

The
St. Petersburg Diaries

(1843–1848)

of Anna McNeill Whistler

Evelyn Jasiulko Harden

THE ST. PETERSBURG DIARIES (1843– 1848) OF ANNA MCNEILL WHISTLER

BY EVELYN JASIULKO HARDEN

ISBN: 978-1-77287-099-2

© Evelyn Jasiulko Harden, 2022

Published by SFU Library, 2022
Simon Fraser University
8888 University Drive, Burnaby, BC, V5A 1S6, Canada

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-NonCommercial-NoDerivatives 4.0 International License.

Available from: <https://doi.org/10.21810/sfulibrary.101>

To the Memory of

Mary Krukowski Jasiulko (1906–1966)
and
Peter Paul Jasiulko (1898–1986), my parents;

Claire Marcia Jasiulko (1930–2008),
my sister;

Edgar Frederick Harden (1932–2009), my husband;

Arial Kromer (1886–1964), the high school teacher who made the difference in my life;

Countess Ekaterina Alekseevna Uvarova Pastukhova (1896–1987)
and Prince Petr Sergeevich Urusov (1899–1984), my professors of Russian;

and for

Edgar F. Harden, my son;

Ghislaine Wood, my daughter-in-law;

and

Mirabelle Harden, my granddaughter

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS .....	iv
MAPS .....	xxiv
PREFACE.....	xxxii
1. SAINT PETERSBURG AND THE JOURNEY THERE .....	1
2. THEIR HOME LIFE AND SOCIAL LIFE .....	23
3. THE WHISTLERS AS THEY WERE IN THE 1840S
George Washington Whistler .....	50
Anna Matilda (McNeill) Whistler .....	79
George William Whistler (George) .....	104
Deborah Delano (Whistler) Haden (Debo) .....	119
James Abbott Whistler (Jemie) .....	132
William McNeill Whistler (Willie) .....	182
4. ANNA WHISTLER'S ST. PETERSBURG DIARIES (1843–1848)
Part I: 1843–1844
Diary .....	192
Notes .....	296
Part II: 1845–1848
Diary .....	598
Notes .....	782
APPENDIX A: EPIGRAPH FROM THE DIARIES .....	1093
APPENDIX B: “EXCERPT FROM THE MARQUIS DE CUSTINES TRAVELS IN RUSSIA IN 1842” .....	1095
APPENDIX C: “LINES ON THE DEATH OF DEAR ELIZTH HASLEWOOD” .....	1097
APPENDIX D: “FROM ELIZA I. WINSTANLEY TO HER SISTER ANNA M. WHISTLER ...” .....	1098
APPENDIX E: BIOGRAPHIES .....	1124
APPENDIX F: “CHORNYI TSVET” (ROMANS) .....	1590
APPENDIX G: PERMISSION FOR RESIDENCE .....	1592

APPENDIX H: SERVICE OF HEIRS.....	1594
APPENDIX I: LETTER TO CATHERINE (MCNEILL) PALMER .....	1606
APPENDIX J: POSSIBLE SKETCH OF JOHN STEVENSON MAXWELL .....	1623
IMAGES
Images 1: Anna Whistler's Extended Family .....	1625
Images 2: Whistlers' Lives in the USA.....	1667
Images 3: Eliza Winstanley's Diary .....	1685
Images 4: Journey to St. Petersburg.....	1701
Images 5: Bobrinskii Mansion .....	1710
Images 6: St. Petersburg .....	1716
Images 7: Imperial Academy of Fine Arts.....	1767
Images 8: Science and the Arts.....	1797
Images 9: Major Whistler's Work and Associates .....	1829
Images 10: St. Petersburg Friends .....	1857
Images 11: Other Important People .....	1881
Images 12: Dr. Edward Maynard .....	1932
Images 13: St. Petersburg Daily Life.....	1945
Images 14: St. Petersburg Environs .....	1984
Images 15: Imperial Family.....	2008
Images 16: Aleksandra Nikolaevna .....	2041
Images 17: 1847 Visit to England .....	2057
Images 18: 1848 Trip to Europe and England .....	2073
LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS.....	2092
BIBLIOGRAPHY .....	2101

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

In preparing this annotated edition of Anna Whistler's St. Petersburg diaries of 1843–1848, I have come to a profound awareness of how beholden I am to the many people and organizations who have helped me. I have accumulated grateful and delighted cause to thank them, which I do now with deep gratitude, great pleasure, and, I hope, sufficient self-effacement.

My research travel would not have been possible without the generosity of funding institutions. I thank the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the International Research and Exchanges Board for their fellowships to do research in St. Petersburg and Moscow; the National Endowment for the Humanities for a summer fellowship to do research in Washington, DC, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; the Office of the Dean of the Faculty of Arts and the Office of the President of Simon Fraser University for numerous research travel grants; and the Dean of Arts Fund for Retired Faculty of Simon Fraser University.

Of the individuals who helped me, my greatest debt is to my London researcher, Michael J. Welch, a fellow nitpicker, whom I thank with all my heart for his astounding familiarity with the archives of the United Kingdom, his thoroughness, unflappableness, modesty, love of research, sound interpretation, and enormous interest in my topic. He has given me years of his life to accomplish my goal, and I can never thank him enough.

Next I want to express my sincerest gratitude to Margaret Ziviski, who beautifully transcribed the very difficult and frustrating manuscript (see Image 6) of Anna Whistler's St. Petersburg diaries as a summer project, while an undergraduate at Simon Fraser University, thus enabling me and all those who did research for me to move ahead.

I am deeply grateful to my colleague, Richard M. Haywood, of Purdue University. We became friends while doing research in the Soviet Union. He shared his knowledge of the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway and the personalities involved long before the materials appeared in his Russia Enters the Railway Age, 1842–1855 (1998). It was also comforting to be able to dine and converse with him and his wife, Piroška, all those cold winter nights.

From the moment I approached the Interlibrary Loan Services (ILL) at Simon Fraser University, the then-head, Sylvia Bell, provided outstanding help, especially in borrowing Russian materials from Russia and Finland, as indeed did every ILL head who succeeded her: Marjorie Nelles, Todd Mundle, Elaine Fairey, Gwen Bird, Scott McKenzie, and Donald Taylor. Alexandra Wawrzyszko-Zielinski provided them with her expertise in Slavic languages and as a bibliographer. Christine Manzer did exemplary work borrowing printed materials for my book while a member of the ILL staff as well as outstanding detailed research in a private capacity for many years, and prepared the list of acknowledgments. Other staff in ILL were also very helpful in various ways: Jannie Swint translated from Dutch; Nancy Blake and Ioana Liuta both capably took over borrowing when their predecessors left ILL; Margo Dykstra bought museum catalogues for me while in Holland; Ian Fell and Anna Raasveldt delivered and retrieved loan materials to and from my home.

Much of my research in Leningrad was carried out in the Central State Archives of the USSR, where I was assigned to work with Agnessa Mukhtan, a generous and knowledgeable archivist, whose help extended to retrieval of materials otherwise unavailable because they were in a part of the building under repair. At the Leningrad Institute of Railway Transport Engineers (LIIZhT),<sup>1</sup> with which I was officially affiliated, I received uncomplicated access to both manuscript and difficult-to-obtain printed materials through the graciousness of the vice-rector, Irina Fadeeva. I also received personal attention from her colleague, Gennadii Afonin, who escorted me every day to and from LIIZhT during the snows of winter. Also at LIIZhT, Marina Pereborova facilitated superb hotel accommodations. At the State Hermitage, Elizaveta Renne, curator of British and Scandinavian Painting, smoothed my access to the Hermitage Archives, paintings in storage, permission for photocopying, and permission to publish photographs of works of art. At the State Russian Museum, Evgenia Petrova, deputy director, arranged access to archival materials concerning Karl Briullov, including his caricatures. At the State Tret'iakov Gallery in Moscow, Lidia Iovleva, deputy director of the Academic Department, arranged for me to meet various staff members of the Manuscript Division. There, Natalia Priimak was especially helpful in contacting staff by telephone at many other archives for immediate answers to my questions. Galina Andreeva, today head of Research and Projects, generously spent time conversing with me about Whistler's drawing teacher, Aleksandr Koritskii, and arranged for me to receive slides and photographs of works of art. Vitold Petiushenko, research director of the State Tret'iakov Gallery, gave permission to publish a caricature of Koritskii by Briullov. At Pushkin House, Vadim Stark took me on a tour of the Whistlers' St. Petersburg.

At the Library of Congress, I am deeply grateful to Robert Allen and David Kraus of the European Division, Charles Kelly of Special Collections, and Grant Harris, present head of the European Division, for quick and easy access to all the materials I wished to see – including unpublished, uncopyrighted material – and the research aid of interns. At the New-York Historical Society, I am deeply grateful to librarian Mariam Touba for her expert knowledge of the manuscript collection, and appreciated her voluble concern over readers' treatment of book and manuscript spines. Later, I profited by her years of correspondence, identifying persons, places, and events connected with New York in the 1840s.

I would like to recognize and thank all of the people whose knowledge, diligence, patience, and good will advanced my research: Gerald Abraham, Dawn Adam, Joan Afferica, Alan C. Aimone, Peter J. Ainscough, Michael Ainsworth, Rev. Canon David Ainsworth, Daria Alavidze, Lee Albright, David Alexander, Peter Alexis, Susan Alland, Martha Looy Allington, Adrienne Aluzzo, Donald Anderle, Peter Anderson, Lena Animmer, Mabel Ansley, Donna Anstey, John Appleby, Terry Ariano, Edward A. Armstrong, Felicity Ashbee, Timothy Ashworth, Norman K. Atkinson, Robert Augustin, Barbara E. Austen, Daniel C. Austin, Eric Austin, Irene Axelrod, Jean M. Ayton, Margot Backas, Prudence Backman, Kaye Bagshaw, Joanna Baird, Judith Baldry, Sharon A. Balius, Loraine Baratti, Melanie Barber, Rosemary Barbour, John D. Barbry, Joan Barker, Bette Barker-Epstein, Roger P. Bartlett, Carrie Bassett, Stephen K. Batalden, Hans Christian Bauer, Fred

Bauman, Charles R. Bawden, Brenda Beech, Dr. Malcolm F. Beeson, Mary Ann Bell, Barbara Bell, D. Bell-Russell, Mary L. Bellagamba, Shari Bellen, Sandra Bender, Mary Morrison Bennett, William Bennett, Avis Berman, Nana Bernhardt, Bryan Berryman, Robert J. Bertholf, R. Calvin Best, Hans Beyer, Mette Bruun Beyer, Herman Beyer-Thoma, C.E. Bidston, H. Bidwell, Sheila Biles, E.G.W. Bill, Clyde Binfield, Alan Bird, Mary Blackford, Pamela Blevins, Richard Blodgett, Katherine L. Blood, Michael Boardman, Norman F. Boas, Tatiana Boiko, Sarah E. Bolce, Richard Bond, Tilo Bönicke, Rt. Rev. Stanley C. Booth-Clibborn, Elmer Booze, Allison Botelho, E.A. Bouchard, John R. Bowles, John E. Bowlst, Kathleen Braden, Torkel R. Bräthen, Andrew Brighton, Rev. Dr. C. Reed Brinkman, Brenda T. Brown, D.A. Brown, David J. Brown, Elisabeth Potts Brown, Jeffery E. Brown, M.N. Brown, Robert Brown, Robert F. Brown, T. Robbins Brown, Robert Brugger, William C. Brumfield, Alexandrina Buchanan, Tricia Buckingham, Margaret Bullock, Jim Burant, Edith Burger, Kevin Burgord, James K. Burkitt, Ann M. Bushey, John W. Buszta, D.J. Butler, Twila Buttimer, D.A.H. Byatt, Harriet Ropes Cabot, John G. Caldwell, Alan Cameron, Robert L. Cammann, Anthony J. Camp, James W. Campbell, James Campbell, Marta Campbell, Patsy J. Campbell, Stephen J. Campbell, Gwyneth Cannan, Ingemar Carlsson, Lynn Carney, Ruth Carr, James Carrott, Susan P. Casteras, Julia Cauchman, M. Sybil Cavanagh, Edward Cazalet, Emma Chambers, Ellen Chances, Kate Cheetham, Ann T. Childs, Faye Chisholm, Michael Chrimes, Vicki L. Chrisman, Suzanne Christoff, Nicolai Cikovsky Jr., Emily Clark, Rosemary K.F. Clarke, Mary Ann Cleveland, Eleanor Clise, C.M. Clubb, Diana Coates, Kenneth R. Cobb, Sandor B. Cohen, Pauline Colec, Cynthia Coleman, Earle E. Coleman, Margaret Coleman, Rebecca B. Colesar, Greg Colley, Clifford Collier, George K. Combs, Nicholas Coney, W.J. Connor, Elizabeth Cook, Rhonda Cooper, Sarah Cooper, William Copeley, John Coulter, Isabel Couperwhite, Gerald Coveney, Ian B. Cowan, Maxwell Craven, John Creasey, Anthony G. Cross, Kimberly Andersen Cumber, V.H. Cummings, Derrick Cunliffe, John H. R. Cunliffe, Kathleen Curney, Jo Currie, Elizabeth Hope Cushing, Jane D'Arcy, Dorothy D'Eletto, Gail S. Davidson, Richard D. Davies, Elliott Davis, Robert Davis, Susan E. Davis, Patricia de Montfort, T. Matthew De Waelsche,

Gary Deans, A. Dearden, Richard Debo, Ruth T. Degenhardt, Melanie Delva, M. I. Demidova, Mrs. P.M. Denney, Maria Deptula, Michael Dever, Frances Dimond, Elizabeth Doctor, Luke Dodd, Vladimir Dovger, Julie Doyle, Nils Drejholt, Rodrigo Aldeia Duarte, Lydia Dufour, Marilyn Duncan, Phillip B. Dunn, Carol Durand, Mark Eastment, S.J. Eccles, Conley L. Edwards, Richard Ekman, R.J. Elvin, D.W. Emberley, Elaine Engst, Lindsay Errington, Anne Escott, Thomas Esper, George Estafy, Godfrey Evans, [illegible first name] Evens, Ian Fell, Irene Ferguson, Evelyn Field, Nancy Finlay, Laurence Fish, Janet Fishman, Jeffrey M. Flannery, Gordon Fleming, Ursula Fletcher, Iain Flett, Michael S. Flier, Mary Flood, Jan Flores, Maureen P. Foley, E. McSherry Fowble, Lydia Foy, Jim Francis, Jonathan Franklin, Stephen Freeth, Monica Friberg, Kathy Fuller, A.L. Fullerton, Patricia Fulton, Richard Fusick, Alisha Gajjar-Fleming, Robin Garton, Julia Gauchman, Doris S. Gauvin, Toby Gearhart, Craig Geddes, Rod Gent, Canon J.E. Gethyn-Jones, Andrea Gibbs, Donald Gibson, Thomas Giebeler, Jennifer Gill, Patricia Gill, Matthew Gilmore, Eleanor Godin, Susan Gold, Pauline Golec, Jeff Goldman, Benjamin E. Goldsmith, Sarah Goodbody, Betsy Goodman, Catherine Goodwin, Ian Graham, Archdeacon William V. Graham, Bobette Grant, Gillian Grant, Mary T. Grant, Audrey Green, A. V. Griffiths, Reiner Gross, Kathleen Guilday, Kathleen Gurney, Milton O. Gustafson, James Gwyn, Jane Hackworth-Young, Bernard Haigh, K. Hall, G.G. Hand, H.A. Hanley, Siobhan Hanratty, Beatriz B. Hardy, James Harris, Suzanne A. Harris, Martha J. Harrison, Joseph Harrison, Negley Harte, Janet M. Hartley, Joan Hartman, Herbert Hartsook, David Haslewood, Rodney S. Hatch III, Bernard Hawkins, Peter Hayden, Wallace Hayden, Bella Hayes, R.W. Hayward, Deirdre L. Haywood, A. Heap, William Heard, A. Heath, John Heath, Bonnie Hedges, Kenneth Heger, Margaret Heilbrun, Alexia Helsley, Dyveke Helsted, John Hemming, Julie Hendy, Colleen Hennessey, Patricia Herlihy, Elizabeth A. Heydt, Walter Hickey, Ian Hill, Michael Hill, Jackie Hillier, Joanne Hillman, Peter Hoare, Bruce G. Hodgson, Sara S. Hodson, H. Hobart Holly, James J. Holmberg, Anastasia Holmes, Marie Holtz, J.T. Hopkins, Maureen Hopkins, Martin Hopkinson, Thomas A. Horrocks, Loren N. Horton, Janis Hourigan, Unn Hovdhanger, Amanda Howard, Jeremy Howard, Geoff

Huenemann, Riordan Huenemann, Rachel Hruszkewycz, Lindsey Hughes, Margaret Humberston, Matthew R. Humphrey, Charles Hunt, Michael Hussey, James H. Hutson, Shelby Hypes, Maureen Ille, David Irwin, Isabel Isaacson, David M. Jackson, Shirley Jackson, Stanley Jackson, John G. James, Bengt Jangfeldt, Jane Janitz-Bond, Chris F.M. Jansen, Gun Jansson, Marcia Jasiulko, Brian Jenner, Henrik Stissing Jensen, Jean Jepson-Page, Rev. Alan F. Jesson, Alice Johnson, Nora V. Johnson, Richard C. Johnson, C.C. Johnston, Michael Johnston, Kathryn E. Jones, Louise T. Jones, William L. Joyce, Tage Kaarsted, Robert Kalleberg, Deborah Martin Kao, Lidia Kapralova, Lena Karlström, Edward Kasinec, Josef Keith, Charles J. Kelly, Laurence Kelly, Dorothy Kemper, Jean M. Kennedy, Roisin Kennedy, Mary Kenyon, Susanna Kerr, Charlotte (Slingerland) Tuttle Kester, Galina Khodasevich, Escon Kilgour, S. Kingra, Juta Kitching, Laurence Kitching, David Knapp, G.A. Knight, Douglas Knock, W. Robert Knocker, Kevin Knoop, Emily J.M. Knox, Marie Koestler, Hope H. Koontz, Dennis Kong, Jeffrey Korman, Veronika Kotila, John Koza, David W. Kraeuter, David Kraus, Vicky Kruckeberg, H. Krugger, Cynthia Hagar Krusell, David Kuzma, Theresa La Bianca, Genevieve Lacambre, Miles Lambert, Clara Lamers, Charles M. Langley, Jesse R. Lankford, Jr., Kurt Larson, William R. Le Fanu, Adrian Le Harivel, Henry W. Lee, Cheryl Leibold, E.G. Leitch, Heather Lemonedes, Susan Sheldon Levy, Peter Liddle, Kenneth Lieger, Laura Linard, Jan Lindroth, Susan Lintelmann, Bert Lippincott, Ioana Liuta, Rebecca Livingston, Christopher Lloyd, Naomi Lloyd, Joel T. Loab, Katharine Lochnan, Jane Lodge Smith, Charles S. Longley, Claude-Ann Lopez, Mildred Lord, Barbara Louie, Stephen Lovell, Jennifer Loveridge, June Lusted, Beverly Lyall, I.F. Lyle, Robert W. Lyle, Catherine A. Lynn, Nancy F. Lyon, Marvin Lyons, Rupert Maas, Ian Macaskill, Declan Macauley, Margaret F. MacDonald, Simone Mace, Colin B. Mackay, Richard Macve, Vera Magyar, Anita Mahoney, Annabel Maingay, Dan Maingay, Hugh Maingay, James W. Maingay, Russell Maingay, David Mander, Brian Manning, Laura Manske, Elizabeth Marcus, Florence M. Marion, Vladimir Markov, Paul Marks, James C. Marshall, Noleen Marshall, Rosalind K. Marshall, Keith Mason, Jean Mauldon, Gloria C. Mayernik, Robert B. Mayo, Shara McCaffrey, James W. McCarthy, Robert A.

McCown, Christine McCullough, Lawrence McDowell, Vivian McDowell, Cynthia McGrath, Dorothy Horton McGee, Philip J. McGreevy, Margaret P. McGrew, Roderick McGrew, Gladys McIntosh, Deborah McKeon-Pogue, Colin A. McLaren, Paul McLaughlin, Hugh McLean, Laurie E. McQueen, Valerie McQuillan, R.J. McWhirter, Rev. Andrew C. Mead, Maria Medina, Rev. Richard F. Meehan, Judith Mellin, Grazia Merler, Linda Merrill, Glenn A. Metzdorf, Stephan Meunier, Peter Michel, Anastasia Miklaieva, Harold L. Miller, Yuriy Miller, George McLean Milne, Stig Miss, Rose Marie Mitten, Rachel Moffat, Elizabeth H. Moger, Roanne Mokhtar, James E. Mooney, K. Moore, Merl M. Moore, Robert Moore, B. Ann Moorehouse, Gary L. Morgan, Vladimir Morosan, Richard Mortimer, Gottfried Mraz, Laura Muir, C. Elsie Mullineux, Cynthia Murphy, Mark K. Murphy, Mary Eleanor Murphy, Mary Murray, Michael P. Musick, Fiona Myles, Gerd Nauhaus, William Nedderman, Walter Neutel, Jeanne T. Newlin, Jennifer Newman, Charles Newton, Kathie O. Nicastro, Mary-Anne Nichols, Cindy Nickerson, Charles Niles, Catrin Norrby, Susan North, Brad Nugent, Claire Nutt, Caroline Sue Heimlich Nutty, John P. O'Connor, William J. O'Neil, Francis P. O'Neill, Anne Odom, Eda Offutt, Kate Ohno, Joseph Oldenburg, Lindy J. Brunkhorst Olewine, Betty Olmsted, Jane M. Oppenheimer, M. John Orbell, Leonée Ormond, Richard Ormond, Sharon Orton, Geoffrey Oxley, Sally Pagan, Richard Palmer, Foster M. Palmer, John Panter, Brad Parker, Pamela Parker, Erika Parris, M. Pearsall, Aldo Perdomo, Etta L. Perkins, Winston C. Perry, Jr., Kathy Petersen, Martin E. Peterson, Raymond Petke, Catherine J. Phillips, [illegible first name] Picco, D.A. Pipe, Francesca Pitaro, Harvey Pitcher, Barbara J. Pittman, Trevor K. Plante, J. B. Post, Cicely Poulton, Claire Prechtel-Kluskens, Robin Price, Benjamin Primer, S. Hardy Prince, William Prince, Jean Marie Proclous, Stuart Pyhrr, Mikhail Piotrovskii, Hanne Quillévére, Amy Rachlin, Sandra Rayser Ragonese, Martin Ramsbottom, Lilian Randall, Debra Randorf, Garner F. Ranney, John Rashford, Jennie Rathbun, U. Rathje, William M. Read, Boyd Reese, Kristen Regina, Kathleen M. Reilly, Greta Reisel, Jon K. Reynolds, Catherine Rice, Mrs. M. Richards, Peter Richards, James F. Ridge, Susan Rigby, Mary Livingston Ripley, Joan Ritcey, Amy Roberts, Amy J. Roberts, E. Wyn Roberts, The Honourable Mrs. Jane Roberts, John

Roberts, J.G.W. Roberts, Mary Robertson, Pamela Robertson, A.S. Robinson, Belle Robinson, Eric Robinson, Rev. Mark R.K. Robinson, Ingrid Roderick, Taryn Rodriguez-Boette, Wolfgang Rohdewald, Catherine Rohr, Scott Roller, Priscilla Roosevelt, Alison Rosie, Frances H. Rossen, Blair A. Ruble, P.K. Rybin, Larissa Salmina-Haskell, Christa Sammons, John M. Sanderson, Corrado A. Santoro, Jacquelyn Sapiie, R. J. Sargent, Norman Saul, D. Gail Saunders, Gerald Saunders, Joan Scafarello, Henry Scannell, Paul Scensny, Daniel L. Schafer, Peter L. Schaffer, Kenneth P. Scheffel, Barry P. Scherr, Judith Ann Schiff, Kathy Schneberger, William H. Schoeffler, Norah Schuster, Janet B. Schwartz, John Scott, Linda Seckelson, Richard Sgritta, Ms. P. Shah, Margaret Sharp, Robert Sharp, Alexander Shchedrinski, Ellen Shea, Alice D. Sheriff, M.F. Shrimpton, Richard A. Shrader, V. K. Shuiskii, Judith A. Sibley, Donna Sidney, Mary Sillitto, John Singleton, Wendy Sjolin, Richard Slocum, John J. Slonaker, Helen Smailes, Martha H. Smart, Caron Smith, Janet Smith, Janet T. Smith, Judith A. Smith, Robin Smith, Shelley Smith, Virginia Smith, Virginia Smyers, Edward Smyk, Egill Snorasson, Kristin L. Spangenberg, Robin Spencer, Shirley Spragge, Colin Squires, Vadim Stark, S. Frederick Starr, Christopher Steele, Brooke M. Stephens, Jack Stevens, Patrick J. Stevens, William P. Stevens, Sarah Stevenson, John D. Stinson, Christine Stocker, Mrs. C. Storey, Jean Straub, Christine Strickland, Marcia Stuart, Mary Stuart, Vladimir Suslov, Brenda Sutton, Jane Sutton, Jane C. Sween, Gil Swift, Leanne Szwarc, Anne Tait, Jennifer Tann, Hugh M. Traphagen, Barbara D. Tarr, Richard Taruskin, JoAnne M. Tautamens, Alistair Tebbit, Martha Tedeschi, Natalia Teletova, Beverly Tetterton, Mary M. Thacher, Elise Thall, Jenifer Thewalt, Graham Thomas, Teresa Thompson, Stuart Thompstone, Alex Thomson, Boris Thomson, Robert Thorne, Michael Thornton, Nigel Thorp, George Thuronyi, Joseph Till, Lev Timofeev, Irina Tokareva, Lori Tollman, Steven R. Tomlinson, Sonja Tompkins, Anne K. Toohey, Susanne Torgard, Alistair Tough, Hoang Tran, Jean Trapido-Rosenthal, Carol Troyen, Reto Tschan, Ann Tumavicius, Donna Turbes, Charles Turpie, Robert G. Turvey, Susan Tyler, Martin Tyson, Jennifer Ulrich, Antônio Carlos Conçalves Valerio, M.A. van Anrooij, Karen Van Westering, Nick Van Wuyckhuysse, Erik Vandamme, John K. Vandereedt, Very Rev. Marshall J. Vang, Noel

VanGorden, Susan Varga, Brien Varnado, Peter G. Vasey, John Vaughan, Olga Verbitskaia, Anne Verplanck, Susan Vicinelli, Margaret Victoria, P.F.Vimpfen, Jacqueline Viswanathan, Helen Volkow, Dr. Annette von Boetticher, Wilhelm von Rosen, Cynthia Wall, Marlene Wallin, William J. Walsh, S.W. Walton, James Ward, Jane Ward, Elizabeth Watson, Helen Watson, Kathryn Watson, Mary Weaver, Susan D. Weinandy, Sohier Welch, F. T. Weyell, John Whitaker, John C. Whitaker, John H. White, David Whitford, Otto Wiehmann, David Wigdor, Tracy Wilcox, Jocelyn K. Wilk, C. Wilkins-Jones, John S. Williams, Judith Wilson, Timothy Wilson, Diana Winterbotham, Melanie Wisner, Allis Wolfe, Rev. Eric B. Wood, Donald M. Woodward, Peter J. Wosh, Geoffrey Wright, John Wright, Nanci A. Young, Peter Young, Nicholas Žekulin, Roberta Zonghi, and Marina Zubkova. I apologize if there is anyone whose name has been omitted.

The following institutions were generous in helping solve research questions, lending published works and permitting copying of unpublished works: A La Vieille Russie, Inc. (New York); A.C. Cooper, Ltd. (London, UK); Aberdeen University Library (Scotland); Airdrie Library (Scotland); Akademiia Khudozhestv [Academy of Fine Arts] (AKh) (St. Petersburg); Albany Cemetery Association (NY); Albright-Knox Art Gallery (Buffalo, NY); Alexandria Library, Lloyd House (VA); Amberly House (Plymouth, UK); American Bible Society (New York); American Philosophical Society (Philadelphia); Anglican Church of Canada—General Synod (Toronto, ON); Angus District Council (Scotland); Archdiocese of Hartford (CT); Archdiocese of Philadelphia Archives; Archiv der Hansestadt (Lübeck, Germany); Archives of American Art (Washington, DC); Archives of Ontario (Toronto); Archives of St. James Church of Kingsessing (PA); Archives of St. Mark's Church Worsley (Manchester, UK); Archives of the Episcopalian Church (Austin, TX); Arkhiv dvortsov-muzeev v Tsarskom Sele [Archives of the Palace-Museums in Tsarskoe Selo]; Arkhiv vneshnei politiki Rossiiskoi imperii [Archive of Foreign Policy of the Russian Empire] (Moscow); Art Gallery of Ontario (Toronto); Art Institute of Chicago, Department of Prints and Drawings; Ashmolean Museum, Department of Prints and Drawings (Oxford, UK); Bacon Memorial District Library (Wyandotte, MI); Bank of England Archive

(London, UK); Bank of New York; Bank of Scotland, Executive Office (Edinburgh); Baring Brothers, Ltd. (London, UK); Beauport, Sleeper-McCann House (Gloucester, MA); Bentley Historical Library (Ann Arbor, MI); Berkshire Athenaeum (Pittsfield, MA); Berkshire County Historical Society (Pittsfield, MA); Bernadotte Library, Royal Palace (Stockholm); Bernadotteska Arkivet (Stockholm); Bernardston Books (Bernardston, MA); Bethnal Green Museum of Childhood (London, UK); Bibliothèque nationale suisse (Berne, Switzerland); Bladen County Public Library (Elizabethtown, NC); Bodleian Library, Department of Western Manuscripts (Oxford, UK); Boston Public Library (MA); Boston Public Library, Rare Books & Manuscripts Department; Boston University Libraries, Howard Gotlieb Archival Research Center; Bowdoin College Library (ME); Braintree Historical Society (MA); Bristol Yearly Meeting (UK); British Consulate-General (Vancouver, BC); British Library, Music Library (London, UK); British Library, Photographic Section; British Museum, Department of Manuscripts (London, UK); Brompton Cemetery (London, UK); Brooklyn Historical Society (NY); Buckingham Town Council (UK); Buckinghamshire County Council (UK); Buckinghamshire Record Office; Bundesarchiv (Koblenz, Germany); Butterworth Law Publishers, Ltd.; Calvary Cemetery (Chicopee, MA); Calvary Church (Stonington, CT); Cambridge University Library, Bible Society's Library (Cambridge, UK); Canadian Yearly Meeting Archives, Pickering College (ON); Canonbury House (London, UK); Case Western Reserve University (Cleveland, OH); Cathedral of All Saints (Albany, NY); Catholic Diocese of Springfield (MA); Charleston Friends Meeting (SC); Cheshire County Council (Chester, UK); Chicago Historical Society; Christ Church (Georgetown, DC); Christ Church (New Brunswick, NJ); Church Missionary Society (London, UK); Cincinnati Art Museum (OH); Cincinnati Historical Society; City of Bristol Archives (UK); City of Detroit Historical Department; City of Dundee District Council (Scotland); City of Edinburgh Library Services; City of Glasgow District Council; City of Liverpool Office of Population Census and Surveys; City of London Archives, Schoolmistresses and Governesses Benevolent Institution (UK); City of London, Guildhall Library and Art Galleries (UK); City of Manchester Central Library (UK); City of York

Council, Education Services (UK); College of Physicians of Philadelphia; Columbia University, Low Memorial Library, University Archives and Columbiana Library (New York); Concord Free Public Library (MA); Connecticut Historical Society (Hartford, CT); Connecticut State Library, History and Genealogy Unit (Hartford, CT); Connecticut Valley Historical Museum (Springfield, MA); Cooper-Hewitt National Design Museum Archives (New York); Cornell University, Carl A. Kroch Library, Division of Rare and Manuscript Collections (Ithaca, NY); Cornwall County Council (UK); Cotuit Federated Church (MA); Cotuit Historical Society (MA); County Library Headquarters (Preston, UK); Department of Archives (Nassau, Bahamas); Department of Cultural Resources (Raleigh, NC); Department of Libraries & Theatres, Central Library, St. Peter's Square (Manchester, UK); Der Innenminster des Landes Schleswig-Holstein (Kiel, Germany); Derby City Council Museum and Art Gallery (UK); Derby City Council, Nottingham Road Cemetery; Derbyshire County Library (UK); Detroit Public Library, Burton Historical Collection (MI); Diocese of Huron Archives (London, ON); Diocese of Huron Synod Office; Diocese of Manchester (UK); Diocese of Maryland; Diocese of Springfield (MA); Diocese of Springfield Catholic Cemeteries (MA); District Central Library, Blackpool (UK); District of Columbia, Public Library; Dr. Williams's Library (London, UK); Durham County Council (UK); Edinburgh Central Library (Scotland); Edinburgh University Library, Department of Manuscripts; English Heritage (Victoria University at University of Toronto); Enoch Pratt Free Library (Baltimore, MD); Episcopal Diocese of Massachusetts (Boston); Episcopal Diocese of New Jersey (Trenton); Essex County Council Archives (Chelmsford, UK); Essex Institute (Salem, MA); Essex Record Office (UK); Falkirk District Council, Falkirk Museums (Scotland); Family History Section of The Yorkshire Archaeological Society (UK); Fife Regional Council Corporate Services Department (Kirkcaldy Registration District) (Scotland); Filson Club Historical Society (Louisville, KY); Fogg Art Museum, Harvard University (Cambridge, MA); Freer Gallery of Art (Washington, DC); Frick Art Reference Library (New York); Gallery Mayo (Richmond, VA); Garton & Co., Print Dealers & Publishers (Wiltshire, UK); Genealogical Library, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Salt Lake City, UT); Genealogical Society of Rockland County (NY); Genealogical Society of Utah (Salt Lake City); General Register Office for England and Wales (GRO); General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church (New York); Geneva Historical Society (NY); Georgetown Regional Branch of District of Columbia Public Library; Georgetown University, Laninger Library (Washington, DC); Georgia Historical Society (Savannah); Germanic Genealogy Society (Saint Paul, MN); Glasgow City Council; Glasgow City Council, Library Department; Glasgow University Archives; Glasgow University Library, Special Collections; Gloucester Library (MA); Gosudarstvennaia Tret'iakovskaia Galereia Rukopisnyi otdel [State Tret'iakov Gallery Manuscript Division] (St. Petersburg); Gosudarstvennyi Ėrmitazh Rukopisnyi otdel [State Hermitage Museum Manuscript Division] (St. Petersburg); Gosudarstvennyi Russkii Muzei Rukopisnyi otdel [State Russian Museum Manuscript Division] (St. Petersburg); Greater London Record Office (UK); Green Mount Cemetery (MD); Green-Wood Cemetery (Brooklyn, NY); Hackney Archives Department (London, UK); Harris Museum and Art Gallery (Preston, UK); Harvard Business School, Baker Library, Historical Collections Department (Cambridge, MA); Harvard Law School; Harvard University Alumni Archives; Harvard University Archives; Harvard University, Houghton Library Theatre Collection; Harvard University, Lamont Library; Harvard University, Schlesinger Library of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Studies; Harvard University, Widener Library; Haverford College, The Quaker Collection (Haverford, PA); Helsinki University Library; High Museum of Art (Atlanta, GA); Hillwood Museum and Garden (Washington, DC); Historic New Orleans Collection (LA); Historical Society of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia); Historical Society of Rockland County (NY); Historical Society of Washington, DC; Hobart and William Smith Colleges, Warren Hunting Smith Library (Geneva, NY); Holyoke Public Library (MA); Hull City Council (UK); Hull Trinity House, Yorkshire (UK); Humberside City Council Leisure Services (Hull, UK); Humberside Libraries; Iberia Parish Libraries (LA); Incorporated Synod of The Diocese of Ontario of the Anglican Church of Canada (Kingston, ON); Institut russkoi literatury, Pushkinskii dom [Institute of Russian Literature, Pushkin House] (St. Petersburg); Institution of Civil

Engineers (London, UK); Institution of Civil Engineers Library; Inverclyde Council (Scotland); Isle of Wight County Council (UK); Jacksonville Historical Society (FL); Jenner Museum & Conference Center (Berkeley, Gloucestershire, UK); John Dixon Library, The Lawrenceville School (NJ); John Jay College of Criminal Justice (New York); Jonathan Clark Ltd. Fine Art (London, UK); Kendal Library (Cumbria, UK); Kennan Institute, Woodrow Wilson Center (Washington, DC); Kent County Council, Arts & Libraries (UK); Kentucky Genealogical Society (Frankfort, KY); Kilkenny Archaeological Society (Ireland); Kilkenny County Library; København's Bymuseum (Denmark); Koninklijk Museum voor Schone Kunsten Antwerpen (Belgium); Lambeth Palace Library (London, UK); Lancashire County Council (UK); Lancashire County Council Library; Lancashire County Council Library, Poulton Historical Society; Lancaster District Central Library (UK); Latvijas Nacionālā Bibliotēka [National Library of Latvia] (Riga, Latvia); Lawrenceville School Archives (NJ); Lebanon County Historical Society (PA); Lebanon Historical Society, Inc. (CT); Lebanon Town Clerk (CT); Leeds Central Library Local History Division (UK); Leeds County Council; Leeds District Archives; Leeds University Library, Leeds Russian Archive, Brotherton Library; Leningradskii institut inzhenerov zheleznodorozhnogo transporta [Leningrad Institute of Railway Transport Engineers] Archives and Library (St. Petersburg); Lennoxlove House (Haddington, Scotland); Library of Congress, Copyright Division (Washington, DC); Library of Congress, European Division; Library of Congress, Geography and Map Division; Library of Congress, Local History and Genealogy Room; Library of Congress, Manuscript Division; Library of Congress, Music Division; Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division; Library of Congress, Rare Book Room; Library of the College of Physicians of Philadelphia; Library of the General Theological Seminary of The Episcopal Church (New York); Library of the National Society Daughters of the American Revolution (Washington, DC); Lincolnshire County Council Archives (UK); Linlithgow Library (Scotland); Liverpool Record Office (UK); Livrustkammaren (Stockholm); Local History Centre of Libraries Division of Lewisham Leisure (London, UK); London Borough of

Greenwich (UK); London Metropolitan Archives (UK); Longridge Historical Society (UK); Lowell City Library (MA); Lowell Corporation for the Humanities, Inc. (Chelmsford, MA); Lowell Historical Society (MA); Lowell National Historical Park (MA); Lutheran All Faiths Cemetery (New York); M.H. de Young Memorial Museum (San Francisco, CA); Mackinac State Historic Parks (Mackinaw City, MI); Maine State Archives (Augusta, ME); Manchester Central Library (UK); Manchester City Council, City Art Galleries (UK); Marischal Museum, Aberdeen (Scotland); Martin Luther King Memorial Library (Washington, DC); Maryland Historical Society (Baltimore); Massachusetts Archives at Columbia Point (Boston); Massachusetts Historical Society (Boston); Memorial University (St. John's, NF); Memorial University, Centre for Newfoundland Studies; Metropolitan Borough of Wirral, Department of Leisure Services and Tourism (Liverpool, UK); Metropolitan Museum of Art Library and Archives (New York); Metropolitan Wigan Department of Leisure (Manchester, UK); Middleton Place (Charleston, SC); Middletown Historical Society (CT); Milwaukee Public Library (WI); Ministério de Justiça Arquivo Nacional (Rio de Janeiro); Minnesota Museum of Art (Saint Paul); Missouri Historical Society (St. Louis); Montgomery County Historical Society, Inc. (Rockville, MD); Mount Hope Cemetery (Rochester, NY); Musée d'Orsay (Paris); Museum Boijmans Van Beuningen (Rotterdam); Museum of Childhood (Anglesey, Wales); Museum of Fine Arts (Boston); Museum of the City of New York Archives; Musica Russica (Madison, CT); National Archives (UK); Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts (London, UK); National Archives (US) (Washington, DC); National Archives at College Park (MD); National Archives of Canada (Ottawa); National Archives of Canada, Historical Resources; National Archives of Canada, Public Programs; National Archives of Denmark (Copenhagen); National Archives of Scotland (Edinburgh); National Archives of Scotland, Historical Search Section; National Archives of Scotland, Scottish Record Office; National Archives of Sweden (Stockholm); National Archives of the United Kingdom (Kew, Richmond, London, UK); National Archives of the United States of America (Washington, DC); National Gallery of Art (Washington, DC); National Gallery of Ireland (Dublin); National

Gallery of Scotland (Edinburgh); National Library of Scotland (Edinburgh); National Library of Scotland, Department of Special Collections; National Library of Wales (Aberystwyth); National Maritime Museum (Greenwich, UK); National Museum of American History (Washington, DC); National Museum of Science & Industry, Science Museum Library (Washington, DC); National Museums Scotland; National Portrait Gallery (Washington, DC); National Register of Archives (Scotland); Naval Historical Center (Washington, DC); New Brunswick Museum (Saint John); New England Historical Genealogical Society (Boston); New Hampshire Historical Society (Concord, NH); New Hanover County Public Library (NC); New Haven Colony Historical Society (CT); New Haven Free Public Library (CT); New Jersey Historical Society (Newark, NJ); New Jersey State Archives (Trenton, NJ); New London County Historical Society (CT); New Orleans Public Library, Louisiana Division; New York City Municipal Archives; New York Genealogical and Biographical Society; New York Public Library; New York Public Library, Rare Books and Manuscripts Division; New York Public Library, Slavonic Division; New York State Bar Association; New York State Historical Association; New York Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, Haviland Records Room; New-York Historical Society; New-York Historical Society Library, Special Collections; Newberry Library (Chicago); Newfoundland Historical Society (St. John's, NF); Newport Historical Society (RI); Niedersächsisches Hauptstaatsarchiv (Hanover, Germany); Norfolk County Council Library & Information Service (UK); Norfolk Record Office (UK); North Carolina Department of Cultural Resources (Raleigh); North Carolina State Archives; North Yorkshire County Library (UK); North Yorkshire County Library, Division Headquarters; Nova Scotia Department of Education (Halifax); Nyack Library (NY); Office of the City Clerk (Lowell, MA); Office of Communications of Trinity Church in the City of New York; Office of Population Census & Surveys (London, UK); Office of Recorder of Deeds, City of St. Louis; Office of the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; Office of the Town Clerk (Lebanon, CT); Oldham Metropolitan Borough (Manchester, UK); Ontario Genealogical Society (Toronto); Oregon Historical Society (Portland, OR); Oslo Kommune (Norway); Osteuropa

Institut München / Historische Abteilung (Munich, Germany); Pasold Research Fund, London School of Economics (UK); Passaic County Historical Society (Paterson, NJ); Peabody Essex Museum (Salem, MA); Peel Estates, Ltd.; Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts (Philadelphia); Philadelphia Archdiocesan Historical Research Center; Philadelphia Center for Early American History; Philadelphia City Archives; Philips International B.V. (Eindhoven, Netherlands); Pollard Memorial Library (Lowell, MA); Portland Art Museum (OR); Poulton-le-Fylde Historical Society (UK); Presbyterian Church (USA) Office of History (Philadelphia, PA); Presbyterian Church (USA) Office of the General Assembly; Preston Cemetery (UK); Preston Historical Society (UK); Princeton University Library Archives (Princeton, NJ); Princeton University, Seeley G. Mudd Manuscript Library; Principal Registry of the Family Division, Record Keeper's Department, Probate Sub-Registry York (UK); Provincial Archives of New Brunswick (Fredericton); Provincial Archives of Newfoundland & Labrador (St. John's); Public Archives of Nova Scotia (Halifax); Public Record Office (Chancery Lane, London and Kew, Richmond, London, UK); Putnam Museum, Quad Cities (Davenport, IA); Regional State Archives of Oslo; Ribchester Museum of Roman Antiquities (UK); Ribchester Museum Trust; Rigsarkivet (Copenhagen); Rijksarchief voor de centrale regeringsarchieven vanaf 1795 (Den Haag, Netherlands); Robert-Schumann-Haus (Zwickau, Germany); Roman Catholic Diocese of Hartford (CT); Rossiiskaia natsional'naia biblioteka [Russian National Library] (St. Petersburg); Rossiiskaia natsional'naia biblioteka Otdel rukopisei [Russian National Library Manuscript Division] (St. Petersburg); Rothschild Archive (London, UK); Royal Archives, Windsor Castle (UK); Royal Collection, St. James Palace (London, UK); Royal Collection, Windsor Castle, Print Room (UK); Royal College of Surgeons of England (London, UK); Royal Geographical Society (London, UK); Russian American Cultural Center at Russia Wharf, Inc. (Boston); Rutgers University, Archibald S. Alexander Library, Special Collections and University Archives (New Brunswick, NJ); Sächsisches Hauptstaatsarchiv Dresden (Germany); Saint Thomas Church Fifth Avenue (New York); Salem Public Library (MA); Salford Local History Library (UK); Saltash Local History Society (Cornwall, UK); San Diego

Museum of Art (CA); Scarborough Library, Yorkshire County Council (UK); Scarsdale Public Library (NY); School of Oriental and African Studies (London, UK); Schuyler County Historical Society (Montour Falls, NY); Scott County Iowa Genealogical Society (Davenport, IO); Scottish National Portrait Gallery (Edinburgh); Seattle Pacific University; Senat der Freien und Hansestadt (Hamburg); Simon Fraser University, Office of the Dean of Arts (Burnaby, BC); Simon Fraser University, W.A.C. Bennett Library Special Collections; Simon Fraser University, W.A.C. Bennett Library, Interlibrary Loans Department; Society of Genealogists (London, UK); Society of Merchant Venturers (Bristol, UK); Sotheby's, Dept of Printed Books & Manuscripts (New York); South Carolina Department of Archives and History (Charleston, SC); South Carolina Historical Society (Charleston, SC); Springfield Cemetery (MA); Springfield City Library (MA); St. Augustine Historical Society (FL); St. James Cemetery and Crematorium (Toronto); St. Johnsbury Athenaeum (VT); St. Louis Genealogical Society; St. Louis Historical Society; St. Louis Public Library; St. Paul's Episcopal Church (Brunswick, ME); St. Peter's Church (Albany, NY); Staatsbibliothek Zu Berlin; State Historical Society of Iowa; State Historical Society of Iowa, Library; State Historical Society of Iowa, Special Collections; State Historical Society of Wisconsin; State Library of Connecticut (Hartford); State Library of Florida, Florida Collection; State Library of North Carolina; State of New Jersey, Department of Education State Library; Staten Island Historical Society (NY); Staten Island Institute of Arts and Sciences; Statens Arkiver (Copenhagen); Stockholms Stadsarkiv; Stonington Historical Society Library (CT); Strokestown Park Famine Museum (County Roscommon, Ireland); Surname Hodgson Association and Resources Enterprise (Toronto); Tate Gallery (London, UK); The Commonwealth of Massachusetts Archives (Boston); The Huntington Library (San Marino, CA); The Library, Friends House (London, UK); The Maas Gallery Ltd. (London, UK); The Royal Society (London, UK); Thorvaldsen Museum (Copenhagen); Thorvaldsen Museum Library and Archives; Toledo-Lucas County Public Library (OH); Toronto Reference Library; Town of Oyster Bay (NY); Town of Pomfret (CT); Town of Windham (CT); Trinity Church (New York); Tsentral'nyi gosudarstvennyi arkhiv

literaturny i iskusstva [Central State Archive of Literature and Art (Moscow); Tsentral'nyi gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv Sanktpeterburga [Central State Historical Archive of St. Petersburg]; Tsentral'nyi gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv SSSR [Central State Historical Archive of the USSR] (now Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv [Russian State Historical Archives]) (St. Petersburg); Tulane University, Louisiana Collection (New Orleans, LA); U. Grant Miller Library of Washington and Jefferson College (Washington, PA); Union Theological Seminary (New York); United Church of Canada Archives (Toronto); United States Military Academy (West Point, NY); United States Military Academy Library; United States Military Academy Library, Special Collections; University College London, College Art Collections; University College of Wales (Aberystwyth, Wales); University of Aberdeen Library; University of Birmingham Library; University of British Columbia, Walter C. Koerner Library (Vancouver, BC); University of Buffalo; University of Durham; University of Edinburgh; University of Glasgow, Centre for Whistler Studies; University of Glasgow, Hunterian Museum and Art Gallery; University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign Library; University of Iowa Library, Special Collections (Iowa City); University of Kansas, Kenneth Spencer Library, Special Collections (Lawrence); University of Manchester (UK); University of Michigan, Engineering Libraries (Ann Arbor); University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, Wilson Library; University of Nottingham Library, Special Collections (UK); University of Pennsylvania Archives (Philadelphia); University of South Carolina, The South Caroliniana Library (Columbia); US Army Military History Institute (Carlisle, PA); US Naval Academy (Annapolis, MD); Vancouver School of Theology Archives (BC); Victoria and Albert Museum Library (London, UK); Victoria and Albert Museum, Textiles and Dress; Virginia Historical Society (Richmond); Vor Frue Kirke (Copenhagen); Wadsworth Athenaeum (Hartford, CT); Walters Art Gallery (Baltimore, MD); Wellcome Institute for the History of Medicine (London, UK); Wellcome Library for the History and Understanding of Medicine (London, UK); West Lothian Council Education & Cultural Services (Scotland); West Sussex Record Office (UK); West Yorkshire Archives Service (UK); Westerly Public Library (RI); Westfield Athenaeum (MA);

Westminster Abbey Muniment Room and Library (London, UK); Westport Public Library (CT); Whistler House Museum of Art (Lowell, MA); Whistler House Museum of Art Archives; Wigan Metropolitan Borough Council (Manchester, UK); Winterthur Museum (DE); Wisconsin Historical Society (Madison); Woodland Cemetery (Coopersburg, PA); Woodmere Art Museum (Philadelphia, PA); Yale Center for British Art (New Haven, CT); Yale University Alumni Archives; Yale University Archives; Yale University Library; Yale University Library, Beinecke Rare Books and Manuscript Library; York House (London, UK); York Library (Toronto, ON); York Minster Archives (UK); Yorkshire County Council (UK); Zephaniah Kingsley Plantation (Jacksonville, FL). I apologize if there is any institution whose name has been omitted.

I want also to express my gratitude to friends and to representatives of organizations that offered me hospitality during my research travels: Galina Andreeva (Moscow), Richard Blodgett (Stonington, CT), Elena Borovskaia (St. Petersburg), Harriet Ropes Cabot (Cotuit, MA), Judith Chayes (Washington, DC), Faye Chisholm (Vancouver), Rosemary K.F. Clarke (London), Ann and Carlton Colcord (London), Florance Scott Conway (New Orleans), Dana D'Anzi (New Orleans), Melanie Delva (Vancouver), Louise Donovan (Cambridge, MA), Elizabeth and Emmons Ellis (Winchester, MA), Irina Fadeeva (St. Petersburg), Ghislaine and Edgar Harden (New York, London, Norwich), Joan Hartman (New York), Piroška Molnar Haywood (West Lafayette, IN), Norman Henley (Baltimore), Lois Hermann (Washington, DC), Marcia Jasiulko (New York), Linda and Laurence Kelly (London), Annabel Maingay (London), Hope and Hugh Maingay (Norwich), Jennifer Newman (Colchester, UK), Jean Parrish (Princeton, NJ), Elizaveta Renne (St. Petersburg), Sandy Fulton Rosenthal (New Orleans), Larissa Salmina-Haskell (Oxford), Vadim Stark and Natalia Teletova (St. Petersburg), Shirley and James Tang (Washington, DC), Mary and Peter Thacher (Stonington, CT), Lev Timofeev (St. Petersburg), Donald Voss (Alexandria, VA), Elsie Weigand Weidner (Philadelphia), Michael Welch (London).

My debt to my family is also great: to my late gallant husband, Edgar, who, during the eighteen-years he survived prostate and bone cancer, translated materials from German, did research and helped prepare the bibliography; to my son, Edgar, who did research and encouraged me, especially as I approached the home stretch; to my daughter-in-law, Ghislaine Wood, long in the Research Department of the Victoria and Albert Museum, who understood the magnitude of the effort and did research; and to my granddaughter, Mirabelle, just because.

Not least, I wish to express my undying gratitude to my editor, Karyn Huenemann (Vancouver, BC) for her willingness to undertake this enormous and complicated project and to give it orderliness and shape, all with humor, patience, and an appreciated low-decibel level of discussion, much of our mutual effort accomplished over the telephone and by courier during the COVID-19 crisis. Brava!

I would also like to thank SFU Library Digital Publishing for accepting my work for publication, especially Kate Shuttleworth, Digital Publishing Librarian, who has guided me through the details of the publication process.

NOTE

1. LIIZhT is the acronym for the Leningradskii institut inzhenerov zheleznodorozhnogo transporta in St. Petersburg. In 1993, it became a university: Peterburgskii Gosudarstvennyi Universitet Putei Soobshcheniia Imperatora Aleksandra I [Emperor Alexander I St. Petersburg State Transport University]. I have chosen to continue using LIIZhT as an identifier.

MAPS

The first map shows St. Petersburg in 1844. Following that are three maps showing the house numbers and owners' names in the environs of the English Embankment and Galernaia Street, exactly as provided in Nistrem's Adres-Kalendar' Sanktpeterburgskikh zhitelei.<sup>1</sup>

The English Embankment was located on the left bank of the Neva River, between Isaac Bridge and Galley Wharf. Behind the English Embankment and parallel to it was Galernaia Street, on a corner of which stood the Bobrinskii mansion. The Whistler family lived in this mansion from late September 1843 until May 1844. On the English Embankment opposite the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts stood Ritter's house. The Whistlers lived in an apartment in this house from September 1844 until May 1849.

The surnames of house owners as supplied by Nistrem appear in the genitive case, because in Russian house + of + surname is understood. I have put these surnames into the Russian nominative case in English transliterations. If the same surname appears for the house on both the English Embankment and Galernia Street, it means that the property occupies the entire lot. If a different surname appears for the house on the English Embankment and Galernia Street, it means that each property occupies a portion of the lot. In some instances – for example, Borg and Borkh – I do not know whether these are two different surnames or a misspelling; in Russian the “kh” is a single letter of the alphabet (“x”) but does not resemble “g” (“r”) in its shape. In instances where the house owner has a foreign surname ending in a consonant – for example, Ritter – only the masculine surname is declined in Russian; the female version of the same surname is not declined. Thus, “Rittera” on the Russian language map indicates that the owner is a man, while “Ritter” indicates that the owner is a woman. This distinction is unwieldy to represent on an English language map, and is unnecessary for my purposes, and so is omitted. I am chiefly interested in the Bobrinskii and Ritter houses. As well, the house numbers provided by Nistrem do not always correspond to the addresses for individuals given in other sources, such as mandatory departure announcements published in the Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti (St. Petersburg News) so that travelers' debtors would be apprized. See "St. Petersburg and the Journey There" for more details about the Whistlers' and their neighbors' residences.

ST. PETERSBURG, 1844<sup>2</sup>

THE ENGLISH EMBANKMENT AND SURROUNDS, ST. PETERSBURG, 1844<sup>3</sup>

This map situates the following street and house maps within the larger context of the area around Galernaia Street and the English Embankment. The area shown here is marked by a black rectangle on the preceding 1844 map of St. Petersburg.

THE ENGLISH EMBANKMENT

GALERNAIA STREET

FROM PETER'S SQUARE, WHICH IS BY THE BUILDING OF THE GOVERNING SENATE, TO THE NEW ADMIRALTY

ADMIRALTY CANAL

FROM THE BUILDING OF THE MOST HOLY SYNOD TO THE MOIKA RIVER

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, 1846

A map of the United States as it appeared in 1846<sup>6</sup> is included here, because the controversy between the United States and British governments over the Oregon Territory and the war between the United States and Mexico arising from the desire of the former to annex Texas were important political issues in 1846–1848. Anna Whistler personally did not wish to have to choose between allegiance to the United States or to England, because she loved both countries. In the case of Mexico, she was distressed that both her husband's brother and nephew would be called up for active duty. See the entries in Part II of the Diaries for Thursday 10th April [1845] and accompanying Note 69, Friday evening [January] 9th [1846] and accompanying Note 263, July 7th [1846] and accompanying Note 410, and [Saturday] November 14th [1846] and accompanying Notes 565 and 567.

NOTES

1. Nistrem, K., comp., Adres-Kalendar' Sanktpeterburgskikh zhitelei [Address Directory of St. Petersburg Residents], 2 vols. (St. Petersburg: V tipografii III Otd. Sobstv. E.I. V. Kantseliarii, 1844).
2. Plan von St. Petersburg (Sanktpeterburga), 1844 [map]. This image is in the public domain. Original held in Special Collections – Historic Maps Collection, Princeton University Library (HMC01.588).
3. Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar', vol. 1, pt. 2, Ukazatel' goroda Sanktpeterburga [Index of the City of St. Petersburg], pp. 3, 4, 39, 40, 41. For a helpful description of the English Embankment, see Anthony Cross, “The English Embankment,” in St. Petersburg, 1703–1825, edited by A.G. Cross (Basingstoke, UK and New York: Palgrave MacMillan, 2003): pp. 50–70.
4. In this map, the house number for Bek should read 74, not 64.
5. Kelii and Keile are the same family name (Cayley in English). Nistrem’s two spellings represent the same family, occupying the entire lot.
6. Haven, John. Map of the United States, including Oregon, Texas and the Californias, showing the Boundary claimed by the United States, Boundary offered as Compromise, Boundary Proposed by Great Britain. New York: Haven and Emerson, 1846. PJ Mode Collection of Persuasive Cartography, Division of Rare and Manuscript Collections, Cornell University Library, Ithaca, NY, accessed 30 May 2021, <https://digital.library.cornell.edu/catalog/ss:19343429>

PREFACE

The St. Petersburg diaries of Anna McNeill Whistler, which she kept from 1843 to 1848, while her husband, Major George Washington Whistler, was supervising the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, are held in Special Collections in the New York Public Library. They have been consulted, cited, and analyzed by many scholars, but anyone who undertakes to deal with that period in the Whistlers’ lives has to know Russian and be able to work with Russian archival materials. Richard M. Haywood, who both knew Russian and was a railway enthusiast, was able to do that, and therefore left us archival-based biographical information about some of Major Whistler’s Russian colleagues in his book Russia Enters the Railway Age, 1842–1855 about the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. However, the authors of biographies of Anna McNeill Whistler and James McNeill Whistler – such as Elizabeth and Joseph Pennell, Kate McDiarmid, Elizabeth Mumford, Georgia Toutziari, and Daniel Sutherland – have not known Russian, and therefore could not go beyond pointing out and analyzing the valuable revelation in the diaries of Anna Whistler’s religious and pious character and her relationship with and own analysis of the other members of her family, of the St. Petersburg foreign and Russian community, and of persons met en route both to and from St. Petersburg.<sup>1</sup>

My decision to undertake editing and annotation of the diaries was based on the fact that I am fluent in Russian and have extensive experience in Russian archives and, like others such as Sutherland, while not an art historian, was drawn to my project partly by an interest in James McNeill Whistler: in my case to him as an artist of the ephemeral. I had in mind to produce an annotated edition that would enable scholars to deal with the Russian period in the Whistlers’ lives at a more profound level. I had hoped to do this by identifying as many as possible of the people and events that Anna Whistler mentions and by addressing James Whistler’s childhood in St. Petersburg, which he called “his cradle” as an artist, and about which almost nothing had been written or was erroneous. I have succeeded in researching both those projects. For example, I was able to consult young James Whistler's record at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts and discovered that the information supplied to the Pennells when they were writing Whistler's biography was incorrect. I was able to consult the service records of Russians and foreigners in Russian service, whom Anna Whistler mentions and to put together biographies for them. I have also ascertained the identities of almost everyone in the diaries and, having worked directly or indirectly with documents in Russian, Polish, English, German, Latin, French, Italian, Swedish, Danish, and Dutch, have created an Appendix of forty-seven biographies of individuals and family groups, about most of whom little has hitherto been known.

In order to be faithful in detail to the 1840s, I first consulted Russian printed materials of that period by researchers such as Bur'ianov, Grech, Pushkarev, and Tsylov, then moved on to the works of later eminent Russian cultural historians such as Kurbatov, Stolpianskii, and Lukomskii, and up into the twenty-first century with its explosion of detailed cultural historical materials – some of them annotated reprints – about St. Petersburg.

The same is true of images of St. Petersburg. I have sought to reproduce only illustrations produced in the 1840s. For example, at that time, policemen on duty in sentry boxes on the street ceased carrying a halberd; therefore, if only an image from the 1830s showing them holding a halberd was known to me, I explain that this detail would have been anachronistic in the 1840s.

Through the generosity of descendants of people in the diaries, I am able to present portraits of many of them, thus enriching the pictorial panorama of locations and events to close to 500 images.

Some endnotes are short essays in themselves. They, along with the introductory chapters and the biographies in Appendix E, constitute an attempt at an encyclopedia of the Whistlers' lives in the 1840s. I preferred to supply readers with the information through quotations, rather than send them only to the sources and thus thin out their experience.

This annotated edition of the diaries, as well as being of interest to scholars and to descendants, will also appeal to art historians dealing with James McNeill Whistler or with Russian or foreign artists, such as Briullov or Dessain; to both specialists and lay readers of Russian history, of Black history, of women's history, of historical travel journals, and of personal and eye-witness accounts; and to railway enthusiasts. Much of the archival material I am presenting has not been published before.<sup>2</sup>

This edition has been a labor of love, protracted by complexities of family and professional life and the “no stone unturned” bent of both myself and my chief researcher, Michael J. Welch.

* * *

While Anna Whistler, James, Willie, and Debo were visiting in Preston, Lancashire, in August of 1843, Eliza (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley, Anna Whistler's half-sister, proposed that she keep a diary during the family's St. Petersburg stay. She gave Anna Whistler a diary that she had herself intentionally kept of a brief trip to Edinburgh in June of 1843, meaning it to be a model for Anna Whistler.<sup>3</sup> Exactly two months from the day of their arrival in St. Petersburg, Anna Whistler began to keep a diary. It is the journal of a very religious and pious Victorian woman, born in North Carolina, who spent her childhood after the age of ten and young womanhood in Brooklyn and New York, and her married life before going to Russia in New Jersey, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. In it, she erratically recorded for some five years events of her family's life in Russia.

The entries are dated according to the Gregorian calendar (New Style, or NS), used in the West, but occasionally she also refers to the date according to the Julian calendar (Old Style, or OS), used in Russia, which lagged behind the Gregorian calendar by twelve days in the nineteenth century and eleven in the eighteenth century. It makes sense to supply both dates in describing the Whistlers' Christmases, New Years, and Easters in Russia, because they celebrated each twice. Certain important events in the life of the Imperial family and in Russian history (such as the date of death of Alexander I and accession of Nicholas I to the throne), or Russian holidays (such as the first of May), receive similar treatment.

Part I of the diaries is dated 28 November 1843 to 27 September 1844 (Anna Whistler's birthday). It actually covers the period from 16 August 1843 to 27 September 1844, and records their voyage from Boston to St. Petersburg, with a stopover in England to see relatives and friends, travel by coach through Germany to Hamburg, the sea journey from Travemünde to Russia, and their life in St. Petersburg and on the Peterhof Road, with day trips to Tsarskoe Selo, Pavlovsk, and Peterhof. It was brought to a close on 27 September 1844, so that John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary of the American Legation in St. Petersburg, who was departing Russia permanently, might send it home in his luggage. Part II is dated March 1845 Ash Wednesday – Old Style –, which means Ash Wednesday, 28 February / 12 March 1845 and runs to September 1848.<sup>4</sup> It illuminates their life in St. Petersburg from 28 February / 12 March 1845 to 11 August–September 1848, with day trips to Tsarskoe Selo and Peterhof, and two extended visits to England: from June to mid-October of 1847 and from June to September of 1848. Also recorded here are travel through Germany in 1847, a stop in Copenhagen on the trip to England in June of 1848, and another stop in Copenhagen on the journey back to St. Petersburg in September of 1848.

There are two major gaps in Part II: from 28 September 1844 to 12 March 1845, and from sometime after 1 January 1848, until 25 April 1848. The second gap is to some extent illuminated retroactively by the entry of 25 April 1848. The gap between 28 September 1844 and 2 March 1845 is not illuminated retroactively. This is particularly disappointing for those interested in Whistler the artist, because it is precisely in this five-and-a-half-month period that James began to take formal drawing lessons from Aleksandr Osipovich Koritskiĭ, a student at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. There are, as well, periods where Anna Whistler wrote daily entries and times when she wrote only one entry per month.

In addition to the gaps, the dating of individual entries contains numerous errors. While usually knowing what day it was, Anna Whistler sometimes did not know what date it was, but there were moments when she recorded the wrong day. Most of her errors can be corrected by using a perpetual calendar and the memoirs of others, but, for example, a week in February of 1844 and some of the dating of their visit to the Isle of Wight in the summer of 1848 cannot be untangled. In addition, while she did not write in her diary on Sundays, she sometimes wrote an entry dated Sunday on a Monday and then another entry dated the same Monday for Monday itself. Other times she wrote a single entry on a Monday, giving a record of Sunday's churchgoing and other activities before passing on to Monday's events. Occasionally an entry date covered months of events.

Anna Whistler was often laconic, but the letters and journals of two American diplomats who served in St. Petersburg and established close ties with the Whistlers supply much additional information. The long, loquacious, and calculatedly detailed letters of John Stevenson Maxwell, intended for sale later to Harper's but diverted instead into his book The Czar, His Court and People (1848), expand her diaries the most. While embellishing chiefly on the period from 24 November 1842 to 27 September 1844, they supply details of the Whistlers' life even after Maxwell's departure from Russia, through his responses to Major Whistler's letters to him, as some of the latter are not extant. Also helpful are the journals kept from 17 May 1847 through 1 July 1848 by Colin McCrae Ingersoll, who was secretary ad interim of the American Legation at St. Petersburg, while his father, Ralph Isaacs Ingersoll, served as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary.

In addition, the extensive extant correspondence of the Whistlers in the 1840s, found in three major collections – the Whistler Collection at Glasgow University Library, the Swift Papers at the New York Public Library, and the Pennell–Whistler Papers at the Library of Congress – sheds light on their Russian sojourn. The extensive extant correspondence from Russia of two of the three contractors making the locomotives and rolling stock for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway – Joseph Harrison Jr. and Andrew McCalla Eastwick – is also very helpful. Harrison corresponded mainly with his family in Philadelphia, with his wife's family in Philadelphia after she and their children joined him in Russia, and with Anna Whistler after her husband's death. Eastwick corresponded with his family, friends, and relatives in the United States, England, and Germany.

Of some help also is the journal of a trip to St. Petersburg via New Orleans and Cuba kept by Henry K. Fettyplace of Salem, Massachusetts, who was a schoolmate of George Henry Prince, a family member of the St. Petersburg firm of William Ropes and Company. Fettyplace spent the month of July 1848 in St. Petersburg and devoted some sixty pages of his 142-page journal to his stay there. The journal documents moments in Major Whistler's lonely life, without his wife and sons, who were in England. Also limited, but nevertheless helpful, is the correspondence of members of the Ropes family in St. Petersburg in the 1830s and 1840s to their family members in Massachusetts.

Anna Whistler readily put down her pen at the sound of her "gude mon's" footsteps. Perhaps his return home is the answer to the unexplained events that caused her occasionally to stop writing in mid-sentence. Her description in May 1847 of St. Nicholas Day and of the opening of the only portion of the railway that Whistler was to see completed and in operation breaks off suddenly and is followed by an entry recorded in England. Much more disconcerting is the similarly interrupted concluding sentence of Part II, when we are left bogged down in retrospective trivial details of the summer of 1848 in England. A disrupted sentence about the smallest church in England brings the diaries to a close, as the family's life in St. Petersburg moves unrecorded toward Major Whistler's imminent attack of cholera and his death from heart failure. We should be grateful, however, that the diaries were preserved at all. When Anna Whistler wished to send them to her friend, James Gamble, to read in 1858, her search turned them up finally in the lumber room of her house.<sup>5</sup> Luckily, they later escaped the fate of piles of family correspondence, which her step-niece, Emma Palmer, on instructions from Anna Whistler, burned at the latter's death.<sup>6</sup>

* * *

While Anna Whistler's diaries are, as is usual, a record of her life and resemble the predominant tone of Eliza Winstanley's diary, they depart from that model by showing the depth of the religious beliefs that guided her life. One of her overriding preoccupations was death and our preparedness for that "last great change." Had the diaries been continued until Anna Whistler's departure from Russia in May 1849, we would see more clearly that the Russian sojourn opens and closes with a death. The family's arrival in St. Petersburg is preceded by the death on route of the child, Charles Donald, while their departure from St. Petersburg is the result of Major Whistler's death. In between, several deaths that occurred during their stay are contemplated, like cameo memorials, at greater length than any other kind of event in the diaries. Many pages are devoted to the process of Miss Hirst's dying of cancer and her fortitude supported by religion. Old Mrs. Leon's death is the occasion for a lengthy narration of her interesting biography, showing the fortunes of a nineteenth-century woman alone in the world and poor, one of their own whom her British compatriots did not abandon. The young woman, Emily Hall's, precipitous death while on a visit from England to the Ropeses is the impetus for a contemplation of preparedness in the young for death and a glimpse into the upbringing of the Ropes children in a pious Victorian family. The last seven months of the life of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, youngest daughter of Nicholas I, run like a red thread through the entries of 1844: her marriage, immediate pregnancy, the diagnosis of terminal galloping consumption (which is only alluded to through details supplied by Anna Whistler),<sup>7</sup> her husband's licentious behavior, a prematurely born son, and the death of mother and child on the day of its birth. And, finally, the death of thirteen-month-old John Bouttatz Whistler, the St. Petersburg baby, the third of Anna Whistler's five biological sons to die within a four-year period, evokes pages of grief from a mother for her own child, while awakening memories of the other two, all only "lent" her by God. The generally held consoling thought of death as the protector from sin, especially in the young, appears throughout the diaries.

There are also many briefer references to death: the deaths of friends at home (Charlotte Canda; Fanny Peabody; Lucy Nichols; Major Whistler's brother James; the infant son of Major Whistler's niece, Eliza [Hamilton] van Vechten; the young Babcock daughter; and the young Ripley daughters); the deaths of members of the congregation of the English Church (old Mr. Thomas Drury, admirals Hall and Greig of the Russian Navy, and the Hodgson baby); the deaths of members of the Russian aristocracy (Countess Sofia Vladimirovna Stroganov, whose grandson, the young Count Aleksandr Sergeevich Stroganov, had been traveling with the Whistler family on the boat from Cronstadt to St. Petersburg in 1843; and Prince Illarion Vasilievich Vasil'chikov, uncle of the young Count's fiancée); and deaths in the Imperial family (Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna, niece of Nicholas I).

The impetus for such concentrated attention on death stems less from a reaction to the appalling mortality rate of the times than from Anna Whistler's concern over whether the souls of those who had died were pure enough to appear before her vengeful God, who would mete out immediate justice. It was her adamant belief that everyone appears before God immediately after death for a reckoning, based on how they have lived, with no second chance. This philosophy requires that we constantly try to be and to do good, and explains her lack of sympathy with the idea of Purgatory in Russian Orthodoxy, a period of forty days during which the soul of the deceased wanders and undergoes a review of its life before a decision as to its fate is made by God.<sup>8</sup>

The other important aspect of her religious beliefs, which is referred to frequently in the diaries, is "the re-union of glorified spirits," "the last great change" that occurs at death, making the newly dead recognizable to and able to recognize those who have gone before and resulting in the unspeakable joy of being together forever.

* * *

The diaries touch on an extensive range of topics from life in the 1840s: the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway; railroads in England; Anna Whistler's family in America and England; her American friends in Russia and at home; her British friends in Russia, England, and America; members of the Imperial family; serfs; servants; the Irish and Scottish famines; political events in Russia, America, England, the Sandwich Islands, and Europe; the Temperance movement; clerics she met and/or heard preach; military conscription in Russia; the Chartist movement, the Cotton Lords, and worker unrest in Preston; travel by coach, train, and boat; the weather; flowers and plants; fashion; cuisine and drink; outdoor and indoor games; educational equipment; sports; books she read alone or with family members; works James and Willie read or memorized and recited; diseases and medical treatment; foreign doctors; English governesses; foreign tutors; private schools; Bible Society work; James's art lessons at home and at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts; temporary art exhibits and the permanent collection at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts; comments on interiors in the Imperial summer residences; a fête given by an enlightened agrarian aristocrat for his peasants. The notes, introductory chapters, and biographies in Appendix E provide extensive detail about these topics, supplying an illuminating panorama of the period.

Political events also find their reflection in the diaries, but her reaction was more to the personal and homely than the political. In America, the War with Mexico alarmed her because her husband's brother and nephew, both in the United States Army, were called up for active duty. The controversy over the Oregon Territory made her anxious because she loved both America and England deeply and did not wish to have her allegiances challenged by the possibility of having to make a choice between them. Events in Russia she understood less well but reacted to similarly. She alluded to the war in the Caucasus in terms of the burdensome length of the conscription period on the common soldier. She seemed unaware of why Nicholas I traveled to England in the summer of 1844, but responded to the fact that as a father he returned immediately when summoned because of the terminal illness of his youngest daughter. The revolutions of 1848 she responded to by copying out from the newspaper the French version of the emperor's speech to his people, the only version she could understand, and mentioning that he and the empress appeared frequently in public with many changes of costume, and presenting her servant, Matvei's, reaction to the emperor's speech. Queen Pomare's appeal to Queen Victoria elicited from her and the other ladies taking tea at the Whistler home the simple hope that she "might not be deserted in her need by Queen Victoria."<sup>9</sup>

* * *

Because Anna Whistler found little time to keep her diaries, the entries were often written hastily and not re-read or corrected. They thus appear for our perusal with nouns or verbs inadvertently omitted; with consistently idiosyncratic spelling, such as "the" for "they"; and the persistent spelling "Britian" for "Britain." There are unintended humorous slips: for example, the frequently appearing given name of her half-sister, Eliza Winstanley; her niece by marriage, Eliza van Vechten; and her brother William's daughter, Eliza McNeill, is substituted for that of "Elijah" the prophet in what is intended to be a serious passage. As her pen raced, she left blanks for things she could not recall but never went back to fill in: for an Old Style date, for a reference to a chapter or verse in the Bible, for the surname of Clara Schumann and the given name of Sir Robert Ker Porter. She mangled a good number of Russian words, but had learned many of the distorted forms from her new English and American friends, whose long residence in Russia had not corrected their malapropisms and mispronunciations: for example, "Alargna" or "Alargon" for "Elagin" Island. Indeed, some of this usage may have been based on someone's charming infelicitous mispronunciation that became an "in-joke." Four years after her arrival, another newcomer, Colin McCrae Ingersoll, in turn put some of the same standard garbled Russian into his journal.

Like her husband, Anna Whistler was not able to learn a foreign language well. Beyond the mispronounced words that were standard in her English-speaking circle, like most diarists she attempted to spell the pronunciation of Russian words based on what she heard. She did not hear the rolled "r" at the end of some Russian words: "samovar" she rendered as "sumavaa." She put an "r" into words that did not have one: the name of the Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, for example, was sometimes rendered as "Olgar." She used an English word that sounded like a specific Russian word, and added an English plural: a fur-lined kaftan-like garment called a "shuba" was rendered as the English word "shoe" plus "be" (pronounced "buh") and for the plural the English "s" was added, thus producing "bes" (pronounced "buzz"). For the most part she used the nominative case of this inflected language instead of the correct oblique case: instead of saying to their coach driver "na dachoo" ("to the dacha") (pronounced "nuhdah'choo"), she said "na Dacha" (nominative case) (pronounced "nuhdah'chuh").

On the assumption that most readers of Anna Whistler's diaries do not know Russian, but do know English, every effort has been made to be reader-friendly in the handling of Russian words and sources. Russian words in the text of the diaries are transliterated, translated, and their pronunciation presented in a way that is, hopefully, comprehensible to the reader. This is done through the use of English words or sounds that approximate the Russian sounds and with indication of which syllable is stressed by placing an accent mark after it. For example, the word for “oarsman” is transliterated as “pirossvoshchii” and the pronunciation given as “peerossvaw’shchee.” The “h” supplied in some syllables is not pronounced; it is intended to show the length of the preceding vowel. For example, in the word for “samovar,” transliterated as “samovar” and pronounced “suhmahvar’,” the “h” in “suh” and “mah” indicates that the “u” is pronounced “uh” and the “a” is pronounced “ah,” as in English.

In the case of printed sources, in the Notes the transliteration is given, followed by the English translation; in the Bibliography, only original languages – in transliteration if necessary – are used. Archival sources are omitted from the Bibliography, but appear in the List of Abbreviations.

The idiosyncrasies of the text of the diaries (omission of words; personal spellings; unfinished, faulty, and incomprehensible sentences; omission of letters in words caused by hasty writing) have been retained throughout, to preserve the flavor of the diarist’s style; errors in others’ letters and diaries mentioned in the Notes, however, have been noted using [sic]. Words omitted by Anna Whistler will be supplied in the Notes, as will corrections of ludicrous errors, such as using the verb “charged” instead of the noun “charge” when speaking in grief of her then-youngest deceased son. Editorial conjectures arising from Anna Whistler’s tiny and cramped writing (see Image 6) and mispronunciations in foreign languages will also be corrected in the Notes.

The choice of which biographies appear in Appendix E is based on several factors: the importance in the diaries; the person’s interesting life; or whether earlier scholarship has illuminated them correctly, let alone at all. For example, of the two unrelated Prince families, to whom Anna Whistler refers frequently, only the Prince family that intermarried with the Ropes family will be discussed in detail (Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E), because George Henry Prince, who appears throughout the diaries, has been dealt with only sketchily in previous scholarship, as has his brother Benjamin Prince.

Notes identifying a specific person presented a challenge. If a name appears six times in a single diary entry, it seemed excessive to identify it six times. Instead, I chose to identify a specific person as fully as necessary the first time their name appears, but in subsequent notes to group together the names of all in the entry who have previously appeared and present their various identifications within that note. Thus, Mr. William Hooper Ropes is identified with his dates and his employment is explained the first time he appears. In subsequent notes, it is explained that “Mr. R.,” “Mr. Ropes,” “William Ropes,” and “my neighbor’s husband” are the same person, and usually his relationship to other family members of his appearing in those notes is pointed out. Beyond that, the reader can consult the extended biographies in Appendix E. Immediate family members in St. Petersburg – i.e., Major George Washington Whistler, Deborah Whistler, James Whistler, Willie Whistler, and Mary Brennan, their servant – are not identified after their first appearance unless information given in an entry requires further clarification of that person’s identity.

In the introductory chapters and in Appendix E, the use of five asterisks indicates a change in topic (or family) within a biography. The use of three asterisks indicates a change of examples (or members of a family) in a topic within a biography.

All responses to this edition, addressed to me in care of the publisher, will be gratefully received and answered. Hopefully, some responses, in addition to supplying constructive criticism and corrections, will offer the announcement of further primary sources.

NOTES

1. Valuable as these biographies are, even though the biographers could have researched non-Russian persons appearing in the diaries in Western archives, they did not do so. While the chapters on Russia in the recent Sutherland and Toutziari biography Whistler's Mother: Portrait of an Extraordinary Life (2018) make for lively reading, some details from the diaries are incorrectly interpreted. To give an example, Colonel Charles Stewart Todd did indeed acquire a piano for Debo to play, but it was for her use when the Whistlers visited his own quarters on his birthday (22nd of this month, in the entry for January 1844, Anna Whistler's Petersburg Diaries, James McNeill Whistler Papers, MssCol 3311, Manuscripts and Archives Division, New York Public Library (hereafter NYPL: AWP), Part I).
2. By this statement I mean that, although archival holdings such as the Swift Papers in the New York Public Library and the Pennell–Whistler Papers in the Library of Congress have been cited by many scholars, we have each based our citations on those materials relevant to what we were emphasizing. For example, because there has not been a full biography of George William Whistler, that part of the Swift Papers that reveals the details of his life in the 1840s has been ignored by other scholars; however, it has been crucial for me.
3. The manuscript of Eliza Winstanley's diary accompanies the manuscript of Anna Whistler's St. Petersburg diaries in the New York Public Library Special Collections. It is reproduced with notes in Appendix D of this edition.
4. Dates will be written with the OS date preceding the NS date, separated by a slash: e.g., 28 February / 12 March.
5. Anna Whistler to James Gamble, 1205 Arch St [Philadelphia], Nov. 11th [1858], Whistler Collection, Special Collections, Glasgow University Library Manuscript Department (hereafter GUL: Whistler Collection), W495; Anna Whistler to James Gamble, 1205 Arch St [Philadelphia], Friday morning Dec 5th [1858], W497; Anna Whistler to James H. Gamble and Jane Gamble, 1205 Arch St [Philadelphia], Tuesday 21st Dec. 1858, W499.

The two halves of the diaries were sent separately to James Gamble. The first part was sent along with the 1843 diary of Eliza Winstanley. Anna Whistler hoped it would not arrive too late for James Gamble to read Eliza Winstanley's diary "with real Scotch - expression” to a Mrs. Ann (Young) Maxwell, who had personally known Eliza Winstanley in Berwick, Scotland, when the latter was “a wee bit girlie” (W497). The second half of the diaries was found after Anna Whistler “went up for one more look in my lumber room to find the half written and never corrected part” (W499).

6. Emma W. Palmer to Mrs. Pennell, Stonington, Sept. 25th [1906], Pennell–Whistler Collection, 1597–1937, Manuscript Division, Library of Congress, Washington, DC (hereafter LC: P-W), box 296.
  7. While Anna Whistler did not record that the pregnant Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna had tuberculosis, she referred to her being on the verge of death and spoke of how no means used to cure her was successful, including the cow shed treatment, which was used for patients with tuberculosis (entry for Sat [July] 13th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I).
  8. For a description of Russian Orthodox Purgatory, see [Lady Edith Vane-Tempest-Stewart] Marchioness of Londonderry and H.M. Hyde, eds., The Russian Journals of Martha and Catherine Wilmot 1803–1808 (London: Macmillan, 1934), pp. 372–373.
  9. Entry for Thursday [August] 29th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

ST. PETERSBURG AND THE JOURNEY THERE

Invited to Russia by Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) in 1842 as consulting engineer to supervise the construction of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, Major George Washington Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) proceeded to St. Petersburg in the summer of that year without his family: his wife, Anna (McNeill) Whistler (see Images 1–5); their four young sons, James Abbott, William McNeill, Kirk Boott, and Charles Donald (for James and Willie, see Images 24–30); and the two adult children from his first marriage, George William (see Images 12–13) and Deborah Delano (see Images 17–19, 21). Diminished in number by the death of Kirk Boott, who had died of scarlet fever in July 1842, while his father was on route to Russia,<sup>1</sup> the remaining members of the family (except for George) moved in October from Springfield, Massachusetts, their home since 1838, to Stonington, Connecticut.<sup>2</sup> George, who had been working in the machine shop of the Proprietors of Locks and Canals in Lowell, Massachusetts,<sup>3</sup> where his father had at one time been superintendent, continued on there. In Stonington, the Whistler family lived with Anna Whistler’s younger sister, Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer; her husband, Dr. George E. Palmer (see Image 36), a physician and native of Stonington; their infant daughter, Julia McNeill; and two children from Dr. Palmer’s first marriage, Emma and Amos. In less than two months after his arrival in St. Petersburg, Major Whistler decided that he would “not stay another winter without his family.”<sup>4</sup> On 16 August 1843, with George to act as their protector as far as England, and their servant, Mary Brennan, to take care of Charles Donald, they were on their way to join him. Except for the excitement of running down a barque just outside Halifax, Nova Scotia, and rescuing all its hands, their journey across the Atlantic, or “the brook,”<sup>5</sup> from Boston to Liverpool on the Acadia (see Image 77) was uneventful.

Anna McNeill had spent the period from autumn of 1829 to April of 1831<sup>6</sup> in Preston, Lancashire, for her health's sake, meeting for the first time her father's daughters from his first marriage, her half-sisters, Alicia McNeill (see Image 39) and Eliza (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (see Image 40), and the latter's husband, John, a solicitor.<sup>7</sup> Some seven months after her return home, in November 1831, she and Lt. George Washington Whistler were married, and now she was returning to present their children, whom no one there had met, except for Alicia McNeill, who had traveled to the United States for the birth of both James and Willie. During her stay fourteen years before, Anna "Mac" had been introduced to many Winstanley friends and relatives in Preston, surrounding Lancashire towns, and London, whose acquaintance she now renewed: the Chapmans, Picards, Simpson sisters, Smiths of Chaddock Hall, Ormerods, Haslewoods, and Stevensons. She revisited as well Eliza Sandland of Liverpool, whom she had known in her childhood in Brooklyn until Eliza was widowed in 1820 and returned to England with her two children.

On 20 September, after "three or four weeks"<sup>8</sup> with the Winstanleys and "four or five days in London,"<sup>9</sup> the Whistlers set out for their final destination. It turned out there was no direct steamer from London to St. Petersburg, so George remained with them. They sailed instead for Hamburg on the John Bull (which they affectionately called the "Bullie") and from Hamburg (see Images 81–82) went by coach via Lübeck to Travemünde (see Image 83). At Travemünde, they parted with George and boarded the Russian steamship Alexandra for the trip across the Baltic Sea to Cronstadt (see Image 84), potentially more dangerous at this time of year than at any other, because of storms.

On this leg of the journey, personal tragedy struck them: Charles Donald, who had just turned two, died in convulsions after a brief illness. Although the law forbade bringing a corpse into St. Petersburg, Anna Whistler was able to persuade the captain to keep the body on board and at Cronstadt, on the island of Kotlin, to deliver it to the English Church there for safekeeping until a ship could take it back to the United States (see Image 85).<sup>10</sup> On 28 September, as was customary because the large Baltic steamers are "of too heavy a draught to pass over the bar at the entrance of the Neva,<sup>11</sup> all passengers were transferred to a smaller steamer for the trip of some twenty miles to St. Petersburg.

* * *

The most affecting first impression of the city is made on the visitor only from the expanse of the Neva. Soon after leaving Cronstadt, they saw on the right the gilded onion domes of the church at the Great Palace at Peterhof (see Image 400) and in the distance a panorama of spires and cupolas seeming to rise from the water: the immense gilded dome of St. Isaac's Cathedral (see Images 119–120) and the gilded tapered spire of the Admiralty (see Image 118); nearing the city, domes of gold, of silver, of azure, with gold or silver stars; the pastel façades of mansions and palaces; the massive granite embankments; finally, the English Embankment (see Images 101–104), where they disembarked; across the way the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts (see Images 154–155), where James would one day take drawing lessons; and, further downstream, the gilded spire of the Peter and Paul Fortress church (see Image 130). Here, the Whistler party was met by John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary to the American Legation, who took care of seeing their belongings through customs, and Major Whistler, who took them to the mansion they would occupy for some eight months. They had arrived at the First Admiralty District, the most sumptuous and elegant of the thirteen districts of St. Petersburg,<sup>12</sup> and the one in which they would live throughout their stay. Here was the pale yellow building of the Admiralty, from which the district took its name, bordered on three sides by linden trees and on its fourth by the Neva. Opposite Admiralty Boulevard lay Admiralty Square, flanked on one side by Palace Square (see Image 132), onto which the lime green and white Winter Palace (see Image 116) and golden yellow Main Staff Headquarters faced, and, on the other side, by the square generally called Isaac Square for the first St. Isaac's Church built there,<sup>13</sup> but also known as Peter's Square for its equestrian statue of Peter the Great (see Image 100), or Senate Square for the Senate building facing onto it (see Image 99). The English Embankment, which received this name because so many of the English inhabitants of St. Petersburg lived on it, began at Isaac Square at the curving golden-yellow building of the Senate. Along the embankment, other buildings of note were the Laval mansion, with its echoes of literary salons and of Pushkin and its ties to the Decembrist rebellion; the Naval Ministry; the Military Academy, where officers were trained for service in the General Staff Headquarters;<sup>14</sup> the Rumiantsev Museum, the interiors and collections of which were in a parlous physical state and which almost no one visited;<sup>15</sup> the house of Liprandi, where for a time Kirton's English bookstore was housed, conveniently for the Whistlers; the house of Strukov, headquarters of the British Embassy; the white building of the English Church (see Images 110–111), where the Whistlers became communicants; and the house of Baron Stieglitz, the banker, who in 1841 arranged the state loan to build the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway.<sup>16</sup> The last house on the embankment, at the New Admiralty Canal, belonged to Sir James Wylie (see Image 298), who had been court physician to Alexander I (see Image 418), and was now chief medical inspector of the Army.

The buildings on the embankment consisted of contiguous façades; they had no spaces between them and no entrance gates. One drove in from the parallel street behind, called Galernaia (Galley) Street, where most of the houses had courtyards with stables, barns, and other service buildings.<sup>17</sup> It was called Galernaia because of the Galernaia wharf on the nearby Moika River, so named in 1721, after the Admiralty had shifted over to the intensive building of galleys there.<sup>18</sup> Many of the English and most of the small colony of Americans lived on these two streets, where they rented apartments in mansions belonging to both Russians and foreigners. The Whistlers rented an entire mansion on the other (south) side of Galernaia Street. For a year, until they actually moved to the English Embankment, its English Church was for them its most important building.<sup>19</sup> Set up in a house bought from Count B.P. Sheremetiev in 1753 and converted, in 1815 changes were made to it according to plans by Giacomo Quarenghi (1744–1817) (see Image 110). On the Galernaia Street side, the ensemble of structures on the plot was enclosed by a stone fence with gates decorated with Ionic columns. The double-lighted church was located on the second floor and occupied almost the entire length of the building along the embankment. It was rectangular in shape, facing onto the Neva and onto the courtyard. Its only decoration, the altarpiece, was a copy of Rubens's Deposition from the Cross (1617–1618) (see Image 112). On the first floor were the apartments of the pastor, Rev. Edward Law (see Image 253), and his family, as well as of the clerk and sexton.<sup>20</sup> From the embankment, the building looked three stories high. Its façade was decorated with six columns that united the second-and-third-story windows and had on its pediment three statues, representing Faith, Hope, and Charity. At the center of the building, on pedestals near the entrance, were sculptures of two lions, personifying strength and might.<sup>21</sup>

The English Embankment and Galernaia Street were connected by a short street called Zamiatin Lane. On one of the corners of Zamiatin Lane, at the English Embankment, stood the building belonging to the Merchant, or Commercial Society,<sup>22</sup> where, in addition to attending dances, charity bazaars, and concerts, one could order takeout dinners, as Maxwell did. Zamiatin Lane was one block long, prevented by the naval barracks on the south side of Galernaia Street from continuing on. Also along the south side of Galernaia Street were the buildings of the Post Office Administration, the Ministry of Education, and the Ministry of the Navy, interspersed with private mansions. One end of Galernaia Street emerged onto Isaac Square through the arch connecting the buildings of the Senate and the Synod, the civil and religious governing bodies of the Empire. Beyond the arch, you could see Falconet's (1716–1791) bronze equestrian statue of Peter the Great in toga and wreath, his horse rearing, its back hooves trampling a writhing snake (see Image 100). The other end of Galernaia Street was closed off by the New Admiralty Canal, which joined the Moika River with the Neva. Here, across the street from the back of Dr. Wylie's house, on the corner plot, stood the mansion (see Images 88–94) of Count Aleksei Alekseevich Bobrinskii (see Image 86), grandson of Catherine the Great and Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Orlov (see Images 414, 443). Bobrinskii was Major Whistler's colleague on the Railway Commission and his landlord.

Entrance into the main courtyard of Bobrinskii's house from Galernaia Street was through monumental gates with marble busts mounted on pylons (see Image 88). The courtyard was flanked on three sides by the front of the house and two stone service wings a single story high. Here, in the winter of 1843–1844, James and Willie had a skating pond and an ice hill for sledding, both carefully attended to and smoothed each day by the outdoor–indoor man (see Image 362)<sup>23</sup> until the final thaw. The house had a small garden attached to it on the Moika River side of the property (see Images 92–93). A stone wall, also decorated with marble busts, separated the garden from the embankments and extended to the entrance gates. At the corner of the wall, where the New Admiralty Canal and the Moika met, was a small two-storied garden pavilion (see Image 90).<sup>24</sup> On the street at that corner, as on many St. Petersburg streets, stood a sentry box, either gray or black-and-white-striped, wooden or stone, square or round, with a policeman on duty at the door, dressed in a clumsy, pathetic-looking uniform of coarse gray cloth (see Image 353).<sup>25</sup>

Major Whistler had had an apartment on the ground floor of the mansion since his arrival, at which time the premises housed the American Legation. When Colonel Charles Stewart Todd, the American envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary (see Image 278), decided to move to the Imperial town of Tsarskoe Selo in 1843, Major Whistler rented the entire mansion for his family and invited Maxwell to be their tenant in that same apartment. They all lived here until May 1844, when the Whistlers gave up the house and took a dacha on the Peterhof Road for the summer.

* * *

Much of the area of the First Admiralty District was filled with the sound and grit of construction throughout their stay. At the Winter Palace, the New Hermitage (see Image 113), which was to be a museum where the public could view the Imperial collections, was being built. Begun in 1840, it was not completed until 1852. In Isaac Square, St. Isaac's Cathedral, begun in 1818 and taking forty years to build, was a work still in progress (see Image 119), and until the 1850s, the square here was cluttered with worksheds and barracks and a fence around the construction area.<sup>26</sup> The outside was completed. Invited artists, such as Karl Briullov (see Image 173) and other Academy professors, were now engaged in painting the interior frescos (see Images 121–124). James's future drawing teacher, Aleksandr Koritskii (see Image 167–168), worked in the cathedral as Briullov's assistant (1843–1847). Opposite the back of St. Isaac's Cathedral, far over on the other side of the large expanse of the square, the Maria Palace (see Image 136) was being built (1839–1844) for Grand Duchess Maria Nikolaevna, Nicholas I's eldest daughter, and her husband, Duke Maximilian Leuchtenberg (see Images 430, 431). On each side of the square in 1844–1845, buildings were going up to house the Ministry of State Properties.<sup>27</sup> Quarenghi's indoor riding range for the Horse Guards (see Image 137), the main façade of which faced St. Isaac's Cathedral, was going to be replaced with a new one, but was finally not torn down. Its sculptures of the naked Castor and Pollux, deemed by the Synod too indecent to stand opposite the cathedral, were taken off their pedestals and moved elsewhere.<sup>28</sup>

Towards the other end of the English Embankment, near where the Whistlers lived as of September 1844, without Maxwell, work on Annunciation Bridge (see Images 140–142), the first permanent bridge across the Grand Neva (begun on 1/13 January 1843), continued throughout their stay. The driving of piles went on all winter day and night except for Sunday, until the spring of 1846.<sup>29</sup> One end of the span lay between the Fifth and Sixth Lines,<sup>30</sup> very near the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. In 1847–1848, a cupola was being erected over the Academy's Church of St. Catherine.<sup>31</sup> Because of the bridge, what was to become Annunciation Square was being created on their side of the Neva.<sup>32</sup> This involved destroying a network of canals. In 1842, the Kriukov and Admiralty canals were channeled into the Neva through pipes, and the area covered over with earth. This work was finished in 1844, and in 1845–1846 Horse Guard Boulevard was built over Admiralty Canal.<sup>33</sup> In 1844–1849, the Horse Guards Regimental Church of the Annunciation of the Most Holy Mother of God (see Image 131) was going up on the spot where grain had previously been stored;<sup>34</sup> it was consecrated just before Major Whistler died.<sup>35</sup> In 1847, quarters for the officers of the Horse Guard Regiment were built here between the newly made Annunciation Street and Horse Guard Lane.<sup>36</sup>

With no permanent bridge, one crossed the Grand Neva over the Isaac Bridge (see Image 99), a retractable pontoon structure made of planks placed over a string of large flat-bottomed boats (plashkouty) somewhat like barges, joined to one another with ropes, and anchored.<sup>37</sup> Located at Isaac Square, it connected the center of the mainland with Vasilievskii Island,<sup>38</sup> the biggest island in the Neva delta (also called in the diaries “the Island,” “Vassili Ostrow,” and “V.O.”). When the Neva froze and navigation closed, one could walk across the ice to the other side or go by horse-drawn sledge (see Image 353). Roads were demarcated on the ice “between artificial rows of trees” so carriages crossing in the dark could avoid impediments.<sup>39</sup>

Fettered or free, the river was honored with ceremonies. On the Feast of the Epiphany (6/18 January), the Blessing of the Waters took place on the frozen river. “A large hole was cut in the ice opposite the Palace ... and ... a little temple covered with purple and gold,” called “a Jordan,” was erected over it. The clergy, emperor, and members of the Imperial family would walk to this temple along “a scarlet carpet ... spread from the portals of the Palace.” The clergy carried a huge silver cross, which was immersed after a mass had been celebrated. At that moment, the fortress guns were fired, and the huge crowds bared their heads as one man. “The Metropolitan enters the temple, and having blessed the water, takes a bucketful from the stream,” and sprinkles the emperor, who “then embraces and is kissed by the Metropolitan.” The Metropolitan sprinkles the Imperial family and then the nearby crowd with the holy water, and “the procession ... returns to the Palace.”<sup>40</sup> When the thaw began, access to Vasilevskii Island was again by means of the Isaac Bridge, but there were dangers. It had to be swung to one side against the bank, often with minimum warning, when the ice on Lake Ladoga broke up and passed down the Neva on its way to the sea. If the ice freed itself suddenly, it might carry off the bridge, at times with people still on it. As soon as the river was freed of ice, the ceremony marking the opening of navigation took place (see Image 349). This involved drinking the potable Neva water,<sup>41</sup> but those unused to drinking it could suffer intestinal problems, as James and Willie did. The first boat to cross the Neva, a state barge, carried the governor of the Fortress to the Winter Palace with a goblet of Neva water for the emperor. After drinking some, the emperor had the emptied goblet returned to the governor filled to the brim with gold pieces.<sup>42</sup> The barge was then rowed down the Neva “to show that the navigation was safe.”<sup>43</sup> The ceremony over, traffic on the river commenced: pretty barges, gondolas with their gay awnings, beautiful yachts, sometimes a man-of-war, the Cronstadt steamers. In the heat of summer, the water shone

“like a sheet of glass.”<sup>44</sup> Mostly at the beginning of spring and before the end of autumn, fog covered the city and hung over the river.<sup>45</sup>

* * *

St. Petersburg weather was capricious and the inconstancy of the climate as the factor determining the characterless nature of its populace was almost proverbial. The sudden changes in atmospheric temperature were so varied and rapid that it was impossible to guarantee in the morning what the weather would be like at noon.<sup>46</sup>

Spring was hardly noticeable. Warm days in April were a rarity. More often, the thermometer in the first half of May, especially in the morning, registered below zero degrees Celsius, while the second half of May could be called summer because then the temperature rose from fifteen to twenty-two degrees Celsius. The earlier or later breaking up of the Neva ice powerfully affected the outcome of spring. If the ice broke up at the end of March, then in mid-April the ice coming down from Lake Ladoga heralded the end of winter, but if the Neva opened up at the end of April and the ice from Lake Ladoga appeared in May, the cold of winter continued. In such years, the frost was followed immediately by summer’s heat. In a day or two, buds would appear on the trees and, in a few days, everything was in full bloom.<sup>47</sup>

Perhaps a third of summer weather was warm and clear; most days were rainy and overcast. The start of summer, like that of spring, was unpredictable; sometimes it occurred in mid-May, sometimes in early June. Sometimes the intense heat was extreme; then suddenly the temperature would drop by ten degrees Celsius or more.

The nights were frequently marked by crimson summer lightning in the western sky. Best of all were the bright and quiet white nights (see Image 117), when sunset had not yet faded completely, while from the other edge of the horizon a weak, faint light would begin to break.<sup>48</sup>

Autumn was characterized by fog, rain, wind, and fine snow; short days when the sun rarely showed itself; long nights; gloom and moisture everywhere, plunging people into sadness and extreme laziness. Sometimes, but rarely, there were days resembling those of summer.<sup>49</sup>

When winter set in, the air became finer and thinner, and people began to feel more cheerful and energetic. This, however, did not last very long, as fog and thaws betrayed the clear weather, of which there were only ninety-nine days per year, and the bitterness of the frosts lessened and it seemed as though autumn were returning.<sup>50</sup>

* * *

There were many new and exciting things to get used to in St. Petersburg: for example, the lantern, flag, and cannon signals. Every day, a cannon shot from the fortress announced the noon hour. The red globe hung out on the fire tower on Bol'shaia Morskaiia Street every evening was a signal for the lamplighters' brigade quartered there to set out on its rounds.<sup>51</sup>

Floods were an ever-present threat, built as the city was at the mouth of a swift, wide river, which was at times kept by opposing winds from flowing into the sea (see Image 107). The usual level of water was considered to be seven-and-a-half feet from the bottom of the river. The usual flooding time was autumn, but occasionally – though rarely – it occurred in spring and summer. Scarcely a year or two passed without a flood, but not all of St. Petersburg suffered from it equally. The flood signals were very elaborate and difficult to remember by heart, becoming more and more complex and frenzied as the water rose. If the Neva rose three feet above normal, a signal of three cannon shots was given in Galernaia harbor, and red flags were hoisted on the spire of the main Admiralty building. If the water rose more than four feet, then, in addition to the red flags, four white ones were hung on shafts in the daytime and four red lanterns at night. When a height of five feet was reached, cannon fire was heard from the Admiralty every half hour, increasing at over six feet to every quarter hour. At seven feet beyond normal, two shots were fired every quarter hour and this same signal was repeated from the fortress.<sup>52</sup> In this respect, the Whistlers' stay was uneventful, although Anna Whistler recorded that water ran through Galernaia Street one day in October 1843,<sup>53</sup> and that they had an unsettling evening in April 1844, until a servant went outside and brought back the reassuring explanation given by the sentry on duty.

There was the “strange, wild appearance”<sup>54</sup> of “the queer looking carriages”<sup>55</sup> called droshki (see Image 352), and of their drivers. The droshki was “a small four-wheel carriage, holding two persons, sitting together behind the driver, or sometimes back to back, with the forewheels about twelve inches high.”<sup>56</sup> It was “a cross between a child’s go cart, and a fire engine, minus the engine, with wheels hardly bigger than that of a wheelbarrow.”<sup>57</sup> The coachman’s dress was distinctive: “his long blue cloth kaftan, reaching to his feet, a red ... sash around his waist, ... a very low, bell crowned, hat upon his head”<sup>58</sup> and “a tin plate between his shoulders with an identifying number on it.”<sup>59</sup> The droshki was “drawn by one horse, sometimes by two, in which case the second ... gallops with his head brought down quite low, while the guide horse carries his head high, and never quits a fast trot.”<sup>60</sup> When Major Whistler drove their carriage to work, the rest of the family hired a droshki. Although it could hold no more than two people, a small boy could squeeze in, too, if he stood. The fast pace of the horses meant that sometimes passengers were pitched out. In winter, they generally landed softly in the snow. Otherwise, it could be serious, and droshki coachmen usually tried to flee after a mishap, because speeding was against the law and an accident meant confiscation of carriage and horses.

Coming home in the evening, one would see “in front of nearly every house, the porter, wrapped in his sheep skin, sleeping on a board, laid upon the pavement ... his sleeping place even in winter.”<sup>61</sup> The porter would “[run] out to open the gate, with only his shirt on, and with bare feet – he did not mind the snow and cold, apparently, more than a dog would have done.”<sup>62</sup>

Then there were the illuminations, celebrating Imperial marriages, births, and the return of Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna after a long, expensive absence in Palermo for her health (see Image 98), that Major Whistler said took money from the coffers for the building of the railroad and delayed his own return home. A full illumination was a dazzling and expensive spectacle: before the entire length of the façade of almost every house, especially on the Nevskii Prospekt and streets adjacent to it, sparkled thousands of fires in the shape of arches, pyramids, palms, and giant stars containing the initials of the Imperial personage being feted.<sup>63</sup> Major Whistler “was obliged to illuminate before his door on a house 100 feet front.”<sup>64</sup> On some occasions, however, there was only a partial illumination, consisting of saucers with a little lighted oil in them placed on the pavement in front of the houses,<sup>65</sup> and not worth stepping out to see.

There were the ubiquitous pigeons, “flying in all directions, and frequently alighting in the most crowded parts of the city” and viewed by the populace “with the sacred feeling that they are emblems of the Holy Ghost.”<sup>66</sup> Untouchable, they would have multiplied without restraint if not for the “foreigners and others less scrupulous, who ... convey them quietly from their roosting quarters to form an important part in culinary operations.”<sup>67</sup> James, in particular, was struck by the fact that Russians would not kill pigeons.

“Saints pictures [were] all over the city, and at all times ‘the faithful’ [were] bowing and crossing before them.”<sup>68</sup> The cult of Mary and of the saints had no place in Anna Whistler’s beliefs, and these “shocking pictures” elicited caustic remarks from her (for icons of Russian holy days, see Images 375–382).

You might see the emperor moving about the city incognito, but “no one is expected to notice [him], unless he first gives the salute.”<sup>69</sup> Sometimes distraught petitioners violated the tabu and poured their misery out to him, resulting in a turn in their fortune.<sup>70</sup>

Like most foreign visitors, the Whistlers found in the daytime the “noise and bustle of European capitals ... wanting here – and this, although carriages, & droschis, are flying in all directions on the wooden pavements, and pedestrians are numerous.”<sup>71</sup> They were struck by the silence and solemnity of the crowds in public spaces. Though the populace was “merry by rule and line, ... it [was] prescribed to them by the police, in what way they are to rejoice.”<sup>72</sup> There were, of course, the cries of the street hawkers and the silence of the night broken by “the occasional long wild yell of sentry upon the street”;<sup>73</sup> a drunk singing, unheeded by a sleeping watchman; or a call from a landing for a boat and its answering approach;<sup>74</sup> but no “[w]histling, shouting [or] hallooing [was] permitted,” except for the huzzas of the soldiers at the sight of the emperor.<sup>75</sup> One of the Americans asked whether this was “only the calmness of despotism?”<sup>76</sup> No wonder James and Willie made a spectacle of themselves in their noisy “ebullition of joy”<sup>77</sup> during Carnival, oblivious to the “‘gendarmes’ stationed at every hundred yards.”<sup>78</sup>

Reviews took place frequently in at least a dozen military squares. The most inspiring was the annual four-hour Imperial inspection of the Guard Corps in May in the capacious Field of Mars before they left their winter barracks for summer camp in the environs of the city.<sup>79</sup> “The polished steel and brass of helmets and breast plates glistened in the sun, the plumes, and embroidered coats of every man seemed newly taken from the band box, the horses pranced, the music played, the Circassians the Tartars, the Cossacks, and the Polish lancers, performed well their parts, and altogether it was an imposing and beautiful array,”<sup>80</sup> with “each regiment distinguished by the color of its superb horses.”<sup>81</sup> James and Willie watched the review in 1844 as Maxwell’s guests, pushing forward with excitement to the front of the crowd and refusing to let their servant, Alexander, take them home “until the very end.”<sup>82</sup> To Maxwell’s replacement, Colin Ingersoll (see Image 280), who grasped as well the mechanicalness of many aspects of Nicholas’s Russia, the soldiers “moved like a machine – so perfect was their step, and the incline of their muskets.”<sup>83</sup>

Of great delight to them were the white nights. Anna Whistler and Debo experienced the white nights in their walks on the embankment and from within the house, amazed at the late hour at which they brought their reading or their sewing to a close without use of candles. More amazing still must it have been, especially to James, to witness that the “soft glassy stream reflects from its surface the buildings ... situated on its banks, but the masses themselves form no shadow,” through “an absence of darkness, rather than the presence of light.”<sup>84</sup>

* * *

This then was the city and the district where they would live for some five years and eight months with their joys and sorrows and without financial cares for the last time in their lives, except for Debo, who would marry well.

NOTES

1. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Springfield, July 10, 1842, Joseph G. Swift Correspondence, 1809–1862, MssCol. 2935, NYPL (hereafter NYPL: Swift Papers). The child had died that morning.
A silhouette was made by Auguste Edouart of Captain William Henry Swift at Saratoga Springs, New York, on 14 July 1842, of which it has not been possible to locate an image (Mrs. Nevill Jackson, Ancestors in Silhouette, Cut by Auguste Edouart [London: John Lane, 1931], p. 225).
2. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Springfield, October 4. 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers. They were to move to Stonington on the 6th or 7th.
3. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, May. 13. 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
4. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 15/27, 1842, John Stevenson Maxwell Papers, New-York Historical Society (N-YHS) Library (hereafter N-YHS: Maxwell Papers), no. 2.
5. All quotations for which no source is acknowledged are taken from the diaries themselves.
6. Martha McNeill to Julius, Baltimore, 28 January 1831; Martha McNeill to Julius, Baltimore, 25 April 1831, NYPL: Swift Papers.
7. Anna McNeill to Catherine Jane McNeill, Liverpool, Nov. 22, 1829, in Kate R. McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother: Her Life, Letters and Journal (North Wilkesboro, NC: s.n., 1936), pp. 16–19; a letter to Mrs. William C. Thompson, daughter of Kate McDiarmid, went unanswered. Also Anna McNeill to Margaret Hill, Manchester, Jan. 14, 1830, LC: P-W, box 34.
8. Deborah Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
9. Deborah Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 6 October 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers. Anna Whistler was issued in London on 16 September 1843, a passport (no. 688) for herself, Deborah Delano Whistler, James Abbott, William McNeill, and an infant, Charles Donald. It was listed that she had arrived from Boston, that Gerard Ralston had vouched for her, and that they were traveling to Petersburg via Hamburg (M1371: Registers and Indexes for Passport Applications 1810–1906, roll 2: 11 May 1843 – 30 September 1846 [hereafter, NAUS: Passports, M1371, roll 2], U.S. National Archives, Washington, DC [NAUS]).

Gerard Ralston, who had vouched for them, was London agent to the firm of Harrison, Winans and Eastwick, who were building the locomotives and rolling stock for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway at the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works.

10. Major Whistler intended to apply to the Russian authorities for permission to bring the body to St. Petersburg, but then changed his mind and had it sent to America for burial in Stonington (Deborah Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 6 October 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22).
11. Edward P. Thompson, Life in Russia; or, The Discipline of Despotism (London: Smith, Elder, 1848), p. 11.
12. The numbering of houses, introduced in St. Petersburg in 1780, was not by streets but within police districts, into which the city was divided (E.I. Krasnova, Istochniki dlia izucheniia domovladieniia Sankt-Peterburga [Sources for the Study of Home Ownership in St. Petersburg] [s.l.: s.n., p. 212]). In the first third of the nineteenth century, houses were still numbered in this way (Krasnova, p. 214). In 1834, for the first time, the numbering of houses was introduced and the right side of the street, going in the direction of the increasingly higher numbers, received even numbers (Krasnova, p. 215). Houses continued, however, to be called by the surnames of their owners (Krasnova, p. 214). See also S.V. Sementsov, “Administrativno-territorial’noe delenie Sankt-Peterburga v XVIII – nachale XIX v.” [“The Administrative-Territorial Division of St. Petersburg in the 18th and the Beginning of the 19th Century”], Peterburgskie chteniia [Petersburg Readings] 96 (1996): pp. 228–231; and “Maps.”
13. The Church of St. Isaac had been built in 1717 on the spot where the Senate now stands (Ivan Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg [St. Petersburg in the Time of Nicholas I] [St. Petersburg: Liga Plus, 2000], pp. 74, 136). This title is a somewhat-condensed, corrected edition of Ivan Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga i uездnykh gorodov S.-Peterburgskoi gubernii [A Description of Saint-Petersburg and the Principal Cities of St.-Petersburg Province], which consists of three volumes in four parts, published 1839–1842 (Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 2). Parts 1 and 2 (with separate pagination) are in volume 1 (1839), part 3 is in volume 2 (1841), and part 4 is in volume 3 (1842).

14. T.A. Solovieva, Angliiskaia naberezhnaia [The English Embankment] (St. Petersburg: Belvedere, 2004), pp. 149–150.
15. P.I. Kann, Ploschcad' truda [Labor Square] (Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1981), pp. 35–37.
16. Solovieva, Angliiskaia naberezhnaia, p. 266.
17. The street will be called Galernaia (pronounced “Gahler’nuhyuh”) throughout this edition, as everyone in the diaries referred to it by its Russian name, including Anna Whistler, who spelled it as she correctly heard it: Galernia. N.R. Levina and Iu. I. Kirpideli, Po ètim ulitsam, po ètim beregam ... Peterburgskie progulki [Along These Streets and Along These Banks ... Petersburg Walks] (St. Petersburg: Papyrus, 1997), pp. 138–142.
18. M.S. Shtiglits, Promyshlennaia arkhitektura Peterburga [The Industrial Architecture of Petersburg] (St. Petersburg: Neva, 1995), p. 14. See also John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 24 / Feb. 5, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 6; and Kann, Ploschcad' truda, p. 12.
19. There is no single source that fully describes the appearance of the English Church in the 1840s. Information appears in the travel volumes of Elizabeth Rigby, in a handbook published by John Murray, in articles written by Anthony Cross, and in Tat'iana Solovieva's Angliiskaia naberezhnaia. After 1816, the English Church stood unchanged in its appearance until 1876. See Notes 20 and 21 below.

Granville describes it as “a very handsome and substantial edifice, situated about the centre of the English Quay, where it presents a noble front to the river, being decorated by a colonnade placed on a massive and well-distributed basement story ... The entrance, properly speaking, is from a street at the back of the Quay, through a handsome gateway. The interior is neat and simple ... well warmed and comfortably fitted up.” It had a Royal or Ambassador’s pew “on the right of the altar, and opposite to the pulpit ... surmounted by the Royal Arms of England.” “The female part of the congregation, as in the Lutheran churches, sat apart from the rest, and occupied the left side of the church.” The altarpiece was described as “a Deposition from the Cross [De Kruisafneming], a very credible painting, on the sides of which are two handsome Corinthian pillars of marble.” The church had no gallery and, while being capacious, could accommodate only a small portion of the approximately 2500 English inhabitants of St. Petersburg. The chaplain's residence, located "on the basement story," was described as "handsome" (A.B. Granville, St. Petersburg: A Journal of Travels to and from that Capital; Through Flanders, the Rbenish Provinces, Prussia, Russia, Poland, Silesia, Saxony, the Federated States of Germany, and France, 2 vols. [London: Henry Colburn, 1828], vol. 2, pp. 202, 203). This is how the church would have looked when the Whistlers were among its communicants.

20. [Elizabeth Rigby], Letters from the Shores of the Baltic, 2nd ed., 2 vols. (London: John Murray, 1842), vol. 1, p. 73. The first edition was published under the title A Residence on the Shores of the Baltic: Described in a Series of Letters, 2 vols. (London: John Murray, 1841); both editions were published anonymously. See also the entry for Monday 5th of May [1845], NYPL: AWPB, Part II; Handbook for Northern Europe, including Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Russia, rev. ed., 2 vols. (London: John Murray, 1849), (hereafter, Murray's Handbook for Northern Europe), vol. 2, Finland and Russia, pp. 480–481; and A.G. Cross, "Chaplains to the British Factory in St. Petersburg, 1723–1813," European Studies Review 2, no. 2 (1972): pp. 140–141. For a portrait of Elizabeth Rigby, see Image 190.
21. Solovieva, Angliiskaia naberezhnaia, p. 88; A.G. Cross, "By the Neva, By the Aire," University of Leeds Review, 25 (1982): p. 7.
22. The Merchant (or Commercial) Club, which was located in its own building, was founded in 1784 "for the purpose of giving the local exchange merchants the possibility of gathering to consult on business matters and to pass the time in pleasant conversation or in permitted games" (A.M. Konechnyi, comp., Progulki po Nevskomu prospektu v pervoi polovine XIX veka [Walks along the Nevskii Prospekt in the First Half of the Nineteenth Century] [St. Petersburg: Hyperion, 2002], vol. 4 of Forgotten Petersburg, p. 274n15).
23. The outdoor–indoor man took care of the yard. He was responsible for the care of the section of the street in front of the house, too, but often, as was the case in the Whistler household, also did indoor work.
24. Pamiatniki arkhitektury Leningrada [Architectural Monuments of Leningrad] (Leningrad: Stroizdat, Leningradskoe otdelenie, 1975), p. 284; Levina and Kirpideli, Po ètim ulitsam, pp. 138–142.
25. Each police sentry box had two sentries, who worked in shifts over a 24-hour period. They were required to know all the houses and other buildings in their jurisdiction and also the owners. Their duties included keeping the peace, taking people to hospitals, and picking up drunks from the street. At night, they had to confront passersby; take note of suspicious characters; and protect people from fires, thieves, and other kinds of attacks. They were required to give aid to anyone requesting it, even if this meant going outside their own jurisdiction. The sentries often had only the sentry box as a roof over their head. Sometimes they lived in it with their entire family. These police sentry boxes were very comfortable and spacious as opposed to those for military sentries. Some had stoves and a place for the off-duty sentry to lie down. It was strange to see them with the accouterments of everyday living, including a line with drying laundry. Often the premises included a small vegetable garden (I.S. Chistova et al., Byt Pushkinskogo Peterburga Opyt ènsiklopedicheskogo slovaria [The Everyday Life of Pushkin's Petersburg: An Attempt at an Encyclopedia] [St. Petersburg: Ivan Limbakh, 2003], pp. 88–89). In the 1840s, the sentries no longer carried a halberd (V.R. Zotov, “Peterburg v sorokovykh godakh” [“Petersburg in the 1840s”], Istoricheskiĭ vestnik [Historical Harbinger] 39 [February 1890]: p. 327).

26. L.I. Broitman and E.I. Krasnova, Peterburg ves' na ladoni Bol'shaia Morskaia [All of Petersburg Laid Out on the Palm of Your Hand: Grand Navy Street] (St. Petersburg: Papyrus, 1996), p. 147.
27. Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaia, pp. 143, 146. The Ministry of State Properties was created in 1838.
28. Kann, Ploschad' truda, p. 28.
29. Richard Mowbray Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, 1842–1855, East European Monographs No. 493 (New York: Columbia University Press, 1998) pp. 363–364.
30. Lines were parallel streets originally intended as canals but then allowed to silt up.
31. V.V. Antonov and A.V. Kobak, Sviatymi Sankt-Peterburga [Holy Places of St. Petersburg], vol. 2 of Istoriko-tserkovnaia ènsiklopediia [Church History Encyclopedia], 3 vols. (St. Petersburg: Chernyshev, 1996), p. 115.
32. Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaia, p. 206.
33. Kann, Ploschad' truda, pp. 43–45.
34. V. Mukhin, Tserkovnaia kul'tura Sankt-Peterburga [The Church Culture of St. Petersburg] (St. Petersburg: Ivan Fedorov, 1994), pp. 189–190; Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaia, p. 206. The architect was K.A. Ton (1794–1881).

35. G. Tabolina and M. Èdomskii, Konnogvardeiskii manezh [The Horse Guards Indoor Riding Range] (St. Petersburg: Almaz, 1997), p. 127; Kann, Ploschbad' truda, p. 46.
36. Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaia, p. 206.
37. The Isaac Bridge was put in place in 1727 (Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 282n26; Kann, Ploschbad' truda, p. 39; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 79–80).
38. The name of the island is said to have been taken from the given name of the artillery officer, Vasili Korchmin, who was quartered here with his company. Peter the Great would always send orders to Korchmin signed “To Vasili on the island” (Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 25). There are, however, many stories about how the island got its name (Julie A. Buckler, Mapping St. Petersburg: Imperial Text and Cityshape [Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2005, p. 139, and p. 292n81).
39. [Sir George William Lefevre], The Life of A Traveling Physician, From His First Introduction into Practice Including Twenty Years' Wandering through the Greater Part of Europe. 3 vols. (London: Longman, Brown, Green, and Longmans, 1843), vol. 2, pp. 238–239.
40. This and previous quotations in this paragraph are from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 24 / Feb. 5, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 6.
41. Despite the abundance of water, only the Neva and the Fontanka at its mouth had suitable drinking water. The water in the canals was harmful to one's health. Water taken from deep places in the Neva's bed was pure, clear, and free of any odor or taste. Water from near the shores was somewhat cloudy but light and soft. Those unaccustomed to drinking it sometimes suffered an upset of the digestive system. A company was raising capital to equip all floors of government and private homes on the left side of the Neva with Neva water (Ivan Pushkarev, Putevoditel' po Sanktpeterburgu i okrestnostiam ego [Guide to St. Petersburg and Its Environs] [St. Petersburg: Departament vneshnei torgovli, 1843], pp. 24, 29, 30.
42. Edward Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, trans. Frederick Hardman, 2 vols. (New York: G.P. Putnam, 1852), vol. 2, p. 115.
43. Georgiana, Baroness Bloomfield, Reminiscences of Court and Diplomatic Life, 4th ed., 2 vols. (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, 1883), vol. 1, p. 190.

44. Entry for June 14 [1847], Colin Ingersoll Journal, Ralph McAllister Ingersoll Fonds, Howard Gottlieb Archival Research Center, Boston University, box 7 (hereafter, BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal), pt. 1, fol. 48. Colin Ingersoll kept a journal in three parts (3 lined notebooks) while in Russia. For reasons unknown, he gave the year 1848 in his first entry in Part 1 instead of 1847. I have rectified this error by placing the correct year in brackets each time I cite an entry.
45. Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 38.
46. Pushkarev, p. 35.
47. Pushkarev, pp. 35–36.
48. Pushkarev, p. 36.
49. Pushkarev, pp. 36–37.
50. Pushkarev, pp., 37–38.
51. Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaiia, pp. 67, 202; Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 302n110.
52. Pushkarev, Putevoditel', pp. 30–34; Aleksei Grech, comp., Ves' Peterburg v karmane: Spravochnaia kniga dlia stolichnykh zhitelei i prieszhikh, s planami Sanktpeterburga i chetyrekh teatrov [All of Petersburg in Your Pocket: A Handbook for Inhabitants of and Visitors to the Capital, with plans of St. Petersburg and Four Theaters], 2nd ed. (St. Petersburg: N. Grech, 1851) (hereafter, Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851), pp. 376–378.
53. See also John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23.
54. Entry for Thursday, May 20th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 6.
55. Entry for Thursday, May 20th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 5.
56. Robert Heywood, A Journey into Russia in 1858 (Manchester, [UK]: Sherratt and Hughes, 1918), p. 6.
57. Entry for Thursday, May 20th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 5.
58. See also Heywood, Journey into Russia, p. 6.
59. Entry for Thursday, May 20th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 5.

60. Entry for Thursday, May 20th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 5–6.
61. Entry for July 28th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 85.
62. Entry for October 6th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fol. 41.
63. From Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti [St. Petersburg News] 129, Tuesday, June 11 [June 23 NS], 1846, p. 571; reprinted from Russkii Invalid [the Russian Invalid newspaper].
64. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 7, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 31.
65. Mary T. Ropes to Mrs. Hardy Ropes, St. Petersburg, October 18/30, 1832, Ropes Family Papers, Baker Library Special Collections, Harvard Business School, Harvard University (hereafter HUBL: Ropes Papers).
66. Heywood, Journey into Russia, pp. 7, 32.
67. Heywood, p. 7. See also J.G. Kohl, Russia, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kharkoff, Riga, Odessa, The German Provinces on the Baltic, The Steppes, The Crimea, and The Interior of the Empire (New York: Arno Press & The New York Times, 1970), p. 36, first published in 1844 by Chapman and Hall (London).
68. Entry for June 7 [1847], fol. 43, BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1.
69. Entry for June 7 [1847], fol. 43.
70. Entry for June 19 [1847], fols. 57–58, BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1.
71. Entry for May 10/22 [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 9–10.
72. Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 2, p. 259.
73. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23.
74. Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 2, p. 260; vol. 3, p. 23.
75. Lefevre, vol. 2, pp. 259–260.
76. Entry for May 10/22 [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 10.
77. Entry for March 29th friday evening, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
78. Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 2, p. 263.

79. G. Vilinbakhov, V.M. Faibisovich, and S. Letin, Khrabrye dela vashi nikogda ne zabudet potomstvo [Posterity Will Never Forget Your Brave Deeds] (St. Petersburg: Slavia, 2000), pp. 22–23. Exhibition catalogue from the Gosudarstvennyi Ermitazh [State Hermitage Museum; or simply Hermitage].
80. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36.
81. Entry for June 3 [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 29.
82. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36.
83. Entry for June 3 [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 21, 27, 93. See also pt. 1, fols. 23–31 for extensive comments on the 1847 review.
84. Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 3, p. 23.

THEIR HOME LIFE AND SOCIAL LIFE

While their grief over Charlie's death, the effects of climate and of illness, and Anna Whistler's disinclination to venture out into what she called "the gay quarter of this showy city,"<sup>1</sup> kept them mostly at home in the final months of 1843, the family began very soon after their arrival to attend Sunday morning service at the English Church (see Images 110–111), where they remained communicants during their entire stay. The rare occasions on which Anna Whistler missed a Sunday service were her near collapse at the approaching first anniversary of Charlie's death and her ministrations to the dying Miss Hirst. Every morning, James and Willie would pass through their mother's dressing room and head for the parlor, where they studied assigned scripture lessons until it was time for prayers, which took place at eight o'clock. After the blessing, they would recite a verse from the Psalms and their mother would give the response. When Anna Whistler rose from her knees, she would embrace Debo; only then did they have breakfast. Every night, she spent an hour with the boys at their bedside reading sacred biography or scripture or religious travels to them and commenting on it. On Saturday nights, James and Willie had a bath. On Sundays, the family went to the service at the English Church in the morning and sometimes to the afternoon service as well. Otherwise, Anna Whistler went to the non-conformist British and American Congregational Church (see Image 125) in the afternoon.<sup>2</sup> Later in their stay, they sometimes traveled to a third service in the schoolroom at the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works (see Images 223–225), where the locomotives and rolling stock for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway were being manufactured, and the Harrisons, the Eastwicks, and Thomas Winans lived. On Sunday evening, one of them read a sermon – often by Henry Blunt – to the others. In the afternoons of other days, Debo and Anna Whistler read aloud to each other works like Prescott's Conquest of Mexico (1843).

Anna Whistler made an effort to be cheerful for her husband's sake. That autumn, they accepted Colonel Todd's invitation for the grownups alone to visit the Winter Palace (see Images 114–117). They began to return the calls of those who had left their cards, and their social life became very full. They made good friends of the Ropeses and their cousin, George Henry Prince; the Maingays (see Images 258–264); the Gellibrands (see Images 265–266); and the Woods (see Images 271–272); and readily expanded their social engagements to these homes, to which generally the piety of the wives drew Anna Whistler. Eventually they became friends with the Mirrieleeses (see Images 268–269), who were close to the Ropeses and Gellibrands and, like them, dissenters. There was much social interchange with the Harrisons and the Eastwicks (see Images 226–227, 233–238), once the wives and children arrived. The sympathizing young widowed Mrs. Nicol Baird, old widowed Mrs. Charles Baird (for Charles Baird, see Image 274), and Miss Krehmer, who had witnessed Charlie's death on the boat to Cronstadt, were great favorites. The very sociable Laws (see Image 253) accepted Whistler invitations, and so the invitations by their "merry pastor"<sup>3</sup> to dances held in his home every other week were in turn accepted, though reluctantly, by Anna Whistler, who did not approve of dancing. The Francis Bairds (see Image 275) seemed at first not to fare too well in their relationship with the Whistlers. Anna Whistler did not enjoy the Bairds' wedding anniversary dinner. She did not like Mrs. Baird's parents nor approve of the fact that Mrs. Baird and her family pretended to Mrs. Baird's mother that the latter was not seriously ill. Eventually, she softened towards them. The Cazalets seemed not to fare at all well in their relationship with the Whistlers. They met at one of the Laws' parties, but Anna Whistler declined Mrs. Cazalet's invitation to a further meeting. Still, given the gaps in the diaries, some sketchy relationships may have been fuller than it seems. Major Whistler's position could and may have won him social invitations from his Russian colleagues, but only a semi-official outing with them is recorded in the diaries. He became friendly with the English sea captain John Kruger, but in general he very reluctantly allowed himself to be separated from his family. The diaries chiefly record visits from his Russian colleagues to the Whistler home: Colonel Pavel Mel'nikov (see Image 247), who was overseeing the building of the northern half of the railroad; Mel'nikov's brother Aleksandr, who held a court position, and his wife; the railroad contractor Major Trouvellier, and his wife; and Major Ivan Bouttatz, who had come to the United States to accompany Whistler to Russia, and for whom – with great affection – they named their last child. Captain Kruger also came by often. John Stevenson Maxwell, who became a dear friend to the entire family, was a frequent guest upstairs. Living with the Whistlers saved his life when he contracted typhoid fever. There were also many transient guests: the Bodiscos (see Images 283–285) and de Stoeckl (see Images 286) of the Russian diplomatic corps on home leave from Washington; Sylvanus Thayer (see Image 318), superintendent of West Point when Major Whistler was a cadet, traveling now for his health with Charles Parker (see Image 319), a young medical student; William Robertson, a recent West Point graduate; the Scottish painter Sir William Allan (see Image 320), whose comments on James's artistic talent changed James's life in St. Petersburg; Dr. Edward Maynard, the dentist and firearms inventor (see Image 329); the Bliss family, their Springfield friends, who visited them briefly while on the Grand Tour; and Rev. Robert Baird, along with reverends Brinsmade and Rankin, all Americans, who dined with them and preached in St. Petersburg before going off to the Evangelical Alliance Conference in London in 1846 and who were accompanied by a young lawyer named Beach. Eventually, Anna Whistler ventured out to shop in the elegant stores on the Nevskii Prospekt and adjacent streets, especially Bol'shaia Morskaia (see Image 109). Mr. Ropes and Mrs. Maingay (see Image 259), fluent in Russian, helped her make her purchases until her own children learned enough Russian to act as interpreters.

The Whistlers always preferred domestic life to what Anna Whistler called “dissipation,” and in their domestic life an unceremonious sociability appealed most to them, as it was “the truest hospitality and involves less anxiety.”<sup>4</sup> “Dissipation” was her term for what she considered to be the empty social whirl that failed as well to honor the Sabbath. They entertained from Monday through Friday, but she was adamant that on Saturday afternoon all toys and amusements be put aside,<sup>5</sup> in order “to make the last day of the week a day of preparation for the first.” This was the prelude to the Sabbath, on which no guests were received by them nor invitations accepted, for, “as you spend Sunday so will your work in all the week days prosper or not.” In time, even the worldly and the less pious accepted her requirement. Few exceptions were made: going to select a dacha one Sunday – the only day Mr. Ropes was free to join them and interpret – and on that same Sunday a drawing lesson from Mons. Vaney for James, to break the latter’s monotonous seclusion during an attack of rheumatic fever.

* * *

The Bobrinskii house (see Images 88–94), despite its flaw – to Western taste – that like all Russian houses it had too many rooms for show and receiving guests,<sup>6</sup> was very comfortable. They had a carriage and a sledge. They had an icehouse. They had their own cow. Major Whistler kept canaries, most of which died, and presented his wife with pots of white roses and tuberose, all expensive acquisitions from the celebrated English Magazine (see Image 108).<sup>7</sup> Their life was made easier by the luxury of a staff of seven or eight servants, with that greatest of assets: an English-speaking cook. Whistler felt that servants “had claims next to children upon the heads of families for forbearance, kindness and watchful care, exercising control to keep them in the safe path of integrity, & encouraging them to do well, by evincing an interest in their conduct and concerns.”<sup>8</sup> The Whistlers treated their servants “kindly and with confidence”<sup>9</sup> and with a humaneness they would not have encountered in most Russian households.<sup>10</sup> In instituting her Sabbath rules, Anna Whistler took the servants into consideration as well: they needed their rest, too, after six days’ labor. They paid their servants “better than they could expect,”<sup>11</sup> and gave them wonderful gifts at Christmas. Realizing that Alexander, the footman, had spent far too much for an Easter egg he presented to the family, Anna Whistler saw to it that he was reimbursed for his generous extravagance. They trusted their servants and were “unaccustomed to lock up from [them],”<sup>12</sup> although Whistler, who was careless about safeguarding his money, had already had a substantial amount stolen from his desk just before his family’s arrival.<sup>13</sup> When the Whistlers returned from Debo’s wedding in the autumn of 1847, they were laden with gifts for the servants. Anna Whistler found them “so respectful and willing.”

Their outdoor–indoor man (see Image 362), called Feodore (as well as Fritz and Frederic in the diaries), a poor serf with a wife and child to support in the country, seemed unable to do his work properly or to keep himself clean. Still, when he cried at the news that he was being discharged, Major Whistler was so moved that he paid off the already-hired replacement and gave Feodore another chance. This kindhearted gesture proved to be a mistake, because after Christmas 1843, Feodore – along with the German footman, Maurice – was accused of stealing the Major’s flute and Anna Whistler’s writing desk. Under advisement, both were let go. Alexander, the previous footman, who had been dismissed for refusing out of pride to go behind the carriage, was reinstated and learned his lesson. Some of the other servants did not have such shortsightedness. When the Whistlers returned from Debo’s wedding, they found that the cook and laundress, who had been let go for the summer, had not sought another post but were waiting to return to their employ. The post of coachman seems to have had several occupants, for reasons unexplained. Even the last one loved his drink, and Anna Whistler recorded some lapses and remembered him with a Bible when she departed Russia. The sickly servant Parasha, who went away with her husband expecting to die, became instead a widow. When she reappeared in the servants’ quarters and recounted to Anna Whistler her plight and her plans to enter a monastery, Anna Whistler wept with her and no doubt helped her in some way. Many of the servants remained with the Whistlers until Major Whistler’s death, and, before Anna Whistler left for America, she tried to find new positions for whomever she could.

The Whistlers’ kindness and charity extended also to a beggar woman with a little boy, Andrea, whom Whistler had befriended before his family arrived, most likely because of the child’s resemblance to his own recently deceased Kirk Boott. Anna Whistler continued to help them, admiring the independent child but appalled at the cringing mother, who kissed her feet. She allowed the child to come into their home but not the mother, giving him a coin for her when he left. She indulged Andrea by seating him on the steps and paying an itinerant organ grinder to entertain him. Giving a coin gratis to Andrea’s mother, however, eventually proved too much for her Yankee work ethic, and she set her to scrubbing to earn the money. Anna Whistler's assessment of the lower classes as lazy, filthy, ignorant, dishonest, and erroneous in their religious beliefs, who "seem to reflect no more than the dumb beast [sic] which perish," never wavered, but her feelings echoed those of many foreigners encountering Russia.<sup>14</sup> The entrepreneurs at Alexandrofsky were among the few who praised them, saying "the Russians were the best workers they had ever employed, there is no end to their patience, and they are very quick at imitation, and never think they know more than their employers."<sup>15</sup>

The alcoholic Swedish draftsman, Hedenschoug, who performed his work in Whistler's chancery in their home, received equally generous treatment. They were unaware he lied about his day of birth and bestowed gifts upon him on the day he had appropriated for himself. He married while in their employ and pretended he needed money to bury one of his children, though the child was not dead. Even when their silver began to disappear, they did not set about getting rid of him, for "father would not accuse him or any man without proof."<sup>16</sup> He cast suspicion on himself by ceasing to appear for work and had to be replaced.

* * *

James and Willie were tutored at home, except for the autumn of 1846, when they were boarders at Monsieur Jean Jourdan's school (see Image 27). They got sick so easily at Jourdan's, from which Anna Whistler felt a wholesome moral life with the other boys was missing, as well, that she persuaded Whistler not to send them back after Christmas. A series of tutors and a mademoiselle passed through their lives, about most of whom even less is known than about the servants. Like the servants, they were the recipients of kind treatment and gifts. James and Willie could soon chatter quite readily in Russian, which they simply picked up, although the few Russian books in the family's extant library suggest some formal study of the language. When James was left in England in the autumn of 1848, Willie attended Baxter's Commercial School until he left St. Petersburg. There, he formally studied Russian because it was necessary for instruction in the sciences at Baxter's. James and Willie studied French and, like Debo, German. Their father now set them English pieces to recite lest they should forget their native language. To the same end, they each read to their mother almost daily. Starting in late 1844, James took private drawing lessons on Saturdays. In addition, starting in 1845, during the week, he erratically attended a drawing course at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts (see Images 154–157), across the river from their apartment on the English Embankment. They put on evening shows for family and guests, where they exhibited a newly acquired educational toy or gave a recitation, sometimes in French. Debo helped tutor the boys. Persuaded not to participate in the frivolity of Carnival, they were given instead the opportunity to ride sleds pulled by reindeer brought into town by Lapplanders (see Image 347) or to attend the puppet theater.

The pedagogical principles of the long-deceased English cleric, Rev. Legh Richmond (see Image 189), whom Anna Whistler so respected, seemed in part to guide her in the children's home education. This is perhaps why they were given a magic lantern and a kaleidoscope, like Richmond's children, and assigned Richmond's verses on the solar system to commit to memory: the infusion of "piety ... into every enjoyment or pleasure"<sup>17</sup> as much as possible. They came to know Richmond's famous Annals of the Poor and were attracted because of them to cottager Jane's grave during their summer idyll on the Isle of Wight in 1848 (see Image 492). Anna Whistler was selective about which of Richmond's principles she accepted. In some instances, they may simply have come to the same ideas independently. Like him, she disapproved of dancing and of theater with live actors (puppets were acceptable) or too many pleasures in one day. Like him, she objected to "a taste for public exhibition of any kind"<sup>18</sup> and "accomplishments acquired only to gratify pride and vanity."<sup>19</sup> Like him, she was adamant about family privacy on Saturday and Sunday, but in their family they were not otherwise so strict as in Richmond's family. Richmond went so far that he would not allow his children to be with other families, not even with relatives, lest they be subject to influences other than those of their parents. While, as in Richmond's family, the Whistler family members each wrote the birthday celebrant a letter and gave gifts, Anna Whistler gave her children a party. She also permitted them to attend other children's parties, except for those given by Mrs. Baird. She "always refused Mrs. F. Baird's children's parties ... because they were after the model of her" grown-up parties.<sup>20</sup> She felt, however, that James and Willie's education was quite haphazard.

General Konstantin Chevkin of the Railway Commission (see Image 245), to whose son Monsieur Lamartine had been tutor before coming to work for the Whistlers, urged Major Whistler in 1847 to leave both James and Willie to be educated in England after Debo's wedding. Major Whistler thought "they should profit of my stay in [Russia] to learn the languages." Chevkin countered his opinion by asking, "is it worth the sacrifice of the more solid and proper education that England will afford and which our very atmosphere seems to reject?" While Whistler felt there was some truth in Chevkin's statement that "the young men who have many languages here know nothing else, and these languages serve only to make them conceited and useless – they think because they know something that others do not that they are superior in everything," he nevertheless brought his sons back to Russia and further home education. James was left in England only in 1848, when the state of his health made it imperative, but his parents clung to Willie and brought him back to Russia, placing him once again in a private school.<sup>21</sup>

* * *

The house resounded with music every day. Major Whistler played the flute, and Debo was accomplished on the harp and piano. Debo often accompanied her father at their musical evenings, but she was the star. In the morning, she practiced. Ellen Ropes, organist at the British and American Congregational Church, whose husband's family owned the only American mercantile establishment in St. Petersburg, began to come by early in the Whistlers' stay on Galernaia Street to play duets with Debo. Other female acquaintances did the same. The first recorded mention of Debo's lifelong friend-to-be, Emma Maingay (see Image 263), is a musical encounter. The Whistlers' musical evenings drew many guests, including Russian colleagues, who had their own tradition of music in the home.<sup>22</sup> Colonel Mel'nikov brought his brother, who, totally enchanted, proposed bringing his wife another time. Major Trouvellier's wife, also a talented pianist, participated in performances. Mr. Curtis, an English contractor, would travel any distance to hear

Debo play. Outside their home, Colonel Todd (see Image 278) provided a piano when she came to his birthday party. She was frequently the accompanist at the dances held by the Laws. One day James would paint At the Piano (1858–1859), portraying her playing (see Image 18), and many other works of his would bear titles combining colors and the names of musical forms. Debo also sang, but almost exclusively within the family circle, and charmed both Maxwell and Emma Maingay's brother, William Bonamy (see Image 260), with a repertoire in several languages. Almost all the music was secular, which saddened Anna Whistler, but, while wishing for religious music to be performed and unable to play any instrument herself, she preferred this kind of evening to any other. Debo also gave piano lessons to James and Willie, and Anna Whistler hoped that if they attained any proficiency they might "contribute to the praise of God in public worship."

The family participated as well in some of the rich musical life of St. Petersburg. Concerts were given most of the year, except summer. They were often charity events, some drawing more than two thousand people. But the main concert season took place within five weeks of Lent, from the second week up to Passion Week (see Images 378–379), while the theaters were closed, and sometimes several concerts would be given in one day. The Italian Opera performed in the fall and winter, and 1843 through 1845 were its legendary seasons.<sup>23</sup> When the season ended, the singers stayed on for the Lenten events. There were also university concerts in the form of musical mornings.<sup>24</sup> The St. Petersburg Philharmonic gave two or three concerts a year.<sup>25</sup> Harp concerts were probably not given while the Whistlers were in St. Petersburg; harp performance had descended from the concert stage to the amusement park and tavern restaurant, alienating the upper classes.<sup>26</sup> Concerts were not performed in Orthodox churches, but rehearsals of the Court Choir took place on Fridays and were open to the public.<sup>27</sup> The choir of the German Singakademie also had rehearsals one could attend every week.<sup>28</sup> The Liedertafel gave public concerts in the Lutheran Church of St. Peter (see Image 129).<sup>29</sup> Organ concerts were also held there.<sup>30</sup> Of the great composers who came to St. Petersburg while the Whistlers were there, Robert Schumann visited with his wife on her concert tour in 1844 (see Images 199–200), and Berlioz performed in March and April of 1847.<sup>31</sup> Liszt played in 1842 and 1843, but while Major Whistler was in Russia without his family he lived a solitary and lonely life and, when they arrived in the fall of 1843, their grief and poor health isolated them as well.

The enjoyment of this wealth of music was at times endangered by the religious caveats of Anna Whistler and her preference for sacred music and for a life withdrawn from the world, as well as governed by considerations of Debo's health. Anna Whistler was moved most by the unnerving singing of the choristers at the rehearsals of the Court Choir. It carried her off to the realms of the dead, where she hoped one day to dwell with the little sons she had lost. At Easter 1844, she went with Mr. Ropes "to hear the mass so beautifully sung" in the Catholic Church of St. Catherine of Alexandria (see Image 127). Living on the Peterhof Road she appreciated the "chaunting" of the monks during the service at the Trinity-Sergius Monastery (see Image 397). Only in her own church did she not like the singing, which was performed by a choir of German boys. She attended no public musical events, except for one Imperial charity evening, where the Italian Opera greats Viardot-Garcia, Tamburini, and Rubini sang without impressing her (see Images 196–198).

The fact that Debo wished to attend secular public musical events even in Lent was a bone of contention between them, but Debo, the professional musician, would not budge and went to hear Clara Schumann twice. She attended The Barber of Seville by the Italian Opera troupe at the end of its first glorious season – with Anna Whistler's reluctant approval – and Anna Whistler's letters show that she went on to attend other Lenten performances over the years. She went to rehearsals of the Singakademie, because she was a member of the chorus. They sang only sacred music, and Anna Whistler – and sometimes Major Whistler – went too. Debo's study of German drew her to some of the other German performance venues. She probably went to the organ concerts at the Lutheran Church of St. Peter, and therefore was interested in hearing a new organ tested one evening. She seemed to react less emotionally than Anna Whistler to the singing of the Court Choir, exchanging impressions with Emma Maingay, while Anna Whistler wept.

Beyond the concert halls and churches, there was music everywhere: the workers singing their melancholy songs while they built the new bridge; the peasants singing on the Peterhof Road, whose songs Emma Maingay told Debo contained low words; Sir William Allan's niece singing Scottish and Spanish songs, whom Debo went to hear at a private home; the powerful singing voice of Mrs. Ropes penetrating the walls of their adjoining apartments; the vocal and instrumental performances of hostesses and their families at the dachas they visited; the organ grinders in the courtyards; the street musicians; the bands and orchestras at Ekateringof, the Summer Garden, the Pavlovsk Vauxhall (pleasure garden), and the islands of the Neva (see Images 406, 149, 384, 105).

Apart from music, other aspects of Russian cultural life in St. Petersburg were essentially non-existent for them. They began to attend exhibits at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts only when James became a student in the drawing courses. The literary scene is not mentioned. They seem not to have known that the great fabulist, Ivan Krylov (see Image 186), whom General Destrem (see Image 246), Major Whistler's colleague, had translated into French, died in November 1844. Poor People, the first novel of the young, still-unknown Dostoevskii (see Image 187), a literary event in 1846, passed unremarked. If Anna Whistler knew that the governess, Miss McLean's, employer, Mrs. Olenina (see Image 306), was the daughter of the recently deceased president of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts (see Image 307), we are not made aware of it. Lack of knowledge of Belinskii's death in June 1848 (see Image 188) might be excused because Anna Whistler and the boys were on their way to England. Even William Ropes's brother, Joseph Samuel, who had received a Russian education, graduating from the Third Gymnasium and St. Petersburg University, was deeply interested only in translating and distributing tracts in Russia until he left permanently in 1847.

* * *

Now, besides celebrating George Washington's birthday, the Fourth of July, Thanksgiving, and their own birthdays, they had two Christmases and two New Years, the second ones coming twelve days after the Western ones, and two Easters, if this movable feastday did not coincide with their own. They were not allowed two birthdays, but much was made of the one they had, especially James's tenth. Besides the Blessing of the Waters at Epiphany followed by the celebration marking the opening of navigation (see Image 349), other Russian celebrations were the Carnival festivities preceding Lent and renewed just before Easter; the first of May promenade at Ekateringof;<sup>32</sup> and Whitsunday (usually Whitmonday) with its matchmaking that some foreigners likened to Valentine's Day.<sup>33</sup> There were also the official holidays that freed James and Willie from their lessons: the day of Alexander I's death and Nicholas I's succession to the throne; the birthdays or namedays of Imperial family members; numerous church holidays, with their folk counterparts; and feast days (see Images 375–382 for icons of some Russian holy days). Easter was the greatest holiday for the Russian Orthodox Church and for Anna Whistler, for whom Christ was the center of her life. Many pages of her diaries are devoted year after year to both the religious and the secular aspects of the Easter season.

Their friends fluent in Russian, members of the American Legation, and Major Whistler's colleagues kept them informed of important internal events, such as Russian court life and the cholera. The special Imperial occasions during their stay in Russia were the marriages in 1844 of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (see Images 434–435, 444–446) and of her first cousin, Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna (see Image 441–442), when Debo was a spectator at the dinner and ball held for the latter and Maxwell regaled the Whistlers with stories of the functions he attended as a diplomat until he fell seriously ill; the tragic decline of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna from tuberculosis and her death after childbirth that same year (see Images 447–460); the death of Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna the following year also in childbirth; the marriage in 1846 of Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna (see Images 420, 432–433), when the Whistlers attended the public festivities at Peterhof, with Colin Ingersoll (see Image 280) filling them in on the private marriage ceremony; the betrothal and marriage of Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich (see Images 436–438) in 1847; and the births and christenings of numerous Imperial grandchildren.

Anna Whistler was made aware of all the phases of the pregnant Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna's fading life and her death.

Friends reported and Anna Whistler witnessed personally that the revolutions of 1848 in Europe resulted in greater public appearances by the emperor and empress with many changes of costume in the course of the same day. The French edition of the official Russian newspaper contained public statements that she could understand and even copied into her diaries. Her Philadelphia friend Henriette Halbach, who in 1848 may have been living permanently in Germany, commented on the revolutions of 1848 in a letter cited in the diaries. With the appearance of the cholera, friends informed them that the populace was stirred – as in 1830–1831 – to seek its scapegoats in Russia’s old political enemy, the Poles, who were accused of poisoning the food, and in foreign doctors, some of whom were being killed.

They were aware of major political events in America chiefly through family correspondence. American newspapers were expensive to receive; moreover, they arrived “mutilated with ink, and pumice stone, where the Gov<sup>t</sup> Censors had erased objectionable matter.”<sup>34</sup> Sometimes Major Whistler went to read them uncensored at the American Legation in Tsarskoe Selo. The main topics of interest for the little American colony were the Mexican War and the possibility of hostilities over the Oregon Territory (see “Maps”). The Mexican War had an extremely personal aspect. It meant that Major Whistler’s eldest brother, William, and William’s son Joseph (see Images 34–35), both in the army, had been called up for active duty. Captain William G. Williams, a West Point acquaintance, was killed. The possibility of hostilities over the Oregon Territory was personal as well: Anna Whistler did not wish to see America and England at war, because she loved both countries and had close relatives and good friends in England as well as English-born friends in America.

They learned also of the many accidents in which steamers both international and local – still the major mode of domestic travel in those early days of the railroad – burned or exploded or were shipwrecked or were delivered when death seemed inevitable. Anna Whistler had experienced such a loss personally: years before, a sister had died by drowning, along with her husband and two children, when they could not get out of their cabin before their capsizing steamer flooded.<sup>35</sup>

* * *

Geographically, the family's life was quite circumscribed. When Major Whistler was not in St. Petersburg, he was traveling between St. Petersburg and Moscow with his superior, Count Pyotr Andreevich Kleinmikhel' (see Image 243), to inspect the progress of the work on the route of the forthcoming railway. Anna Whistler and the children spent their Russian sojourn entirely in St. Petersburg and its environs, with the sole exception that in June of 1848, Willie accompanied his father on an inspection trip.<sup>36</sup>

Major and Anna Whistler did not see eye-to-eye about the Bobrinskii house. He wanted to keep renting it "because of the respectability of its situation and character," but she thought "it too large and expensive,"<sup>37</sup> as he refused to have any tenant but Maxwell in the rooms the latter was presently occupying. Maxwell, however, expected to be leaving Russia. In early 1844, they began to consider taking a dacha,<sup>38</sup> as their family physician, Dr. James Rogers of the British Legation, had told them "it [was] necessary for the health of the boys to be in [the] country during the 4 months of Summer."<sup>39</sup> Possibilities were the nearby Peterhof Road, which ran along the shore of the Gulf of Finland, where some of their friends and acquaintances owned or rented dachas, or a bathing place on the Baltic Sea. The Major did "not like the miserable country and country houses in the vicinity,"<sup>40</sup> but it was impossible for him to leave his work and accompany his family to the Baltic seacoast, so the Peterhof Road was chosen. Anna Whistler prevailed, and they gave up the Bobrinskii house permanently on 13 May 1844. They moved their household goods in carts to "a delightful country house looking just [then] like the banks of the Potomac,"<sup>41</sup> belonging to Thomas Drury, Senior, a bleach manufacturer. It was located "about 3½ miles from the city barrier,"<sup>42</sup> a short distance Whistler could easily travel every day. Here they passed May to September 1844. They frequently visited the hospitable Gellibrand dacha, where the Ropes family spent their summers, with Mr. Ropes, like most exchange merchants of the First Guild, remaining in town all week and coming out on Saturday. Mrs. Gellibrand (see Image 267) was deeply devoted to distributing religious tracts to the Russian troops who traveled the Peterhof Road back and forth between St. Petersburg and Peterhof. She found willing helpers in James, Willie, and Anna Whistler, who were advised to pitch the tracts from a distance lest the recipients, in their eagerness, knock them down. Mr. Drury had several houses on his estate, and they came to know the occupants of his other dachas: Mrs. Norman in one and Mr. Drury's son, William, with his wife and ten children in another. Anna Whistler held Sunday School at the Whistler dacha, where James and Willie were joined by the Norman, Drury, and Handyside children. The family branched out and accepted invitations to the Baird and Anderson dachas, where Anna Whistler particularly enjoyed the music. They went on excursions to the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works (see Images 223–225), where the Harrison (see Images 226–227) and Eastwick (see Images 233–238) families lived in a house on one side of the Works (see Images 239–240) and, in a house on the other side of the Works, Thomas DeKay Winans (see Image 229) had bachelor quarters until his marriage in the summer of 1847. The Harrison quarters “had a home look,” with their rocking chairs and their “portraits of Washington and Franklin on the walls.”<sup>43</sup> There, they attended Sunday services held for the mechanics in the schoolroom by Rev. Thomas Ellerby (see Image 256) of the British and American Congregational Church of St. Petersburg and were taken to the works to see locomotives, passenger cars, and wheels being made. James and Willie rode the Eastwick boys' ponies. They traveled back into St. Petersburg for Sunday morning services at the English Church (see Images 110–111) and for an excursion in Ekateringof Park with its old wooden palace, serpentine walkways, and amusements (see Images 405–406). They went up river to the factory run by General Alexander Wilson, where linens and playing cards were made (see Images 241–242). They long anticipated and perhaps finally took an excursion to Lake Ladoga (see Image 404). The adults went to the famed Trinity-Sergius Monastery on the Peterhof Road (see Image 397) to hear a service, but especially for the singing. The Gellibrands took them (without James and Major Whistler, who were at Aleksandrofsky) to the neighboring estate of Count Grigorii Grigorievich Kushelev (see Image 302) to witness the annual fête he gave for his peasants. James celebrated his tenth birthday, thrilling his mother with a poem avowing his love for her, albeit borrowed from Thomas Moore. Aunt Alicia (see Image 39) came that summer for a visit and stayed for over a year that culminated in the birth of John Bouttatz Whistler.

* * *

Living on the Peterhof Road, they made day trips to the Imperial summer-residence towns of Tsarskoe Selo and Peterhof (see Images 383–394, 400–403). “The country beyond the city, and in the direction of Moscow, is flat and unattractive”<sup>44</sup> and occupied by factories, while on the road to Peterhof, with its very attractive dachas, Imperial residences, and the monastery (see Image 397), one encountered overpowering clouds of dust in the summer heat, unless it rained, and then the dust turned to thick mud.<sup>45</sup> Mosquitoes were also plentiful. Living in the country, they experienced the curious phenomenon of a watchman on each estate beating during the night with a pair of sticks on a board nailed to two posts in order to warn thieves away and indicate to his master that he was carrying out his job.<sup>46</sup>

They had already visited Tsarskoe Selo, where Colonel Todd lived, in early May of 1844, when they were still tenants in Bobrinskii’s house, invited by Maxwell, who sought to repay them for saving his life. They traveled then for the first time on the first and only railway line existing in Russia, which ran from St. Petersburg to Tsarskoe Selo and then three kilometers further to Pavlovsk (see Image 383), and found it primitive by American standards. The perfect neatness of quiet inland Tsarskoe Selo, uniform in its layout, with macadamized roads and carefully kept gardens, where trees were washed and paths looked like parquet floors, enchanted Anna Whistler. She did not see it, with Colin Ingersoll’s eyes, as “built with the same regularity and uniformity – in a straight line – like a body of Russian soldiers drawn up for Review.”<sup>47</sup> They visited only the Great Tsarskoe Selo Palace (also called simply the Catharine Palace; see Image 385), able to do so because the heir apparent was not in residence. She recorded the opulence of Catherine the Great’s apartments and skeptically regarded the arrangement of Alexander I’s study as an attempt to create the illusion that it looked just as it had in his lifetime. James said he would have liked to know more about the paintings in the espaliered main gallery. On that trip, they had also visited Pavlovsk, going by carriage from Colonel Todd's house. They visited only the pleasure garden pavilion – the terminus for the train (see Image 384) – on the private property of the emperor's brother, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich. In the pavilion, one could take refreshment, dine, and dance. A military band and an orchestra played alternately. It would not have appealed much to Anna Whistler, and there seems to be no record that they went there again.

From their dacha, they traveled by carriage to Tsarskoe Selo again in August of 1844 with Aunt Alicia. Anna Whistler described in the diaries in some detail the collections of the Armory, the grounds of the Alexander Palace, where Nicholas I resided, and the Chinese bridge with its lifelike figures in the Alexander Park (see Images 388–394).

That same August, they visited Peterhof (see Images 400–403), where Nicholas I resided in the Cottage and the heir apparent in the Great Peterhof Palace, which precluded visiting either residence. Peterhof, in contrast to Tsarskoe Selo, resounded with the rumble of jetting and cascading water, creating a light spray of shimmering moisture, forming a transparent vault over the spacious central basin, transforming broad steps into crystal staircases with glasslike cloches, turning quivering droplets into diamond dust, and producing rainbows.<sup>48</sup> Anna Whistler recorded their impressions of the central fountains in front of the Great Peterhof Palace in the Upper Garden, the bath house, and Peter the Great's favorite palace, Monplezir, in the Lower Garden. James was most taken by the Samson fountain and the athletes and serpents shooting streams of water. He was moved to laughter in the Peterhof Hermitage (Little Monplezir) by paintings of birds produced by Peter the Great's own hand, but Anna Whistler felt they should be “most highly prized” for that very reason.<sup>49</sup>

* * *

In September of 1844, they moved into a spacious ten-room apartment with a balcony on the third floor of a house on the English Embankment belonging to a merchant named Ritter. They had a view from their living room of the Neva in all its seasonal transformations and of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts opposite (see Images 154–155). As the landing for the Cronstadt steamer was located near them, from their balcony they could observe the animated arrival and departure of its passengers.<sup>50</sup> At the start of spring, for a brief while, the crowds shifted from the muddy sidewalks of the Nevskii Prospekt to the wide, clean, and dry granite pavement of the English Embankment (see Images 101–104).<sup>51</sup> Here they promenaded from two to four in the afternoon until Bright Week, the week after Easter, when they abandoned the English Embankment for the Summer Garden (see Image 149).<sup>52</sup> During the three months of summer, from six o'clock every evening until late into the night, elegantly dressed musicians gave "Petersburg serenades" on horn and wind instruments from boats floating past the English Embankment.<sup>53</sup>

They lived here for four years and eight months. The Ropeses moved from the Galernaia and became their neighbors across the landing. In the summer of 1845, they remained in St. Petersburg, where John Bouttatz Whistler, the last child, was born. After his birth, Debo left St. Petersburg to spend a year with the Winstanleys in Preston, Lancashire. In 1846, Major Whistler prevailed: they did not take a dacha again. That summer, they frequently traveled from St. Petersburg to visit friends who continued to summer on the Peterhof Road. In July, afraid of a possible mishap on the water, they hired a coach to take them and the Crufts – visiting Americans consigned to their care – all the way to Peterhof to join in the public festivities celebrating the marriage of Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna and His Highness Prince Karl of Württemberg (see Images 420, 432–433). The crowd was limited to the grounds of the Upper and Lower Gardens, and it was the illuminations and the milling mass of people that Anna Whistler concentrated on recording. In August, they visited Tsarskoe Selo again. It had been approximately two years since the death of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, and Anna Whistler devoted herself to viewing the oratory created in her memory in the room where she had died in the Alexander Palace, as well as other monuments to her within the Alexander Park (see Images 450–457). In October of 1846, the Whistlers suffered their own loss: John Bouttatz died. His body was sent to Stonington to be buried with his brothers.

* * *

James's attack of rheumatic fever in 1847 made Dr. Rogers advise them to shift the summer location for Anna Whistler and the boys to England. Although such separations were commonplace for the foreign community of St. Petersburg, this was the beginning of the family's breakup. In the summer of 1847, they lived with the Winstanleys and enjoyed the rural beauty of England. On this visit to Preston, they were introduced to at least one of the Cotton Lords of the town, Charles Swainson, at whose home in Walton-le-Dale, Cooper Hill (see Image 464), James celebrated his thirteenth birthday. Anna Whistler became aware of the unrest among the unemployed mill workers or at least recorded it for the first time. Debo, who had traveled separately through Europe to England with the Blisses, announced, on joining her family, that a young English doctor named Francis Seymour Haden (see Image 20) wished to marry her and with no delay. Deeply unhappy over the impending marriage, Whistler took his second leave from Russia to be present at their wedding in October, which was marred by his depression. He and Anna Whistler and the boys returned to St. Petersburg in late October.

In June of 1848, James had another severe attack of rheumatic fever, and the cholera began to rage with full force. Europe was rife with revolutions. Dr. Rogers, who was himself leaving Russia temporarily because of the epidemic and possibly because of the scapegoat killing of doctors, advised everyone he could to leave. Anna Whistler took the boys to England again. They lived with the Hadens, who were expecting their first child in December. She managed finally to visit her old friend of eighteen years before, Georgina Shaw (see Image 486), who ran a school for girls in Clapham. In July, they traveled to the Isle of Wight for a holiday of several weeks. They lodged in the village of Shanklin, where they made the acquaintance of a family named Phillips and encountered other escapees from the cholera in St. Petersburg, some of them Russian. Mrs. Morgan read from her husband's frank letters about the devastation being wreaked by the cholera epidemic, while Major Whistler's reports were calculated not to distress his family. They made daily excursions, often in the company of the Phillipses, to popular sights: within Shanklin and to its chine, Bonchurch, Ventnor, Culver Cliffs, Appuldurcombe, Blackgang Chine, St. Lawrence, and Rev. Legh Richmond's Brading (see Images 489–496). James drew to his heart's content. Debo and the Winstanleys visited them. They saw members of the well-known naval family of Napier and had a conversation with an intriguing "Lady D." James's health remained frail: he was not permitted to bathe in the sea and had to ride a donkey when they traveled any distance. At the end of the summer, Anna Whistler made the decision to leave him in England. She decided to leave Mary Brennan, too, to be of assistance to the pregnant Debo. She and Willie returned to St. Petersburg to find Whistler changed for the worse by the illness he had suffered over the summer. In November, he contracted cholera. Anna Whistler nursed him back to health, but his heart began to fail and, in April of 1849, he died. The Russian sojourn was over.<sup>54</sup>

NOTES

1. All quotations for which no source is acknowledged are taken from the diaries themselves.
2. Information about the British and American Congregational Church (often called simply the British and American Chapel) is difficult to find and contradictory. Two excellent contemporary sources on the houses of worship of St. Petersburg substantially dissipate this confusion, when compared to one another.

Antonov and Kobak explain that a congregation was formed on 6 December 1833 including the Congregationalists, which seven years later separated from the Anglicans. The congregation bought a building, to which, in 1839–1840, the architect Karl-Wilhelm Winkler (1813–1861) added from the courtyard side a double-lighted hall holding 250 persons, although there were far fewer Congregationalists in St. Petersburg at that time. In 1890, for the fiftieth anniversary of the Chapel, the front building was expanded into a two-story structure according to the plans of civil engineer F.V. [sic: F.N.] Sobolevskii (1831–1892) and redecorated (Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, pp. 269, 383, 388).

Shul'ts's explanation is as follows. The building of the Methodist British–American Church and the prayer hall of Christ the Savior of the Hutterites and the prayer hall of the Sarepta Brotherhood was built on New-Isaac Street in 1820 [sic: 1840] according to the plan of the civil engineer F.N. Sobolevskii (1831–1892). When it was being built, the foundation and walls of the house previously standing on that spot in the 1780s and 1790s and the entire adjacent plot, all belonging to Count A.A. Bezborodko, were included (S. Shul'ts, Khramy Sankt-Peterburga Istoriiia i sovremennost' [Churches of St. Petersburg: Their History Past and Present], ed. M.V. Shkarovskii [St. Petersburg: Glagol, 1994], p. 261).

A valuable source about the Chapel are the letters from St. Petersburg of the Ropes family members to their relatives in Massachusetts in the 1830s cited in these Notes. They show that the congregation was in existence in 1832, when William Ropes arrived in Russia for the second time; that they were collecting money to build their own church; and that in the meantime they met in the meeting house of the German Moravian Brethren (Mary T. Ropes to Uncle Hardy Ropes, St. P. 19 June 1832, St. P. June 30/July 12, 1833, and St. P. 3 July N.S., and St. P. Cronstadt June 1/14 [sic], 1833, HUBL: Ropes Papers; Wm. Ropes to Hardy Ropes, St. P. 4 Dec. N.S. 1832).

When Anna Whistler came to Russia, the British and American Congregational Church was well-established in its building on New-Isaac Street.

3. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29.
4. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30 / Oct. 12, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W364.
5. William Whistler described the Saturday afternoons of his childhood to his second wife, Helen (Ionides) Whistler (Elizabeth R. Pennell and Joseph Pennell, The Whistler Journal [Philadelphia: J. Lippincott, 1921], p. 254; Joseph Pennell and Elizabeth R. Pennell, The Life of James McNeill Whistler, 2 vols. [London: Heinemann, 1908], vol. 1, p. 9).
6. V. Ia. Kurbatov, Peterhof [Peterhof] (Leningrad: Izdanie Leningradskogo Gubernskogo Soveta Professional'nykh Soiuzov, 1925), p. 30; Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 45.
7. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 3 October 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W363. The English Magazine was a department store.
8. An essay on the life of George Washington Whistler, written by Anna Whistler in May 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
9. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 4, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27.
10. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 84; Bloomfield, Reminiscences, vol. 1, pp. 148–149.
11. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 4, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27.
12. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 4.
13. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1843, entry dated Sept. 10, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21.
14. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fols. 10, 23. Her friend Miss Hirst said she would “give all but her own soul to be able to talk Russ sufficiently well to teach the poor & ignorant the gospel plan of Salvation” (Tuesday, 25 June 1844, in the entry for Monday 17th June, NYPL: AWP, Part I). Mr. Gellibrand, the brother-in-law of Mr. Ropes, said “I have lived among these people 20 years & am more & more convinced of the errors of the Greek church, but without the bible how soon we should also lose our light!” (entry for Sat [July] 6th, NYPL: AWP, Part I). For filth and bugs, see Bloomfield, Reminiscences, vol. 1, p. 159.

15. H.K. Fettyplace, Entry for tuesday [July 25], 1848, Journal of a Voyage from Mobile to Havana (via New Orleans) Hence to St. Petersburg and from Hense [sic] to Boston on Board the Ship “Peterhof” Captain L. Endicott, A. 1848, Peabody Essex Museum (PEM) Library, Salem, MA (hereafter PEM: Fettyplace Journal). I wish to express my deep gratitude to Margaret Coleman, director of the Russian American Cultural Center at Russia Wharf (now closed) in Boston, who, together with Meghan Driscoll, then working at the Cultural Center, transcribed the portions of Henry King Fettyplace’s journal relevant for my work. I wish also to thank Irene Axelrod, archivist of the PEM Library, for her participation in the transcription process.

Henry King Fettyplace was born in Marblehead, Massachusetts, probably in 1819, given that this is the birth year of his classmate, George Henry Prince. His brother, Thomas J. Fettyplace, was appointed consul for Mobile by the Republic of Texas on 22 December 1843. On 25 June 1844, Henry K. Fettyplace wrote to the secretary of state asking to be appointed vice-consul in Mobile, a position Thomas J. Fettyplace had requested to be permitted to establish “for a few days” (Alma Howell Brown, “The Consular Service of the Republic of Texas,” Southwestern Historical Quarterly 33, no. 3 [1930]: pp. 223, 224). Henry K Fettyplace died in 1862 and was buried in Marblehead, Massachusetts.

16. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 4 Dec. 1848 & 5th, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
17. Domestic Portraiture; or, The Successful Application of Religious Principle in the Education of a Family, exemplified in the Memoirs of three of the deceased children of the Rev. Legh Richmond. With a few introductory remarks on Christian education, by the Rev. E. Bickersteth, Rector of Watton, Herts. (New York: Robert Carter, 1834), p. 30.
18. Domestic Portraiture, p. 45.
19. Domestic Portraiture, p. 27.
20. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Feb. 19 [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.
21. All quotations in this paragraph are taken from Major George W. Whistler to Anna Whistler, Moscow July 16th 1847. Friday—, GUL: Whistler Collection, W655.

22. For a brilliant exposition of music in the Russian home and concert hall, see Richard Stites, Serfdom, Society, and the Arts in Imperial Russia: The Pleasure and the Power (New Haven & London: Yale University Press, 2005), pp. 53–126.
23. Julie A. Buckler, The Literary Lorgnette Attending Opera in Imperial Russia (Palo Alto, CA: Stanford University Press, 2000), p. 14. “The St. Petersburg directorate made a brief, Italian opera troupe in the late 1820s, but the venture was unprofitable” (Buckler, p. 37). “The ‘Golden Age’ of Italian opera in Russia began with the tenor Giovanni Rubini’s visit in 1843. After an initial season performing with local Russian singers, Rubini concluded an agreement with the Imperial Theater directorate, enabling him to form his own troupe in Italy and return to St. Petersburg for full opera seasons. The troupe initially featured the famous trio of Rubini, baritone Antonio Tamburini, and mezzo-soprano Pauline Viardot-Garcia ... Tsar Nicholas I proved himself willing to provide abundant financial support for Rubini’s Italian opera project” (Buckler, p. 38).
24. I.F. Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn’ Peterburga Muzyka v obshchestvennom i domashnem bytu 1801–1859 gody. Materialy dlia èntsiklopedii “Muzykal’nyi Peterburg” [The Concert Life of Petersburg Music in Social and Domestic Life 1801–1859. Materials for an encyclopedia “Musical Petersburg”] (St. Petersburg: [Petrovskii fond], 2000), pp. 90–91.
25. Petrovskaia, p. 91.
26. The harp was taught in the Smol’nyi and the Catherine female institutes and could be heard at the public examinations there. After the expansion of harp performance to lower-class venues, instruction on the harp at the Smol’nyi Institute ceased and was not resumed until 1891 (Petrovskaia, pp. 14–15).
27. Petrovskaia, p. 46.
28. Petrovskaia, p. 38.
29. Petrovskaia, p. 48.
30. Petrovskaia, p. 69.
31. Petrovskaia, pp. 104, 120, 142–143, 179; Taisija A. Shcherbakova, Mikhail i Matvei Viel’gorskii: ispolniteli, prosvetiteli, metsenaty [Mikhail and Matvei Viel’gorskii: Performers, Enlighteners, and Patrons] (Moscow: Muzyka, 1990), p. 44.

32. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg. May 2/14 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 12.
33. Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 3, pp. 8–123; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35.
34. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fol. 51.
35. See the biography of the Easterbrook family, part of the biographies of the Whistler, Swift, Kingsley, McNeill, Cammann, Rodewald, Flagg, Boardman, Gibbs, Chew, Palmer, Easterbrook, Lorillard, Dunscombe, Vallance, Bohlen, Halbach, and Fairfax families in Appendix E (hereafter, Whistler . . . Fairfax).
36. Entry for Monday [May] 22nd [1848], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II; A.I. Shtukenberg, Memuary Antona Shtukenberga [Memoirs of Anton Shtukenberg], 3 vols. (St. Petersburg, 1836–61), Rukopisnyi otdel (RO) [Manuscript Division], Leningradskii institut inzhenerov zheleznodorozhnogo transporta (LIIZhT) [Leningrad Institute of Railway Transport Engineers], St. Petersburg (hereafter, Shtukenberg, Memuary), vol. 2, fol. 516.
37. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 32. Both quotations are from this letter.
38. For an English-language work on the dacha see Steven Lovell, Summerfolk: A History of the Dacha, 1710–2000 (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 2003).
39. George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 4th, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
40. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 32.
41. George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 4, 1844, entry dated May 18, NYPL: Swift Papers; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29.
42. George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 4, 1844, entry dated May 18, NYPL: Swift Papers.
43. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 51.
44. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fol. 1.
45. See similar comments by Al'bin Konechnyi, quoting V.R. Zotov on life in Petersburg in the 1840s (Al'bin Konechnyi, - “Peterburgskie dachi” [“Petersburg dachas”], Antropologicheskii forum [Anthropology Forum] 3 [2005]: p. 449).

46. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36.
  47. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fol. 4.
  48. I am no longer able to locate the original source for this description of water at Peterhof.
  49. Anna Whistler does not mention that she saw these paintings in the Hermitage (Little Monplezir) at Peterhof, but Henry K. Fettyplace (entry for Sunday 30th July 1848) has identified their location in this building.
  50. Beginning in 1837, when a new fairway was dug in the mouth of the Neva for more convenient communication between St. Petersburg and Cronstadt, regular passenger travel between St. Petersburg and Europe, Scandinavia, and England started. The landing and the ticket office were located on the English Embankment (Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 284n1).
  51. Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 227.
  52. Solovieva, Angliiskaia naberezhnaia, p. 16.
  53. Solovieva, p. 15; P.E. Bukharkin, ed., Deviatnadsatyi vek [The Nineteenth Century], vol. 2 of Tri veka Sankt-Peterburga Ėntsiklopediia [Three Centuries of St. Petersburg: An Encyclopedia], 3 vols. (St. Petersburg: Filologicheskii fakul'tet Sankt-Peterburgskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, 2006), bk. 5, pp. 199–202.
  54. Anna Whistler visited Russia again, alone, sometime in July – August of 1860. Writing to James on 19 August 1861, she reminded him: “Tis a year today, dear Jamie, since you and Seymour [Haden] welcomed me back to the Sloane st home from Russia –” (Anna Whistler to dear Jamie Stonington Conn Monday, Aug 19th [18]61, GUL: Whistler Collection, W511). She referred to this trip again in 1876, in a letter to one of the daughters of Andrew McCalla and Lydia (James) Eastwick. In it, she makes clear that she visited Peterhof, in the environs of St. Petersburg, in 1860. She visited then with the family of George Henry and Marion (Hall) Prince: “Marion the youngest sister of the three whom I knew as interesting children in 1860 when I visited Peterhoff –” (Anna Whistler to Mary Emma Harmar Eastwick, Hastings, 19 July, with additions on 26 and 28 July, LC: P-W, box 34). “Marion the youngest sister” refers to Sarah Marion Prince, a daughter of George and Marion (Hall) Prince.

THE WHISTLERS AS THEY WERE IN THE 1840S

GEORGE WASHINGTON WHISTLER

Why George Washington Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) was called “Major” is an item of curiosity that has not been resolved. He graduated from West Point with the rank of second lieutenant in July 1819. He was promoted to first lieutenant in August 1829, “but resigned his commission on December 31, 1833, in order to become a full-time civil engineer. Nevertheless, by May, 1836, he was called Captain Whistler, and by the time that he began to work for the Western Railroad of Massachusetts ... in 1837, he was known as Major Whistler, by which rank he was called, both in America and Russia, until his death in April, 1849.”<sup>1</sup> He may have been a member of a state militia,<sup>2</sup> but to date this has not been corroborated.

* * *

Whistler’s first marriage (23 January 1821) was an elopement with Mary Roberdeau Swift (see Image 10) against her parents’ wishes.<sup>3</sup> Three children – George William (see Images 12–13), Joseph Swift, and Deborah Delano (see Images 17–19, 21) – were born to them within a period of four years (1822–1825). Whistler’s peripatetic life as an army engineer entailed at times extensive absences from home. Mary Roberdeau (Swift) Whistler died in 1827. His wife’s death resulted in the necessity of relinquishing their children to the care of her family and rarely seeing them,<sup>4</sup> until his second marriage enabled him to retrieve them. Viewed retrospectively from twelve years (1843) into his marriage to Anna McNeill (see Images 1–5) and the ensuing years in Russia until his death, this earlier life seems to reflect an absence of religious conviction or commitment to formal religion fostered by his wandering life and his anguish and bitterness over the loss of his first wife and separation from his children. Anna Whistler set about working to shape his religious life and views, and partly succeeded. He went to church on Sunday. He enjoyed the sermons read aloud at home on a Sunday night, participating as a reader himself sometimes. He joined in the family's daily attendance at church during the week before Easter. In time, he began to carry his Bible with him on inspection trips with Count Kleinmikhel' (see Image 243).<sup>5</sup> He was "wont to kneel side by side [with his wife] in [their] chamber" and pray silently.<sup>6</sup> He celebrated the Sabbath by withdrawing from the outside world to please her. On his deathbed, he assured her that he believed in Christ, but she seems never to have been able to persuade him to partake of communion and thus enter into the formal mysteries of her religion. Nor was he willing to simply entrust his cares entirely to God, as, for example, when his son George had to take a year's cruise for his health. Only on his deathbed, barely able to speak, did he accept his wife's words that he could leave them all to God. The eulogies Anna Whistler wrote after his death of his religious beliefs and of the almost providential purpose in his going to Russia have, therefore, to be considered in the light of her own deeply religious persuasion and her grief-stricken need to embellish all aspects of his life.

There are two interesting descriptions of Whistler's physical appearance in midlife. The first is the more sensual:

A man of medium height, erect and military in bearing, Major Whistler was always a prominent figure on the street. With dark rich complexion and black hair that hung in coarse curls, he might easily be taken for a foreigner. He had a rare face. The nose was strong and prominent yet delicately molded, and the lips of a refined mouth were mobile and expressive.<sup>7</sup>

The best description of Whistler's physical appearance and spiritual bearing in the 1840s, though, is the succinct and vivid statement made by his Russian colleague, Anton Shtukenberg (see Image 250), first cousin of James's drawing teacher, Aleksandr Koritskii (see Images 167–170):

During the first years Whistler was very hale, with wonderful thick black hair and a slightly bronzed face with an aquiline nose; and in general he had a noble-looking native profile which reminded you of an Indian and made you recognize in him, when you got to know him, a true free gentleman.<sup>8</sup>

In temperament, he was a perceivably honorable, generous, modest, gentle, compassionate, stubborn, anxious, and emotional man, who cried easily and suffered from homesickness whenever parted from his family. Separated by great distance from his young children, he sought out other children wherever he was for the reason that they physically resembled his own. He often rode all night at the end of an inspection trip to reduce his time away from home. He reluctantly accepted an invitation from Russian colleagues for even a day's absence from his family, although he occasionally allowed himself to spend a "bachelor" evening with his English sea-captain friend, John Kruger. He was a "humane person who did not forget man or beast."<sup>9</sup> In his modesty, he was "inclined in a place of worship to 'take the lower room.'"<sup>10</sup> He was embarrassed by "public displays of feeling."<sup>11</sup> He was anxious "lest deviating from Mr. Laws practice should bring remarks upon him,"<sup>12</sup> when his wife broke with custom and asked Rev. Williams to close the evening at their home by conducting their family devotions.

He held decided views on the influence of women upon society and "on the claims of children":

[His] views ... of the sacred responsibility of women, were such as would if adopted extend happiness throughout all classes of society, he was solemnly impressed by the dignity of the calling of the mother of a family & seriously considered the influence of women of all ages upon the society in which they moved. how often he lamented that frivolity in manner, indelicacy or extravagance in dress should impair it, he would conclude his very forcible remarks upon this important subject, by saying he knew he could not make converts – for fashion was his opponent.

As a result of these views, he left domestic decisions to be made by his wife, though he murmured with pained feelings when she decided that Debo should marry Francis Seymour Haden (see Image 20) immediately and that James (see Images 24–29) should be left in England for his health. His ineffectual plea both times was that they should first come back to St. Petersburg just for the winter.

Of the claims of children he was very scrupulous, to practice any injustice upon a helpless little one or take advantage of confiding & unsuspecting youth he considered an outrage to laws human and divine. he always was scrupulous against deceiving children, watchful against injudicious indulgence, yet none shrink from harshness more, he was grieved but never angry when his children were in fault.<sup>13</sup>

He did not chide Debo when staying out late at a party affected her health adversely and exhausted him as well. His daughter's insufficient concern for him on her wedding day, although she would now be permanently separated from him, drew comment in Anna Whistler's diary, but she recorded no murmuring from Major Whistler, only his misery. But he was a stubborn man. Debo's marriage "outside the United States"<sup>14</sup> – and something he disliked in his brief encounter with Haden – prevented him from writing to her until he was dying. This behavior, though admittedly hurtful to his daughter, came not from a hardened heart, according to Anna Whistler, but from an awareness of how offensive it might be to Debo that he would never allow himself to speak of Haden in any letter he might write. His correspondence with General Joseph G. Swift (see Image 11) reveals how he struggled, encouraged, and empathized with his sometimes flighty and difficult son, George, thousands of miles away. The news of the terrible death of young Charlotte Canda, Debo's schoolmate, made him weep, perhaps because he, too, had only one daughter. After hearing the choristers of the Imperial Choir and viewing their comfortable quarters, he "allowed his imagination to embitter his pleasure in listening to them by the idea of how they must be dulled & punished"<sup>15</sup> under the Russian educational system. He became a mentor to young men. The diaries record that the troubles of an unnamed young man agitated him greatly. Anna Whistler's correspondence refers to young men at Alexandrofsky who had turned to him for guidance and about whom he concerned himself even on his deathbed.<sup>16</sup>

Whistler felt from the start of his work with due anxiety the weight of the responsibility placed on him:

[T]his establishment [the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works] has always been a source of great anxiety to me ... for in all matters relating to it they have left me to do as I thought best – never investigating the merits of the Engines or Cars – leaving all to me – ... in the beginning the responsibility I felt here was very heavy – for where so much was doing – if it was not right – the wrong would be irreparable.<sup>17</sup>

His conscientiousness about his work is evident in the four requests he made to Count Kleinmikhel' for leave to go abroad (in 1843, 1846, 1847, and 1849) during his stay of six years and eight months in Russia. Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) approved them all. The first leave, to meet his family in Hamburg, Whistler did not in the end have to take; thus he remained in Russia from August 1842 until October 1846 without a break. His final request was for permission to depart “for a milder climate on the sea coast” for the restoration of his health and to “return with the first opening of navigation,”<sup>18</sup> but he died in the meantime.

* * *

His American colleagues in Russia loved and revered him. Maxwell considered him his “bosem [sic] friend, [his] counsellor”:<sup>19</sup>

He is all that my imagination had ever dreamed of in the beau ideal of a soldier ... he has seen much of life on the good side and the bad, without being spoiled by either and retains a heart as fresh and as generous as those I loved so much in my school day friends.<sup>20</sup>

How am I indebted to him for hour after hour of pleasure and content in this dreary land! How inestimable are the riches of this man's heart. how few will I ever meet to be compared to him in character and virtue ... I know his talent. I have had an opportunity known to few to learn his perfect honour where an extraordinary attempt was made upon it.

I have seen him empty his pocket and shed his tears over a poor child in the street.<sup>21</sup>

He must be happy too at home for I have seen the tears jump from his eyes when speaking of his lady.<sup>22</sup>

Joseph Harrison Jr. (see Image 226) was deeply attached to him, and at his death acknowledged to Joseph Harrison Sr. several times that he had lost his best friend. When the widowed Anna Whistler was preparing to return to America, he undertook “all the expenses and toil of boxing those articles of furniture valuable from fond associations of home here.”<sup>23</sup> His tie to Whistler prompted, after the latter’s death, an extremely generous offer of thousands of dollars to help young George Whistler establish himself. Later, the Harrison home in America was always open to Anna Whistler, who paid extensive visits to the family in the lean years before she left America permanently.

Andrew Eastwick (see Image 233) also felt that by the death of Major Whistler he had lost “a friend whom I loved with brotherly affection. He was a good man, always anxious to promote the happiness of his fellow man. For such a man who cannot weep? ... The death of my dear friend ... was unexpected and cast sad and gloomy feelings upon me, from which I feel it most difficult to arouse myself.”<sup>24</sup> The Eastwicks later in the United States demonstrated much kindness to Anna Whistler, from storing her furniture to lending money to her brother, Charles.<sup>25</sup>

Colin Ingersoll (see Image 280), too, was drawn to Whistler from his first meeting with him in St. Petersburg, where he found it “a treat to see and talk with a real live Yankee ... intelligent and delightful in conversation.”<sup>26</sup> He frequented their home with the same ease and enthusiasm as had Maxwell before him, “daily at our fireside, at our table unceremoniously welcomed.”<sup>27</sup>

Whistler’s Russian colleagues and the emperor also appreciated him. Both Pavel Petrovich Mel’nikov (see Image 247) and Osip Ivanovich Kraft (see Image 248), the engineers sent to America by the Russian government to find a suitable consulting engineer for the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, proposed Whistler because of his “strict rules of honesty and wonderful qualities of character, in particular [his] American calmness and easygoing disposition.”<sup>28</sup>

Aleksandr Andreevich Bodisco, the Russian Ambassador in Washington (see Image 283), appraised the Russian government's "excellent acquisition" thus: "Major Whistler unites a great ability and twenty years' experience with a great desire to do good [work] and to justify the confidence with which we wish to honor him."<sup>29</sup>

Nicholas I, "the soul of frankness" himself, liked the Americans building the railroad and the rolling stock for their frankness.<sup>30</sup> Having granted Whistler's request for permission to send for American mechanics in 1843, he spoke to Ambassador Ralph Isaacs Ingersoll in 1847 – several months after awarding the Order of St. Anne (2nd class) to Whistler (see Image 252) and diamond rings to Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick – "of ... Major Whistler, in the highest terms and of the great service which the Empire had derived from his talents and skill,"<sup>31</sup> and said that the success of both Whistler and Harrison "was beyond his expectations, and that words failed him to express his confidence in Whistler, and the gentlemen whom he induced to come to Russia, and undertake the contract."<sup>32</sup>

In America, Whistler's name became "identified with the American interests in Russia. If people [began] to talk of Russia, it [was] only a sort of prelude to a conversation about Major Whistler."<sup>33</sup>

* * *

Whistler, the namesake of the first president of the United States<sup>34</sup> and a graduate of West Point, was a staunch American. Attempts had been made by Count Bodisco and by Baron Brünnow, the Russian ambassador in London, to persuade him to actually enter the Russian service, but his own disinclination and Major Bouttatz's advice against it kept him from doing so. He never regretted his decision to remain "Mr. Whistler" and to stay out of that "most servile of all services," in which "I have seen generals treated with much more indignity – than any gentleman could stand in our country – and worse than I have ever seen a private treated with in our service" and for which there was no redress, only a continuing "endeavor to please, at all hazard." He was astonished by the corruption he saw in the government, having been "unwilling to believe all that was told [him]" and felt that "not even His Majesty could with impunity interfere with [the system]."<sup>35</sup> He was free of those

“snobbish instincts” that inclined some Americans “to a disparagement of our country, and its democratic institutions.”<sup>36</sup> To the Russian system of patronage, in which “persons have very little by right” and in which “fear keeps every body within his orbit lest he should be crushed – as he most certainly would be,” he contrasted that of his own country: “none but Americans can understand the blessings of security by law – and the justice of public opinion.” He defended America against its critics: “I know it is common all over Europe – and even at home, to accuse our public opinion of tyranny – it may be sometimes but where there is no public opinion – there can be nothing but tyranny in its worst shape”;<sup>37</sup> “ours is the only country worth living in. I wish with all my heart all our people could visit Europe, they would return satisfied and be thankful for the blessings they enjoy.”<sup>38</sup>

With the outbreak of the 1848 revolutions, “orders [were] given to our countrymen” at Alexandrofsky “to complete at once 250 baggage wagons for the Army”; but at “a large dinner party at the [American] Legation” on 11 March 1848, “Major Whistler, good Republican that he is, [was] enthusiastic over the French news, and [thought] the Republic there [was] going to last.”<sup>39</sup> A few days later, he “called [at the Legation] in great spirits over the success of the French Republicans.”<sup>40</sup>

* * *

Appropriations for the building of the railroad were not straightforward, nor could they be questioned. It was expected that the railroad would be completed in 1847, but year after year saw a postponement. In January 1847, Whistler was puzzled as to why “when the money for this work was a spe[cial] loan – by the govt ... we are cut short 33 pr cent of our funds – we ask for 15,000,000 silver rubs – and they give us only 10,000,000 ... the work for want of the 5,000,000 will be extended another year for its completion.”<sup>41</sup> He had already blamed delays to a great extent on the Imperial family’s extravagant living.<sup>42</sup> Now he heard “that some of this next year’s appropriation has been employed in the last year’s travels of the Imperial family.”<sup>43</sup> His comment was: “So they do things here – no troublesome members of Congress to call for informat[ion].”<sup>44</sup> In early 1849, he placed the time of the railroad’s completion in 1850, citing War Department expenditures as the cause:

What a pity that we should be curtailed in the means of finishing just now – 'tis true the expenditures of the Govt War Dept. may be very great – but what signifies 8 or 10 millions of dollars to a Govt to complete a work upon which they have expended forty millions – 'tis strange how things are managed and kept from appearing in their proper light here – for I know full well 'tis only because of this management that the money is not forthcoming.<sup>45</sup>

He felt that no inducements could make him stay in Russia after the railroad was built, as he “would not upon any consideration bring up [his] family in this country.”<sup>46</sup> “[H]is native land, he cherished ... as a religious sentiment which he desired his children to retain wherever they might be.”<sup>47</sup> He had great misgivings about his long absence from America and “long[ed] to take [his] boys home that they may feel themselves always Americans.”<sup>48</sup> In fact, he was already considering sending his family to England in 1847, where they would spend a year waiting to return home with him at the anticipated completion of the railroad in 1848.<sup>49</sup> He also considered sending them all back to America,<sup>50</sup> for “every day convinces me that ours is the only country in which to live a rational and happy life – and my children should receive this impression there.”<sup>51</sup>

Although he wanted his sons (see Images 24–30) to be educated in America, he was aware of the importance of an exposure to Europe for them. His own exposure to a foreign country other than England made him understand the necessity of knowing foreign languages. Sending for his family, he urged them to concentrate on learning French in the months before setting out, or they would “not be able to understand anybody.”<sup>52</sup> In all his years in Russia, he never learned Russian and spoke such labored French that he was assigned an interpreter. When he decided to send the boys to Monsieur Jourdan’s school, his prime reason was that they should learn modern languages. He later wanted them to learn the classical languages as well, in anticipation of their possibly attending Harvard or Yale.<sup>53</sup>

He believed that it was better for them to attend a school than to be tutored at home. He knew it was right for James, but was anxious over the irregularity of his education caused by ill health. When he had to decide about Willie's studies in late 1848, he ultimately chose Baxter's Commercial School over tutors at home, a decision made in part to strengthen Willie's character.

Maxwell assured him that he "could have no conception of the vast advantages" James and Willie were enjoying. He felt that the family's "residence in Europe on their account should reconcile [Whistler] perfectly to a few more years of absence" from America, and that he would "never regret the course" he had chosen.<sup>54</sup>

Despite Whistler's strongly held views about returning home, in 1849, for the first time, he spoke, and with poignance, of his desire to remain in Russia until the completion of the railroad. Only if actually physically present for the ceremony of its opening did he seem to feel he would get his share of the credit:

I have had a great desire to finish this road – to be here until it was finished – indeed I should feel as if I had not accomplished the object for which I came if I left before I ran over the line – and I am sure I shall not get my just share of the credit if I do not see this ceremony – you see I do not hesitate to claim that the work will be creditable.<sup>55</sup>

Perhaps because he had come to know the system, he feared that his role would be played down if he were absent, but an undoubtedly more powerful reason was that he was now in a very weakened physical state and surmised that he would not live to see the railroad's completion. The opening of the railroad to the general public took place on 1 November (OS) 1851.

* * *

Whistler worked a six-day week. He spent his time at the Railway Commission office or out at Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works (see Images 223–225). Almost every evening, he conferred in his chancery at home with Thomas DeKay Winans (see Image 229), who came then on shop business because he could leave Alexandrofsky only after the work day was over. Occasionally, Whistler remained at home to write a technical document or a report for Count Kleinmikhel'. The two quite regularly went on at least a fortnight's inspection trip of the line. Sometimes Whistler could be absent from home for a month. At first, they went during the working season of April to October; as the construction progressed, they went even in winter. Whistler's work in building railroads in the United States had accustomed him to spending long days on horseback in all kinds of weather. In Russia, he would come home from these trips "rather browner than when he left" his family, reporting that he had "been sailing thro bogs knee deep" – luckily in his waterproof boots. On one trip, he had been "on horse back seventeen hours at a sitting," so that "his joints [were] unhinged."<sup>56</sup> On another, "he had [spent] only one night in bed, [and] ... had one day walked 7 versts and rode 47 over such bogs!"<sup>57</sup> On occasion, he "suffered from the cold in traveling" and even in July had to put on a fur-lined pelisse (shuba) (see Image 13).<sup>58</sup>

In his early years in Russia, he was very hale. These years were not free of illness, but his constitution was not visibly undermined. Like many foreigners, not long after arriving in St. Petersburg he became sick from drinking the Neva water,<sup>59</sup> but the diaries contain many instances of severe colds that he succumbed to with increasing frequency. From the time his family arrived, he would ride all night from an inspection trip to get home sooner. In winter, he sometimes suffered for days afterwards from a cough and pain in the chest. A few days after an inspection trip in March of 1846, he had an alarming attack with excruciating pain that the best efforts of the family physician could not alleviate for many days.<sup>60</sup> In March of 1847, he left home one morning, did not eat all day, returned at one in the morning, and caught cold. In April 1847, he was a victim – with James, Willie, and their laundress – of the influenza raging in St. Petersburg, but returned to his duties as soon as he seemed well. Still, in his letters to General Joseph G. Swift, he indicated that he was in good health, and as late as January 1847, that the climate agreed with him.<sup>61</sup>

The decisive blow to Whistler's health occurred in July of 1848, when "his family [had] all gone to England and left him alone in the house," and he felt for the first time "the difference between leaving home and being left at home, it is so dreadful lonesome ... the house appears as large again as usual, and the servants farther off than ever."<sup>62</sup> Their friends tried to assuage his loneliness. In this particularly virulent period of the cholera epidemic, he had an "attack of illness" while at the Gellibrands' dacha, that "seriously impaired [his] general health."<sup>63</sup> He became very susceptible to colds, "and his stomach [was] so irritated that not a week ... passed without his being confined several days to [his bed]."<sup>64</sup> It is not clear whether he had contracted cholera. When Anna Whistler and Willie returned to St. Petersburg in late September, they "found him sadly changed by his late severe attack." She was "sad to think how very ill he must have been," and reported to James that "he still needs much care and good nursing."<sup>65</sup>

Ever conscientious, Whistler returned to work as soon as he could and in October went on an inspection trip to Moscow.<sup>66</sup> He was "suddenly attacked by cholera" in November and was only able to leave his bed "to sit up" in early December.<sup>67</sup> He could dress himself and go out for prescribed short drives.<sup>68</sup> The cholera had left his constitution shattered, and it was an "extraordinarily severe winter."<sup>69</sup> Nevertheless, each time he seemed to recover, he returned to work immediately. Before Christmas, he attended a Railway Commission meeting<sup>70</sup> and traveled to Alexandrofsky with Count Kleinmikhel'.<sup>71</sup> In January and February of 1849, he continued to work but was still on an invalid's diet.<sup>72</sup> He did "not ever feel just well – I can eat but little that does not agree with me – my feet and legs swell." Nevertheless, he intended to go to Moscow "the next week if it be milder," thinking that "perhaps the journey will be of service to my health and strength"; but if his health did not improve soon, he would not stay in Russia but would "try a trip to Germany."<sup>73</sup> In March, his condition worsened and he was suffering pain similar to that of James's rheumatic fever attacks.<sup>74</sup> Anna Whistler called his illness "the most distressing I ever attended": "congestion about the heart ... great difficulty at times in breathing, but the rheumatism in the legs has lessened that ... his arms have lain like pillows by his side & his legs as powerless, & swelled, until today he can lift them a little ... he has been only shifted from one side of bed to the other in a sheet."<sup>75</sup> He aged greatly in these few months.<sup>76</sup> A petition, expedited by Count Kleinmikhel', for permission to leave the country, was approved by Nicholas I. They hoped to take the first steamer, but navigation was not expected to open until May.<sup>77</sup>

Some of Whistler's Russian colleagues visited him. Among them was Count Kleinmikhel'. There is a story with possibly apocryphal details about his visit: “When Whistler’s wife saw this figure wearing his stars and with a cock’s tail feathers on his hat, she absolutely did not want to let him in, thinking that he would frighten her husband. The Count, therefore, almost burst into the sick man’s bedroom.”<sup>78</sup> Anna Whistler’s account, however, stresses his kindness and concern: “[Whistler] bids me ... tell you how kind his chief has been in obtaining promptly the Emperors permission to his traveling for health. Count Kleinmikhel’ came himself to see Whistler – before he was so very ill as to be denied seeing any but the doct and myself – he sent his own physician to enquire in person – and couriers daily since, until he left [for] M[oscow] where the Court are to spend the Carnival.”<sup>79</sup>

Not long before Whistler’s death, the reclusive Kraft, in charge of the Southern Administration of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, also paid him a visit, “and the dying man said: ‘Yes, indeed, my breathing is at high pressure, and very soon I’ll be setting out on the express train for eternity!’”<sup>80</sup>

Through verbal instructions to his wife, Whistler, who had not made a will in Russia,<sup>81</sup> bequeathed to Pavel Mel’nikov his portrait (possibly the one executed for his birthday in 1848, whereabouts unknown), and the Bible (whereabouts unknown) that he read every day, containing many notes in his own hand.<sup>82</sup>

He died on 26 March / 7 April 1849. Anna Whistler and Joseph Harrison Jr. were present, along with Dr. Rogers, who, “the evening before ... had said there was no danger”:<sup>83</sup>

Our good Doct. was greatly shocked at the rapid sinking – in a few minutes Mr. Harrison communicated to me there was no hope of recovery – I then asked the Doct. to tell your father so – oh it is very painful he replied! but remember Doct. where he is going! When Doct. R. asked him, “have you any wordly affairs to settle my dear Sir?” not any was the calm reply. It seems he had told Harrison before I returned, “I feel as if I was going on a long journey!” And tho he was so serene his convictions may have been strong that his present existence must soon be swallowed up in an endless one.

I said to my dearest as I knelt alone in his chamber of death, “Whistler you can leave us to God! He will take care of us!” “Oh yes, yes, he answered fervently – And dearest your hopes are as mine centered in Christ!” “Oh yes I hope in Him.” Then I added. “you have nothing to say to me my own Whistler for we have but one heart & one mind” – he pressed my hand between his, tho’ chilled by death still warmly! “But our absent children dear Whistler!” “Oh Annie let the Doct. give me something to help me speak! but the cordial failed to revive nature, he threw his arms around me & said “I cannot speak, but love them, bless them.”<sup>84</sup>

He died “without a struggle” at half past four in the morning.<sup>85</sup> It seemed to Anna Whistler that a “bright look irradiated [his] countenance in death.”<sup>86</sup> A death mask (whereabouts unknown) was commissioned by Joseph Harrison Jr.<sup>87</sup>

Willie, who “had been spending a day with Henry” Harrison at Alexandrofsky, “arrived in the morning” to receive the “sad sad news” of his father’s death.<sup>88</sup> He seems to have been inconsolable and to have suffered physical collapse for a time.<sup>89</sup> He did not write to James until four weeks had passed, but even then did not communicate his feelings, preferring to wait until they were together in England, when “talking will be so much more comforting.”<sup>90</sup>

The funeral service, performed by Rev. Dr. Edward Law (see Image 253), was held on Tuesday, 29 March / 10 April 1849, at two o’clock in the English Church (see Image 9).<sup>91</sup> Whistler’s body was then placed in the vault of the church until arrangements could be made for it to be sent to America for interment.<sup>92</sup> There seems to be no document identifying the makeup of the congregation at the service.

* * *

It is unlikely that no Russians attended the funeral service, but the record of condolences and assessments of Whistler’s character by Russians, although heartfelt, is chiefly official and diplomatic. It reflects both the high esteem in which he was held and an awareness of the difficulty of replacing him.<sup>93</sup>

K.I. Fischer, director of the Department of Railways, verbally presented to Anna Whistler the condolences of both Kleinmikhel' and the emperor: "I told Mrs. Whistler, in your name, of your heartfelt sorrow at the death of her husband, whom you esteemed equally for his mind and his heart; [and] that the Emperor, too, had expressed his extreme regret over the loss of a person so useful and in every respect worthy."<sup>94</sup>

Kleinmikhel' further said in a letter to Bodisco that he had been ordered by the emperor to contact Bodisco "to find in America a man capable of replacing M. Whistler," whom he described thus: "Death has deprived us of this worthy employee, who, through his profound and solid knowledge, the scope of his practical experience in his field, the great probity of his character, and the zealotry of his labors, had acquired among us a well-deserved general esteem."<sup>95</sup> The emperor also showed his sensitivity by suggesting they wait a while before putting in a replacement. Bodisco responded: "In appreciating with equal good will and justice the great ability and the high probity of Major Whistler, you yourself, Count, have gauged how difficult it will be to replace him adequately."<sup>96</sup>

Anna Whistler wrote James that "the Emperor sent a Courier" in early May "to express his high appreciation of our loss and his own loss in the death of your father & to offer to aid me in any way. This mark of respect is gratifying – The Count too has expressed his sympathy in the same way – But rich and poor, all ranks respected & loved Major Whistler."<sup>97</sup>

Fischer was sent by Kleinmikhel' to tell Anna Whistler that if "she needed anything or had any wishes he would deem it a particular pleasure to intercede in her behalf . . . Despite all her stoicism she could not hide her emotion and tears."<sup>98</sup> She asked for help in leaving the country and in removing her possessions without any difficulties. As she already had a certificate from the Department of Railways identifying her as Major Whistler's widow, Fischer foresaw no obstacle to her leaving, but pointed out in his report that a special order would be necessary to prevent customs from going through her belongings.<sup>99</sup> The note Kleinmikhel' wrote on Fischer's report shows that the emperor ordered the minister of Finances to let her possessions go through customs without inspection.<sup>100</sup> She was also paid her husband's salary up to the day of his death.<sup>101</sup>

From Anton Shtukenberg there is a personal statement. He wrote in his memoirs that Whistler was one of a small group that had exercised a good influence over him: "One could turn to him for advice as one would to a comprehensive technical book; his answer was always positive, clear and reliable, not like some, who tell you: 'Why, you can do it this way or that way; do that there, and this here, but, how to do it best, well, figure that out for yourself' ... His responses about my work helped me a lot and made my reputation."<sup>102</sup>

In early May, letters arrived from James for Willie and from Debo for Anna Whistler. As the letters are not extant, we know only that they "relieved [her] almost bursting heart by weeping over your sorrow, & your affection,"<sup>103</sup> and that James's letter was "touching and manly."<sup>104</sup>

Willie wrote James about some of the visitors who had come to express their condolences or who had sent notes. Monsieur Lamartine, their former tutor, "came to see [them]... he was very much afflicted and quite bowed down with sorrow, he felt he had lost his best friend, poor man he looked very ill."<sup>105</sup> Anna Whistler "received such a kind note from Mr. Biber," another former tutor, in which "he spoke of the great affliction of his brother at the loss of his first patron."<sup>106</sup> Koritskii came, too, and said he was going to write a letter to James for Anna Whistler and Willie to take to England, because his hopes of traveling with Briullov and seeing James were not to be realized.<sup>107</sup>

* * *

Anna Whistler apparently gave up their apartment at the end of April, because she and Willie spent the first week of May in the home of the Mirrielees family (see Images 268–269), then moved to the Harrisons' home at Alexandrofsky (see Images 239–240) on 7 May.<sup>108</sup> Some of their household goods were left behind to be sold. They were to depart Russia on 12 May on the Vladimir, but their departure was delayed until the 19th because navigation remained closed.<sup>109</sup> She had been sure she would not cast "one lingering look" back at Russia in the days when she anticipated returning to "an enticing future" in America with her husband, but departing as a widow rendered "sacred ... [her] associations” with Russia and “the dear circle” there.<sup>110</sup> The day they left would have been Whistler’s forty-ninth birthday.

Whistler’s body came home to America on the Medora, one of the ships belonging to William Ropes and Company. The ship arrived in Boston on 14 August, and his body was placed “in the vault of R. Lee until the completion of the tomb at S[tonington].”<sup>111</sup> The funeral service in Stonington was held in the Calvary Episcopal Church in late August–September 1849.<sup>112</sup> Whistler was then buried in the family plot in Evergreen Cemetery with his four young sons: Joseph Swift, Kirk Boott, Charles Donald, and John Bouttatz.

* * *

Whistler’s biography in the diaries fades with the departure of Anna Whistler, James, and Willie for England in June of 1848. Mention of him appears twice that summer through some of his letters from cholera-stricken St. Petersburg. Listening to Mary Ann (Parland) Morgan, who had also fled Russia, read aloud her husband’s letters about the desolation being visited upon St. Petersburg and the countryside by the cholera, Anna Whistler reveals that, true to character, “my dear husband never clouds his reports of his own health & of the preservation of that of our faithful domestics with these fearful details.”<sup>113</sup> When she next refers to him, he has announced his own illness and the kindness of their friends in caring for him.<sup>114</sup>

The diaries present a wife’s deeply loving portrait of the qualities of character of her husband, their family and social life, and glimpses into his work in Russia; but because they conclude in September of 1848, they supply no information about his possibly second and more serious bout of cholera, his increasing heart failure, and his family-shattering death.

This essay on Whistler’s life in St. Petersburg has, therefore, had to rely extensively on the letters of John Stevenson Maxwell at the New-York Historical Society; the letters of Whistler and William Henry Swift to General Joseph G. Swift at the New York Public Library; the Whistler Collection at Glasgow University Library; the Pennell–Whistler Collection at the Library of Congress; correspondence of members of extended family in the United States Military Academy Library archives at West Point; Letterbook No. 1 of Joseph Harrison Jr. at the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; diplomatic correspondence in the U.S. National Archives in Washington, DC; and documents in the Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv (Russian State Historical Archives) and the archives of the Leningradskii institut inzhenerov zheleznodorozhnogo transporta (Leningrad Institute of Railway Transport Engineers), both in St. Petersburg.

NOTES

1. Richard M. Haywood to Robert J. Ramsbottom, West Lafayette, Indiana, September 1, 1984. This letter was graciously given to me by Piroška Molnar Haywood. Mr. Ramsbottom was then president of the Stonington Historical Society (SHS). Their librarian, E.L. Smith, was not able to “find the ‘missing link’ between Lieutenant and Major” (E.L. Smith to Richard M. Haywood, Stonington, 30 November 1984). The enigma has resulted in Whistler’s sometimes being referred to as lieutenant by various biographers until his death: for example, Gardner Teall, “Whistler’s Father,” New England Magazine (October 1903); and Ronald Anderson and Anne Koval, James McNeill Whistler: Beyond the Myth (London: J. Murray, 1994).
2. Haywood also checked the Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island militia records without success. See Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 53n84.
3. Wm. H. Swift to General Joseph G. Swift, Philadelphia, 25 February 1821, NYPL: Swift Papers.
4. George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, New York, Feb. 20, [18]28, NYPL: Swift Papers; George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, Louisville, Kentucky, May 21st, 1828; George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, Baltimore, from Georgetown, September 24, 1829; George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, Baltimore, Feb. 8, 1831. Also Anna Whistler to Margaret G. Hill, Manchester January 14th, 1830, LC: P-W, box 34.
5. Entry for [Saturday] November 14th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
6. Entry for [Saturday] November 14th [1846].
7. Quoted in McDiarmid, Whistler’s Mother, p. 115. Her failure to cite sources is a shortcoming of her book.
8. Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 3, fol. 514.
9. Entry for Saturday morning Feb 6th 1847, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
10. Entry for April 10th 1844, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
11. Within the entry for Preston. September. Saturday 10th [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
12. Entry for August 1st Thursday [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

13. This and the previous two quotations are from an essay on the life of George Washington Whistler, written by Anna Whistler in May 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
14. James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London, May 9th 1849, Laver Papers, Special Collections, Glasgow University Library Manuscript Department (hereafter GUL: Laver Papers).
15. Entry for 12 March 1844, in the entry for Feb 26th [1844] and accompanying Note 267, NYPL: AWP, Part I.
16. “Do you remember his care for Williams? perhaps if you would represent it to him, he might desire to live to reward it ... I forget even the name of the other who had turned to Whistler in distress, & who therefore was mentioned by him as one you might try again,” Anna Whistler to [Joseph and Sarah Harrison], Fleetwood. Monday. July 15th. 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
17. George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, December 19 [NS], 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
18. Rossiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv (RGIA) [Russian State Historical Archives], St. Petersburg: Fond 219, op. 1, d. 11. Ob otpuske Vistlera za granitsu i o ego smerti [File concerning permission for Whistler to go abroad on leave and his death], Kleinmikhel’ to Whistler, 16 March (OS) 1849. Both quotations in this sentence are from this document. The RGIA archive was previously called Tsentral’nyi gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv SSSR [Central State Historical Archive of the USSR] (TsGIA SSSR).
19. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23.
20. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 2/14 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 12.
21. This and the previous quotation are from a letter from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23.
22. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 2/14 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 12.
23. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
24. Andrew Eastwick to Edward Eastwick, Alexandroffsky April 2/14th 1849 Saturday, Eastwick Letters. The Eastwick family correspondence (hereafter, Eastwick Letters), some 116 letters, is in the possession of Estelle and David Knapp of New Albany, Ohio. Estelle Knapp is the descendant of Andrew McCalla Eastwick. David Knapp, a mechanical engineer, has transcribed the Eastwick correspondence. His annotated edition, produced in conjunction with Igor Kuvaldin of St. Petersburg, will appear in 2022 or 2023 (David Knapp and Igor Kuvaldin, Eastwick Letters: An Unabridged Account of the Andrew McCalla Eastwick Family in St. Petersburg, Russia, 1844–1850 [forthcoming]).

David Knapp has also written a book about the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, entitled Rails to Russia, based on the Eastwick correspondence. The unpublished manuscript has been deposited in the Copyright Division of the Library of Congress. He is in the process of producing a CD of it that will be available to scholars. He has given a portion of another version of Rails to Russia to the Museum of the History of the OAO “Proletariat” Factory in St. Petersburg [Музеи истории ОАО “Пролетарский завод”], formerly the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works.

25. See the biography of the Eastwick family in Appendix E (hereafter, Eastwick).
26. Entry for May 21st [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 6–7.
27. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Monday evening Dec 13th [OS] English Christmas day [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375.
28. RGIA: Fond 446, op. 12, d. 4. P.P. Mel’nikov, Svedeniia o russkikh zheleznykh dorogakh [Information about Russian Railways], sect. 1, bk. 1 (hereafter, Mel’nikov, Svedeniia), fol. 197v.
29. RGIA: Fond 219, op. 1, kn. 3, d. 3347. O posylke v Ameriku Maiora Buttatsa dlia vyzova v Rossiiu Maiora Uistlera [File on sending Major Buttats to America to invite Major Whistler to Russia]. Copie d’une dépêche adressée à S.E. Mr le Vice Chancelier par Mr de Bodisco en date de Washington le 1/13 mai 1842 [Copy of a dispatch addressed to His Excellency the Vice-Chancellor by Mr. de Bodisco dated Washington 1/13 May 1842].
30. Entry for June 15th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 50.
31. Ralph I. Ingersoll to James Buchanan, No. 1. Legation of the United States, St. Petersburg, 3 June 1847. Despatches Sent/Cambrelling/Ingersoll/1840–1848, Records of Diplomatic

- Posts: Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, 1807–1955, Records of Foreign Service Posts 84.2, vol. 3, fol. 7, NAUS.
32. Entry for June 16th [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 52; entry for February 18th [1848], pt. 3, fol. 25.
  33. John S. Maxwell to George W. Whistler, New York. Monday–December 13. 1846, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers.
  34. On 22 February 1848, he held a celebration of George Washington’s birthday at his home (entry for February 22nd [1848], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 3, fol. 27).
  35. This and all preceding quotations in this paragraph are from George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 26 April (OS) 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  36. Entry for March 17th [1848], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 3, fol. 47.
  37. This and all quotations in the previous sentence are from George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 26 April (OS) 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  38. George Washington Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 4, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  39. Entry for March 11th [1848], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 3, fol. 41; A.M. Eastwick to Charles James, Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works, St. Petersburg, March 1st/13th 1848 Monday, Eastwick Letters.
  40. Entry for March 17th [1848], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 3, fol. 47.
  41. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan. 18, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  42. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Dec. 19, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers. The Imperial family’s extravagance was evident in a report in the New York Herald: “The Empress of Russia, who is proceeding to Sicily for the winter, in the hope of regaining her health, will take up her residence in the beautiful environs of Palermo, and a small squadron of Russian steam vessels will be at her disposal, to enable her to take whatever trips she may choose on the Mediterranean” (New York Herald, Wednesday, October 15, 1845).
  43. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan. 18, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.

44. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan. 18, 1847.
45. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, January 31 / February 12, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers.
46. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
47. An essay on the life of George Washington Whistler, written by Anna Whistler in May 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
48. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg Dec. 4th 1848, NYPL: Swift Papers.
49. George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846; April 8/20, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
50. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. In my room. St. Petersburg. tuesday evening Sept. 26th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W361.
51. George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 8/20, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
52. George W. Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Feb<sup>y</sup> 15th 1843, GUL: Whistler Collection, W653.
53. "They take every day ... in the evening lessons in Latin" (Joseph H. Eastwick to Edward P. Eastwick, St. Petersburg, February 13th, 1848 Sunday, Eastwick Letters).
54. Both quotations in this paragraph are from John S. Maxwell to George W. Whistler, Paris. September 13th? 15th? 1845, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers.
55. George W. Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, January 31 / February 12, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers. In the Soviet period, his role was indeed played down.
56. All quotations in this and the previous sentence are from the entry for Wed [July] 10th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
57. Entry for Thursday [August] 29th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I. A verst = 0.663 miles, 1.067 kilometers.
58. Entry for Wed [July] 10th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
59. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, November 1/12 [sic], 1842, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 4.
60. Entry for [Wednesday] April 15th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.

61. George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, December 19, 1845; January 18, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers, 62. Entry for Sunday [July 16, 1848], PEM: Fettyplace Journal.
63. George W. Whistler and Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 5 December 1848, NYPL: Swift Papers.
64. George W. Whistler and Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, 5 December 1848, NYPL: Swift Papers. There are many holes in the letter. I have supplied the words [his bed] because they are logical and are confirmed by Fettyplace's journal. On July 21st, Fettyplace went to see Major Whistler "and found he had been sick in bed for three or four days" (entry for July 21st, 1848, PEM: Fettyplace Journal).
65. Quotations in this and the previous sentence are taken from Anna Whistler to James Whistler. In my room. St. Petersburg. Tuesday evening Sept. 26th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W361.
66. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. Thursday. Sept. 30th Oct. 12th 1848. St. Petersburg, GUL: Whistler Collection, W364; Anna Whistler to James Whistler. Friday evening Oct. 20th 1848, W365.
67. George W. Whistler and Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Dec. 5th, 1848, NYPL: Swift Papers. See also Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Tuesday Nov. 21st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W368; Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Nov 27th 1848 4 oclock Monday afternoon, W369.
68. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Monday Evening, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370; Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Monday evening Dec. 13th [OS] English Christmas Day [1848], W375.
69. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Friday. March 9th 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W384.
70. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. St. Petersburg. Monday evening Dec. 13th [OS] English Christmas day [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375; Anna Whistler to James Whistler. [ St. Petersburg]. Dec. 25 [1848] and Tuesday 26th [1848], W376.
71. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. [ St. Petersburg] Monday evening 8th of Jan 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W377.
72. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Feb 19th. Monday eve, GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.

73. All quotations in this and the previous sentence are from George W. Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, January 31 / February 12, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers.
74. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Friday, March 16th [18]49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W385.
75. Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Monday 21 March / 2 April [1849], NYPL: Swift Papers.
76. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Friday, March 16th. [18]49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W385; Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison, Saturday evening, Preston, July 7th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
77. Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Monday 21 March / 2 April [1849], NYPL: Swift Papers.
78. Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fol. 516.
79. Anna Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, Monday 21 March / 2 April [1849], NYPL: Swift Papers.
80. Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fol. 516.
81. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Philadelphia, Sept. 5, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers.
82. Mel'nikov, Svedeniia, fol. 198v.
83. RGIA: Fond 219, op. 1, d. 11. Ob otpuske Vistlera za granitsu i o ego smerti [File concerning permission for Whistler to go abroad on leave and his death], Fisher to Kleinmikhel', 27 March (OS) 1849. Fisher informed Kleinmikhel' that "from what he could understand from Harrison's words the cause of death was water in the chest cavity, but that the doctor treating him probably did not altogether realize the nature of the illness, for the evening before he had said there was no danger but when he came [to see Whistler] during the night he announced that the patient would not live till morning." A post mortem showed that "the principal and primary cause of . . . death was ossification, and consequent contraction of the orifices of the heart . . . [and] dropsy" (Joseph Harrison, Jr. to Captain William H. Swift from Alexandroffsky, March 28 / April 9 1849, Joseph Harrison, Jr., Letterbooks (No. 1: 1844–1850), Historical Society of Pennsylvania (HSP), Philadelphia (hereafter HSP: Harrison Letterbook No. 1).

84. Mary D. Whistler [first wife of George William Whistler] to grandmother [Martha Kingsley McNeill, Anna Whistler's mother] Baltimore, 11 May (NS) 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W960.
85. This information is contained in an extract "from a letter dated St. Petersburg, April 7, 1849," written from an unidentified person to an unidentified addressee ("Death of Major Whistler," New York Herald, May 8, 1849). Announcements of his death were also carried by the New-York Tribune, May 8, 1849; the New York Evening Post, May 8, 1849; the New-York Commercial Advertiser, May 7, 1849, and in newspapers all over America: e.g., The Daily National Whig (Washington, DC), May 9, 1849; Indiana State Sentinel (Indianapolis, IN), June 28, 1849; Hillsdale Whig Standard (Hillsdale, MI), May 15, 1849; The North-Carolinian (Fayetteville, NC), May 19, 1849; Hartford Weekly Times (Hartford, CT), May 12, 1849; Wilmington Journal (Wilmington, NC), May 18, 1849; and The Cecil Whig (Elkton, MD), May 12, 1849.
86. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
87. Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison, Saturday evening. Preston. July 7th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
88. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
89. Betsy Sandland and Eliza Sandland to Anna Whistler, Liverpool, April 27th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34; Letters Relating to Whistler, Extracted from a letter written by Anna Whistler to unknown, Alexandroffsky, May 14th 1849, LC: P-W, box 296.
90. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
91. The undertaker listed on the funeral invitation sent to Colin Ingersoll (see Image 9), "Masters," is identified in BRBC STP 1845 as Thomas Masters, verger, with a family consisting of two males and one female, resident in the British Chapel; under "remarks" is noted "wife born Masters" (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 38).
92. PREC STP, no. 5936, p. 384 (Major Whistler's death announcement). The Registers of the British Factory Chapel, St. Petersburg, which contain data about the births, christenings, marriages, and deaths of communicants and non-communicants of the English Church in St. Petersburg, have been invaluable in identifying persons Anna Whistler knew. These records are - available at both the Guildhall Library in London and the RGIA in St. Petersburg (RGIA: Fond 1689, op. 1, ed. khr. 1 Register British Factory Chapel St. Petersburg [1763–1812]; Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 2 [1812–1830]; Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 3 [1831 – Jan. through 1846 – Dec.]; Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 4 [1847–1867]). The registers in the RGIA are the originals, while those at Guildhall Library are copies; I have consulted both. Citations to the Guildhall Library copies have been abbreviated as PREC STP (for “Parish Registers of the English Church, St. Petersburg”).

93. His successor was Major Thompson S. Brown (1807–1855). Brown’s criticism of some of Major Whistler’s decisions irritated and angered the Russians. Shtukenberg, in his memoirs, dismissed him as “resembling an orangutan, but pockmarked and grey haired” (Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fol. 516). Baron Anton Ivanovich Del’vig (see Image 251), in his memoirs covering half a century, described Whistler as “a remarkable man” and his replacement as “of hardly any use” (S. Ia. Shtraukh, ed., Polveka russkoi zhizni Vospominania A.I. Del’viga 1820–1870 [Half a Century of Russian Life: The Memoirs of A.I. Del’vig 1820–1870], 2 vols. [Moscow and Leningrad: Akademiia, 1930], vol. 2, p. 325).
  94. RGIA: Fond 446, op. 18, d. 2, 1849. Vsepoddanneishie doklady Mart-Mai: O propuske za granitsu bez osmotra veshchei vdovy inzh-a Uistlera [Most Devoted Reports March-May: File concerning permission for the belongings of the widow of the engineer Whistler to be cleared for sending abroad without customs inspection], Fisher to Kleinmikhel’, 25 April (OS) 1849, fol. 216r.
  95. RGIA: Fond 219, op. 1, d. 4198. O priglasenii v Rossiuu ... Brauna [File concerning an invitation to Brown to come to Russia], Kleinmikhel’ to Bodisco, 17 April (OS) 1849.
  96. RGIA: Fond 219, op. 1, d. 4198. Bodisco to Kleinmikhel’, Washington 30 May / 11 June 1849.
  97. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
  98. RGIA: Fond 446, op. 18, d. 2, 1849, fol. 216r (see Note 94 above for document title).
  99. RGIA: Fond 446, op. 18, d. 2, 1849, fols. 216v–217r (see Note 94 above for document title).
  100. RGIA: Fond 446, op. 18, d. 2, 1849, fol. 216 (see Note 94 above for document title).

101. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
102. Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fols. 514–515.
103. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849, Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
104. Letters Relating to Whistler Extracted from a letter from Anna Whistler to unknown, Alexandroffsky, May 14th 1849, LC: P-W, box 296.
105. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
106. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978. It is possible that Mr. Biber is Karl Friedrich Eugen Biber (Monbeliard 17/29 August 1823 – St. Petersburg 27 January / 8 February 1876), who graduated from the University of Besançon on 2/14 August 1841. After 1841, he was a teacher and a private tutor in Courland and St. Petersburg and then worked in Mr. Hirst's private school. From 1857 to 1876, he was a senior teacher of French in St. Peter's School (St. Petrischule), the oldest school in St. Petersburg (Julius Iversen, Das Lehrpersonal der St. Petri-Schule von Ihrem ersten Beginn bis zur Gegenwart (1710–1887) mit Biographischen Notizen [The Teaching Staff of St. Peter's School from its Beginning to the Present (1710–1887) with Biographical Notes], vol. 2 [St. Petersburg: Golicke, 1887], p. 41). He married, on 22 June / 4 July 1858, Elizabeth Mary Hirst (PREC STP for 1858, no. 6955, p. 576).
107. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
108. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W388.
109. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Alexandroffsky, May 10th 1849. Thursday.
110. Anna Whistler to Mrs. Harrison, 62 Sloane St., June 20th [1849], LC: P-W.
111. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Philadelphia, August 21, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers. Anna Whistler identified Lee as William Raymond Lee (Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., Fleetwood, Monday, July 15, 1849, LC: P-W).

112. The SHS has no information about when the funeral was held or who attended, as the local newspaper did not begin publication until 1851 (Anne Tate, Stonington, CT, to E. Harden, 1 June 2007). Consultation of the Evening Post and New-York Herald, which are indexed, disclosed no notice of his burial (Mariam Touba, N-YHS, to E. Harden, 9 July 2007, N-YHS).
113. Undated entry [end of July] within the entry for Saturday July 22nd [1848], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
114. Entry for Tuesday [August] 9th (actually 8 August 1848), NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.

ANNA MATILDA (MCNEILL) WHISTLER

“Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed”<sup>1</sup>

When Lieutenant George Washington Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) and Mary Roberdeau Swift (see Image 10) eloped in January 1821, Anna Matilda McNeill (see Images 1–5) was sixteen years old. In December 1827, the first Mrs. Whistler died. Although Whistler’s attentions seemed to have turned to Anna “Mac” (see Images 1–5), from November 1828 to May 1829 he was in England, sent there by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad to study railways. Some six months later, she herself went for her health’s sake to England, where she spent the period from autumn of 1829 to April of 1831 in Preston, Lancashire. Here, she visited for the first time the daughters of her deceased father, Dr. Daniel McNeill (d. 1828; see Image 23),<sup>2</sup> from his first marriage – her half-sisters, Alicia McNeill and Eliza (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (see Images 39–40) – and lived with Eliza and her husband, John, a solicitor. She had taken with her gifts from George Washington Whistler, tokens reflecting his interest in her.<sup>3</sup> An “understanding” may have been reached before she sailed, for she felt free to ask in her correspondence, with familiarity, humor, and calculation, to be remembered to him.<sup>4</sup> In November 1831, at the age of twenty-seven, almost four years after Mary (Swift) Whistler’s death, Anna “Mac” became the second Mrs. Whistler.<sup>5</sup>

Whistler’s choice elicited approval from his brother-in-law, Joseph G. Swift (see Image 11), of “a judicious and otherwise good marriage that is to be.”<sup>6</sup> Anna had “a very quiet and ... assured bearing,”<sup>7</sup> “a repose of manner which so charmed people that they termed it a ‘sweet peacefulness,’”<sup>8</sup> and “all those qualities which must render her matrimonial career blest and tranquil.”<sup>9</sup>

In appearance, she was described as “fair, dainty and refined,” with “very beautiful hands, ‘always most carefully kept’ ... and pretty feet, ‘with high shapely arches.’”<sup>10</sup> The left-profile, waist-length portrait of her by Thomas Wright (see Image 208) executed in Russia in 1845, when she was thirty-nine or forty years old, makes tangible her physical appearance (see Image 1).<sup>11</sup> It shows that she was slender and had dark hair, worn in an attractive chignon with a free tendril hanging loose in front of small ears; dark eyes (of indistinguishable color) and eyebrows; a long, straight nose; small chin; erect posture; and small breasts. Her expression is one of pleasant composure, confirming the earlier assessments of quiet self-assurance.

In temperament, in addition to her quiet self-assurance, she was religious, pious, cheerful, modest, compassionate, reclusive, stubborn, restive, and had an explosive temper and a sharp tongue. She loved music and art but had no talent for either. Her forté was words, both spoken and written. She had rare charm as a conversationalist and wrote well. Her descriptions of nature, in particular, to many of her correspondents, were especially attractive. Thus she wrote to James in the winter of 1848: “You know how I delight in the glories of the firmament! The rainbow hues of the clouds thro which the bright sun was glowing, burnishing the windows of the Winter Palace upon which it reflected and every gilded dome and spire sparkling under its influence.”<sup>12</sup> And to Joseph Harrison Jr. (see Image 226) she described the first iceberg she had ever seen: “On Sunday when I was on deck an Iceberg was another object of interest to me, as I never before saw one ... it looked like a large snowy tent, but thro the glass, with the sun shining bright upon it, rainbow colors were added to its magnificence.”<sup>13</sup>

Her formal religious affiliation was Episcopalian, which she was introduced to by her mother, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22). Her religious beliefs have been described as “set in the 19th-century mold of evangelical Protestantism” that “permeated the South, characterizing sects such as Presbyterians and Low Church Episcopalians.”<sup>14</sup> When living in Brooklyn, she was most likely the “Miss McNeill” recorded in 1821 as a communicant at St. Ann’s Church, along with her parents, Martha and Dr. Daniel McNeill.<sup>15</sup> In St. Petersburg, she attended the English Church (see Image 110–111) on Sunday mornings and sometimes the afternoon services there as well. Otherwise, on Sunday afternoons she attended the service at the British and American Congregational Church (see Image 125), where her friends the Ropeses and Gellibrands (see Images 265–266), were communicants. Later, when their minister, Rev. Thomas Scales Ellerby (see Image 256), established a Sunday evening service for the mechanics at the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works (see Images 239–240), she would sometimes attend that as well. Their home on the Peterhof Road in the summer of 1844 was so close to town that it did not keep them from attending the Sunday morning service at the English Church; however, instead of going into town on both Sunday mornings and afternoons, she set up at their dacha in the afternoons a Sunday school, so dear to her heart and at that time impossible to establish at the English Church. It was for James and Willie (see Images 24–30) and any children whose families would permit them to attend, such as the Handyside girls, the Drury boys, and the little Normans. On one occasion, they held a combined Episcopalian and Congregational service.

Like many a second spouse, on entering the marriage Anna Whistler immediately gained step-children: George William (nine years old), Joseph Swift (seven years old), and Deborah Delano (six years old). In 1834, James Abbott was born; in 1836, William McNeill; in 1838, Kirk Boott. An extant letter from 1838 concentrates on children – their accidents and illnesses, their temperaments and toys – and reveals the sensible, humorous, and seemingly unflappable homemaker and mother, who was then seven months pregnant with her fourth child.<sup>16</sup>

The family lived quite retired from the world,<sup>17</sup> the preference of Major Whistler after four years of separation from his children, but Anna Whistler's choice as well. George William (see Images 12–13) eventually went to work in Lowell in the machine shop of the Proprietors of Locks and Canals; Joseph Swift was sent to a private school; Debo (see Images 17–19, 21), the only daughter, was almost a recluse at home, to be protected from the world by her anxious, loving father.

Anna Whistler set out to create a pious Christian household. The “law of [Major Whistler was] that mother's wishes should be [the children's] rule of daily action.”<sup>18</sup> Unfortunately, from the start she presented her religion and wishes so negatively that she turned her family away from it. Kate (Prince) Livermore, while calling her “one of the ‘Saints upon earth’,” acknowledged that “the religion which was so much to her she failed to make sweet and lovely to her sons; too puritanical . . . and the Sunday to be kept most strictly.”<sup>19</sup>

It is no surprise, therefore, that outstanding among James's, Willie's and their first cousins' traumatic childhood memories were the Saturday preparations for the Sabbath, when they had to put their toys away until Monday.<sup>20</sup> Anna Whistler went “through the boys pockets ... taking all balls, toys, knives out of them ... all books, even the Rollo<sup>21</sup> series, were hidden away, and [the children’s] most exciting reading was Pilgrims Progress,<sup>22</sup> and Mrs. Sherwood’s Tales.”<sup>23</sup> She “always wore black satin slippers in the house ... and as this gave her a noiseless approach ... [y]oung culprits were sometimes taken unawares and forthwith marched off to learn the Collect for the day. And if toys were left carelessly about, Mrs. Whistler quietly impounded them, requiring a fine from the owner for the mission box before restoring them.”<sup>24</sup>

“[M]other’s wishes” had also been accepted by Major Whistler, as he bowed to his wife’s efforts to create a Christian home. He met her more than halfway, stopping, however, at acceptance of the mysteries of her religious faith,<sup>25</sup> but he believed her to be “a pure Christian” and hoped he might “profit by her example, she has taught us to say in all sincerity – Gods will be done.”<sup>26</sup> She, in turn, deferred to him as head of the family, requesting his permission before engaging in certain actions, such as bringing the frail James to Russia or sitting for the night by the bedside of a sick friend in Russia.

Sometimes, however, they did not see eye-to-eye, and both extant letters and the diaries reflect their disagreements. On the rare occasion when the moment had to be seized or forfeited, such as when she acted impulsively and unilaterally to request Rev. George Williams to read evening prayers in their St. Petersburg living room as he was on the verge of taking his leave, she encountered her husband’s disapproval. She listened to his concerns about possible resulting censure by their fellow communicants in the English Church, discussed her action with the approving Rev. Williams, and vowed in her diaries that she would act unilaterally again if an occasion warranted it.

But her diaries and letters also reflect her total devotion to and deep love for her husband. During her first long separation from him – in which she, not he, left St. Petersburg, traveling to England in the summer of 1847 to spend several months there for the sake of James’s health – her letters to him en route contain passages that must be viewed as love letters. Speaking of the problems arising from James’s present character, so much resembling in its faults her own, she writes about reproaching herself for having rudely rejected a certain birthday gift from her husband. Although he has forgiven her for it, she continues to feel remorse, but acknowledges, “I bless God every day of my life for giving me such a husband, and though I often appear restive, yet believe me your advice and example are not lost upon your fond wife.”<sup>27</sup>

Urging James to practice “self-denial and obedience” and reminding him of an instance in Russia when his father’s gentle voice attempted to reconcile him to these guiding principles, she lovingly exhorts her late husband: “oh my own loved one! may we all hear thy tones of gentle admonition yet sounding upon our hearts, to induce us to live in constant preparation to meet thee in the paradise of God!”<sup>28</sup> And the biographical essay she wrote about him shortly after his death is a paean to her love for him.<sup>29</sup>

* * *

The positive opinions held of Anna Whistler in her circle in the United States were upheld by persons she encountered in Russia. John Stevenson Maxwell, who lived in the Bobrinskii mansion first with Major Whistler and then with the Whistler family, had the opportunity to observe Anna Whistler closely on a daily basis for about a year, making him a reliable commentator on her consistent traits of character. Observing her submission to the will of God in the affliction she was suffering from Charles Donald Whistler’s death en route to St. Petersburg in 1843, he immediately admired and esteemed her “fervent and unaffected piety.”<sup>30</sup> And, on hearing by letter in 1846 of the death of John Bouttatz Whistler, he wrote to Major Whistler of the solace Anna Whistler’s “Christian fortitude and resignation” must have brought him as well.<sup>31</sup> He assessed her “good temper and spirits” as her “usual” behavior,<sup>32</sup> an effort she acknowledged in the diaries she could make for others no matter how depressed she might herself be feeling. After she had nursed Maxwell back to health from his near-fatal attack of typhus fever in early 1844, he praised her as one of the sweetest women I ever saw, so amicable, so benevolent, so truly pious, and who amidst all her calamities is so resigned to the will of God and his strenght [sic] finding not only consolation not only for her own afflictions, but for the afflictions of others around her, such religion as she possesses is indeed a treasure in this world, and gives an angelic character and influence alone derived from Heaven. She has told me often of her dear little one's [siz] who now rest with God and in her chaste sorrow – the very tear drop seemed to bright with the perfect hope of rejoining them again forever. I thought of Patience on a monument, smiling at grief.<sup>33</sup>

Indicating in his letters to his family that the reclusive Mrs. Whistler did not “go into society,” he described the positive experience of being in her presence in her own home: “within the bounds of the little circle she culls around her, her cheerfulness, goodness, and amiable qualities, make her every day still more the favorite. In truth I never knew ... a lady so generally beloved by those with whom she was surrounded, than is this one, and every body likes to go to her house and enjoy her society.”<sup>34</sup> If Maxwell saw or heard any of her displays of temper or razor-edged tongue, his correspondence reveals no such behavior. Nor did he comment extensively on her religion, noting only that the family was religious and went to church during Lent every day.

Joseph Harrison Jr. (see Image 226) wrote to his family in Philadelphia after Anna Whistler's departure for America in 1849: “You will find her a very good and pious woman. – without any form or ceremony,”<sup>35</sup> “very kind in her manners, and one whom you will like from the first moment of seeing her ... You may recollect that we left Alicia with Mrs. Whistler, when I went to England to bring Sarah home in 1846 ... their house seemed like home for all of us.”<sup>36</sup>

Anna Whistler herself indicated Colin Ingersoll's attachment to her (see Image 280): “Young Ingersoll seems glad to serve us in any way, our fire side is the only one he feels at home at, tho he is much liked thro out the American circle, the better I know him the more I find in him to admire and esteem. He is here every day, generally dines with us. Father says he seems to look upon me as a mother.”<sup>37</sup>

The extant negative assessment of Anna Whistler available from the 1840s seems petty and is easily refuted. Some eleven years into the marriage, when Whistler had been in Russia only two months and decided he could not bear to remain there without his family, William Henry Swift wrote his brother, Joseph G. Swift, that he disliked Anna<sup>38</sup>

because “[u]nder a very quiet and ... assured bearing, she has quite a fancy of making a figure” and he “believe[d] her to be both artful and selfish.”<sup>39</sup> “Mrs. Whistler wishes to go to England and I dare say she will go there,” he said, probably referring to her stubborn determination to revisit her half-sisters in Preston en route to St. Petersburg.<sup>40</sup> As soon as the seriously ill James was pronounced able to travel,<sup>41</sup> and Major Whistler had given his approval, Anna Whistler, like “a good soldier’s wife,” made “all her arrangements” briskly and in just two weeks went “to Boston, to New York, to Mrs. Wittenhams (for the daughter) to Brooklyn, to Patterson, to Philadelphia, said her good byes to all her friends, and was off with all her family to England.”<sup>42</sup> In addition to what William H. Swift deemed Anna Whistler’s unloving treatment of her step-daughter (his niece), he censured her for carelessly spending her husband’s large Russian salary that could secure their future.<sup>43</sup> He was aware, at the same time, as Major Whistler’s financial advisor, that the Major was involved in an argument with his brother-in-law, William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31), about a supposed agreement to surrender a portion of his Russian salary to the latter,<sup>44</sup> that also constituted a serious drain on it; but he chose to censure Anna Whistler, perhaps viewing Major Whistler’s extravagance as an act of honor. Anna Whistler nevertheless spoke kindly of William H. Swift, who continued to handle both Major Whistler’s<sup>45</sup> and then her financial affairs after she was widowed.<sup>46</sup>

In Russia, she demonstrated that despite William Henry Swift’s negative assessment of her she was neither “artful” nor “selfish.”<sup>47</sup> She was noticed, in less than a year in St. Petersburg, by other communicants of the English Church and thanked by them for ministering to the recently deceased Mary Gent Hirst during the latter’s terminal illness. She perceived in this attention that she had inherited the mantle of doer-of-good-works so long held by Miss Hirst and accepted it with humility.<sup>48</sup>

* * *

The diary she was encouraged to keep in Russia became not simply a superficial and chatty recounting of events in her life after the model of Eliza Winstanley’s Edinburgh diary (see Appendix D), but expounded

the religious credo that lay at the core of her being. Reproaching her concentration on “self and my own thoughts” as “egotism,” she revealed that the moral model of Christ, resigned and obedient, constituted the mitigating and supportive center of her life. She was at this time a middle-aged woman between thirty-nine and forty-four years of age, but asserting on the eve of her forty-fourth birthday that she felt “as young (in activity) as when in my teens.”<sup>49</sup>

This decade of the family’s personal life was one of great tragedy. It opened with the death on 1 January 1840 of fifteen-year-old Joseph Swift Whistler, followed by the deaths of Anna Whistler’s niece, eight-year-old Louise McNeill, in July, and of her nephew, ten-year-old Henry Cammann McNeill, in August of that same year. Although the decade proceeded with the birth in 1841 of Charles Donald Whistler, in 1842 four-year-old Kirk Boott Whistler died, and in 1843 two-year-old Charles Donald Whistler. In 1845, John Bouttatz Whistler was born, but died thirteen months later, in October 1846. In 1847, Deborah Delano Whistler’s marriage created a rift with her father that lasted until his death. In 1848, the often alarmingly ill James Abbott Whistler was left in England for the sake of his health. Throughout the decade, George William Whistler was a source of anxiety, irritation, and grief to his parents. In 1849, Major Whistler died. Anna Whistler was sustained during these losses and family strife by her deep religious faith.

While emulating Christ in her own suffering, she, however, maintained the belief that the cause of suffering was the will of a loving God who required total obedience without complaint or else exacted revenge. She harshly viewed the failing health of her sister-in-law, Maria (Cammann) McNeill, as an affliction visited on her and her alcoholic husband, William Gibbs McNeill, because his “pride has resisted all other admonitions” and “remained a scourge still,”<sup>50</sup> a reference to his inability to turn for comfort to Christ, “the friend who is closer than a brother – the one for adversity!”<sup>51</sup> But of the multiple instances she cites of punishment for rebellion against God’s will, perhaps the harshest concerns children: if the death of a child causes a parent to turn against God and “to the world for comfort,” God deals an even more severe blow “to make us feel our risk in delaying repentance.”<sup>52</sup> The culmination of her compassion for Christ’s sufferings and the physical sufferings of her last biological son finds its expression in the diaries in an almost unendurable, long passage of raw-nerved hysteria.<sup>53</sup>

While regretting that her family did not accept her harsh religion, she never wavered in her beliefs. She did, however, try, unsuccessfully, to present a more palatable form, suggesting to Debo, for example, that she spend time with people who were examples of religion “in its most attractive form” and who exemplified what “a happy thing ... [it was] to be a Christian.”<sup>54</sup> She wished, when visiting Chaddock Hall (see Image 467), that Debo could have been with her to meet Bessie and Mary Smith, whom she found to be fit examples of attractive Christianity for her step-daughter.

Nor did she have any earthly ambitions for her sons. It was more practical for James to be an architect than an artist, but otherwise she did not ask for them to become important. She felt financial help to George by Joseph Harrison Jr. after Whistler’s death would not build his character. She was more interested in her children’s being spiritual models for others.

* * *

The intellectual aspect of any religion failed to interest her. She considered that “our blessed Saviour [sic] precepts are so plain that he who runneth may read.” She was grateful when able to avoid being present at any discussion of dogma and its fine points, believing that “if we walk humbly as to our own merits, looking to Him as the author and finisher of our salvation ‘fulfilling all righteousness’ we may be saved without diving into mysteries, and these questions are so seldom without bitterness that I dread them.”<sup>55</sup>

She felt a kinship with communicants of other Protestant denominations, such as the Ropeses and Gellibrands, who were Congregationalists. She attended services of Protestant denominations other than Congregationalists for special reasons, such as the funeral service in the Dutch Reformed Church (see Image 128) for Wilhelmina van Grooten, because she was the sister of her friend Helene Funck. It was her love of vocal religious music, however, that drew her to venues such as the rehearsals of the choristers of the Imperial Choir and a service at the Trinity-Sergius Monastery on the Peterhof Road (see Image 397), and enabled William Hooper Ropes to persuade her to attend early Mass at the Catholic Church of St. Catherine of Alexandria (see Image 127) on her first Easter in Russia.

But the proselytizing side of her nature and her temper constantly got the better of her. While the Nevskii Prospekt bore the name “the street of tolerance” because of the many faiths represented in the houses of worship on it, she was adamantly judgmental in her approach to Orthodoxy. Although she was willing to attend an Orthodox or Catholic service, but not without bewailing the use of an intermediary between the congregation and God, hearing of certain specific Russian religious holidays caused her to give vent to a vituperative remark. For example, the celebration of the death of the Virgin Mary (see Image 382), an official holiday, drew from her the acerbic comment: “I wonder what chronicler informs them.”<sup>56</sup> Like William Gellibrand and Mary Gent Hirst, she would have given all but her own salvation to convert Russians to Christ. She berated the English in Russia for not using the advantage of their fluency in the language to influence changes in Russians instead of participating with them in their errors.

Hearing of certain customs of Russian daily life produced a similar reaction. During their summer on the Peterhof Road, the Whistlers were introduced to the practice of a watchman beating on a board at intervals during the night to show his employer that he was carrying out his obligation to ward off thieves and to show his master that he was actually carrying out his task. This elicited the comically irate reaction from Anna Whistler that “it is a shameful evidence of the defects of the religious system, but I trust when the Gospel is preached freely to all nations this people so very apt to learn as they seem may be honest thro love to God & not fear of man.”<sup>57</sup>

Her pared-down interest in what the world and its powerful considered important actually applied to all facets of life for her: to her views on the Imperial personages of Russia, to her fervent hope that Queen Pomare (see Image 293) would be helped in her hour of need, to the calling up for active military duty of Major Whistler’s brother and nephew (see Images 34–35) in the Mexican War, to the controversy over the Oregon Territory, to the wars in the Caucasus. The human aspect was always paramount and the approach religious.

She felt she ought to attempt to see Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) in public, because she would be asked about him when she returned home, but her interest in him was in the personal and homely, just as it was in the case of all the “ordinary” people she encountered, heard of, or loved.

While witnessing a military review, “Independent Yankee” that he was, young Colin Ingersoll (see Image 280) nevertheless felt that Nicholas I was “no ordinary man”: “Tall, commanding, limbs of faultless symatry [sic] – cold, like a statue, yet strikingly majestic,” “a face classical than otherwise,” Nicholas I was one of “the finest specimens of ‘the human form divine’ [he had] ever seen.” “[H]is presence seem[ed] to inspire [Ingersoll], ... as the man, one would select from a crowd of thousands, in any land, as ‘born to command’.”<sup>58</sup> While witnessing a similar review, Anna Whistler thought “he looked too proud for mere mortal & ... wondered if he remembered the presence of the King of Kings! for ... how small was all this array in comparison to the Armies of heaven.”<sup>59</sup> She was impressed that at a service at the Trinity-Sergius Monastery, where the emperor asked for a special service and prayers for his dying daughter, Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (see Images 434, 444, 451), he acknowledged his powerlessness by weeping.<sup>60</sup>

As a mother, she empathized throughout the diaries with Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna (see Images 420, 424) on the dying and death of a child, but greeted with apprehension the idea that the empress might come to worship Briullov’s portrait of her deceased daughter installed in the memorial oratory (see Image 453). Two years after the grand duchess’s death, she toured the monuments to her memory (see Images 452–457) and was gratified by their emphasis on the Bible and the homeliness and concentration on family in the hut from which the young woman used to feed the ducks.

She wished the empress could be persuaded to use her influence to ensure that only religious music would be played during Lent, and thought of the aid the value of the Imperial treasures could give to the missionary fund.

She did not refer in her appraisal of Nicholas I to the negative aspects of what some considered an unhinged personality. In the case of his spouse, she ignorantly questioned the justice of those, such as Custine, who, while correctly assessing the empress's facial tic and wornout appearance to be the result of the terror of the Decembrist Rebellion and of years of childbearing, attributed her resultant permanent debility to a subservience to the whim of the emperor, who pulled her back into the social whirl whenever her health seemed to rally. Such commentators were not suggesting that the Imperial marriage was an unhappy one, despite Anna Whistler's interpretation that they were (see Appendix B).

The controversy over the Oregon Territory made her anxious, because she loved both America and England deeply and did not wish to have her allegiances challenged by the possibility of having to make a choice between them (see "Maps"). The War with Mexico raised the possibility of the death of close relatives. Events in Russia she understood less well, but reacted to them similarly, influenced in part by what her English and American friends explained to her. She alluded to the war in the Caucasus in terms of the burden of at least fifteen-year conscription on the common soldier. She seemed unaware of why Nicholas I traveled to England in the summer of 1844, but reacted to the fact that as a father he returned immediately when summoned because of the terminal illness of his youngest daughter. The revolutions of 1848 she responded to by copying out from the French newspaper the translated version of the emperor's speech to his people, the only version she could understand; by referring to their servant Matvey's allegiance to the emperor; and by mentioning that the emperor and empress appeared frequently in public with many changes of costume. Queen Pomare's appeal to Queen Victoria (see Image 287) elicited from her and other ladies at tea in the Whistlers' home the hope that she "might not be deserted in her need by Queen Victoria."<sup>61</sup>

* * *

While the question of the emancipation of the slaves in America was cogent at this time, the issue of the Southern-born Anna Whistler's attitude toward slavery and black people requires consideration, because two males to whom she was closely related, one of whom is mentioned in the diaries and extensively in extant family correspondence, were partners in inter-racial liaisons. Her mother's brother, Zephaniah

Kingsley, was “an Atlantic trader in enslaved Africans, slave plantation owner in Florida, and patriarch of a large mixed-race extended family that functioned in a polygamous fashion.”<sup>62</sup> He was not married in a conventional sense to any of the black women with whom he had children.<sup>63</sup> The overseer of his San Jose plantation at Fort George Island (see Images 58–60) as of 1838 was Anna Whistler’s brother, Charles Johnston McNeill, who was married to Eliza (Coffee) McNeill, a mulatto.<sup>64</sup>

Uncle Zephaniah Kingsley, fearing that his manumitted family members and former slaves would suffer in Florida as a result of miscegenation laws, sent them to live in Haiti, “the first free black republic in the Western world,”<sup>65</sup> in 1839.<sup>66</sup> Before this decision, he had made frequent appraisal trips to Haiti, stopping in New York to conduct business and attend abolitionist meetings, although he eventually ceased to share the speakers’ views.<sup>67</sup> He had expressed his views on slavery in legal documents, starting in March 1811, when he freed his wife, Anna Kingsley, and their children.<sup>68</sup> He had also expressed these views in newspaper articles and a treatise. Anna Whistler was six years old in March 1811 and living in North Carolina. She had to have heard about her uncle’s life from family conversations. In 1815, her family moved north permanently. It is plausible that she never read his A Treatise on the Patriarchal, or Co-operative System of Society, As It Exists in Some Governments, And Colonies in America, and in the United States, Under the Name of Slavery, published in 1828, when she was twenty-four,<sup>69</sup> especially given her reluctance to pursue intellectual arguments.

On 13 September 1843, while in New York, Zephaniah Kingsley died of a heart attack.<sup>70</sup> His will, witnessed on 20 July 1843 in Florida, showed that “his concerns were first and foremost for the future of his extended biracial family.”<sup>71</sup> He was worried that “my heirs would break my will,”<sup>72</sup> and, indeed, in October 1844, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill “filed a petition . . . to invalidate her brother’s will and to disinherit the designated heirs,”<sup>73</sup> listing as co-petitioners her children, including Anna Whistler.<sup>74</sup>

On 2 March 1846, however, the validity of Zephaniah Kingsley’s will was upheld by the courts.<sup>75</sup> No extant document shows what Anna

Whistler thought of this action on the part of her mother, whom she deeply loved and was devoted to.

Zephaniah Kingsley died three days before Anna Whistler was to depart for Russia, and she possibly did not know about it until later in her voyage. When she arrived in Russia, her thoughts were all of the loss she had suffered from Charles Donald's death, but it is interesting that she did not mention Uncle Zephaniah in her St. Petersburg diaries.

The family member who suffered to some extent from Martha (Kingsley) McNeill's contesting of Zephaniah Kingsley's will was her own son, Charles Johnston McNeill, who had been named one of three white heirs both to property and money. Kingsley's wife, Anna's, petition "that [Charles] be dismissed as overseer at San Jose,"<sup>76</sup> led to his being replaced.<sup>77</sup> Although Martha (Kingsley) McNeill had spent time in Florida with him as early as 1829,<sup>78</sup> in the autumn of 1846, when she was considering coming to live with the Whistlers until they left Russia permanently, Charles Johnston McNeill traveled north and successfully persuaded her instead to accompany him when he returned to Florida.<sup>79</sup> For an unknown number of years until her death in 1852, she admirably tutored Eliza (Coffee) McNeill in social behavior and engaged in the religious and moral training of this daughter-in-law and of the grandchildren.

Like Anna Whistler's religious views, her views on slavery were instilled in her by Martha (Kingsley) McNeill. She refers in her diaries to her mother's influence in her life, citing proverbs quoted by her and attitudes toward the vicissitudes of life held by her, even demonstrating that her own love of flowers came from her mother. Indeed, in alluding to her mother's visits to Florida, she chiefly revels in thoughts of the varieties of flowers in bloom there and does not at all mention Charles's family and her mother's life with them. There is thus no clear statement as to what she felt about that complex situation, but Charles apparently turned to Anna Whistler for financial help, because her correspondence confirms an instance in which she attempted to solicit a loan for him not only from Joseph Harrison Jr., but from Harrison's father.<sup>80</sup>

At her brother's request, she traveled to Reddys Point and was chaplain to his and Eliza's children, but she did not have her mother's devotion to this project. Her chosen enthusiastic charitable efforts for black people seemed to be reading the Bible with them. Thus, while living in Pomfret after her return from Russia, she went “to see a poor old colored woman who is bed ridden & who expresses such a wish for my going often that I shall propose daily reading the scripture to her.”<sup>81</sup>

Beyond family loyalty, beyond acts of charity to black people, while not a supporter of slavery, she ignored the possible cruelty of slaveowners and lauded the religious preparation being given by them to the slaves to spread the Bible in a future return to Africa. Extant letters reveal that she did not express her views on slavery until pressed after the publication of Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) and Harriet Beecher Stowe's tour of England.<sup>82</sup> The fact that Mrs. Stowe's travels in England increased the “popular mania” for her novel resulted in Anna Whistler's being questioned about her own reaction more frequently than she would have liked. Thus we learn that, while “no advocate for slavery,” she felt she could “witness to the humanity of the owners of southern Atlantic states, & testify that such are benefactors to the race of Ham . . . that the blacks at the south are cared for by Christian owners, being taught from the gospel & all their religious indulgences provided.” She therefore took “the view that God has permitted the stigma to remain upon our country that missionaries might be prepared for Africa, thro the religious instruction provided by slave owners in our Atlantic states, & that thro the Colonization Society it will be effected.” She felt “Uncle Tom may prove an incentive” in effecting these views, “tho so much romance & poison is mixed up with the abolitionist prejudices of the writer.”<sup>83</sup>

In 1858, when visiting Charles Johnston McNeill and her southern cousins, she continued to stress the good life she felt she saw the slaves enjoying: “I wish all who are pained at the thoughts of slavery could see the freedom & easy labor of the workies here”; “As to slavery at the south, I never saw servants so free to idle, the owners have the severest task & such a weight of responsibility in the care & training of such families! But it has long been my conviction [through] the Providence of our Lord that heathen Africa may be enlightened by their people of our Southern States. The galleries of all the churches are free to them & very attentive hearers they appear”; “rice and cotton is cultivated by very contented looking negroes.”<sup>84</sup>

It is noteworthy that Anna Whistler seems not to have meant her diaries to be a confession written for herself alone. She sent Part I to her family in the United States, and took up the writing of Part II chiefly because of her mother's reception of Part I. Years later, she retrieved them from her lumber room to send to her friend, James Gamble, for him to read himself and to read aloud to a Scottish friend. She was never ashamed of Jesus in the world nor of her religious beliefs.

* * *

While Anna Whistler's diaries of 1843–1848 reveal the religious and moral aspect of her biography as no other documents written by her do, this essay depends also on her voluminous correspondence in the Whistler Collection at Glasgow University Library and the Pennell–Whistler Collection at the Library of Congress, as well as the correspondence of John Stevenson Maxwell at the New-York Historical Society and Joseph Harrison Jr. at the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; the Swift Papers at the New York Public Library; the correspondence of members of extended family in the Swift Papers at the United States Military Academy Library archives at West Point; Colin Ingersoll's Journal at Boston University; and, among printed sources, chiefly Kate McDiarmid's biography of Anna Whistler and Daniel Schafer's biography of Zephaniah Kingsley.

NOTES

1. John 20:29 is Jesus's reply to the Apostle Thomas, who doubted the resurrection of Jesus until he had actually seen and touched Jesus's wounds. Verse 29 is the epitaph on Anna Whistler's tombstone in Hastings, England.
2. Dr. Daniel McNeill is said also to have been known as Charles Donald McNeill, "native of Bladen County, North Carolina [and] identified with Wilmington, North Carolina"; see Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
3. Anna Matilda McNeill to Catherine J. McNeill, Liverpool, 22 November 1829 (McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother, pp. 16, 19).
4. Anna Matilda McNeill to Margaret Getfield Hill, Manchester, January 14, 1830 (McDiarmid, p. 20).
5. "Whistler, Lt. George W. of USA. m. in N.Y. Anna Matilda, daughter of the late Dr. Daniel McNeill," Brooklyn Star, November 9, 1831, Card Index for Brooklyn Star, Brooklyn Historical Society, Brooklyn, NY.
6. J.G. Swift to Louisa Walker Swift, New London [CT], 17th Oct. '31, in file J.G. Swift to his wife, Louisa (Letters of General Joseph G. Swift; Swift, Joseph Gardner, 1783–1865, Papers 1800–1865; Manuscripts, 19th Century 10; United States Military Academy (USMA) Library, West Point, NY [hereafter USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers]).
7. William H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, November 4, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers.
8. McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother, p. 11.
9. Niece Julia M. Osborne to Uncle Joseph G. Swift, Geneva [N.Y.] Nov. 8, 1831, Family Letters of J.G. Swift and his wife 1822–1831, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers.
10. McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother, p. 21. Deborah (Whistler) Haden, writing to James in November 1848, compared the portrait she had of Anna Whistler to the subject herself and said, "it is not nearly so nice or refined looking as the original" (Deborah Delano (Whistler) Haden to James Whistler, Nov 28, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, H6).
11. Wright, Thomas. Anna Whistler, mother of James McNeill Whistler, 1845. Pencil and w/c. 16.9 x 10.6 cm. (6 5/8 x 4 1/4 ins), PH 1/57, neg. no. AC874, Hunterian Art Gallery, Glasgow

- University. It is signed “Tho<sup>s</sup>. Wright (Rait) 1845.” Rait is a transliteration of his Russian signature.
12. Monday morning Dec. 11th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W371.
  13. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr. Steamer America. August 8th [18]49. Wednesday afternoon, LC: P-W, box 34.
  14. Phoebe Lloyd, “Anna Whistler the Venerable,” Art in America 72, no. 11 (November 1984): p. 150.
  15. [F.G. Fish], St. Ann’s Church (Brooklyn, New York) from the Year 1784 to the Year 1845, with A Memorial of the Sunday Schools, to which is added, An Appendix, containing a brief notice of the other Episcopal churches in Brooklyn by a Sunday School Teacher (Brooklyn, NY: printed by the author, 1845), pp. 51, 193, 200, 201.
  16. Anna Whistler to Catherine McNeill, Stonington, May 1st, 1838, McDiarmid, Whistler’s Mother, pp. 29–30.
  17. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J. G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 28, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  18. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Stonington, Wednesday, Aug 27th 51, GUL: Whistler Collection, W395.
  19. Kate Livermore to Elizabeth Robins Pennell, October 31, 1906, fol. 2914, LC: P-W, box 292, L.
  20. McDiarmid, Whistler’s Mother, pp. 138, 155.
  21. The Rollo series was written by Jacob Abbott (14 November 1803 – 31 October 1879), “a congregational clergyman, educator and writer of children’s books.” He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1820 and “studied theology at Andover Seminary in 1821–22 and 1824.” In 1825, he “became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Amherst College.” In 1828, “he founded the Mount Vernon School” in Boston. It became “one of the pioneer institutions in America for the education of young women.” Abandoning “traditional disciplinary methods, he appealed to the honor and conscience of his pupils by making the school self-governing.” “In 1833 he resigned” his post as principal and in 1834 “became minister of the Eliot Congregational Church in Roxbury, Mass.” After 1835, although he founded together with his brothers Abbott’s Institution (1843–1851) in New York City and another, short-lived, school, he turned to writing and was most prolific. His “first important work” was The Young Christian (1832). The Corner Stone (1834) caused a furor in circles “hostile to Unitarianism” and “became the subject of one of the famous Oxford Tracts for the Times (No. 73) by J.H. Newman,” but the two later met and became friends. “In later editions of The Corner Stone Abbott changed certain equivocal passages to prevent further misapprehension of his views, which were substantially those of the more liberal Evangelicals of his period.” Another famous work was his Rollo series for young readers, which he intended, as he did his other literary works, “as instruments for the accomplishment of certain definite results in human life and character” (Allan Johnson, ed., Dictionary of American Biography, 20 vols. [New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1964] [hereafter, Dictionary of American Biography], s.v. “Abbott, Jacob”).

There were 14 Rollo books in the first series (1835–1842). The purpose of these “stories about a boy named Rollo [and his] experiences on a New England farm and out in the wide, wide world (including Europe) [was] to teach lessons of self-improvement, honesty and industry” (Max J. Herzberg, et al., The Reader’s Encyclopedia of American Literature [New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1962], p. 1).

22. John Bunyan’s The Pilgrim’s Progress from This World, to That Which Is to Come was published in 1678. Bunyan (1628–1688) was a tinker by profession and a preacher by avocation. He was imprisoned for preaching without a license from 1660 to 1672, for twelve years, and again in 1676–1677 for six months. The Church of England, reestablished at the restoration of Charles II in 1660, cracked down on sectarian preachers who had flourished during the Civil Wars, the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, and the Interregnum. Pilgrim’s Progress is an allegory. Christian’s spiritual journey is made geographical: he goes from the City of Destruction through the Slough of Despond to the Palace Beautiful, through the Valleys of Humiliation and the Shadow of Death to Vanity Fair and, after a spell in the prison of the Giant Despair, to the Delectable Mountains and finally, after crossing the River of Death, to the Celestial City. On the way, he encounters and engages in lively dialogue with other pilgrims, many less resolute than he (Mr. Honest, Mr. Fearing, Mr. Ready-to-Halt); helpful folk (the Evangelist, the Interpreter); and tempters (Mr. Worldly Wiseman, Ignorance).
23. McDiarmid, Whistler’s Mother, p. 155. McDiarmid is citing Emma Palmer’s account of how the Sabbath was kept. For Mrs. Sherwood and her edifying tales for children, see the entry for South Shore of Blackpool. on the Lancashire coast. July 28th

1847. Wednesday, NYPL: AWP, Part II, and accompanying Notes 843 and 844.
24. McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother, p. 138. McDiarmid is citing the answers given to her questions by Anna Whistler's niece, Anna Whistler (Palmer) Stanton.
  25. See the biography of George Washington Whistler in the 1840s in this chapter.
  26. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, January 18, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
  27. Anna Whistler to Major George Washington Whistler Tuesday morning June 8th 1847 Steamer Nicolai, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353.
  28. Both quotations in this example are from Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Pomfret thursday Jan 15th 1852, GUL: Whistler Collection, W405. The instance in Russia was a family excursion in the Summer Garden. James was at the time of letter W405 a cadet at the United States Military Academy.
  29. An essay on the life of George Washington Whistler, written by Anna Whistler in May 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
  30. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23.
  31. John S. Maxwell to Major George Washington Whistler, New York, Monday December 13, 1846 (Monday was December 14), N-YHS: Maxwell Papers.
  32. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35.
  33. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33.
  34. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 45. Anna Whistler herself mentioned in 1846 the novelty of having spent a few nights at the Gellibrand dacha, speaking of it as "quite an era in my St. Petersburg life, as I never slept from home before" (entry for August 12/24th Monday [1846], NYPL: AWP, Part II).
  35. Joseph Harrison, Jr. to Joseph Harrison Sr Philadelphia United States Alex. July 26th (OS) 1849, HSP: Harrison Letterbook No. 1.

36. Joseph Harrison, Jr. to his sister Elizabeth Alex. July 27th (OS) 1849, HSP: Harrison Letterbook No. 1.
37. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg, Monday evening Dec. 13th [OS] English Christmas Day [1846], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375.
38. Among her own relatives Anna Whistler was deeply disliked by Virginia Carry (Ragland) Fairfax, the wife of her nephew, Donald McNeill Fairfax, son of Anna Whistler's sister, Isabella Kingsley (McNeill) Fairfax. Because of Anna Whistler's straitened circumstances, the couple shared their apartment in Baltimore with her in 1855, as a result of which she and "Ginnie" clashed. Anna Whistler forgave her, as she did anyone who displayed antagonism toward her.
 Anna Whistler's great-nephew, Donald P. Stanton, son of her niece and namesake, Anna Whistler (Palmer) Stanton, daughter of Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer, in his answers to Kate McDiarmid's questions recounted anecdotes demonstrating his mother's dislike of her "Aunt Anna." This dislike was prompted by Anna Whistler's humiliation of her as a teenager and remembrances of confiscated toy episodes. Among the more amusing anecdotes he related was the one told upon Anna Whistler's death, proposing that she, who could not play any instrument, was probably now playing the harp in heaven (Anna P. Stanton to Kate McDiarmid, 22 April [1928], GUL: Whistler Collection, S179). He also informed Kate McDiarmid that his mother said Anna Whistler "was a snob, haughty and reserved" with those she did not consider her equals (Donald P. Stanton to Kate McDiarmid [26 May 1930], GUL: Whistler Collection, S201).
39. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Springfield, Nov. 4, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers.
40. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Washington, April 19, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
41. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, August 12, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17 [sic].
42. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, September 9, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21.
43. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, September 9, 1843; Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Washington, August 4, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
44. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J. G. Swift, Washington, June 15, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers. See the biography of George William Whistler in the 1840s in this chapter for details of his father and uncle's quarrel.

45. William H. Swift nevertheless continued to handle Major Whistler's financial affairs and Anna's after the death of Major Whistler and was the executor of the latter's American will.
46. Entry for Tues., July 25: July 23, Anna McNeill Whistler 1850 Diary, LC: P-W, box 33 (hereafter, AMW 1850 Diary). This entry reveals that Mary Brennan also had money ($300) in the hands of Capt. Swift and was receiving interest. The frugal Anna Whistler was using a diary for an earlier year, containing printed dates. Next to these printed dates she wrote in the dates for the days as they would have been in 1850.
47. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Springfield, Nov. 4, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers.
48. Entry for Sunday [August] 11th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
49. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 26 September 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W361.
50. Anna Whistler to J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Sept. 24, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
51. Anna Whistler to Margaret Getfield Hill, 62 Sloane St Christmas Eve 1852, Letters of Anna Mathilda McNeil Mother of James McNeill Whistler 1830–1876, LC: P-W, box 34, fol. 35.
52. Entry for Monday [August] 5th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
53. Entry for Friday [October] 16th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
54. Rev. Thomas S. Grimshawe, Memoir of the Rev. Legh Richmond, A.M., 4th ed. (London: R.B. Seeley and W. Burnside, 1828), p. 599. These are the words of Richmond's daughter.
55. All quotations in this paragraph are taken from the entry for Monday [August] 26th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I. Even when she learned of the death of Nicholas I, believing that he "had gone to where there is no change, no place for repentance," she hoped "the false system in the Greek and Roman churches – purgatory – may not have been depended upon by the Emperor, but faith in the alone merits of Jesus Christ our only righteousness!" (Anna Whistler to James Whistler [Washington] 176 Preston Street Wednesday 28th [March 1855], GUL: Whistler Collection, W448).
56. Entry for Wed [August] 28th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

57. Entry for Monday 10th June [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
58. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 19–20, 25.
59. Entry for June 6th Old Style ... & 18th our calender [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
60. Entry for Wed [July] 17th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
61. Entry for Thursday [August] 29th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
62. Daniel L. Schafer, Zephaniah Kingsley Jr. and the Atlantic World: Slave Trader, Plantation Owner, Emancipator (Gainesville, FL: University of Florida Press, 2013), p. ix. This aspect of Anna Whistler's immediate family background had not been explored in depth until the publication of Schafer's carefully researched, outstanding biography of Zephaniah Kingsley, although he had earlier written a biography of Kingsley's wife, Anna Magigine Jai Kingsley (Daniel L. Schafer, Anna Magigine Jai Kingsley: African Princess, Florida Slave, Plantation Owner [Gainesville, FL: University of Florida Press, 2003]). Before the appearance of Schafer's two works, a number of articles appeared on the subject of miscegenation in James Whistler's family. See, for example, Philip S. May, "Zephaniah Kingsley, Nonconformist (1765–1843)," The Florida Historical Quarterly 23, no. 3 (January 1945): pp. 145–159; Paul G. Marks, "James McNeill Whistler's Family Secret: An Arrangement in White and Black," The Southern Quarterly 26, no. 3 (1988): pp. 67–75.
63. Schafer, Zephaniah Kingsley, p. 227.
64. Schafer, pp. 218–219, 292.
65. Schafer, p. 210.
66. Schafer, pp. 219, 292nn16–17; Daniel W. Stowell, ed. Balancing Evils Judiciously: The Proslavery Writings of Zephaniah Kingsley. (Gainesville, FL: University of Florida Press, 2000), p. 111.
67. Schafer, Zephaniah Kingsley, pp. 206, 207, 208, 209; Stowell, Balancing Evils, p. 111.
68. Stowell, pp. 23–25.
69. Stowell, pp. 39–75.
70. Schafer, Zephaniah Kingsley, p. 229; "Deaths From November 15, 1842 to February 19, 1844: Sat., Sept. 16, 1843: In this City, Sept. 13, Zephaniah Kingsley of Fla. 77y," in Gertrude A. Barber, comp., Index to the New York Evening Post, vol. 19 (1939), p. 63.

71. Schafer, Zephaniah Kingsley, pp. 226, 293.
72. Schafer, pp. 229, 293.
73. Schafer, pp. 231, 294.
74. Schafer, p. 294. Schafer says that it is possible that, although Anna Whistler was named by her mother as a co-petitioner, she was not consulted for her consent, nor were her siblings or first cousins.
75. Schafer, pp. 233, 295. Martha (Kingsley) McNeill's "appeals to Florida's higher courts for a reversal of the decision also failed" (Schafer, pp. 233; see also p. 295n7).
76. Schafer, p. 231.
77. Schafer, pp. 232, 294n5.
78. Anna McNeill to Catherine J. McNeill, Liverpool, 22 Nov. 1829, GUL: Whistler Collection, W344; Anna McNeill to Margaret Hill, Manchester, January 14th, 1830, LC: P-W. Her brother William Gibbs McNeill expressed his disapproval: "Mother, I am sorry to say it, goes again this winter to Florida – she seems to think it her duty & I shall interfere no farther than to put my veto against that crazy craft of Uncle Kingsley's" (William G. McNeill to Joseph G. Swift, Boston, Sep<sup>r</sup>. 18th [18]31, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers).
79. Anna Whistler to General J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Sept 24, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
80. Entry for May 4: May 2; entry for May 16: May 14, AMW 1850 Diary.
81. Anna Whistler to Meg Hill, Pomfret, Wed. P.M. Oct. 8, 1851, LC: P-W, box 34.
82. Uncle Tom's Cabin, or, Life Among the Lowly (1852) is a novel by Harriet Beecher Stowe (1811–1896), an American author. It is "an account of the trials, sufferings, and innate grandeur of Uncle Tom, a Negro slave who is cruelly mistreated by a Yankee overseer named Simon Legree and finally whipped to death by him ... The background is plantation life in Kentucky and Louisiana ... [Stowe] wrote it as a contribution to the cause of abolition, but showed more fairness to the South than was generally realized. Her despicable villain is a Vermonter from her own part of the country; she vents her sharpest ridicule on a Yankee woman. On the other hand, she depicts in admiring colors the true southern gentleman and the genuine southern lady. Mrs. Stowe's primary fear was that the abolitionists would denounce her; she had always avoided approving their cause and she liked the South ... It is likely that Uncle Tom's Cabin has sold more widely than any other work of fiction ever written" (Herzberg, Readers' Encyclopedia of American Literature, p. 1167). "In 1853 the Stowes visited Europe and were received with tremendous acclaim in England" (p. 1094).

83. All quotations in this paragraph are from Anna Whistler to Catherine Cammann 17 and 28 April 1853, LC: P-W, box 34. See the introductory essay in the chapter "Slavery and Civil War" in Georgia Toutziari, "Anna Matilda Whistler's Correspondence – An Annotated Edition" (5 vols., PhD diss., University of Glasgow, 2002), vol. 3, pt. 1, pp. 600–609.
84. These quotations are taken from the following letters in GUL: Whistler Collection: Anna Whistler to James H. Gamble South Bay, Charleston, South Carolina Jan 23rd Saturday, W488; Anna Whistler to James H. Gamble South Bay Charleston Feb 4th 1858, W489; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, South Bay, Friday afternoon May 7th 1858, W491.

GEORGE WILLIAM WHISTLER (GEORGE)

George (see Images 12–13) was Whistler's eldest child, born on 9 July 1822. He was five years old when his mother, Mary Roberdeau (Swift) Whistler (see Image 10), died (9 December 1827), and nine when his father remarried (3 November 1831). He was almost twelve when his first half-brother, James (see Images 24–29), was born, and seventeen when his only biological brother, Joseph, died. He was an indifferent student.<sup>1</sup> The principal foreman at the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works, Joseph Senior Kirk of Lowell, Massachusetts, told Anna Whistler he had known George in Lowell as a lad. Little else is known of George's youth. One does not have the impression that, like other young men, he was apprenticed in his early teens to learn a trade or business. He seems to have been in poor health and assiduously tried to avoid a cold climate in winter. He may have already been suffering from the heart condition that caused his death at forty-seven, paralleling that of his father at forty-eight from the same ailment.

In May 1843, while his family was preparing to join Whistler in Russia, George, aged twenty-one, was working in the machine shop of the Proprietors of Locks and Canals in Lowell. After consulting with his father, he had “decided to remain ... [there] for a year.”<sup>2</sup> He was working a ten-hour day, like the other employees, enjoyed the work, and said it agreed with his health.<sup>3</sup> This suggests he may have previously lacked the stamina to work full-time.

In August of 1843, he had to accompany Anna Whistler, Debo, and the children (see Images 1–5; 17–19, 21; and 24–30) to England, where he found that he would be required to continue on as their protector as far as Travemünde, because there was no direct ship from London to Cronstadt (see Images 77–85).<sup>4</sup> Whistler regretted George's decision not to travel all the way to Russia with them, since he could have returned home at any time if he so desired,<sup>5</sup> and his presence “would have been a great comfort” to their bereaved family.<sup>6</sup> But George did not wish to run the risk of being unable to leave Russia so late in the season and “was anxious to return to America before the cold weather.” Alone in the United States, he had as guardians and advisors his mother's brothers,

General Joseph Gardner Swift (see Image 11) and Captain William Henry Swift.<sup>7</sup>

Immediately after arriving home, he sent news “of the possible necessity of a voyage,” astonishing his father, who did not have “the slightest knowledge or idea of his delicate health.”<sup>8</sup> The nature of this illness is never referred to by name. Whistler, hearing about it from George himself, was surprised and referred to it only as “delicate health.” Later, he was glad George had not come to Russia with the family, because the “climate would have been fatal to him.” Joseph G. Swift probably named the illness in writing to his brother, but his letter is not extant. William Swift’s reply to Joseph Swift is cryptic and ominous:

The information which [your letter] contained relative to George Whistler, I fear is ominous of his fate. I have known for some years that the disease was lurking about him, but had entertained a hope that he might outlive it. A letter which he wrote me on the day of his departure from New York seemed at the time I received it, to be the last I should ever see from him, this is an opinion of foreboding that has occurred to me more than once in my life, and more than once it has not deceived me, I hope in this case that my fears may not be realised.<sup>9</sup>

This dark response may be referring to a diagnosis of the heart condition that would eventually carry off Whistler, George, and James. It suggests George’s fear that he might die on the journey and his depression. Later in George’s life, William Swift spoke of him as having “the McNeill disease,” a reference, also cryptic, to Anna Whistler’s brother, William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31), an alcoholic. Anna Whistler’s letter to Joseph Harrison Jr. (see Image 226) when George died clarifies that, in addition to his heart condition, he had “disease of the liver of so long standing [that it] was incurable!”<sup>10</sup>

Whistler wrote George in November of 1843 that Count Kleinmikhel’ (see Image 243) would be glad to give him a job. He urged George to do all he could that winter to improve, “especially in the machine shop – and on the road,” to get practical knowledge in putting up and running an engine and to learn French, and then to come to Russia in the spring of 1844 and judge how long to stay.<sup>11</sup> With George so far away, his letters would cross with his father's, and Whistler was frustrated that George's "movements [were] in advance of the possibility of advice from [him]."<sup>12</sup> George had gone ahead with plans for a sea voyage, and Whistler was grateful that General Joseph G. Swift had intervened to arrange a protection for George from the Secretary of State.<sup>13</sup> In late November, George sailed on the Lausanne "for the Sandwich Islands, mouth of the Columbia River, Manila and Home again,"<sup>14</sup> on a cruise that was intended to last a year. In Honolulu, he found out that the Lausanne was not going to the mouth of the Columbia River, as originally scheduled, but returning immediately to the United States. As he did not wish to return home in winter, he left the Lausanne, planning to visit the various islands and come home in the summer of 1845. He considered himself quite well already.<sup>15</sup> He must have gone further afield, however, for when he arrived in the United States around March 1845, and wrote to his father from Brooklyn, the family was under the impression that he had not yet "embarked from China."<sup>16</sup> He declared himself in perfect health and suggested coming to Russia for a visit that summer.

He set about seeking employment again. He wrote his father of the possibility "of entering the navy in the new Corps of Steam Engineers." Whistler liked the idea, feeling that if George's "health will permit it – and he will pursue the course ... he will have ample field for action – it will be an important branch of service in time."<sup>17</sup> He urged George to visit the family in St. Petersburg, but only "if it would not interfere with any prospect he may have for employment," for in St. Petersburg "there would be none."<sup>18</sup> The longer Whistler worked in Russia, the more he came to feel that even if it were possible for George to receive employment there, nothing would induce him to permit his son to be employed in the servile system he himself had come to see in action and to despise.<sup>19</sup>

George left Boston on 1 June 1845,<sup>20</sup> spent a week in England, where he visited the Winstanleys, and on 25 June arrived in St. Petersburg.<sup>21</sup> He was a sponsor at two christenings: for John Bouttatz Whistler, who was born on 29 August; and for Alicia McNeill Harrison, who was born on 12 September.<sup>22</sup> George had planned "to return on 1

Sept: to take his chance for an appt in the ‘Steam Marine’.”<sup>23</sup> William Swift disapproved of the idea on the grounds that George did not have “stamina enough for the situation.”<sup>24</sup> Whistler rejoiced in his son’s visit. He was especially happy that in laying out their views before one another, George concurred “that this was no country for him.”<sup>25</sup> George may also have talked with Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick about possibilities of employment back in the United States, and Thomas DeKay Winans could have suggested his father’s firm. George did not leave Russia until 16 September, when he accompanied Aunt Alicia and Debo to England. In early October, he was in Washington.<sup>26</sup> By the beginning of December, he had taken a job in Baltimore with the firm of Ross Winans (see Image 228), “a much better place for him than the Navy,” in William Swift’s opinion.<sup>27</sup> Here he came to be regarded by Ross Winans in a few months as “most usef<sup>ul</sup>”; his employer also anticipated that he would do “well for himself.”<sup>28</sup> George said “he never was so happy ... he now really [felt] that he [was] useful.”

By mid-March of 1846, George wrote his father that he was engaged to marry a Baltimore girl named Mary Ann Ducatel (Baltimore, MD bap. 11 May 1825 – Baltimore, MD 25 February 1852).<sup>29</sup> Mary Ann Ducatel was the daughter of Julius (Jules) Timoleon Ducatel (Baltimore, MD 6 June 1796 – Baltimore, MD 23 April 1849; see Image 14) and Joanna (Barry) Ducatel (Maryland 1800 – Baltimore, MD 16 November 1873), who were married on 11 May 1824.<sup>30</sup> Her father “was educated at St. Mary’s college, and then became associated with his father, long the principal pharmacist in Baltimore.” He then studied natural sciences in Paris for several years. On returning to Baltimore, he became, firstly, professor of natural philosophy at the Mechanics’ Institute and then professor of chemistry and geology at the University of Maryland. Next he was elected to the chair of chemistry in the medical department at the University of Maryland. Eventually, he became professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology at St. John’s College in Annapolis, Maryland. He was invited in June 1838 by the Secretary of War to “attend the examination of the Cadets” at the USMA, which he accepted. He was the author of A Manual of Toxicology (1848).<sup>31</sup> Joanna (Barry) Ducatel was related to Captain James Barry (c. 1755 – 7 January 1808) and his wife Joanna Gould Barry (d. 26 October 1811). The extended Barry family were Irish immigrants; in the 1790s, four brothers – James, Robert, Garret, and Redmond – all immigrated to the United States. Joanna (Barry) Ducatel appears to be the daughter of either James Barry's brother Robert or nephew Robert. The James Barrys had been living in Lisbon, Portugal, and James Barry served as the Portuguese consul general for Maryland and Virginia from 1791. They had two daughters, Ann (d. 17 July 1808) and Mary (d. 17 November 1805), both of whom were unmarried. The Barry family was painted by American artist Gilbert Stuart (1755–1828): the portraits of the Barry daughters are now in the NGA (1954.9.3 and 1954.9.4) [National Gallery of Art, Washington, DC]; the portrait of Captain James Barry (see Image 15) is the Princeton University Art Museum (1979-52).<sup>32</sup> On 27 August 1872, Joanna (Barry) Ducatel advertised in The Sun (Baltimore) that her “large and commodious dwelling” was available “for rent.” On 16 November 1873, she died.

Apparently George assured Whistler that he and Mary would not marry until he was financially stable. Whistler “could see no reason for not yielding to his wish,”<sup>33</sup> perhaps remembering that he himself had eloped with Mary Roberdeau Swift when her father would not give his consent to their marriage. He expressed “every confidence in [George’s] not undertaking the responsibility of marrying anybody until he sees some tolerable fair prospects of providing for his happiness.” He also felt that “George’s own letters are most satisfactory proof of his good heart and head,” and indicate his “improvement and progress.” Whistler knew Mary Ducatel’s father from his own Baltimore days. Reminded by Joseph G. Swift that “Miss D. as a little girl was like Deborah,” he recalled that knowing this had made him, then a widower separated from his children, want to see the child because he missed his own young daughter.

At this time, George became embroiled in a conflict between Anna Whistler’s brother, William Gibbs McNeill, and Whistler. When Whistler was leaving Lowell, McNeill had proposed verbally that “in professional matters we were partners – the receipts for our professional services, to be a common fund to be divided equally between us,” but Whistler had intended to “do as [he] pleased, according to circumstances.”<sup>34</sup> McNeill, whose alcoholism was apparent, and who was having difficulties finding employment, was now demanding money from Whistler. He was writing, however, to George, saying “impudent things” about Whistler, and requiring George to send these letters on to Whistler, most of whose letters he refused to answer directly.<sup>35</sup> William Swift, who was handling Whistler’s financial affairs in the United States, sent McNeill three thousand dollars at Whistler’s request and intended to send him two thousand more as soon as he could “get it without sacrificing Whistler’s worth.”<sup>36</sup> George wrote McNeill a note “withdrawing certain expressions he had used in their correspondence relative to the habits of McN.” He also traveled to New York, where he discussed the subject of his and McNeill’s correspondence with McNeill’s wife, Maria (Cammann) McNeill, and became “reconciled to [her] and his cousins.”<sup>37</sup> Whether the matter of money McNeill demanded of Whistler ended here is not clear, but this episode seems to be the basis for the story that Whistler had no savings from his Russian employment because a portion of them was demanded by and given to McNeill.

In August of 1846, George raised with his father the possibility of accepting a position to go to Russia as a partner in the firm of Harrison and Winans to attend to the contract the firm had taken to lay the rails.<sup>38</sup> A competent person would be “given an interest in their establishment.”<sup>39</sup> Ross Winans felt Thomas DeKay Winans (see Image 229) would do well “to associate some good & suitable person with [him] & that of Young Whistler is the proper person – he is every way qualified to be as useful & efficant [sic] as anyone you could select & the propriety of asociating [sic] him with you in preference to anyone else you will readily perceive.”<sup>40</sup> Whistler, however, had already advised George against it.<sup>41</sup>

By April of 1847, after apparently being refused a raise, George quit his job with Ross Winans, unwilling to adhere to the usual practice of a long apprenticeship for reputation’s sake rather than for money.<sup>42</sup> His father did not think he had served there long enough “to make his compensation a matter of so much importance.” Whistler had been hoping, too, that George would adhere “to the plan of becoming a mechanical Engineer.” He understood that George’s wish to marry Mary Ducatel had precipitated his impatient decision.<sup>43</sup> William Swift, exasperated by George’s “fickleness” in holding down a job, assessed him as having “a radical and serious defect in his character, he is infirm of purpose, and a weathercock should form the crest in his coat of arms.”<sup>44</sup>

Seeking employment yet again, George had an opportunity in a machine shop in Charlotte, North Carolina, where it seemed he might be a partner, if he could supply ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Whistler, however, could not give him such a sum “without taking all that he [had] saved.”<sup>45</sup> Furthermore, William Swift did “not think George capable of managing such an establishment” in the South, although he felt that “North Carolina [was] a much better climate for [George] than New York.”<sup>46</sup> George, therefore, may have had prospects in New York as well.<sup>47</sup> Perhaps McNeill, who had found employment with the Erie Railroad by October 1846,<sup>48</sup> had proposed it, now that they were reconciled. The extant correspondence of his uncles and his father does not reflect how he was employed for the next two years, beginning April 1847.

On 20 June 1848, George Whistler and Mary Ducatel were married in Baltimore in the Basilica of the Assumption. There seem to be no extant letters from them or others about their wedding or their married life in the 1840s.<sup>49</sup> The Whistlers received some news of them through Joseph and William Swift. Anna Whistler was cheered to hear of “George’s improved spirits and health,” feeling “quite sure he must be happy with such a sweet companion as Mary is described to be.”<sup>50</sup> When Whistler died, Anna Whistler wrote George and Mary a moving account of his last moments. Mary’s father, Dr. Julius Ducatel, had also recently died.<sup>51</sup> Overwhelmed by the correspondence she had to conduct, Anna Whistler asked Mary to inform Martha (Kingsley) McNeill at Stonington of Whistler’s death.<sup>52</sup> When she and the boys arrived back in America, James was the first to meet Mary.<sup>53</sup>

In tribute to Whistler, Harrison wrote to William Swift and to George, offering “to advance thousands for George,” now about twenty-seven years old, to help him establish himself.<sup>54</sup> Anna Whistler, though grateful and not knowing how they would respond to the offer, stated her opposition, feeling that “pecuniary debts . . . seldom cement friendships.” She wished Whistler’s sons to shrink from debt, as had their father. She felt George would “be wise to be frugal & steadily to pursue the beaten track of engineering,” gradually rising “thro his own perseverance in his profession” and “by his own industry win[ning] the confidence of the public.”<sup>55</sup> She informed Harrison that “George had a new appointment which will enable him to support himself & wife, he will be on the Erie railroad.” He would be happy because he would see many of his cousins, who were also employed on that railroad. He would leave Baltimore early in July for New York, which was to be his headquarters, and receive a salary of $1200 per annum. He would be able to “take his wife with him sometimes & sometimes leave her in New Haven” with Anna Whistler, if she should settle there.

George accepted his appointment in New York City.<sup>56</sup> His summer quarters were to be Binghamton, New York.<sup>57</sup> He asked to be given his father’s professional papers.<sup>58</sup> Although he must have been grateful for Harrison’s offer, he was remiss in writing to acknowledge his gratitude, and there is no evidence that he ever did. Anna Whistler found George “looking thinner than I ever saw him, but . . . not feeling ill now.”<sup>59</sup> She assured Harrison that George had been “prevented answering your very friendly letter by illness, & by business, the packing up & removal to a new post of duty,” which were “as much as he could possibly accomplish then.”

George’s uncles Swift were exasperated with him, but rightly left his father to be the decision-maker about the professional path he should take. McNeill considered him “a silly boy.”<sup>60</sup> Whistler, who was more easygoing, was nevertheless adamant about what employment George should not take.

In August 1849, Whistler’s remains were lying in a vault in Boston. When it came to the matter of the resting place for them, George behaved in an indelicate manner. Anna Whistler wanted her husband buried in Stonington Cemetery, which she said was also Whistler’s wish. George wanted his father buried in Green-Wood Cemetery in Brooklyn, where Whistler’s first wife was buried. Joseph and William Swift both felt it was Anna Whistler’s right to make this decision, and George had no right “to say or do [anything] in the matter.” Both wrote him their opinion, Joseph Swift stating his far more plainly than did William Swift. Whistler was buried in Stonington Cemetery. George’s desire that a monument to his father be erected in Green-Wood Cemetery was eventually realized.<sup>61</sup>

The entire family loved George. On their arrival in St. Petersburg, all praised him liberally for his care of them during the journey to Travemünde, and Whistler humorously related what an authority on everything George was in James's and Willie's estimation.<sup>62</sup> To Anna Whistler, he was "my loved George" and "my own George." She was totally devoted to him. Feeling she was "painfully situated" in the conflict between her brother William and George in 1846, she stood firmly with George. The three years she had so far been in Russia had confirmed her "fears for my dear but erring brother."<sup>63</sup> She was "thankful dear George does not yield where principal must be upheld." On returning to America, she "found in George a comforter & adviser,"<sup>64</sup> whose views were much like his father's. She thanked God that she had "yet a George Whistler to aid me in strengthening & elevating the principles of my boys." Writing Joseph Harrison Jr., she was "too hurried to write half I feel this eldest brother merits – but as you were never deceived in his father, so may you find in him much to win your esteem & confidence for his own sake, as for attachment to the dear departed."

* * *

The presentation of George's biography in the diaries differs from that of the other family members. George was actually present with his family on only two occasions: accompanying them from Boston to Travemünde in 1843, and visiting them in St. Petersburg from June through August of 1845. All other references are to his life away from them. The last mention of him is in the entry for Saturday, 30 January 1847. His letters for this period are not extant. There seems to be only one extant letter from his father to him, written in November 1843, chiding him for his careless handling of business and financial matters.<sup>65</sup> References to him are sometimes second-hand, relayed to Joseph Swift by Whistler from letters George wrote to Whistler. Other references are first-hand, from reports by William Swift to Joseph Swift, after seeing and speaking with George. William Swift's and Whistler's letters to Joseph Swift are the most extensive source of George's life in the 1840s. Few of Joseph Swift's letters to William Swift are extant, but sometimes his opinions are revealed through William's responses to them. Anna Whistler supplies detailed information about George's life in the summer of 1849 in her letters to Harrison at that time. These rather sparse sources nevertheless enable us to create a revealing biography of George William Whistler.

NOTES

1. "George does not love his Book" (Sarah D. Adams to Gen. J.G. Swift, New London, April 12, 1830, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers).
2. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, May 13, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
3. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, May 13, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. P., May 2/14, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers.
4. Deborah Whistler and Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 6th, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
5. Major G.W. Whistler to George W. Whistler, St. Petersburg, November 3, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
6. This and the following quotation in this paragraph are from Deborah Whistler and Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 6, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
7. A silhouette was made by Auguste Edouart of Captain William Henry Swift at Saratoga Springs, New York, on 14 July 1842, of which it has not been possible to locate an image (Jackson, Ancestors in Silhouette, p. 225).
8. This and the following quotation are from Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan<sup>y</sup> 18, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
9. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Lockport, Illinois, December 24, 1843, in response to the news of George Whistler's illness communicated to him by J.G. Swift on November 14, 1843 (letter not extant), NYPL: Swift Papers.
10. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, London, 5 February 1870, LC: P-W.
11. Major George W. Whistler to George Wm. Whistler, St. Petersburg, November 3, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
12. Major George Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan<sup>y</sup> 18, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
13. Major George Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Jan<sup>y</sup> 18, 1844.
14. NAUS: Passports, M1371, roll 2, passport no. 1737.
15. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, entry of November 5 in letter of October 28, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.

16. Entry for Tuesday. April 1st [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. George's letter is not extant.
17. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 26, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
18. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 26, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers; Letters from Wm. Henry Swift to his brother, Gen. Joseph G. Swift, Washington, May 20, 1845, W. Henry Swift, Correspondence 1820–1857, C231, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers.
19. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 26, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers; IGI.
20. M1372: Passport Applications, 1795–1905, roll 16, application no. 292, NAUS.
21. Entry for June 28th [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
22. PREC STP, no. 5650, p. 328, and no. 5558, p. 329.
23. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, August 23, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers; Letters from Wm. Henry Swift to his brother, Gen. Joseph G. Swift, Washington, May 20, 1845, W. Henry Swift, Correspondence 1820–1857, C231, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers.
24. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, August 23, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
25. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
26. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, October 21, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
27. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, December 1, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
28. This and the following quotation are from Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
29. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Lockport, Ill., April 26, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers; IGI.
30. The Sun (Baltimore, MD), Tuesday, November 18, 1873, p. 2; Ducatel Family Bible Marriages; Basilica of the Assumption [Baltimore, MD] Baptismal Records.

31. Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography, ed. James Grant Wilson and John Fiske, 6 vols. (New York: D. Appleton, 1900), s.v. "Ducatel, Julius Timoleon"; IGI.
32. Allen C. Clark, "Captain James Barry," Records of the Columbia Historical Society, 42–43 (1940–1941), pp. 1–16; "Appointments of Vice-Consuls for Portugal, 26 April 1791 –6 July 1791," NAUS website, accessed 2 February 2022, <https://founders.archives.gov/documents/Jefferson/01-20-02-0072>; "George Worthen Whistler: Biography," National Gallery of Art, accessed 2 February 2022, <https://www.nga.gov/collection/provenance-info.11108.html#biography> ; IGI.
33. This and the rest of the quotations in this paragraph are from Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
34. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, Springfield, February 15, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers. A further letter from Whistler indicates that he and McNeill became reconciled (George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, Springfield, May 29, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers).
35. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, May 26, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers; [Washington], May 28, 1846; Washington, June 15, 1846; Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, July 21, 1846.
36. This and the following quotation are from Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, June 15, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
37. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, July 21, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
38. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, September 10, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
39. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, Sept. 3, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
40. Ross Winans to Thomas Winans, Baltimore, October 13, 1846, Winans Papers, H. Furlong Baldwin Library, Maryland Historical Society (MdHS), Baltimore (hereafter MdHS: Winans Papers), MS 916, box 2, fol. 32. Whistler had suggested someone named Mathews, but Ross Winans wanted Thomas to take what he was suggesting into consideration.
41. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, November 19, 1846 [no place given], NYPL: Swift Papers.

42. This and the following two quotations are from Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 8/20, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
43. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, May 20, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
44. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, February 20, 1847 [no place given], NYPL: Swift Papers.
45. This and the following quotation are from Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Washington, June 6, 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
46. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, February 20, 1847 [no place given], NYPL: Swift Papers.
47. Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, February 20, 1847 [no place given], NYPL: Swift Papers.
48. William H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, October 5, 1846 [no place given], NYPL: Swift Papers.<sup>5</sup>
49. On 18 June 1851, George and Mary became the parents of a son, George Worthen Whistler. See Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Pomfret tues night February 10 [1852] and Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Pomfret 3 March 1852, LC: P-W, box 34. For details of George William Whistler's life after the 1840s, see the biographies of the Winans family in Appendix E (hereafter Winans).
50. Joint letter of Major George W. Whistler, St. Petersburg, Jan'y 31 / Feb. 12, 1849 and Anna Whistler, Monday 2nd April / 21st March [1849] In St. P., to General J.G. Swift, NYPL: Swift Papers.
51. ["Ducatel Street"], The Sun (Baltimore, MD), Sunday, April 24, 1949. This was the 39th in a series of articles on Baltimore street names. It was written 100 years after the death of Dr. Julius Ducatel.
52. Mary (Ducatel) Whistler to grandmother, Baltimore, May 11, 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W960.
53. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., Stonington. Monday Aug. 13 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
54. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., [London], 62 Sloane St., June 19, 1849, LC: P-W, box 34. All quotations and all information in this paragraph are taken from this letter, except where otherwise indicated.

55. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., [London], Monday, June 25, [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
56. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., [London], Monday, June 25, [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
57. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Stonington, Monday, Aug. 13 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
58. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr. Saturday evening. Preston. July 7, 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
59. This and the rest of the quotations in this paragraph are from Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., Stonington. Monday Aug 13 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
60. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, July 26, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
61. The quotation and all information in this paragraph come from Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Philadelphia, September 5, 1849, NYPL: Swift Papers.
62. Major George W. Whistler to George Wm. Whistler, St. Petersburg, Nov. 3, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
63. This and the following quotation are from Anna Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Sept. 24, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
64. This and the following quotation in this paragraph are from Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Stonington, Monday, Aug. 13 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34.
65. Major George W. Whistler to George Wm. Whistler, St. Petersburg, Nov. 3, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.

DEBORAH DELANO (WHISTLER) HADEN (DEBO)

Debo (see Images 17–19, 21) was Whistler's youngest child from his first marriage, born on 24 October 1825. She was approximately two years and two-and-a-half months old when her mother, Mary Roberdeau (Swift) Whistler (see Image 10), died, and six when her father remarried.

Anna Whistler's diaries and the correspondence of both family and friends reflect a long-term conflict between her and her step-daughter before the latter's marriage, and a strong possessiveness on the part of Major Whistler (see Image 7–8, 21) toward his only daughter. Captain William Henry Swift, his brother-in-law, said he had "reason to know" that there was "a great difference in the treatment of Debo when W is at home and when he is absent."<sup>1</sup> Although he encouraged Whistler to remain in Russia alone to save money, he also rejoiced in the decision for the family to join Whistler, because he felt all would be right once Debo was "near her father."<sup>2</sup> While he did not think the relationship between a step-mother and step-daughter need be troubled, he regretfully saw Anna Whistler (see Image 1–5) as the stereotypical unloving step-mother.<sup>3</sup> One has to keep in mind that Debo was his dead sister's child. Anna Whistler was not unloving; she simply wanted to create a pious young woman, rather in her own image.

In addition, both parents seemed to feel "it better that [Debo] should be imured everlastingly within the precincts of her own house."<sup>4</sup> This was true even in Russia. When Debo returned to St. Petersburg in October 1846 after a year's absence in England, the blunt Maxwell made a devastating comment on the loss of freedom she re-experienced in her parents' home. Asking Major Whistler "not [to] be offended at so poor a similitude," he wrote that she seemed to him "now, like a singing bird shut up in a cage of wire."<sup>5</sup>

Maxwell described her as not precisely pretty, "nor such as one would fall in love with at first sight, but ... possess[ing] the severe and classic beauty seen in the Grecian models."<sup>6</sup> She had no "equal in polite requirement" and was diligent in her studies. He admired her heartily for having "every mental quality that can command esteem." While not finding her "coquettish, malicious or vain," he characterized her as “capricious haughty and witty.”<sup>7</sup> George Henry Prince said she was graceful.<sup>8</sup> She was accomplished on the harp and piano and also sang. She devoted her time in Russia to practicing and performing; to the study of German, which in a year she “[spoke] tolerably well”;<sup>9</sup> and to teaching James and Willie (see Images 24–30). Her French was excellent.

She generally was the pianist at any gathering that included dancing, but at the Laws’ last soir ee before Lent in 1844, to which she went accompanied only by her father, she “found it pleasant dancing.”<sup>10</sup> Anna Whistler hoped that Debo would never “yield to fondness for dancing at the expense of what [Anna Whistler] conceived to be decorous.”<sup>11</sup> When Debo would decline to dance, it won the approval of Anna Whistler, whose “heart [was] pained when [their] views were opposite.”<sup>12</sup> She “so yearn[ed] for sympathy from Debo, that [she was] willing when there [was] no glaring folly to meet her more than half way.”<sup>13</sup> She “love[d] to watch how unassuming [Debo was] compared to other young ladies.”<sup>14</sup> She wished Debo to be one of that small band of Christ’s followers who stand as an example to those in error to lead them “into the way of truth.”<sup>15</sup> She appreciated their spontaneous musical evenings at home, but did not want Debo to practice all morning in order to perform in the evening. Music could be a snare, and such excess only served self-aggrandizement. She thought Debo would be “much more happy ... if she found no pleasure”<sup>16</sup> in the theater or opera. She objected when Debo attended a concert by Clara Schumann (see Image 199) during Lent, because it was not “consistent with a communicant” of the Episcopalian Church “to give countenance to theatres,”<sup>17</sup> especially in that season. Quite ignoring her step-daughter’s love of music and her expertise, she objected also because Debo had already heard Schumann play recently.

But Debo, though devoted to Anna Whistler, would not obey and did not want to be the kind of Christian her step-mother was. She resisted Anna Whistler’s wish to acquaint her with the sainted invalid, Mary Gent Hirst, “whose cheerfulness would render religion captivating to a young person,”<sup>18</sup> and, for some reason, many years later did not want to visit the Gellibrands (see Images 265–266), who were then living in England.<sup>19</sup> Anna Whistler, however, continued to hope to influence her, regretting, for example, that Debo was not with her when she met the pious young Bessie and Mary Smith at Chaddock Hall (see Image 467) in 1847. But, unbeknownst to her, someone was matchmaking Debo and Francis Seymour Haden (see Image 20) at that moment. After Debo had children, she instituted family prayers, and, when Anna Whistler visited her in London, proposed sacred music in the evening to please her.<sup>20</sup>

Debo was an eligible eighteen when she went to Russia (where she was also called “Dasha”). The Whistlers’ life until after Christmas 1843 was relatively isolated. The diary for 1844, however, shows that the young bachelors quickly responded to her, but her parents responded equally quickly to them. Well before his daughter came to Russia, Major Whistler had revealed to Maxwell the simple condition under which she might marry tomorrow with his consent: if she chose a young officer “who wears the uniform of our gallant little army.”<sup>21</sup>

Maxwell had the advantage over other young men, because he lived in the Whistler home and saw Debo almost every day. Perhaps for that very reason he seemed to forget the Major’s requirement for a fiancé for his daughter. He wrote his mother, coyly suggesting a flowering relationship with Debo. He asked that it be kept a secret,<sup>22</sup> but his family must have betrayed him because the rumors were reported to Whistler by General Joseph G. Swift (see Image 11), to whom he replied: “we know of no matrimonial project in our family . . . we live quite as retired as we ever did in our lives, so whatever noise Debo’s music has made, is confined to ourselves.”<sup>23</sup> And blind to his daughter’s possible matrimonial longings, he trusted he would “bring Debo home quite safe.”

It is possible also that Debo did not want Maxwell as a suitor. His letters show him to have been rather a popinjay. Despite his intimacy with the family, she always responded to his invitations by saying she would only go if her mother went. When she read his book, The Czar, His Court and People, in 1848, she rightly judged “some parts [to be] written in rather bad taste.”<sup>24</sup>

Maxwell gave up but recorded another suitor’s attempts. William Bonamy Maingay (see Image 260), brother of Debo’s best friend, Emma Maingay (see Image 263), was in May of 1844 “making love with all his might and mind to Miss W, and judging from the intimacy between this lady and his sister,” Maxwell thought him “in a fair way to succeed.”<sup>25</sup> Meeting “this new pretender” then for the first time, Maxwell “soon saw ... and heard ... that he made great headway.” While believing that Major Whistler did not like Maingay at all, Maxwell felt that “the objections to him [were] trifling.” But despite his predictions of Maingay’s success in making an impression on Debo “through his personal and agreeable accomplishments,” this courtship, too, did not succeed. Because of the friendship between the two families, however, he continued to be a frequent guest at the Whistlers, often the bearer of letters from his sister, after the Maingays returned permanently to England.

The good-tempered and frank William Miller, a Scottish merchant approaching twice Debo’s age, who was as well honorary British vice-consul in St. Petersburg, was a suitor in the summer of 1844. The early period of his courtship, covered in the diaries, shows the poor bachelor building up his courage. It is also a clear instance of Anna Whistler working against a potential suitor, as she recorded her conversations with Miller in great detail. He first appears in the diary entry for Friday, 7 June 1844, when he brought to tea at the Whistlers’ dacha Timothy Abraham Curtis, a former banker, who was “willing to ride this far any time to listen to Debo’s piano or harp.”<sup>26</sup> Generally, Miller visited on weekdays, but he came by again on Sunday, 10 June, this time after ten o’clock in the evening in deference to Anna Whistler’s wish that no one intrude on their Sunday. He tried to make a good impression by recounting that he had spent the Sunday at church and done a kind deed, after which, the day on the wane, he had come to Francis and Dorothea Baird’s dacha for dinner and thence to the Whistlers, ostensibly because he was bearing an invitation from Mr. Curtis. On Saturday, 19 June, when he brought Sir William Allan (see Image 320) with him to tea, Miller showed his interest in Debo quite openly. He exhibited a moment’s dissatisfaction when a note from Mrs. Ropes took her away from the tea table. While she was playing the piano for Allan, Miller confessed to Anna Whistler his “desire to see [them] all so very much” that he could not “overcome it even on Sunday.”<sup>27</sup> She laughingly rebuffed his wish to come out some Sunday and walk with Major Whistler, to whom he thought the observance mattered less. Next, he proposed to take her and Debo for a drive in his phaeton. As the Major was away, the proposal was parried with the excuse that they “were obliged to use the Majors horses every day to keep them in order against his return.” Anna Whistler stated frankly in the diary entry her concern lest a particular significance be attached to their being seen out driving with an eligible bachelor. Miller continued to make visits. He came to tea on Wednesday, 17 July 1844, and to lunch–dinner on Wednesday, 21 August 1844. In September 1844, George Henry Prince recorded in his journal the plight of any man interested in Debo: “Miss W is a belle But Mr. Maxwell and I know pretty well how the wind blows – the matter has been discussed by us in secret.”<sup>28</sup> Because of the gap in the diaries from September 1844 to March 1845, we do not know whether Miller visited the Whistlers in that period nor whether any other suitors appeared.

In June 1845, Miller returned from a trip to Scotland laden with gifts for the Whistlers ordered by Alicia McNeill (see Image 39), with whom he had become friends in the summer of 1844 in St. Petersburg. He even slipped in a gift for Debo from himself. He seemed at ease, inviting himself to dinner one Saturday and managing to intrude successfully on their Sabbath. Although he had said in his note that he would not outstay his welcome, because he was busy that evening, he changed his plans. He drove Debo to Elagin Island (see Image 409), accompanied by Major Whistler and “mademoiselle,” their governess. Anna Whistler was in an advanced state of pregnancy and did not go. After the ride, he stayed to tea. He remained until after ten o’clock and went home only when Anna Whistler hinted he should by leaving the room and going to bed. All of his behavior that day was very forward, and perhaps he had made progress in those unrecorded months. Still, he, too, was not successful.

The climate of St. Petersburg did not agree with young foreign females. Debo’s health began gradually to decline, and “the Doctors advised that she ... leave ... for a time.”<sup>29</sup> In September 1845, she departed St. Petersburg in the company of her brother, George (see Images 12–13), and Aunt Alicia (see Image 39), bound, like her step-mother before her, for a long stay with the Winstanleys in Preston, and with friends in and near London. Separated from her parents, she was free to be introduced to eligible bachelors with less impediment. It is said she met her future husband, Francis Seymour Haden, at the Winstanleys.<sup>30</sup> Another source specifies that she met him through the Chapmans<sup>31</sup> of Preston, who were friends of the Winstanleys.

There is also evidence that after her return to St. Petersburg in October 1846, there was a Russian suitor, an unidentified army officer, with whom she was purported in 1847 to have “just had a love affair.”<sup>32</sup> It is possible that she had rebuffed his advances, but, whether they appealed to her or not, we must conjecture that Major Whistler may have complained to the authorities, although such an act seems inappropriate for him, given his character. But it had come to their attention somehow, because the officer had been punished by being “sent off to Archangel.”<sup>33</sup> As it was generally customary to send a disgraced person off to his family property when depriving him of permission to reside in the capital, the suitor may have been Captain Petr Petrovich Klokov, who was born in Archangel and had a family home there. Klokov, a bachelor, was Major Whistler’s aide, spoke English, and frequented their home.<sup>34</sup> The Bliss family of Springfield, Massachusetts, who were touring Europe and made a brief visit to the Whistlers in May 1847, learned of the unhappy consequences. They invited Debo, a great friend of their daughter, Sarah, and loved by all their family, to travel with them for the summer “through Switzerland to Paris, and thence to England,”<sup>35</sup> which explains why she left St. Petersburg so suddenly. This must later have seemed providential to Anna Whistler, who viewed Debo’s departures and canceled departures from St. Petersburg in that light, because as a result Francis Seymour Haden proposed to her that very summer.

The successful suitor, Francis Seymour Haden, called Seymour, seemed the ideal choice for her. He was not only a physician but “a talented draftsman ... having attended a government art training school while studying medicine at the Sorbonne in Paris.” On “completion of his medical studies,” he had “traveled through Italy and Switzerland ... from February to August, 1844,” going on “regular sketching expeditions.” He had made etchings of some of his sketches when back in London. Starting in 1845, he had begun to collect etchings, particularly “in the area of seventeenth-century Dutch etching,” accumulating Rembrandt’s work especially, and “in the mid to late 1840s ... began [a] serious study of Rembrandt etchings.” After his marriage to Deborah

Delano Whistler, and while James lived with them in London, he took charge of the latter's schooling and art education, started him off as an art collector as well as criticizing his artistic efforts, and stopped just short of attempting to mold his character.<sup>36</sup>

Anna Whistler's and Haden's letters to Major Whistler received a surprised, anguished, and somewhat raving response from him.<sup>37</sup> He wanted his daughter to come back to him just for the winter and then to marry, but he left the decision to his wife. Because Ann (Ormerod) Haden, the recent wife of Seymour Haden's uncle John, had fostered the relationship between Debo and Seymour, and because Seymour was the nephew of the Whistlers' close friends in Lowell, Massachusetts, Anne (Haden) and Kirk Boott (see Image 43), Anna Whistler yielded to his wish to marry immediately. Perhaps the recent unhappy love affair with the Russian suitor also persuaded her to finally choose Debo's happiness over Whistler's. The unhappy Major Whistler, in requesting the emperor's permission to go to England, gave as his reason not the marriage of his daughter but the illness of his sons, that might require leaving them in England.<sup>38</sup> Already irritated by the letters of the young man whose precipitous proposal had disturbed his tranquility, he took a dislike to Seymour in the few hours of their acquaintance<sup>39</sup> and was unwell during the marriage celebration. The diaries reveal how he avoided making a toast to the newlyweds. From then on, he never responded to Debo's letters to him and Anna Whistler. In August of 1848, the pregnant Debo visited Anna Whistler and the boys on the Isle of Wight. James was left in London in September in the charge of Debo and Seymour, while his mother and Willie returned to St. Petersburg. On December 14, the Hadens' first child was born, a daughter, whom they named Annie (Major Whistler's name for Anna Whistler) (see Images 18–19). "Just before his death," Major Whistler broke his silence and "by a great effort, wrote a note to his daughter full of kindness," which was "a great consolation to [her]."<sup>40</sup> When Anna Whistler broke up housekeeping in St. Petersburg, plans were made to send the piano to Debo, as it was for her that her father had bought it.<sup>41</sup> Dessain's portrait of James and Willie (see Image 27) was being taken to England "to be a comfort to her" when they should all leave her to return to America,<sup>42</sup> for Anna Whistler felt she could not settle in England with the boys out of deference to her husband's wish that they be educated in their native land.<sup>43</sup>

The friction between Anna Whistler and Debo disappeared with the latter's marriage. They remained close until Anna Whistler's death, even meeting in the homes of mutual friends, such as Tom and Eliza (Stevenson) Smith, after the rift between Seymour and James occurred.<sup>44</sup>

Many years later, Emma Palmer was very careful about what she copied from the diaries for the Pennells about Debo's marriage: "Lady Haden ... of course would not want to be put in [the Whistler biography], as it is written of her then; even the account of her wedding ... I carefully refrained from copying any but the most trivial parts, as I was not sure they would like it."<sup>45</sup>

* * *

Debo's biography in the diaries concludes with the anticipation of the birth of the Hadens' first child in December 1848 (her pregnancy is referred to so obliquely that the reader cannot easily guess). The birth is not recorded, because the diaries stop in September of that year. Of all the Whistler family members, Debo's biography for this period is the only one that relies extensively on the diaries and also the Maxwell Papers at the New York Public Library.

NOTES

1. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Springfield, Nov. 4, 1842, NYPL: Swift Papers.
2. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Washington, April 19, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
3. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Springfield, Nov. 4, 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers. In this letter, he asked whether it was “not among the possibilities that a woman should feel towards a child as a parent should feel even if she be not the mother?” He knew it was possible, because since his first wife’s death their daughter, Mary, had been brought up lovingly in the Bliss family in Springfield, Massachusetts.
4. Wm. H. Swift to Joseph G. Swift, Springfield, December 12, 1841, NYPL: Swift Papers. In the instance cited here, it was more difficult to persuade Major Whistler than Anna Whistler to permit Debo to go on a visit to New London.
5. John S. Maxwell to George W. Whistler, New York. Monday December 13, 1846, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers. This image was used about her by her uncle, Wm. H. Swift, as well (Wm. H. Swift to Gen. J.G. Swift, Springfield, December 12, 1841, NYPL: Swift Papers).
6. This and the quotations in the following two sentences are from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 32.
7. See also earlier comments about Debo in John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23 (Note 29 in the biography of Anna McNeill Whistler in the 1840s in this chapter).
8. Entry of Saturday, September 21, 1844, in George Henry Prince’s journal, in Edward A. Raymond and Col. Eugene Prince, “Whistler Had a Father, Too,” My Country 8, no. 2 [May–June 1974]: p. 13. Except for the few entries in this article, the whereabouts of George Henry Prince’s journal are unknown to me. As S. Hardy Prince of Beverley, Massachusetts, the family member in charge of family archives, died recently (2018), efforts are being made by his successor to determine whether the journal is in these archives.
9. Major George W. Whistler to Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 28, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
10. Entry for [Wednesday] Feb 14th 1844, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

11. Entry for August 1st Thursday [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
12. Entry for August 1st Thursday [1844].
13. Entry for Friday 2nd May [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
14. Entry for Thursday [August] 15th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
15. Entry for [Wednesday] Feb 14th 1844, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
16. Entry for [Wednesday] Feb 14th 1844.
17. Entry for March 29th friday evening [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
18. Entry for Tuesday night April 22nd [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
19. Telling Debo in 1866 that she had “promised to spend a week ... at Albyns,” Anna Whistler added, “I know you would not go there” (Anna Whistler to Deborah Haden, Coblenz, 24 January 1866, GUL: Whistler Collection, W522).
20. When Anna Whistler came to live permanently in London, she was pleased that Debo’s children’s “Sunday night exercises [were] bible & sacred music” (Anna Whistler to James H. Gamble, 10–11 February 1864, GUL: Whistler Collection, W516).
21. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 2/14, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 12.
22. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Dec. 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 26.
23. This and the following quotation are from George W. Whistler to Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, October 28, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
24. James Whistler to George Washington Whistler, 62 Sloane St (1849) Friday even. Jan. 26, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
25. All quotations in this paragraph are from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of May 27 in the letter of May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35.
26. Entry for Monday 10th June [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
27. This and the following quotation are from the entry for Monday July 1st [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
28. Raymond and Prince, “Whistler,” p. 13.

29. Major George W. Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, December 19, 1845, NYPL: Swift Papers.
30. Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, p. 182; Pennell and Pennell, Life of Whistler, vol. 1, p. 22.
31. Whistler scholar Richard S. Schneidermann says that she and Haden met in 1846 (Richard S. Schneidermann, “Sir Francis Seymour Haden A Reassessment of His Etchings and Water Colors” (master’s thesis, University of Cincinnati, 1973), p. 89). See Pennell and Pennell, Life of Whistler, vol. 1, p. 22.
32. Typed copy of his autobiography to 1876, Papers, 1846–1897, MSS Collection (BV Bliss, George); N-YHS Library (hereafter, N-YHS: Bliss Papers), vol. 1, fol. 39. George Bliss (the son) only began to write his autobiography in 1896, many years after this event, but there is no reason to doubt his story (vol. 1, fol. 251). It is referred to so guardedly in Anna Whistler’s letter of 10 June 1847 that without George Bliss’s reference one would never guess the background to her comments (Anna Whistler to George Washington Whistler, Esq. [envelope], “Staat Hamburg” Lubec June 10, 1847, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353).
33. Anna Whistler to George Washington Whistler, Esq. [envelope], “Staat Hamburg” Lubec June 10, 1847, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353.
34. See the biography of Petr Petrovich Klovov in Appendix E (hereafter, Klovov).
35. N-YHS: Bliss Papers, vol. 1, fol. 39.
36. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, In the drawing room, with Willie on sofa Friday 22nd Dec 1848, entry of 1 Jan New Years day, N.S. 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W374; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Sunday night Nov. 5th 1848, W367; James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even: 26. Jan. 1849, W661; James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St, entry of Monday 19 [March] within letter of Saturday 17 March 1849, W386; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [St. Petersburg, December 25, 1848], W376; Deborah (Whistler) Haden to James Whistler [London, July 28, 1849], H10. See also Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison [London] Monday. June 25 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34, and Katherine A. Lochnan, The Etchings of James Whistler (New Haven and London: Yale University Press in association with the Art Gallery of Ontario, 1984), pp. 3–7, passim.

37. George Washington Whistler to Anna Whistler, Moscow Sep<sup>t</sup> 17th 1847, NYPL: Swift Papers.
38. “Miss Debra Whistler was married on the 16th of this month which was the cause of Mr. W visiting England” (A.M. Eastwick to E.P. Eastwick, Alexandroffsky Head Mechanical Works St. Petersburg October 17/29th 1847 Friday, Eastwick Papers); RGIA: Fond 219, op.1, d. 11. Ob otpuske Vistlera za granitsu i o ego smerti [File concerning permission for Whistler to go abroad on leave and his death], Kleinmikhel’ to Whistler, 16 March (OS) 1849.
39. James Whistler said later that his father disliked Haden instantly and he himself thought Haden was “just like a schoolmaster” (Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, pp. 182, 253, 254). For Christmas 1848, Major Whistler told Willie “he might send a roll of music to Sis for her Christmas present from her little brother,” selecting it himself but calling it Willie’s gift (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Nov. 27th 1848. 4 o'clock Monday afternoon, GUL: Whistler Collection, W369). Years later, Anna Whistler explained to Debo that Whistler did not write to her “not from lessened love . . . but from delicacy to her, as he could never mention her husband in [his letters]” (Anna Whistler to Deborah Haden, London, 14 December [1867], GUL: Whistler Collection, W535).
40. James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London, May 9th 1849, GUL: Laver Papers. Francis accurately pointed out: “I suppose he did not wish her to marry out of the United States.”
41. William Whistler to James Whistler. S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
42. William Whistler to James Whistler. S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849.
43. Emma W. Palmer to Mrs. Pennell, Extract from a letter dated Alexandroffsky, May 14th 1849, LC: P-W, box 296. The writer is Anna Whistler; the addressee is not identified, but it is not James Whistler.
44. Both Seymour and James were known for their violent tempers. In 1864, Seymour “maligned his former medical partner, James Traer [1833–1867], who had been a good friend to [James] and Anna [Whistler].” This caused James to publicly call Seymour “a scoundrel and hypocrit,” and then, during a chance encounter in a [Paris] café,” to knock him through a plate glass window.

Seymour, in turn, had James expelled from a gentlemen's club of which they were both members. Friends and family were drawn into the fray. The upshot was that Seymour forbade any Whistler entry to his home. Anna Whistler and Debo, however, eventually took up meeting secretly in the homes of such mutual friends as Tom and Eliza (Stevenson) Smith (Daniel E. Sutherland and Georgia Toutziari, Whistler's Mother: Portrait of an Extraordinary Life [New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2018], pp. 143–144).

45. Emma W. Palmer to Mrs. Pennell, Stonington, Aug. 28th 1906, LC: P-W, box 296.

JAMES ABBOTT WHISTLER (JEMIE)

James Whistler (see Images 24–29), the child and adolescent, nine to fourteen years old, suffered from poor health. In July of 1843, when Anna Whistler (see Images 1–5) was attending a wedding in Geneva, New York, she received the news that James, left in Stonington, was close to death, this on the eve of their departure for St. Petersburg.<sup>1</sup> He had had an attack of rheumatic fever. In St. Petersburg, he battled many colds and sometimes made himself sick by foolishly getting wet in winter. But rheumatic fever was his personal scourge. The pain of an attack was excruciating. It caused a nervous irritability, which weakened him,<sup>2</sup> and “however he [might] suffer pain ... his nervous debility magnified it.”<sup>3</sup> He would become hysterical. Even when it was alleviated, he “could not be touched without screaming for days after.”<sup>4</sup> In April 1844, he had a brief attack that made Anna Whistler think there was going to be a repeat of July 1843.<sup>5</sup> He did in fact have two further serious bouts of rheumatic fever in St. Petersburg. In 1847, it confined him to his bed for nine weeks. In 1848, he had had it for a month when the cholera outbreak created a further danger.<sup>6</sup> In 1843, the sea voyage to Russia improved his health;<sup>7</sup> in 1847, the sea air of Scarborough (see Image 463) and jaunts in rural Lancashire (see Images 462, 465–466) restored him to health again;<sup>8</sup> in 1848, despite the sea air of the Isle of Wight (see Images 489–496), he remained frail. His failure to fully recover prompted Anna Whistler’s decision to leave him in England. Consideration for his delicate health was always paramount.

He was beautiful to look at.<sup>9</sup> Maxwell was struck by the beauty of both James and Willie (see Images 24–30) on first seeing them at the customs house in St. Petersburg.<sup>10</sup> Dessain’s portrait of them confirms this assessment (see Image 27).<sup>11</sup> Others reacted only to James, perhaps because of the vivacity that accompanied his beauty. Dr. Thomas Whitaker of Kirkby Lonsdale, who had no children of his own, was drawn to him,<sup>12</sup> as was “Lady D” on the Isle of Wight, who said “his was a countenance never to be forgotten.”<sup>13</sup> Mrs. Ropes spoke of him as luminous (“that bright boy”).<sup>14</sup> The exquisite pencil portrait of him – a curly-headed boy with “a gentle, elfin face” – drawn in 1845 or 1846 by an unidentified artist is proof of the women’s words (see Image 26).<sup>15</sup>

In temperament he was high-strung,<sup>16</sup> sensitive, excitable, impatient, cheerful, undisciplined, indolent, careless, and a procrastinator. Anna Whistler felt that he had inherited his excitability from the McNeill side of the family.<sup>17</sup> He was exuberant and noisy, joined in many of these moments by Willie. Maxwell, who took them to Admiralty Square at Shrovetide, pompously described their antics among the silent Russian crowds as American spiritedness.<sup>18</sup> But compared by their mother to “little Russian children” and to English boys, they were decidedly inferior in their manners. She felt they would “have both pleasure & profit in such companions as the Druries.”<sup>19</sup>

James’s impatience was another aspect of his excitability. When news came of the arrival of Aunt Alicia (see Image 39) in St. Petersburg, he wanted to rush out of the yard to the customs house before the carriage was ready. When he heard that an estate they saw on the Peterhof Road belonged to young Count Stroganov’s father, he immediately wanted to visit them. He was not present when his mother attended the feast Count Kushelev (see Image 302) gave for his peasants, but would probably have reacted again with great excitement when young Count Stroganov (see Image 299) was pointed out among the guests.

His extensive hero-worship – of John Stevenson Maxwell, William Hooper Ropes, George Henry Prince, Dr. Thomas Whitaker, Carl Hedenschoug, Aleksandr Koritskii (see Images 167–170), and William Boxall (see Image 209) – was also highly enthusiastic.

A calmer aspect of his excitability was the “unbounded cheerfulness” with which he was blessed.<sup>20</sup> He was blessed as well by “an elasticity of spirits,” had “a contented temper,” was “so grateful for every kindness,” “scarcely ever expressed a complaint,” and was “free from envy.”<sup>21</sup> Bedridden, he expressed no jealousy when Willie went alone to children’s parties or to Carnival. Kept at Monsieur Jourdan’s school until 5:30 as a punishment, he would not allow Willie to wait there for him, but insisted he go home without him at 2 p.m., their usual time of release on Saturday. He willingly gave up even his favorite pastime of drawing when sick, acknowledging that it might cause further injury to his health.

He found it “‘first rate’ to be among fifty other boys”<sup>22</sup> at Monsieur Jourdan’s school and was not homesick like Willie. His father said that “boys – and especially boys like James, are happier at school – than in a family – the only reason ... for preferring the family is, if it in any way be thought better for his health.”<sup>23</sup> But one had to be careful not to suggest that such a temperament meant lesser love of home. Anna Whistler reduced James to tears when she made the mistake of saying to him that he could not know what the homesick Willie felt.

His parents cautioned him not to exert himself in his studies lest he fall sick, but they also urged him to improve his habits of study and carry all efforts through to the end,<sup>24</sup> “not to be a butterfly sporting about from one temptation to idleness to another.”<sup>25</sup> This gave him a mixed message and supported his bad habits.

James frequently exhibited manly behavior, which always impressed his mother. For example, during the outdoor festivities celebrating the return of Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna (see Images 420, 424) from Palermo (see Image 98), he persuaded his mother to go into the streets with him as her protector. His conduct pleased her more than the spectacle.<sup>26</sup>

James loved to talk. He talked a great deal<sup>27</sup> and asked a great many questions. His “eagerness to attain all his desires for information & his fearlessness, often ma[d]e him offend [his parents] because [they] love[d] him too tenaciously to be reconciled to his appearing less amiable than he is.”<sup>28</sup> The seeming rudeness of his insistence for answers embarrassed them when non-family members were present, but some visitors found his manner amusing rather than troublesome. Similarly, in making comments as he looked at an art book, he demanded that he have an audience for his remarks. Anna Whistler complied, especially when he was ill and isolated from others, giving him her undivided attention.<sup>29</sup>

He was undisciplined, indolent, and a procrastinator. He read in bed under the covers long after he was supposed to be asleep and had to be removed to his mother’s room. He failed to prepare his drawings for the Academy and was forced sometimes to do his assignments seated by his mother’s desk. Even Miss McMaster, the Wood children’s governess, talked to him “playfully ... about his better application to study and greater perseverance in cultivating his talent for drawing.”<sup>30</sup> Mr.

Eastwick (see Image 233) felt “it would be of service to James if he was put under a pretty rigid master for a year or two, [as he] is too much inclined to play for a boy of his age and requires checking.” He assessed James as “a very clever boy who may be made of great service to the world.”<sup>31</sup> James was unconcerned about conforming to institutional rules. After presenting his recitation at Monsieur Jourdan’s, he ambled back to his desk chatting to classmates along the way and was kept after school. His parents’ letters to him in England show they were aghast at the late hours he kept at Mr. Phillott’s school, so injurious to his health; they warned of placing him elsewhere.<sup>32</sup> They were not amused that he had engaged in painting scenery for a private theatrical.<sup>33</sup> He failed to be the exemplary young Christian his mother hoped he would be,<sup>34</sup> although he wrote her to send him some prayers.<sup>35</sup> His parents were deeply disappointed that in England he was drinking wine after having taken a temperance vow.<sup>36</sup> He pled as his justification the social embarrassment he felt at being different from the other boys.<sup>37</sup> His mother characterized his general lax behavior by calling him a “saunterer” and likening him to Adeodatus in The Dark Mirror, who “was bright and joyous, and thus tempted to wish to revel among the world’s charms, but whenever reminded of duty . . . tried to keep the straight path, and would make no turnings from it – which was the more remarkable, for he delighted in the flowers of the broad road, and required repeated warning!”<sup>38</sup> After her husband’s death, Anna Whistler refused Dr. Palmer’s proposal that she and the boys settle in Stonington. She felt she had to have the “courage to look for a home among strangers,” as “New York, or Baltimore” would present “too much distraction for an excitable lad like Jamie,” who was “very much the votary of novelty.” She felt that “only [her] greatest precaution [could] ever confine his attention to the cultivation of his mind for the coming 4 or 5 years.”<sup>39</sup> Anna Whistler thought that James had inherited all his faults from her: if both of them “could take time to think before [they] act, or speak, how much mortification [they] should save both” the Major and themselves.<sup>40</sup>

* * *

Both parents viewed James’s choice of a profession in terms of its usefulness rather than his passion for it. Major Whistler thought that

James “could be most useful” in the profession of “Engineer and Architect.” He felt that James’s “natural inclination or taste for the fine arts – if ... not allowed to become too poetical, [would] certainly be of much service to [him] in any profession connected with arts and sciences.” He urged him to “cultivate now as an artist ... an acquaintance with, and a taste for works of art – useful works,” assuring him that later “the study of sciences with a view to a practical application of such works will be a delight instead of a task to you.”<sup>41</sup> He encouraged James to express his opinion on the works of art he saw, but he did not want him to be an artist. His mother seconded his father’s thoughts, pointing out that, although he, too, had once wanted to be an artist, he had come to apply “his talents ... more usefully.”<sup>42</sup> She felt that James would similarly “experience how much greater [his] advantage, if fancy sketches, studies etc. are meant for [his] hours of leisure.” Not wishing, however, to seem unfeeling towards her son’s aspirations, she did not close the door completely, asking that he simply try at this point “to enlarge his views by improving [his] mind first.”

His father died soon after expressing his opinion about what James’s profession should be. His mother, who wanted to honor her husband’s wishes, took James and Willie back to the United States for their education and continued to hope for a time that James would “bend his talent to architecture,” even when he “was full of thoughts of going to West Point.”<sup>43</sup>

* * *

James’s ability to draw came from his father. Major Whistler had taught drawing at West Point. His St. Petersburg drawings of engines, however, had to be corrected. In criticizing James’s sketches, he felt that more detail was needed in them rather than less and that, as he himself had not seen the places James had sketched, “a few more touches would make them a much better illustration of what [James] had seen.”<sup>44</sup> In his comments he anticipated a later critic, who assessed James’s nocturnes as “clever, sketchy and incomplete, like everything he has done.”<sup>45</sup>

James’s love of beauty came from his mother, who “never [lost] a chance to make the impression of the beautiful on [her] mind.”<sup>46</sup> His appreciation of color also came from her. The beauty of natural phenomena that she described in her letters to him – “for you enjoy beautiful scenery”<sup>47</sup> – he would later paint. She “delight[ed] in the glories of the firmament” provided by “the goodness of our Great Creator” to mix “exquisite delight” with earthly trials.<sup>48</sup> James was the child and adolescent, ecstatic over “the beautiful dissolving views”<sup>49</sup> closing the performance at the children’s theatre in St. Petersburg, taking in the fire of burning illuminations and bursting fireworks, the playing water of fountains, “the vapours overhanging the fields and woods ... mak[ing] them look as if covered with hoarfrost,”<sup>50</sup> the fog on the river, the reflection of buildings and bridges on the river and canals, the reflection of shadowless buildings during the white nights – unconsciously taking in the idea of transformation.

Images of the Neva and the canals of St. Petersburg, the fountains of Peterhof, the Baltic Sea, and the Gulf of Finland dissolved in his memory with other images of water: the Merrimack Falls and Merrimack River in Lowell, Massachusetts, where he was born; the sound at Stonington, Connecticut, ceaselessly crashing; the Connecticut River, which they traveled on by sloop with their furniture during their move to Springfield, Massachusetts;<sup>51</sup> the Atlantic, on whose waves he traveled to encounter Europe for the first time; the sound and the ocean encircling the Isle of Wight that he was too frail to bathe in; and the Thames, only glimpsed on several trips until he was left in London for close to a year. Later, he would fix permanently on canvas the fleeting life of the ephemeral and the power of natural phenomena to transform their surroundings, and would depict in several mediums the river, the sea, and the canal.

His ability to express in writing his ideas about art also came from his articulate mother, who first talked to him of her impressions of nature, light, and color, and then put them down on paper when distance separated her from her son. Her insistence on “the daily morning recital” of scripture “equipped him ... with a high literary standard, familiarity with good English, and a useful supply of appropriate quotations.”<sup>52</sup>

James drew constantly. He drew in his books (see Image 166).<sup>53</sup> The diaries and letters of family and friends confirm likenesses attempted or taken: of Maxwell; the shipboard passenger, Hindus Kissan das Beirage; three maids working for Elizabeth and Richard Picard; little John Picard; aunts Alicia McNeill (see Image 39) and Eliza Winstanley; a monk; a street sweep; his niece, Annie; and others. Some portraits and drawings were given to the sitters; others he sent to his parents and to friends in letters. The Petersburg sketchbook contains some portraits, but also biblical subjects (see Image 14), figures from Russian life (see Image 165), and scenes on the Isle of Wight.<sup>54</sup>

James drew without instruction, as an amusement, until he went to St. Petersburg. Here, he briefly took drawing lessons at home with a Monsieur Vaney for a few months before the family moved to a rented dacha on the Peterhof Road in May 1844 for the summer. The turning point in his artistic life was his meeting with Sir William Allan (see Image 320), who was brought to tea at their dacha by William Miller, a fellow Scotsman, on 29 June 1844. Allan's flattering comment about James's "uncommon genius," on examining his largely untutored drawings, was the impetus for his first serious formal drawing lessons, both privately with a student of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts and in a class at the Academy. But, as his parents did not want him to be an artist, to Allan's concerned comment that they "not urge him beyond his inclination," Anna Whistler replied that James's drawing "had only been cultivated as an amusement and that [she] was obliged to interfere or his application would confine him more than [they] approved."<sup>55</sup> The subsequent drawing lessons they permitted did not change their minds, although, having consented, they constantly urged James to apply himself.

* * *

Some time after the family's return to the city in September 1844 – and probably well before 26 March / 7 April 1845 – James began to take private drawing lessons from Aleksandr Osipovich Koritskii (see Images 167–170), who was both an officer in the Construction Division of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings and an advanced student at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts, where he was a protégé of the famed Karl Pavlovich Briullov (see Image 173).

Koritskii (pronounced "Kahreet'skee") was twenty-six or twenty-seven years old and James was ten. Still, Koritskii, mindful of the fact that he was teaching Major Whistler's son, may have addressed James as Iakov Egorovich (pronounced "Yah'kuff Yeegor'uhveech"): i.e., James, son of George. This is a mode of address used by Russian adults to one another in a formal relationship, but not used to children. Or perhaps Koritskii used James's first name and patronymic only when speaking to Major and Anna Whistler about him. In any case, Anna Whistler was amused by Koritskii's formality.<sup>56</sup> As for James, we know only that in his letters he spoke of his teacher as "Mr. Karitzky," and sometimes simply as "Karitzky," in the latter instance as his parents did.

It is a matter of conjecture whether Koritskii was hired for the purpose of tutoring James or of preparing him for entrance to the Academy. When James began to attend the drawing course at the Academy, the Whistlers kept Koritskii on. In this way, James's class instruction was supplemented by a private lesson at home on Saturdays from someone familiar with the teaching procedures in the Academy's drawing courses.

The teaching of drawing at the Academy was divided into three levels, where the models were (1) drawings, engravings, and lithographs; (2) plaster casts; (3) and live models. The first level was divided into two groups: in one, the models were heads; in the other, figures. A similar division into two groups existed in the second level. This created five drawing classes, with the following numbers and titles: (1) "Drawing from Originals of Heads"; (2) "Drawing from Originals of Figures"; (3) "Drawing from Plaster Casts of Heads"; (4) "Drawing from Plaster Casts of Figures"; (5) "Life Drawing."<sup>57</sup> The Russian word "original" in this context means "a drawing, engraving or lithograph of outstanding quality, which serves as a model for others to copy."<sup>58</sup>

James did not meet the age requirement of fourteen for admission to the Academy, but it was probably waived for him because of his father's important position.<sup>59</sup> James was ten years and eight months old when Koritskii paid the nine-ruble fee on 26 March / 7 April 1845, and signed the receipt book for ticket No. 355, issued to "Uistler (Iakov)," "the son of an American," to attend drawing classes (see Image 159).<sup>60</sup> James was the last of nineteen students who signed up for them in March 1845,<sup>61</sup> and four hundred fifty tickets were issued for that year.<sup>62</sup> His name was also registered in a book where the ticket number, to whom issued, documents submitted in order to register, and home address were recorded. The entry for James (see Image 160) reads: "355. Uistler (Iakov), in Ritter's house on the English Embankment."<sup>63</sup> Judging by the dash in the "documents submitted" column, this requirement was also waived for him. Finally, he was also registered in a book listing Academy pupils from 1845 through 1849, where the number of the drawing class each student was assigned to appears (see Image 162).<sup>64</sup> There was some difficulty in spelling his surname in Russian the first time it was registered (see Image 159).

James began to attend his course on 2/14 April and "seem[ed] greatly to enjoy going to a class." He stood "next a youth of 16 (Caslett),"<sup>65</sup> which was probably Anna Whistler's version of Cazalet, a prominent English merchant family in St. Petersburg.<sup>66</sup> He was "entered at the second room,"<sup>67</sup> meaning the auditorium in which the first level of drawing classes was held. He was placed in "Drawing from Originals of Heads," as the number 1 next to his name in the "Inspector's Class Journal" attests.<sup>68</sup>

A first-hand explanation of what being in the first class entailed is to be found in the memoirs of a full-time Russian student, who entered the Academy in 1847:

Drawing comprised the chief subject of study ... I went into the first class, i.e., drawing from originals of heads ... Soon I received N<sup>o</sup> 2 for my first head, and for my second N<sup>o</sup> 1 ...

Here's what receiving N<sup>o</sup> N<sup>o</sup> meant: classes were divided into morning ones, from 9 to 11 o'clock, and evening ones, from five to seven. During the morning classes everyone worked on his own particular specialty, but in the evening everyone, no matter what class he might be in, drew using a French pencil. When the month was up, the drawings were exhibited in the classes for the professors to look at. This was a kind of examination. In addition, every week figures and plaster casts of heads were presented and the requirement was that the outlines of them should be faithfully reproduced [in the pupils' copies] even if the shading was not a finished piece of work. At the monthly inspections, or examination, the pupils did not have to present these weekly assignments because the professor had looked them over during the week, but some pieces of work, which were prepared exclusively for the monthly examination, had to be presented by a deadline.

After a month the Council of professors would visit all the classes and, for example, in the class for drawing from plaster casts of heads, they would look at [and decide] which of the heads was drawn best and that one would be N<sup>o</sup> 1; the next best would be N<sup>o</sup> 2, etc. Of course, there was a certain amount of squabbling among the professors because one would find a certain drawing best while another would try to prove the opposite and defend the drawing he considered best. In these instances the final decision rested with the Vice-President of the Academy. Since the students' surnames usually appeared on the drawings, the professors could show bias in evaluating the merits of the drawings, but it has to be said to their credit that this almost never happened ... Whoever received one of the top ten numbers was transferred in the next third of the year into the next class.<sup>69</sup>

The two professors who taught "Drawing from Originals of Heads" and "Drawing from Originals of Figures" were Ivan Aleksandrovich Voinov and Ivan Ivanovich Vistelius.<sup>70</sup> There is proof only that James was Vistelius's pupil. An extant pencil copy of a neoclassical drawing of a woman's head that he executed in St. Petersburg (see Image 163) bears the customary surnames of teacher and student: "Vistelius" and "Visler."<sup>71</sup>

The angle of the portrait is from the right shoulder and back (not including the spine), which are bare. The woman's head is turned to the right, almost looking over her right shoulder, to the extent that the right iris, which seems light-colored, fills the right corner of her eye and some of the left eye is visible, as is the part in her hair, which is parted in the middle. Her hair, which seems light-colored, is plaited into narrow braids. A double braid encircles the middle of her head while another braid, of which only a single tier is visible, is coiled on top of her head. She has full lips and a long, straight nose. The right shoulder and back are visible down to the level of the middle of the right upper arm. The elbow is not visible, but the lifted hand with wrist and half of the lower arm can be seen. The hand is turned palm in, and the thumb and forefinger hold up a piece of drapery while the other fingers of the right hand are extended upward and forward. The left arm has been brought across the chest and the left hand rests on the right shoulder close to the neck. The little finger of this hand looks truncated and may be folded under. The raised drapery intersects the left arm so that only the hand, the wrist and half of the lower arm are visible, the same as in the case of the right hand.<sup>72</sup>

James attended the evening class, from 5 to 7 p.m., but from the start did not go every day. After his first class, he hoped to go three times a week, but his ill health, a term as a boarder at Monsieur Jourdan's school, the arrival of brother George Whistler in the summer of 1845 and his stay of several months, skipping a class to stay home and make "something to surprise dear father,"<sup>73</sup> and two summers for his health's sake in England – the one in 1847 extending well into October – all took their toll on his attendance.

He was very impressed that Koritskii was in the life class (see Image 158), and felt that he could never achieve that level himself.<sup>74</sup> Nor was it unheard of that some students "stayed in the same class two and three years,"<sup>75</sup> and this is what happened to him, given his absences and failure to take the monthly assessment examinations that determined advancement into subsequent levels. In 1846 and 1847, he was not formally registered. In 1848, his name appeared in the Inspector's Class Journal, with ticket number 425 assigned to him, but there is no number to show which of the five drawing courses he was registered in, and none to indicate that he took a monthly examination.<sup>76</sup> Four hundred eighty-six students were registered in the drawing courses in that year.<sup>77</sup> The proposed date of 1847–1848 later assigned to the abovementioned drawing he made for Vistelius<sup>78</sup> means it was executed some three years after he began attending the Academy (before June 1848), and that he was still in "Drawing from Originals of Heads." There are no other known extant drawings bearing his name along with that of his Academy teacher. But, as Anna Whistler, looking over "St. P. memorials" of her sons some five years later, wrote James that her "eye met ... your originals,”<sup>79</sup> other drawings (whereabouts unknown) would seem to have been made.<sup>80</sup>

While the diary entries from 5/17 April 1845 to June 1846 show that James attended drawing lessons at the Academy on an irregular basis, the center in his artistic life was Koritskii, who came to the Whistler home on Saturdays at four o’clock to give him a two-hour lesson.<sup>81</sup> This included the period from September through December 1846, when James attended Monsieur Jourdan’s school, because boarders went home early Saturday afternoon for the weekend. He enjoyed his lessons with Koritskii so much that when he had to miss one because he was kept at school until 5:30 one Saturday as a punishment, he cried.<sup>82</sup> The loan from Koritskii of an écorché and a plaster bust,<sup>83</sup> and his condemnation of a drawing of a dog by James, give glimpses into the content of the lessons.<sup>84</sup> Occasionally, Koritskii came to their house on a Monday morning, which may have been connected with an assignment set by the Academy or by him, having a deadline.<sup>85</sup> James’s comment in later years that “he could remember wonderful things he had done during the years in Russia,”<sup>86</sup> although vague, nevertheless shows the elation he felt. James had the opportunity to see Koritskii himself sketch at these sessions. In 1846, Koritskii drew John Bouttatz Whistler “seated in his little carriage driving about the parlour.”<sup>87</sup> In 1847, he drew the figure of Napoleon in James’s sketchbook (see Image 171).<sup>88</sup> And, when James was not registered at the Academy, he sometimes went there to Koritskii’s study in the morning to draw and – in early 1847 – possibly to have his portrait painted.<sup>89</sup> However, the frequency of these lessons was, like attendance at the Academy, affected by considerations of James’s health and by family plans.

In 1847 and 1848, when James was seriously ill and Anna Whistler took the boys to England for both summers, his time with Koritskii was severely curtailed: in both 1847 and 1848 they probably worked together only four months. But James thought of Koritskii even when separated from him. From 1847 on, he constantly referred to Koritskii in his letters to his parents. From England in 1848 he sent paints to St. Petersburg to his father, who assured him that he “would send one half to [Koritskii] as a present from [James].”<sup>90</sup>

It was a blow for both James and Koritskii that at the end of the summer of 1848 James was left in England. He was assured that he would spend the mid-summer vacation the next year in St. Petersburg,<sup>91</sup> but no one could have guessed at that point that he would never see St. Petersburg, his beloved father, or Koritskii again.

Anna Whistler returned to St. Petersburg charged with a commission for Koritskii from James as well as with expressions of attachment to this young man, whom he “look[ed] up to with all the reverence an Artist merits and his master besides.”<sup>92</sup> When correspondence became the only link with his parents, James wrote them so many letters in September and October of 1848<sup>93</sup> mentioning Koritskii that Anna Whistler invited Koritskii to spend the evening of 31 October with the family so “that [they] might deliver [James’s] messages of love to him.”<sup>94</sup> The invitation was for seven o’clock, when Willie, the only remaining family member who spoke Russian, “would be free from study to talk to him of [James].”<sup>95</sup> Willie and Koritskii looked at views of the Isle of Wight, and Willie “recounted to him [their] walks and pursuits.”<sup>96</sup> Anna Whistler showed him a sketch James had made for her of “The Witch of Endor Raising Samuel” and reported to James: “Your master said it was a good effort.”<sup>97</sup> James’s commission to Koritskii was for “impressions in white wax of the Russian eagle,”<sup>98</sup> but Koritskii “said he would try to get a book of Russian heraldry” for James instead.<sup>99</sup> When Willie “told him how often [James] had wished for him, he seemed in a glow of emotion, put his hand on his heart and said “and ‘oh how I wish for him always.””<sup>100</sup> He thanked James “for the paints,” saying “such cannot be bought here.”<sup>101</sup> It was clear that “he delighted to talk of his pupil.”<sup>102</sup> He asked for and received permission to write to James.<sup>103</sup> He did not succeed in getting the book of heraldry by the deadline of 5 November that Anna Whistler had set,<sup>104</sup> and this project fell by the wayside. Nor does he seem ever to have written to James, although he sent his love through Anna Whistler and repeatedly promised to write. Gradually the objects he had lent for copying were returned to him.<sup>105</sup>

For the Academy exhibit in late autumn of 1848, Koritskii submitted a copy he had made of Dessain’s 1847 portrait of James and Willie (see Image 27), “a proof of his affection for . . . dear Jemie.”<sup>106</sup> On

11 December, he presented “dear father with [this] portrait of his pupil and ‘brat’” (Russian for “brother”).<sup>107</sup> Koritskii had obviously intended it as a surprise, because when Major Whistler had gone “one day to the Palette [de Raphael],” an art supplies store, “the vender of crayons etc ... [had] enquired if we had been to see the portrait of our boys exhibited at the Academy, most admirable likenesses painted in oils by a Russian officer.”<sup>108</sup>

Koritskii came again later in December “to recommend a draftsman” to replace the alcoholic Hedenschoug.<sup>109</sup> Major Whistler, knowing Koritskii had given his paints from James to the ailing Briullov, presented to him with James’s love the second half of the paints James had sent.<sup>110</sup>

He came again to consult in late January or early February 1849 with the now-frail Major Whistler about Briullov, whose serious illness required him, too, to leave the severe climate of St. Petersburg. He asked Major Whistler what route should be taken to reach the island of St. Catherine, off Brazil, recommended by Briullov’s doctors.<sup>111</sup> He apparently harbored the hope that he might accompany Briullov on his journey to Europe and thus see James in England.<sup>112</sup>

Koritskii’s last recorded visit took place when he called on the widowed Anna Whistler and Willie in May 1849 before they left St. Petersburg permanently.<sup>113</sup> He told them of his great disappointment. His hopes of going abroad with Briullov and seeing James in England had all been dashed. They were to take a letter from him to James, but there is no further reference to it.<sup>114</sup> With their departure from Russia, the Whistlers lost touch with him.<sup>115</sup>

James was exposed at the Academy to a rigorous, challenging, competitive, structured training, albeit sporadic. Koritskii both taught him and tried to direct him in fulfilling the demands placed on the students, yet attendance in a class and Koritskii’s supervision did little to instill discipline in him. Years later, he expressed the regret that he had not “begun by learning something of drawing,”<sup>116</sup> but he was immersed in the world of art as he had never been before. The elated words of Koritskii’s cousin, Anton Shtukenberg (see Image 250), about his visits to the Academy were equally applicable to James:

[I] loved to wander through the rooms of the glorious Academy. They instilled [in one] a particular poetic mood. I had free access to the Academy and would gaze passionately at Guido Reni, Domenichino and Raphael (in copies made by Briullov and Bruni). This greatly aided the development of my taste and my love of the fine arts ... it seems to me that in the Academy even a person with no hands would have become enamored of painting.”<sup>117</sup>

This awakening later prompted James to name St. Petersburg as his birthplace.<sup>118</sup>

* * *

An aspect of his immersion in the world of Russian art is that through Koritskii he apparently came to the attention of Briullov. It is plausible that Koritskii would have told Briullov that he had been engaged to give lessons to the young son of the American building the railroad. It seems likely that Briullov knew James at least by sight, since James was a pupil of his student, although under any circumstances the beautiful, animated, underage child in the halls of the Academy would have drawn attention to himself. Koritskii wrote in his diary on 30 December [1846 / 11 January 1847] that he “was painting a portrait of the American” (whereabouts unknown), who may have been James, and some of the time the work was carried out in Briullov’s presence.<sup>119</sup> The ailing Briullov’s delight when Koritskii presented him with paints sent by James from London in 1848, and pretended they were for Briullov from James, also suggests that Briullov knew James or knew of him.<sup>120</sup> In fact, he may have known both Whistler boys, for Willie felt free to try to see Briullov as well as Koritskii during the Christmas holidays of 1848.<sup>121</sup>

Anna Whistler would have heard a great deal about Briullov from Koritskii via James and Willie. There is no direct evidence that she ever met him, but indirect evidence suggests that she may have visited his studio, and it is in this period that he was painting some of his best portraits. Her diaries show her acquaintance with only one female portrait by Briullov – St. Alexandra Ascending to Heaven (Sviataia Aleksandra, voznosiasbchaiaisia na nebo) (1845) (see Image 453) – which

James pronounced “the most interesting of all the works of art around us” when they visited the oratory (see Image 452) of the Alexander Palace in Tsarskoe Selo (see Images 388, 447) in 1846.<sup>122</sup> Two years after leaving Russia, Anna Whistler, with her appreciation for color, alluded to Briullov when describing to James her visits “next door to see Cousin Josée Richards,” daughter of General Joseph Gardner Swift and the niece of Major Whistler, “looking beautiful enough for one of Brulloffs subjects in a cerulean blue robe clasped with turquoise and her eyes as blue as the broach.”<sup>123</sup> It is difficult to imagine that Anna Whistler could make a comparison between Josée Richards and the subjects of Briullov’s paintings based only on statements about them by Koritskii translated by her children and having seen only one of Briullov’s female portraits. Privileged visitors to St. Petersburg could be taken to view artists’ studios.<sup>124</sup> The indirect evidence suggests that Koritskii, through whom his friends obtained access to view Briullov’s studio,<sup>125</sup> may have taken some of the Whistler family on a tour of it as well. He mentioned to Major and Anna Whistler in October of 1848 that Briullov was painting a group of nuns (see Image 176), which he (Koritskii) hoped they might see.<sup>126</sup> This, too, implies entry to Briullov’s studio.

James’s enrollment at the Academy awakened the family’s interest in the exhibits taking place there. Every three years the Academy building was the scene of a public exhibition of the works of Academy professors and students as well as of artists working in St. Petersburg.<sup>127</sup> In the autumn of each year there was an annual exhibit. There were also many smaller temporary exhibits. Attending exhibits also introduced them to the permanent collection.

On 17/29 April 1846, Major and Anna Whistler attended the triennial exhibit. They wanted their children “to become familiar with the subjects of the modern artists.” James and Willie went almost every day that week. James was especially taken by “a boys portrait said to be his likeness and altho the eyes were black and the curls darker than his, [his parents] found it so like him ... the boy is taken in a white shirt with crimped frill open at the throat, it is half length and no other garment could set off the glow on the brunette complexion so finely.” Major Whistler “said he should be glad to buy it, but its frame would only correspond with the furniture of a palace, being a rich vine.”<sup>128</sup> Emile-

François Dessain, a French artist then working in St. Petersburg, showed sixteen works in this exhibit, including six pastel portraits (unnamed in the catalogue).<sup>129</sup> One of them may have been the portrait resembling James, for something inspired his parents to commission Dessain to paint James and Willie. After the exhibit – most likely between autumn of 1846 and an unspecifiable date in 1847 – Dessain executed a pastel double portrait of James and Willie, identically dressed in grey trousers and close-fitting black jackets, the uniform of Monsieur Jourdan’s school, which they attended from September through December of 1846 (see Image 27).<sup>130</sup> Anna Whistler’s “deeper interest” was attracted by the religious subject of The Brass Serpent (Mednyi zmi) by Fyodor Antonovich Bruni (see Images 183–184) in the permanent collection, but in her zeal she seemed to imagine more “countenances beaming with Faith” than actually were.<sup>131</sup>

In March of 1847, the Academy mounted a special two-week exhibit of seven paintings by the celebrated Russian marine painter, Ivan Konstantinovich Aivazovskii (see Image 178).<sup>132</sup> Major and Anna Whistler, Debo, Willie, and Mary Brennan attended.<sup>133</sup> Anna Whistler recorded with appreciation the play of the light from the torches in the central painting of the group: Peter I at Krasnaia Gorka Lighting a Bonfire on the Shore as a Beacon to His Foundering Ships (Pyotr I pri Krasnoi gorke, razzhigaiushchii kostyor dlia podachi signala gibnushchim svoim sudam) (see Image 179). Smaller views of Odessa, Constantinople, and other seaports (see Images 180–182), in which the “sun gilds the water magnificently or the moonbeams play upon the waves all delighted [them] in turn.”<sup>134</sup> Only James missed the exhibit, which his mother must have described to him. He had by then been confined to the house for nine weeks with rheumatic fever. He had not been permitted to draw the entire time, so Koritskii was not coming to their home. James’s compensation was a volume of Hogarth’s engravings of his own originals, which Debo borrowed for him. Looking through it, his thoughts were of Koritskii, to whom he greatly wished to show it.

Unfortunately, only these two exhibits were recorded by Anna Whistler, but they show the rich and exciting offerings James and his family could savor a short ride across the Neva opposite their home. From England in 1849, he continued to be interested in knowing of any exhibits taking place at the Academy,<sup>135</sup> but Major Whistler was too weak to attend, if he was even aware of them.

Given all the exhibits James must have seen, the tantalizing question remains of whether he ever visited the Hermitage (see Images 114–116).<sup>136</sup> When the family first arrived in St. Petersburg, Colonel Todd took the adult members to the Hermitage. In October 1848, when Koritskii visited the Whistlers and told them he was copying paintings in the Hermitage, he invited Major and Anna Whistler “to go [there] to see the pictures now.”<sup>137</sup> Relating this to James in a letter, Anna Whistler’s response was: “but oh I shall miss my Jemie too sadly there!”<sup>138</sup> A possible interpretation of her comment is that she would miss him too much if she were to go now, because she had been there before in his company. There is support for this interpretation in an earlier analogous situation. In September 1848, she had expressed similar sentiments about visiting the Church of Our Lady (Vor Frue Kirke) in Copenhagen without James on her way back to St. Petersburg, after having visited it with James on their way to England in June 1848 (see Images 480–484).<sup>139</sup> Beyond the abovementioned intimation, there seems to be no information about whether James ever visited the Hermitage.

* * *

The Whistlers’ interest in having portraits of family members made in St. Petersburg preceded the commission for the portrait by Dessain. James’s watercolor portrait (see Image 24) was painted in 1844 by C.A.F. Fiessler, a German artist, whose biography cannot so far be established.<sup>140</sup> Nothing is known about the circumstances under which it was executed. It was given to Mary Brennan as a gift by Anna Whistler.<sup>141</sup>

In the primitively painted portrait, James, nine or ten years old, stands at “a wooden drafting table” with “a palette in his left hand and a paintbrush in the right.”<sup>142</sup> The blue-eyed boy with short, curly, dark hair wears a dark-belted beige artist’s smock (unpainted, it is the color of the paper). He is not the beautiful child Whistler was. Behind him and to his left is a green drape with fringe that is perhaps supposed to be gold. The wall is grey. The child is painting the portrait of a woman with long, dark hair, who is wearing a blue dress with stiff pink roses that stick up from a dark belt. “[H]e is shown in a three-quarter view with his face turned toward the viewer.”<sup>143</sup> The border of the portrait is painted bright blue to resemble a frame. In the lower left of the portrait is written: “n.d. Natur gemalt v. C.A.F. Fiessler. 1844.” In this same year, a full-length portrait photograph was taken of James, showing a sweet-faced boy (see Image 25).

In 1845 or 1846, James’s pencil portrait (see Image 26) was executed by an unidentified artist, whose possible identity has been proposed as Thomas Wright (see Image 208), Koritskii (see Images 167–170), or James himself with later corrections by Seymour Haden (see Image 20).<sup>144</sup>

For his 48th birthday, in May 1848, Major Whistler commissioned a portrait of himself (whereabouts unknown) for his wife from an unidentified artist, who may have been the brother of the children’s tutor, Mr. Biber.<sup>145</sup> James accompanied his father to the artist’s studio at least once. There is no information about the appearance of the portrait. It may be the one Major Whistler bequeathed when dying to Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel’nikov (see Image 247), his colleague and friend in charge of the Northern Administration of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway.<sup>146</sup>

The English artist Thomas Wright was then active in St. Petersburg. He drew a pencil and watercolor portrait of Anna Whistler in 1845 (see Image 1), signing it in the lower right “Thos. Wright (Rait) 1845” (“Rait” is a transliteration of his Russian signature, Райт). In the drawing, Anna Whistler appears in left profile. She is wearing a light blue dress with a white collar. Her figure is shown to just below the bodice of her dress. She is slender, with a quite long, straight nose. Her visible eye and eyebrow look dark. She is looking straight ahead with an expression of pleasant composure. Her dark hair is pulled back in a braided chignon. A small curl of hair hangs loose in front of her ear. Only the very top of her ear is covered by her hair. Her chin is small and proportionate to her face. Her dress has a puckered panel running from the neck across the shoulder to the top of the elbow-length sleeve, which has a puckered cuff. The collar is squarish and lighter in color than the dress and reveals the neck.

Major Whistler's draftsman, Carl Hedenschoug, persuaded the Whistler parents in 1844 to let him draw James's and Willie's portraits. He produced such hideous caricatures that, although the kind-hearted Major Whistler paid for them, he also burned them.<sup>147</sup>

With Koritskii's presentation of his copy of Dessain's portrait of James and Willie to Major Whistler, he and Anna Whistler each had a portrait of them. Anna Whistler, however, liked Koritskii's copy less than she did the original,<sup>148</sup> and both she and her husband did not seem to consider either artist first-rate.<sup>149</sup> Consequently, as James was now living in England, they shifted their search for a portrait artist. Major Whistler asked that his engineer friend Thomas Macdougall Smith be requested to find "a first rate Artist ... in London that we may have a good picture with a perfect likeness."<sup>150</sup> Smith recommended William Boxall (see Image 209). When James's portrait was almost completed, he described to his father the fine background with its "warm tone very like one of Gainsboroughs," with "a beautiful creamy surface" that "looks so rich" (see Image 28).<sup>151</sup> Seeing his portrait, he immediately wondered "what Karitzky would say to it?"<sup>152</sup> Certain of returning to St. Petersburg, he added: "Of course he will see it."<sup>153</sup>

In 1849, after the death of Major Whistler, when Anna Whistler and Willie stopped in London to pick up James on their way home to America, daguerreotypes were made at the request of Joseph Harrison Jr. of her and both boys by William Edward Kilburn in his Regent Street studio.<sup>154</sup> "In the exquisitely clear, jewellike ninth plates of the Whistler brothers, which form a pair of mirror images, the boys sit before a delicately hand-colored backdrop of blue sky and white clouds" (see Images 29–30).<sup>155</sup> The whereabouts of the daguerreotype of Anna Whistler are unknown to me.

On their trips between England and Russia, Anna Whistler, James, and Willie stopped in Germany and Denmark. These stopovers appealed to James, who had expressed to his mother his desire to travel, his particular interests being Italy and Egypt.<sup>156</sup> In Lübeck, they visited the art gallery of Georg Pflüg, which contained many Old-Master paintings. Mr. Pflüg was already acquainted with Major Whistler.<sup>157</sup> On their 1847 stopover from Russia, James, a first-time visitor, went to the gallery three times.<sup>158</sup> He was impressed by "a very fine head painted by a Spanish master.”<sup>159</sup> They also visited “the marine church where the wonderful clock and the deaths dance are.”<sup>160</sup> The latter, James wrote his father, “consists of series of oil paintings – representing death in 24 different positions exercising his power over people of all ranks; the picture itself was more curious than pretty.”<sup>161</sup>

On route to England in the summer of 1848, their steamer stopped at Copenhagen to take on coal. Delayed by quarantine precautions, they opted to spend their brief time ashore at the Church of Our Lady (Vor Frue Kirke) (see Image 480). The sculptures here were known to them from reproductions owned by the Laws in St. Petersburg. The visit was proposed by James and seconded by the friend of Bertel Thorvaldsen – probably Dr. Olaf Lundt Bang (see Image 485) – whom they had met on board and who had “detect[ed] Jemies love for sculpture.”<sup>162</sup> At the church, they saw Thorvaldsen’s neoclassical marble sculptures of Christ, the apostles, the angel baptismal font, and the terra cotta pediment with St. John in the wilderness (see Images 481–484). Anna Whistler liked the figure of Christ “better than any attempt at similitude of Him that I ever saw before. The expression ... so benign & so commanding.”<sup>163</sup> She was probably moved by Christ’s appearing to be human rather than divine.

Left in London with the Hadens in the autumn of 1848, James was sent to Eldon Villa, a school run by a Mr. and Mrs. Phillott, at Portishead, near Bristol. Anna Whistler was waiting to hear what Seymour, who would see James at Christmas, would say as to whether James had “gained either health or wisdom at Portishead.”<sup>164</sup> She seemed nevertheless to expect James to return to Eldon Villa in the new year and to come to St. Petersburg when his third quarter at the school was over.<sup>165</sup> But after Christmas, James did not return to the Phillotts’ school, where there were too many temptations.<sup>166</sup> He lived with the Hadens, and Seymour arranged for tutoring by “a clergyman well-qualified to teach him.”<sup>167</sup>

Living with the Hadens, James became even more immersed in the world of art than in St. Petersburg. He sat to William Boxall (see Image 209), later director of the National Gallery, for his portrait. He formed a deep attachment to Boxall and, in turn, charmed the artist. He, Debo, and Seymour visited Boxall’s studio to view the portrait, which was “very like and a very fine picture” by “a beautiful Colorist.”<sup>168</sup> He may have taken Mr. Eastwick (see Image 233) there, too, so that a “report [of his likeness]” could be made in St. Petersburg.<sup>169</sup> He announced with elation that Boxall was going to take him to Hampton Court to see the cartoons by Raphael, “the greatest Artist that ever was.”<sup>170</sup> He wished his father and Koritskii could be there, too. Boxall made him a present of History of the Early Italian Painters by Anna Jameson.<sup>171</sup> Boxall’s portrait of the fourteen-year-old boy (see Image 28) was exhibited at the Royal Academy in the spring and summer of 1849.<sup>172</sup>

Seymour fostered James’s art education, paying no heed to the fact that James’s parents did not want him to be an artist. It was Seymour, himself an artist, who probably had the greatest influence over James in this brief stay in London. He “was a talented draughts man ... having attended a government art training school while studying medicine at the Sorbonne in Paris.” On “completion of his medical studies,” he had “traveled through Italy and Switzerland ... from February to August, 1844,” going on “regular sketching expeditions.”<sup>173</sup> He had made etchings of some of his sketches when back in London.<sup>174</sup> Watercolors of some of the sketches hung in Debo’s boudoir (see Images 213–222).<sup>175</sup>

Starting in 1845, Seymour had begun to collect etchings, particularly “in the area of seventeenth-century Dutch etching,” accumulating Rembrandt’s work especially. “[I]n the mid to late 1840s ... [he] began [a] serious study of Rembrandt etchings.” It is believed that James’s participation in this activity, even for the short time he spent in England, “would have developed [in him] an extraordinary knowledge not only of Rembrandt’s etchings ... but also of the etchings of the seventeenth-century Dutch school.”<sup>176</sup>

Seymour also “arranged for [James] to attend a series of very popular lectures ... at the Royal Academy Schools in March, 1849” by Charles Robert Leslie (see Image 210), who had at one time been “drawing master at West Point.”<sup>177</sup> James “liked them very much.”<sup>178</sup> His “interest in etching” had been awakened in St. Petersburg, when he whiled away his confining days of illness looking at Hogarth’s book of etchings of his own originals.<sup>179</sup> Leslie’s lecture on Hogarth now impressed him the most.<sup>180</sup> It is felt that Leslie reinforced Seymour’s directing of James’s “interests towards Rembrandt and seventeenth-century Dutch art.”<sup>181</sup> Seymour started James as a collector by giving him “a 10s Print from one of Fuseli’s works called ‘The Lazar House’ ... taken from Milton and ... a very fine thing tho’ much exaggerated” (see Image 207).<sup>182</sup> He acted as critic of James’s artistic efforts, correcting his drawing of the infant Annie Haden.<sup>183</sup> He also saw the flaws in James’s character. When James was leaving for America, Seymour wrote him a letter telling him “sans [without] reserve of your faults,” but decided James would “think it too severe” and did not send it.<sup>184</sup>

In the spring of 1849, James took James Bicheno Francis (see Image 56), a visiting friend from his childhood days in Lowell, “through several picture galleries.”<sup>185</sup> Not everyone shared his indefatigable enthusiasm for art, as Seymour did, or encouraged his opinion on works of art, as his father had. Francis, the hydraulic engineer who had replaced Major Whistler at Lowell, Massachusetts, characterized James with some amusement as “a very profound Critic – setting down this picture as dumb, that a mess, and another divine, all in the most innocent and amusing manner.”<sup>186</sup> After going “through no less than five galleries,” Francis, who had no appreciation for the arts in general, “got tired to death of pictures.”<sup>187</sup>

* * *

The Russian art experience, augmented by the German and the Danish, and especially by the English, culminated in the adolescent’s declaration in 1849: “I hope, dear Father, you will not object to my choice, viz: a painter, for I wish to be one so very much.”<sup>188</sup>

A little more than two months later, his father was dead. James returned with his mother, Willie, and Mary Brennan to their native land. The almost five years abroad, especially in his formative years, had changed him and made him different from his contemporaries at home. He “had a rather foreign air,”<sup>189</sup> as did Willie, and together they made “a most picturesque couple, quite unique, among the other boys” in Stonington.<sup>190</sup>

“There are critical periods in children’s lives,” such as “growing up in a foreign community,” “that predispose them to seek other identities.”<sup>191</sup> It is perhaps in St. Petersburg that James’s aristocratic view of himself was formed.<sup>192</sup> His father had been invited by the emperor to build the first railroad in Russia. His father had actually been presented to Nicholas I (see Images 420–423). He had breakfasted at the emperor’s table, when he had talked and traveled in the same railroad car with the emperor, when the latter came to inspect the factory at Alexandrofsky (see Images 223–225) and ride on the finished section of railroad. He had received a Russian decoration (see Image 252) for his work. All of this would have been enough to instill in James an aristocratic view of himself, but in addition, the family lived surrounded by Imperial palaces and mansions belonging to the aristocracy. Their first landlord was a count and the grandson of Catherine the Great (see Images 86, 414). Some of the family went to a fête for peasants on the estate of Count Kushelev (see Image 302). They had met young Count Stroganov (see Image 299) on the voyage to St. Petersburg. Being a child, James did not have his mother’s understanding of the social gap between them and the aristocracy that she thought could not be bridged. He wanted to see the young count when the name of the latter was mentioned, but was restrained by her. She may have told him that the young count’s grandmother (see Image 300) had died, as well as his fiancée’s uncle (see Image 310), to both of whom the emperor was devoted. In Briullov’s studio, which he must have visited, and in the permanent collection of the Academy, he would have seen portraits of aristocrats. There is an uncorroborated story that when Major Whistler died, the emperor proposed that James and Willie be educated in his Corps of Pages (see Images 139, 371) and they may have known of the offer their mother rejected. An early inkling of any snobbery in James was recorded by his mother when he was miffed because they had to travel second-class on the train from Hull to Scarborough during their 1847 visit to England.<sup>193</sup> Still, when asked whether he would like to be a grand duke and have the grounds at Tsarskoe Selo “for play grounds,” he rejected the idea because “there could be no freedom with a footman at ones heels!”<sup>194</sup> And, had he been enrolled in the Corps of Pages, his love of freedom and lack of discipline could have resulted in his dismissal.

For six years, he endured artistic doldrums in the United States, until he was twenty-one, when he returned to Europe forever.

* * *

James's biography in the diaries concludes with the summer of 1848 on the Isle of Wight. No mention is made of his having been left in England, when Anna Whistler resumes writing her diary in St. Petersburg in September. Her abandonment of the diary after September 1848 means that James's life and art experiences in England are excluded. Her comments on his lessons at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts in St. Petersburg hardly illuminate his experience there. Her first-hand acquaintance with James and Koritskii's relationship within the family yields greater but not abundant detail. This essay on James's life during the St. Petersburg sojourn, on the important continuity of his rich art experiences in England, on his relationship with Koritskii from a distance, and on the illumination of Koritskii's artistic life outside their family has therefore relied heavily on outside sources: the Whistler Collection at Glasgow University Library; the Maxwell Papers at the New-York Historical Society; the Harrison Letterbooks at the Historical Society of Pennsylvania; the Pennell–Whistler Papers at the Library of Congress; James's record at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts in the Rossiiskii gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv (Russian State Historical Archives) in St. Petersburg; and the Eastwick Letters in the possession of Estelle and David Knapp, and extensive printed sources.

NOTES

1. There was at first some doubt as to whether the family would arrive at all in 1843. Although Major Whistler and Maxwell were looking for a house for them, Major Whistler was “much distressed for [James] who is very ill” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, August 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17). In the event that he might not be granted permission by Nicholas I to go to Hamburg to meet his family, he had obtained Colonel Todd’s permission on 1 August for Maxwell to meet them, but this proved to be unnecessary (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, August 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17). Soon, Major Whistler received the news that James “was better” and that “they will arrive here by the end of September” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, August 12, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17). Both letters are marked “No. 17.”
2. Entry for Saturday Jan 30th [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
3. Anna Whistler to George W. Whistler [ St. Petersburg] Tuesday noon 8/20th June [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W354.
4. Entry for Saturday Jan 30th [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
5. Entry for Tuesday night April 22nd [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
6. Andrew McCalla Eastwick thought he would not survive: “He is a tender plant and I fear much if they will ever be able to raise him to manhood. It would never answer to send him from home alone; he is too delicate” (A.M. Eastwick to Edward p. Eastwick, Alexandroffsky, May 25th/6th June 1848 Sunday, Eastwick Letters).
7. Deborah Whistler to General Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg Oct. 6th 1843, NYPL: Swift Papers.
8. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, Preston Monday June 21st 47 – Saturday July 3 [1847], GUL: Whistler Collection, W654.
9. His beauty was remarked upon from the time he was very young until he was an old man. Kate (Prince) Livermore said:

My dear Father ... used to say after an evening spent with the Whistlers [in Lowell, MA], May I go upstairs and see that beautiful boy asleep? And there was the beautiful child with the bed clothes kicked off but his deep rouge coloured flannel combinations in contrast with his rich brown curls, and his rosy cheeks fast asleep ... and then my Father would say 'it is enough to make Sir Joshua Renals come out of his grave [?] [?] to paint Jemie'." (Kate Livermore to Elizabeth Robbins Pennell, Sept. 5th 1906, LC: P-W, box 292, L, fol. 2899)

Wallis Gay wrote of the over-sixty-year-old Whistler: "His very handsome grey-blue eyes still sparkled with the fire of youth ... I think it strange that no one ever seems to emphasize his singular beauty. Not only were his features finely cut, but the symmetry of his figure, hands and feet, retained until late in life, was remarkable: in youth he must have been a pocket Apollo" (Wallis Gay, Recollections of Whistler, LC: P-W, box 283, F-G, fol. 1091).

10. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22.
11. Pastel portrait by Émile-François Dessain, of James and William Whistler, 1847, Freer Gallery of Art, Smithsonian Institution, Washington, DC, acq. no. 04.412a-b.
12. Entry for South Shore of Blackpool. on the Lancashire coast. July 28th 1847. Wednesday, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
13. Entry for St Petersburg. 1848. September, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
14. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Monday evening Dec. 13th [OS] English Christmas day [25 December NS] [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375.
15. Margaret F. MacDonald, James McNeill Whistler Drawings, Pastels and Watercolours: A Catalogue Raisonné (New Haven and London: Published for the Paul Mellon Centre for Studies in British Art by Yale University Press, 1995) (hereafter, MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné), no. 32, pp. 10–11.
16. Emma W. Palmer to Mrs. Pennell, Stonington, Sept. 25th [1906], LC: P-W, box 296.
17. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Feb 19th Monday eve [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.
18. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 32.
19. Entry for Monday 27th of July [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.

20. Entry for Thursday evening 29th Oct. [1846], Tuesday night [February] 9th [1847], and Saturday evening. Feb 27th [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
21. Entry for Thursday evening 29th Oct. [1846].
22. Anna Whistler to Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Sept. 24, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
23. George W. Whistler to Anna Whistler, St. Petersburg. Saturday 9th Sep<sup>r</sup> – [18]48, GUL: Whistler Collection, W657.
24. George W. Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 6/18 Jan<sup>y</sup> –49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W660.
25. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [ St. Petersburg] Saturday morning Jan 20th 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W378.
26. Entry for Saturday afternoon June 20 [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
27. Entry for October 23rd [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
28. Entry for Tuesday 13th May [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
29. Entry for Saturday evening. Feb 27th [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
30. Entry for Saturday Sept 20th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
31. A.M. Eastwick to Edward Eastwick, Alexandroffsky Head Mechanical Works, St. Petersburg, November 1st/13th 1847 Saturday, Eastwick Letters.
32. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
33. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St Petersburg Feb. 19th Monday eve [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.
34. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg. Sunday night Nov 5th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W367; Anna Whistler to James Whistler St Petersburg Feb. 19th [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.
35. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Dec. 4th 1848. Monday evening, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
36. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg. friday. March 9th 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W384.

37. George W. Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Feb'y 28th/March 12 [18]49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W379.
38. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [ St. Petersburg] Monday evening 8th of Jan 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W377. The work Anna Whistler was reading aloud was The Dark River: An Allegory, by the Rev. Edward Munro. She erroneously called James Adeonatus instead of Adeodatus. I have consulted the 3rd American edition, "with Engravings from Original Designs by Chapman" (New York: General Prot. Episcopal S.S. Union, 1848).
39. Anna Whistler to Dr. Geo E Palmer, [London], June 8th 1849, LC: P-W, box 296. See also Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison, 62 Sloane St. June 11th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34. All quotations in this and the previous sentence are from Anna Whistler's letter to Dr. George E. Palmer.
40. Anna Whistler to George W. Whistler, Tuesday morning June 8th 1847. Steamer Nicolai, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353.
41. All previous quotations in this paragraph are from George W. Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Jan'y 6/18-49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W660.
42. This and the following two quotations are from Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [ St. Petersburg] Thursday 3/15 Feb. [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W382.
43. Anna Whistler [to Margaret G. Hill] Friday afternoon 20th, LC: P-W, box 34.
44. George W. Whistler to Anna and James Whistler, St. Petersburg Saturday 9 Sep<sup>r</sup> – 48, GUL: Whistler Collection, W657.
45. Elizabeth R. Pennell and Joseph Pennell, The Art of Whistler (New York: Modern Library, 1928), p. 98.
46. Entry for Shantlin [sic]. Isle of Wight – its southern coast. Saturday July 22nd [1848], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
47. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [ St. Petersburg] Monday morning Dec. 11th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W371.
48. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [ St. Petersburg] Monday morning Dec. 11th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W371.
49. Entry for [Monday] March 9th 1846, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
50. Entry for Monday [August] 19th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

51. "The early years and boyhood of James MacNeill Whistler," by Miss Emma W. Palmer, GUL: Whistler Collection, P44.
52. Pennell and Pennell, Art of Whistler, p. 135.
53. MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 5, p. 2; nos. 9–11, p. 10.
54. For a detailed analysis of James's St. Petersburg sketchbook, see MacDonald, no. 7, pp. 2–9. Others drew in the St. Petersburg sketchbook, too; Koritskii and Lidderdale have been identified (MacDonald, no. 7, pp. 3, 4, 6).
55. This quotation and the two preceding are from the entry for Monday July 1st [1844], NYPL: AWP, Part I.
56. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, no place, no date, with an entry later in the letter dated Tuesday. 26th, no year, GUL: Whistler Collection, W376. On the typewritten copy of this letter, someone has written "[1848] or early 1849." W376 must be compared with Anna Whistler to James Whistler, GUL: Whistler Collection, W375, which is dated " St. Petersburg. Monday evening Dec. 13th English Christmas day." In W375, Anna Whistler caused some confusion for the reader by not stating that 13 December was OS. Monday was "English Christmas day," 25 December (NS). Once this is established, it becomes clear that in both letters, when Anna Whistler mentions Saturday and her conversation with Willie about the new baby, she means 23 December (NS), the day on which she received the news of the birth of the Hadens' first child, a daughter, who was born on 14 December (NS). Thus, "Tuesday 26th" in GUL: Whistler Collection, W376 is 26 December (NS) 1848. There is also internal evidence to support my dating. In W375, the information that "Willie is enjoying being with his companions at Mr Harrison's on Christmas Day" means that he had gone to Alexandroffsky, where the Harrison's lived. In W376, Anna Whistler writes James on the morning of "Tuesday 26th" that "Willie has not come from Alexandroffsky," meaning that he had stayed there overnight and not yet come home. Moreover, as W375 does not contain the writer's signature at the end, while W376 does not contain an opening greeting to the addressee, I believe they are not separate letters, but that W376 is a continuation of W375.

James's first name and patronymic in Russian would be Yakov Egorovich (pronounced "Yah'kuff Yee'gor'uhveech"). "Yacklegorivitch" is a slightly distorted rendering by Anna Whistler in this letter.

57. The existence of these five levels of drawing courses is not clearly apparent in the document concerning the reorganization of the Academy in 1840 (S.N. Kondakov, comp., Iubileinyi spravochnik Imperatorskoi Akademii khudozhestv 1764–1914 [Jubilee Handbook of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts 1764–1914], 2 vols. [Petrograd: R. Golike, 1914–1915], vol. 1, pp. 150, 184), but is made very clear in the Academy registers that indicate which drawing courses students were registered in. In these books, there are five columns named for the five courses (RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 140v. Spisok uchenikov Akademii Koim vydany bilety dlia poseshcheniia klassov s pokazaniem poluchennykh imi na èkzamenakh medalei. S 1845 po 1849 g. [List of Academy pupils to whom tickets were issued to attend classes, showing the medals received by them on examinations. From 1845 through 1849]). Fond 789 contains the records of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts.
- L.A. Seriakov (1824–1881), who entered the Academy as a student in 1847, said there were six drawing courses, the above-mentioned and a sketching (ètiudnyi) class (L.A. Seriakov, “Moia trudovaia zhizn’, rasskaz gravera, akademika L.A. Seriakova. 1824–1875” [“My Working Life, the Story of It by the Engraver, Academician L.A. Seriakov. 1824–1875”], Russkaia starina 14, [September 1875]: p. 350).
58. A.V. Kornilova, Karl Briullov v Peterburge [Karl Briullov in Petersburg] ([Leningrad]: Lenizdat, 1976), p. 20; N. Moleva and E. Beliutin, Russkaia khudozhestvennaia shkola pervoi poloviny XIX veka [The Russian Art School in the First Half of the Nineteenth Century] (Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1963), p. 359; N.P. Sobko, “Zhizn’ i proizvedeniia gravera L.A. Seriakova. 1824–1881” [“The Life and Works of the Engraver, L.A. Seriakov. 1824–1881,” Russkaia starina 31 (1881): p. 428. The “original” could itself be a copy and could be the work of a talented student, as had been the case with Karl Pavlovich Briullov (Kornilova, Karl Briullov, p. 20).
59. In the reign of Nicholas I, there were two sets of amendments to Academy regulations. Those of 1830 raised the age of admission to fourteen on the grounds that because of the previously excessively young age of the general education school pupils, their love of and talent in the fine arts had not yet been able to form or manifest itself at that point (Kondakov, Iubileinyi spravochnik, p. 150).
60. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 734, fol. 18v. Kniga o vydache biletov raznym litsam poseshchaiushchim Risoval’nye klassy IAKh za 1845 g. i 1846 g. [Book concerning the issuing of tickets to various persons attending drawing classes at the IAFA in 1845 and 1846]. On the inside of the cover is written: “Spisok poseshchaiushchim raznym Risolva’nye klassy Imperatorskogo AKh koim vydany dlia vkhoda v onye ot Akademii bilety s ustanovlennoiu platoiu s pokazaniem: Komu imenno vydany bilety s kotorogo vremeni i skol’ko s kogo polucheno deneg i proch. Za 1845 god” [List of various persons attending the drawing classes of the Imperial AFA, to whom tickets have been issued by the Academy for entrance to those classes, together with the established fee, and indicating: to whom the tickets were given, as of what date, and how much money was received from whom, etc. For 1845].

61. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 734, fol. 18v (see previous Note for document title). An examination of the fees paid shows that for registration during the period January through April the fee was nine rubles, during May through August six rubles, and during the final third of the year three rubles.
62. RGIA: Fond 789 op. 19, d. 735, fol. 17v (see Note 57 above for document title).
63. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 733, fol. 31r. Kniga dlia zapisi biletov, vydavaemykh uchashchimsia na poseshchenie risoval’nykh klassov na 1845 g. [Book for registering tickets issued to pupils to attend drawing classes in 1845].
64. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 140v. (see Note 57 above for document title).

The documents I consulted about James’s time at the Academy were also consulted by a Russian researcher when the Pennells, in preparation for writing their biography of Whistler, wrote to Russia inquiring about James’s career there. Almost all the information they give about him is incorrect. This is based partly on mistakes made by the Russian researcher and partly on the Pennells’ wish to aggrandize young James’s talent.

65. This and the quotation in the previous sentence are from the entry for Thursday 5th/17th of April [1845], within the entry for Thursday 10th April [1845], NYPL: AWPD, Part II.
66. No Cazalet is registered for 1845, but a Goodlet is (RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 734, fol. 5r. (see Note 60 above for document title)). It is possible Anna Whistler confused the two, as she was acquainted with the Cazalets. Such mistakes were not uncommon for her.

67. Entry for Thursday 5th/17th of April [1845], within the entry for Thursday 10th April [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
68. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 14v. (see Note 57 above for document title).
69. Seriaikov, “Moia trudovaia zhizn’,” pp. 350–351. P.P. Chistiakov (1832–1919), who entered the Academy in 1849, says he was put in Course 1, “the class in which they drew with pencil copying originals of heads” (P.P. Chistiakov, Pis'ma, zapisnye knizhki, vospominaniia 1832–1900. Materialy podgotovleny k pečati i primečaniia k nim sostavleny E. Beliutinyi i N. Molevoi [Letters, Notebooks, Memoirs 1832–1900. Materials prepared for publication and notes to them by E. Beliutin and N. Moleva] [Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1953], p. 513).
70. Through the process of attrition and through the elimination of posts after the death of a teacher or upon his transfer to another course, after 1839 and beyond the period when the Whistlers lived in St. Petersburg, Voinov and Vistelius were the teachers of drawing Courses 1 and 2 (Moleva and Beliutin, Russkaia khudozhestvennaia shkola, pp. 352–353).

Ivan Aleksandrovich Voinov (1796 – St. Petersburg 26 September / 8 October 1861), portrait painter, was a pupil in the Academy from 1800 to 1812. In 1808, he received the small silver medal and in 1809 the large: each award was for a life drawing. In 1811, he was awarded the small gold medal for the program assigned him on the theme of An Old Man and a Boy Performing Some Kind of Exercise (Starik s mal'chikom v kakom libo upražhnenii). In 1812, he was awarded the large gold medal for the program A Recruit Saying Goodbye to His Family (Rekrut, proshchaiushchiiisia so svoim semeistvom) and also received a first-class certificate as portrait painter. As a pensioner of the Academy, he was a teacher's assistant in the portrait class. In October 1817, he was appointed drawing teacher at the Academy. He was characterized at the end of the 1820s as using in his drawing class predominantly “originals” with a complicated pictorial form and basically connected with 18th-century images, and as preferring figures to heads. In 1848, he was awarded the title of academician and in 1859 that of adjunct professor. He also taught in the Society for the Encouragement of Artists. This biography is a composite drawn from the following sources: T.N. Gorina, ed., Khudozhniki narodov S.SSR: Biobibliograficheskii slovar' v shesti tomakh [Artists of the Peoples of the USSR: A Biobibliographical Dictionary in Six Volumes] (Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1972), vol. 2, p. 312; Moleva and Beliutin, Russkaia khudozhestvennaia shkola, pp. 68, 143, 352–353n12; Kondakov, Iubileinyi spravochnik, vol. 2, p. 41; P.N. Petrov, ed., Sbornik materialov dlia istorii imperatorskoi S.-Peterburgskoi Akademii khudozhestv za sto let ee sushchestvovaniia [A Collection of Materials for the History of the Imperial St. Petersburg Academy of Fine Arts for the One Hundred Years of Its Existence], vol. 1: 1864, vol. 2: 1865, vol. 3: 1866 (St. Petersburg: Komissioner Imperatorskoi Akademii Khudozhestv Gogenfel'den i Ko, 1864–1866), vol. 1, pp. 525, 532, 537, 538, 557, 564, 567; vol. 2, pp. 9, 32, 35, 36, 48, 93; A.E. Iundolov, comp., Ukazatel' k Sborniku materialov dlia istorii Imperatorskoi S.-Peterburgskoi Akademii khudozhestv za sto let ee sushchestvovaniia, izdannomu pod redaktsiei Pochetnogo Vol'nogo Obshchnika Akademii P.N. Petrova s ego primechaniiami [Index to A Collection of Materials for the History of the Imperial St. Petersburg Academy of Fine Arts for the One Hundred Years of Its Existence, published under the editorship of P.N. Petrov, Honorary Free Associate of the Academy, with notes by him] (St. Petersburg: M.M. Stasiulevich, 1887), p. 45.

The son of a joiner, Ivan Ivanovich Vistelius (Novgorod Province 1802 – St. Petersburg 4/16 February 1872), miniaturist, was a pupil in the Academy from 1813 to 1827. His teacher was A.G. Varnek (1782–1843). In 1825, he received the small silver medal and in 1826 the large: each award was for a life drawing. In 1827, he was awarded the small gold medal for the program assigned him on the theme of The Feat of the Kievan Youth Who, to Save the Family of His Ruler and to Deliver Kiev, Which Was Surrounded by Pecheneg Forces, Swam across the Dnepr to Communicate Important News to His Countrymen, Risking His Life by Doing This in Full View of the Enemy (abbreviated Russian title, Podvig Kievliana). In this same year, he also received a first-class certificate as artist 14th grade and was appointed drawing teacher at the Academy. He was characterized at the end of the 1820s as favoring the use in his drawing class of “originals” that were basically pale-colored outline drawings of figures from antiquity. In 1831, he was awarded the title of “nominee” and assigned a program for the title of academician: Portrait of V.K. Shebuev (Portret V.K. Shebueva) (1777–1855), rector of the Academy (today in the Gosudarstvennyi Russkii muzei [GRM] [State Russian Museum], St. Petersburg). In 1832, he was assigned a further program for the title of academician: to paint Narcissus Looking at Himself in the Water (Nartsis, smotriashchiiisia v vodu); the size of the figure was required to be four vershki: i.e., seven inches (a vershok = 1¾ inches). In 1836, for the title of actual academician, he was assigned a program to paint a miniature on the theme of Cain Becoming Sensible of the Evil Deed He Has Committed (Kain, po chuvstvovaniu svoershennoe im zlodeianie); the size of the picture was left to his own discretion. He failed to be elected at this time and did not receive the title of academician until 1848. Other works by Vistelius are a lithograph of Ossian (Ossian) (from the original by F. Gerard); an engraving of Alexander I Saving a Sick Peasant (Aleksandr I spasae bol'nogo krest'ianina) (from the painting by Karl P. Briullov); a pencil drawing of Amor and Psyche (Amur i Psikheia) (in the State Russian Museum). Vistelius taught in the Academy from 1827 to 1871, becoming an adjunct professor in 1859. He also taught in the Drawing School of the Society for the Encouragement of Artists from 1843 to 1859 and in the Land Survey School and the Patriotic Institute. He was interested in lithography. A watercolor portrait of him was painted in 1856 by K.K. Zinoviev. Vistelius has been characterized by Moleva and Belutin as a more talented artist than Voinov and a top teacher.

This biography is a composite drawn from the following sources: T.N. Gorina, Khudozhniki narodov SSSR, vol. 2, p. 285, and vol. 4, bk. 1, p. 318; Moleva and Belutin, Russkaia khudozhestvennaia shkola, pp. 68, 143, 268, 353, 389; Kondakov, Iubileinyi spravocnik, vol. 2, pp. 39, 76; Petrov, Sbornik materialov, vol. 2, pp. 52, 207, 209, 213, 222–223, 224, 260, 274, 333, 342, and vol. 3, pp. 274–275, 339; Iundolov, Ukazatel', pp. 43, 91; Èsfir Atsarkina, Karl Pavlovich Briullov: zhizn' i tvorchestvo [Karl Pavlovich Briullov: Life and Works] (Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1963), p. 327; Chistiakov, Pis'ma, pp. 477, 577; E.N. Teviashov, Opisanie neskolk'kikh graviur i litografii. Sostavil po svoemu sobraniu E.N. Teviashov [Description of Some Engravings and Lithographs. Compiled from his own collection by E.N. Teviashov] (St. Petersburg: V. Kirshbaum, 1903), p. 76.

71. MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 19, p. 11. Vistelius's name is in the upper right corner; Whistler's is in the lower right. MacDonald did not transliterate the names from the Russian; instead, she transcribed them as though they had been written in English: thus her incomprehensible spellings, "Burmereiyez/Buarepr." MacDonald very kindly supplied me with a photocopy of the drawing. Unable to obtain a photograph of the drawing, I have transliterated the two Russian names from the reproduction of the drawing in her book (MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 19, p. 11). The final letter in each surname in Russian is the "hard sign" (tyrdyi znak), which until 1917 was placed at the end of all Russian words ending in a consonant. When in this position, it is not transliterated; therefore, I have not rendered what became MacDonald's final "z" and "r." The quality and size of the reproduction do not permit me to deal with all of the inscriptions on it. The name "James Whistler" in English is visible below the Russian version "Visler." See also Seriakov, "Moia trudovaia zhizn'," pp. 350–351.

72. The drawing has the following history:

Drawn in St. Petersburg, 1847/8: probably sent to Mr. or Mrs. Thomas Winans because, according to Miss Elsie Célèste Hutton, she found the drawing among her mother's papers at Thomas Winans' villa 'Alexandroffsky' in Baltimore (note on photograph, GUL); on 9 June 1950, she wrote to J. Revillon, 'I am so glad to have you tell me about the drawing in pencil of the girls head and the Russian signature. I couldn't make out what that was' (9 June 1950, GUL: Whistler Collection, Rev 1955 3/186-7): passed by family descent to the present owner. (MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 19, pp. 11–12)

The private collection was in New Jersey at the time of publication of the Catalogue Raisonné (MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 19, p. 11). Its present location is unknown.

MacDonald assigned the date "1847/8" to the drawing. This was, of course, determined by style. James's name being in the register of the Academy for 1848 confirms the supposition that he made this drawing in 1847/48 and submitted it to Vistelius in 1848. MacDonald's analysis that, rather than being a copy from a plaster cast as Joseph Revillon thought, "[i]t is more likely to be a careful copy of a neoclassical drawing, or rather an engraving or lithographic copy after such a drawing, since it appears to be imitating the printer's style," cannot be refuted, given that James was in Course 1: "Drawing from Originals of Heads." The "original" he used was either a drawing or an engraved or lithographed copy of a drawing, and it was indeed "very likely that it was both supervised and corrected by ... Koritskii" (MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, p. 12).

73. Entry for Tuesday 10th March [1846], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
74. Entry for Thursday 5th/17th of April [1845], within the entry for Thursday 10th April [1845], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
75. Seriakov, "Moia trudovaia zhizn'," pp. 350–351.

76. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 737, fol. 62v. Klassnyi zhurnal po chasti Inspektora na 1846, 1847, i 1848 god [The Inspector's Class Journal for 1846, 1847, and 1848].
77. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 17v. (see Note 57 above for document title).
78. MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, p. 11.
79. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Scarsdale, April 3, 1854, GUL: Whistler Collection, W432. She seemed to think "originals" meant her children's copies.
80. On inquiring about student work at RGIA, whose holdings include Fond 789: Imperial Academy of Fine Arts, I was told that the fond did not contain work submitted for graduation (diplomnye raboty); but then, James was not a full-time student. I was also informed at the Archive of the Academy of Fine Arts that they do not have any drawing by Whistler.
81. Entry for Thursday 5th/17th of April [1845], within the entry for Thursday 10th April [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II; entry for Saturday, Sept. 20, [1846]; entry for Saturday Dec 5th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. Saturday was 19 September in 1846. On Sunday, 20 September, Anna Whistler would not have written in her diary.
82. Entry for Saturday Dec 5th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
83. William Whistler to James Whistler S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg Monday Oct. 2 [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W974. An "écorché" is a figure usually in the form of a statuette, shown without skin to expose the muscular construction of the body (David G. Diamond, ed. Bulfinch Pocket Dictionary of Art Terms, 3rd rev. ed. (Boston: Little, Brown, 1992), s.v. "écorché").
84. Entry for Monday 27th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
85. Entry for Monday 27th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
86. "Once, he said, in London with his father, he had not been well, and he had been given a hot foot-bath, and he could never forget how he sat looking at his foot, and then got his paper and colours and set to work to make a study of it, 'and in Russia,' he added, 'I was always doing that sort of thing'" (Pennell and Pennell, Life of Whistler, vol. 1, p. 15). A similar quotation can be found in Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, p. 171. Major Whistler came to England only once during the time he was working in Russia: to attend Debo's wedding in October 1847. He and James went from Preston to London without the other family members to meet Francis Seymour Haden and traveled back to Preston with him for the wedding.

87. Entry for Saturday afternoon. May 30th [1846], NYPL: AWP, Part II. This entry marks the first appearance of Koritskii's surname in the diaries.
 Either Willie was also in this sketch, or there was more than one of "baby" by Koritskii, for, in 1908, William Whistler's second wife, Helen (Tonides) Whistler (1849–1917), wrote to Elizabeth R. Pennell asking "to borrow a pencil drawing of my husband about 10 years old in Russian dress with a younger brother "Johnnie" in a quaint kind of go-cart, this was drawn by their drawing-master in St. Petersburg" (Helen Whistler to E.R. Pennell, Sept. 23, 1908, LC: P-W, box 304, W–Z, fols. 4963–4).
88. St. Petersburg Sketchbook, fol. 23, Hunterian Art Gallery, Glasgow University; MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, pp. 4, 5.
89. Entry for Saturday evening. Feb 27th [1847], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
90. Major G.W. Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Wed., August 9, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W656.
91. Anna Whistler to James Whistler In my room. St. Petersburg, tuesday evening Sept 26th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W361.
92. Entry for Thursday 5th/17th of April [1845], within the entry for Thursday 10th April [1845], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
93. James wrote to his family in the remaining four months of 1848. He was unable to discipline himself to send a letter regularly along with the one Debo wrote once a fortnight to her parents or the one Mr. Fairbanks wrote every Friday to Major Whistler, but he managed to comply sometimes and friends personally carried some of them. Their receipt and some of their contents is reflected in the letters of his parents and Willie (Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg, Oct. 3rd 1848. Tuesday, GUL: Whistler Collection, W363; Anna Whistler to James Whistler Thursday. Sept. 30th Oct. 12th 1848. St. Petersburg, W364; Anna Whistler to James Whistler Friday evening Oct. 20th 1848, W365; George W. Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Oct. 27/Nov. 8 1848, W659; Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg. Sunday night Nov. 5th 1848, W367; Anna

- Whistler to James Whistler In the drawing room, with Willie on sofa Friday 22nd Dec 1848, W374).
94. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
  95. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848.
  96. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848.
  97. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848. The whereabouts of this drawing are unknown. MacDonald does not record it in Catalogue Raisonné. It would seem to have been executed in 1848. Its biblical subject is taken from 1 Samuel 28 (James Hall, Dictionary of Subjects and Symbols in Art [London: John Murray, 1974], p. 343).
  98. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [St. Petersburg] Friday evening Oct. 20th, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W365.
  99. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
  100. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg November 1st 1848.
  101. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg November 1st 1848. In 1841, the American portrait painter John Goffe Rand (1801–1873), living in London, invented the paint tube. “Made from tin and sealed with a screw cap,” it replaced the accident-prone pig’s bladder for storing paint. Its portability freed painters from confinement to their studios. It also introduced “dazzling new paint pigments such as chrome yellow and emerald green – that had been invented by industrial chemists” (Perry Hurt, “Color App,” Smithsonian Magazine 44, no. 2 [May 2013]: p. 20).
  102. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg. Dec. 4th 1848. Monday Evening, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
  103. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
  104. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St Petersburg. Sunday night. Nov. 5th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W367.

105. William Whistler to James Whistler S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg Monday Oct. 2 [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W974.
106. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Dec. 4th 1848. Monday Evening, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
107. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg] Tuesday morning Dec 12th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W372.
108. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Dec. 4th 1848. Monday Evening, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
109. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg, Dec. 4th 1848; Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg. December 25 and 26, 1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375 and W376; James Whistler to George W. Whistler [London] Friday even. January 26 [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
110. Anna Whistler to James Whistler S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366; Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg. December 25 and 26, 1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375 and W376.
111. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg] Thursday 3/15th Feb. [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W382.
112. William Whistler to James Whistler S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978.
113. William Whistler to James Whistler S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849.
114. William Whistler to James Whistler S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849.
115. Although the Whistlers lost touch with Koritskii, mention of James's attachment to him came up again in September 1852, when Koritskii's name appeared for the last time in Anna Whistler's extant letters. Writing to her 18-year-old son at West Point, she expressed the hope that he would enjoy his drawing lessons there and feel similar affection for "the American artist" – probably his professor of drawing, Robert W. Weir (1803–1889) – "as you loved Karitzkie and M.<sup>r</sup> Boxall so ardently" (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Scarsdale, 3 Sept. 1852, GUL: Whistler Collection, W413). Weir "had succeeded Charles Robert Leslie in 1834" (Lochnan, Etchings, p. 11).

116. Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, p. 22; Elizabeth R. Pennell, Whistler the Friend (Philadelphia: J.B. Lippincott, 1930), pp. 130–131.
117. Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 1, pp. 127–129. See also F.F. L’vov, “Obshchestvo pooshchreniia khudozhnikov v 1850–1862 gg.” [“The Society for the Encouragement of Artists in 1850–1862”], Russkaia starina (August 1881): p. 635.
118. Pennell and Pennell, Life of Whistler, vol. 1, p. 233. The Pennells also mention that he spoke of “my Russian cradle” (Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, pp. 180–181).
119. Gosudarstvennyi Russkii muzei Otdel rukopisei [State Russian Museum Manuscript Division], St. Petersburg (hereafter, GRM OR): Fond 22, d. 37. Fond Zheleznova Mikhaila Ivanovicha Kratkie zapisi Koritskogo A.O. (uchenik K.P. Briullova) o zhizni i rabotakh K.P. Briullova 1843–1847 [Collection of M.I. Zheleznov. Brief notes by A.O. Koritskii (pupil of K.P. Briullov) about the life and works of K.P. Briullov 1843–1847] (hereafter, GRM OR: Koritskii, Zapisi), fol. 22v. The photocopy of this page in my possession is clearly marked 23 in the upper right-hand corner, but the archivist wrote “f. 22v” on it when identifying the file. I am inclined to think that the sitter was James, because Anna Whistler recorded on 11/23 January 1847 that “Jemie often had crossed on the ice to the Academy of Fine Arts to spend an hour or two of the early part of the day in the study of his drawing master” (entry for January 1847 / Saturday 23rd of our style being 11th of Russian style, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II). In other words, there is a period of twelve days between Koritskii’s entry and Anna Whistler’s (between 11 January and 23 January NS), during which James often went to the Academy. It is, of course, likely that he was going to work with Koritskii, but he could have been sitting for his portrait (whereabouts unknown) as well. Willie Whistler spent at least two mornings sitting to Koritskii for his portrait (whereabouts unknown) in March 1847 (entry for Wednesday March 23rd [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II). Major Whistler was sitting for his portrait (whereabouts unknown) to someone unidentified, but that was in May 1848 (entries for 19 May [1848] and 22 May [1848], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II). All of this, I believe, makes James the likely candidate for “the American.”

Koritskii’s diary does not specifically indicate whether “the American” was present when he was painting the portrait, but he was working on it in the same room as a fellow student, Faddei

Antonovich Goretskii (1825–1868; see Image 185), and Briullov, so they knew who the subject was (Dec. 30 (OS) [1846] [Jan. 11 (NS) 1847], GRM OR: Koritskii, Zapisi).

120. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Wednesday November 1st, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
121. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 8 Dec. [18]48, GUL: Whistler Collection, W976.
122. Entry for August 12/24th Monday [1846], NYPL: AWPD, Part II.
123. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Stonington, Wednesday Aug. 27th [18]51, GUL: Whistler Collection, W395.

Briullov strove for what he called “effect” in some of his portraits of women, a reference to his deliberate exaggeration of colors (N.M. Moleva, Vydaishchiesia russkie khudozhniki-pedagogi [Outstanding Russian Artist-Teachers] [Moscow: s.n., [1962]], p. 19). It is not possible to say specifically which of his portraits Anna Whistler had in mind, but an outstanding example of “effect” (which was not in his studio) is his Portrait of Countess Iu. P. Samoilova with Her Adopted Daughter, Giovanina Pacini, and a Blackamoor (Portret gr. Iu. P. Samoilovoi s vospitanitsej Dzhovanino Pacini i arapchonom) (1832–34), in which shades of red predominate (see Image 206). Behind Samoilova is a red velvet drapery, and the shawl grasped by the blackamoor before it slips off her arm is red, as are the edging of his garment, the flower design in the rug, the cloth covering the walls, and the upholstery of the couch. Surrounded by fire, Samoilova, with an arm around Giovanina’s shoulder, sails into the room, an ethereal being in sky-blue shot silk, which echoes the blue of the heavens visible behind her through a door onto a balcony (G.K. Leontieva, Karl Pavlovich Briullov [Leningrad: Khudozhnik RSFSR, 1986], pp. 22–25, 183; M. Rakova, “K.P. Briullov – portretist” [“K.P. Briullov, Portrait Painter”], in Ocherki po istorii russkogo portreta pervoi poloviny XIX veka [Studies in the History of the Russian Portrait in the First Half of the XIX Century] (Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1966), p. 185).

124. L’vov, “Obshchestvo pooshchreniia,” p. 634.
125. Elizabeth Rigby (see Image 190) describes in her memoirs of Russia and Estonia her visit to Briullov’s studio and apartment as well as to other artists’ studios (Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 2, letter 25, pp. 271–272).

126. Anna Whistler to James Whistler St. Petersburg Wednesday November 1st 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
127. Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, p. 7.
128. This and the previous quotations in this paragraph are from the entry for Saturday. May 2nd [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
129. Ukazatel' khudozhestvennykh proizvedenii, vystavlennykh v zalakh Imperatorskoi Akademii khudozhestv [Index of the Works of Art Exhibited in the Salons of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts] (St. Petersburg: Imperatorskaia Akademiia Nauk, 1846), p. 18.
130. Entry for Saturday Sept. 20th [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. The date should be the 19th.
131. Entry for Saturday. May 2nd [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. The Brass Serpent was in the permanent collection of the Academy. Bruni's biography and a discussion of reactions to this painting can be found in Notes 328 and 329 in NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
132. Entry for Wednesday, March 23rd [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. Wednesday was 24 March. Aivazovskii's biography and further information concerning this exhibit can be found in Notes 714–716 in NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
133. Entry for Wednesday March 23rd [1847].
134. Entry for Wednesday March 23rd [1847].
135. James Whistler to George Whistler 62 Sloane St, entry for Saturday evening 27th in letter of Friday even Jan. 26. (1849), GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
136. The Hermitage at the time of the Whistlers' sojourn in St. Petersburg consisted of "the Hermitage proper (or little Hermitage), which stands beside [the Winter Palace and was] built to the designs of Vallin de la Mothe in 1769; the Old or Great Hermitage, completed in 1787 by Felten for the express purpose of housing the rapidly expanding collection of pictures; the theater designed (also in 1787) by Quarenghi, erected on the site of Peter the Great's Winter Palace and joined to Felten's building by a gallery running over the Winter Canal." (Boris Piotrovsky, The Hermitage: Its History and Collections [New York: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, [1982]], p. 15). The plans for a fourth building, the New Hermitage, designed by Leo von Klenze (1784–1864), were approved by Nicholas I in 1842 (V.F. Levinson-Lessing, Istoriia Kartinnoi galerei Ermitazha 1764–1917 [A History of the Picture Gallery of the Hermitage 1764–1917] [Leningrad: Iskusstvo, 1985], p. 9). The New Hermitage was in the process of being built throughout the remainder of the 1840s. It was completed in 1851 and opened in 1852 as a public museum (Levinson-Lessing, Istoriia Kartinnoi galerei Ermitazha, p. 10). An 1846 guide to St. Petersburg explained that “at present the greater part of the Hermitage is undergoing reconstruction and only those rooms from the previous building which face toward the Neva facade have been preserved,” but it was possible to view them (Aleksii Grech, comp., Ves’ Peterburg v karmane: Spravochnaia kniga dlia stolichnykh zhitelei i prieszhikh, s planami Sanktpeterburga i chetyrekh teatrov [All of Petersburg in Your Pocket: A Handbook for Inhabitants of and Visitors to the Capital, with plans of St. Petersburg and four theaters, 1st ed. (St. Petersburg: N. Grech, 1846) (hereafter, Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1846), p. 94; see also Ivan Pushkarev, Istoricheskiĭ ukazatel’ dostopamiatnosti Sankt-Peterburga [Historical Index to Memorable St. Petersburg Sights] (St. Petersburg: Konrad Vingeber, 1846), p. 118). James and Willie were too young to visit the Hermitage in 1843.

It also has to be remembered that when the Whistlers were in St. Petersburg, the Hermitage was not a separate institution with its own director, but “a continuation of the Winter Palace” and the property of the Imperial family (Levinson-Lessing, Istoriia Kartinnoi galerei Ermitazha, pp. 8, 130). As such, access to it on the part of the public was limited (Levinson-Lessing, pp. 9, 129). It was not until the 1860s that it attained a certain independence from the Court administration, and in 1863 it was permitted to have its own director (Levinson-Lessing, pp. 10–11).

137. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Wednesday November 1st. 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366.
138. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Wednesday November 1st. 1848.
139. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, On board the steamer “City of Aberdeen,” Friday noon Sept. 15th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W359.
140. Up until the 1990s, the name of the artist was misread as Fiefster. The closest approximation to Fiessler in Russia is Fessler: e.g., an Adolf Fessler was a pupil of Konstantin Aivazovskii, Russian marine painter (Amburger Datenbank, Osteuropa Institut München/Historische Abteilung [Munich, Germany] [hereafter, Amburger Datenbank], ID 17303). He, however, seems unlikely to have painted James’s portrait.

141. The portrait passed from Mary Brennan to her niece, Mary Brennan Barrett (see the Brennan, Bergin, and Keefe family biographies in Appendix E [hereafter Brennan, Bergin, Keefe]). It was sold by the Barrett family to a family named Armstrong, eventually becoming the property of Edward A. Armstrong and his sister, Lucia Armstrong Williams, of Richmond, Virginia. They put the portrait up for sale around 1994 in the Mayo Gallery in Richmond, Virginia, where I saw it. It was later auctioned at Sotheby's and donated by the purchaser to the National Portrait Gallery in Washington, DC. The measurements are 28.1 x 23.3 cm (11 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>16</sub> x 9<sup>3</sup>/<sub>8</sub> in.). This information is based on conversations I had with Robert Mayo and Edward A. Armstrong.
142. Eric Denker, In Pursuit of the Butterfly Portraits of James McNeill Whistler (Washington, DC: National Portrait Gallery; Seattle: University of Washington Press, 1995), p. 21.
143. Denker, Pursuit, p. 21.
144. MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, pp. 10–11.
145. My supposition is based on the fact that when Major Whistler died Mr. Biber wrote to Anna Whistler “of the great affliction of his brother at the loss of his first patron” (William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg 10 May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978).
146. Mel'nikov, Svedeniia, fol. 198v; E.J. Harden, “Major George Washington Whistler, Railroad Engineer, in Russia: 1842–49,” in Ex Oriente Lux Mélanges offertes en hommage au professeur Jean Blankoff à l'occasion de ses soixante ans, vol. 1 (Brussels: Centre d'Etude des Pays de l'Es, 1991), p. 157n35.
147. Entry for English Quai – Ritter–Dom. Sept 23<sup>d</sup>, NYPL: AWP, Part I.
148. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg] Tuesday morning Dec 12th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W372.
149. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg] Tuesday morning Dec 12th [1848].
150. Anna Whistler to James Whistler [St. Petersburg] Tuesday morning Dec 12th [1848].
151. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even. Jan. 26 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661. Kate (Prince) Livermore said: “[I]t is a lovely picture but I should never have known that it was intended for Jemie at [?] period of his life; his - eyes were a deep blue, were deep set, and were large” (Kate [Prince] Livermore to Elizabeth Robbins Pennell, Sept. 5th 1906, LC: P-W, box 292, L, fol. 2900).

152. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even. Jan. 26 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
  153. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even. Jan. 26 1849.
  154. Melissa Banta, “Portrait of an Artist as a Boy: James McNeill Whistler, 1834–1903,” in A Curious and Ingenious Art: Reflections on Daguerreotypes at Harvard (Iowa City: University of Iowa Press for the Harvard University Library, 2000), p. 117; Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr. London, Monday 25 June 1849, LC: P-W, box 34. In this letter, Anna Whistler said: “Mr. Haden will take me [to Kilburn’s studio], as you so flatteringly wish it & my boys too before we leave London.”
  155. Banta, “Portrait of an Artist as a Boy,” p. 119.
  156. Entry for Saturday evening. Feb 27 [1847], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
  157. Anna Whistler to George Whistler, Tuesday morning June 8th 1847. Steamer Nicolai, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353.
  158. Anna Whistler to George Whistler, Tuesday morning June 8th 1847. Steamer Nicolai.
  159. James Whistler to George W. Whistler Preston Monday June 21st 47 – Saturday July 3 [1847], GUL: Whistler Collection, W654.
  160. James Whistler to George W. Whistler Preston Monday June 21st 47 – Saturday July 3 [1847].
  161. James Whistler to George W. Whistler Preston Monday June 21st 47 – Saturday July 3 [1847].
  162. Entries for July. thursday 6th [1848] on board the Camilla and Shantlin [sic]. Isle of Wight – its southern coast. Saturday July 22nd [1848], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
  163. Entry for Shantlin [sic]. Isle of Wight – its southern coast. Saturday July 22nd [1848].
  164. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, In the drawing room, with Willie on sofa Friday 22nd Dec 1848, entry of Monday 1st Jan New Years day. N.S. 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W374.

165. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, In the drawing room, with Willie on sofa Friday 22nd Dec 1848, entry of Monday 1st Jan New Years day. N.S. 1849.
166. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Sunday night Nov. 5th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W367.
167. Emma W. Palmer to Elizabeth Pennell, Stonington, Dec. 17th [1906] with extract, LC: P-W, box 296.
168. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even: 26. Jan. 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
169. James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St entry of Monday 19 [March] within letter of Saturday 17 March 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W386.
170. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even: Jan. 26. 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
171. James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St entry of Monday 19 [March] within letter of Saturday 17 March 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W386. The title of this text is actually Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters (1845); the error occurs in the letter.
172. Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison [London] Monday. June 25 [1849], LC: P-W, box 34; James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London May 9th 1849, GUL: Laver Papers.
173. The quotations in this paragraph are from Lochnan, Etchings, p. 4.
174. Lochnan, p. 5.
175. Undated continuation (after the beginning of 1848) of the entry for Preston. September. Saturday 10th [1847], NYPL: AWPD, Part II.
176. Quotations in this paragraph are from Lochnan, Etchings, pp. 5–6.
177. This and the preceding quotation are from Lochnan, p. 7.
178. James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St, entry of Monday 19 [March] within letter of Saturday 17 March 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W386.
179. Lochnan, Etchings, p. 3.
180. James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St, entry of Monday 19 [March] within letter of Saturday 17 March 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W386.

181. Lochnan, Etchings, p. 7. For Lochnan's detailed discussion of what James would have taken to heart from Leslie's lectures, see pp. 7–9.
182. James Whistler to Anna Whistler 62 Sloane St Saturday 17 March 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W386.
183. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [St. Petersburg, December 25, 1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W376; James Whistler to Anna Whistler, 62 Sloane St, Saturday 17 March 1849, W386; MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, no. 21, p. 12. Explaining to his mother that Seymour had corrected his drawing of Annie, James did not want to send it to her, preferring to wait until he had made another, uncorrected drawing.
184. Deborah (Whistler) Haden to James Whistler [London, July 28, 1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, H10.
185. James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London May 9th 1849, GUL: Laver Papers.
186. James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London May 9th 1849.
187. James B. Francis to his wife, Sarah, London May 9th 1849. In 1879, Francis visited the famous James Whistler, "considered the best etcher in England." He "could see nothing good" in those paintings of Whistler's that he viewed, but presumed that the fault lay with him, for he had also attended H.M.S. Pinafore and "could see no fun in it" (James B. Francis to his son, George E. Francis. London June 19, 1879, GUL: Laver Papers). His obituary stated that he had no "taste for music except the song of birds" (William E. Worthen, "Life and Works of James B. Francis": Essay 10 (read on 20 February 1893), Contributions of the Old Residents' Historical Association, Lowell, Mass. 5, no. 2 (March 1894): p. 241). The same was true of his taste for art. For his biography see The National Cyclopaedia of American Biography, 64 vols. [New York: James T. White, 1891–1984], vol. 2, s.v. "Francis, James Bicheno."
188. James Whistler to George W. Whistler, 62 Sloane St Friday even. Jan. 25 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W661.
189. "The early years and boyhood of James McNeill Whistler," by Miss Emma W. Palmer, GUL: Whistler Collection, P44.
190. "The early years and boyhood of James McNeill Whistler."
191. This felicitous comment was made by an unidentified member of the audience at a lecture given in 1994 at the Kennan Institute in Washington, DC, by Elena Borovskaia. An art historian from St. Petersburg, she was interested in Whistler's "influence on the Russian art of his time." I wish to thank the Kennan Institute for kindly supplying a tape of the lecture.

192. The idea that Whistler's later aristocratic view of himself may have had its foundation in his St. Petersburg years was suggested by another unidentified member of the audience at the abovementioned lecture given in 1994 at the Kennan Institute in Washington, DC, by Elena Borovskaia.
193. Entry for Preston. Lancashire, England. June 26th 1847 Saturday NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
194. Entry for Thursday [May] 29th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.

WILLIAM MCNEILL WHISTLER (WILLIE)

William Whistler (see Images 27, 30), the child and adolescent, was seven to almost thirteen years old during his sojourn in Russia. Like James (see Images 24–29), he was beautiful to look at and for several of their early years they resembled one another. In the Dessain portrait (see Image 27), they almost look like twins, and are both slender. But Willie was robust in health compared to James: “round, ruddy and hard as a Spitsbergen Apple.”<sup>1</sup> He did not suffer from a major chronic illness, nor did he fall sick from minor bouts of cold and flu as often as his older brother. In 1848, however, possibly because he was entering puberty, Willie became fat. In June of that year, after he had been on an inspection trip with his father while James was suffering from another attack of rheumatic fever, Anna Whistler recorded how fat he was.<sup>2</sup> He had a face “like ‘plum pudding Jack.’”<sup>3</sup> Even in referring to his excellent progress in his studies, his mother, calling him “our little Parson elect,” exclaimed “what a student the fat boy is.” He became thinner while attending Baxter’s Commercial School that fall,<sup>4</sup> perhaps because he was so unhappy there.

In temperament he was gentle, tractable, obedient, studious, probably slow in his speech and deliberate in his movements,<sup>5</sup> and a homebody. As he was “rather less excitable than Jemmie, & therefore more tractable,” Anna Whistler (see Images 1–5) preferred to take “this gentlest of my dear boys” as her interpreter when she went shopping.<sup>6</sup> Observing Willie during their 1847 trip to England, she felt that in his manliness as he strode “about the deck holding the Capt’s hand & talking German so eagerly with him”; in his “lovely combination of gentleness and determination to do what is right”; in his constant concern for her when she was seasick, he “was prompted by his dear father, whom he is so much like.”<sup>7</sup>

An obedient child, he held his parents’ views and mouthed similar thoughts. He accepted that his mother approved only of puppet shows but not of the theater. He was surprised that James attended private parties in England that he and their parents had seen held up to ridicule in Punch.<sup>8</sup> He did not understand how James, knowing that their parents disapproved of such snobbish parties, would nevertheless participate and risk injury to his health as well.<sup>9</sup> Major Whistler's last words to him, "Goodbye, be a good boy,"<sup>10</sup> were hardly necessary.

Anna Whistler constantly held Willie up for James to emulate.<sup>11</sup> Recounting to him the abusive treatment Willie suffered at Baxter's, she asked him whether he was not sorry that he was "ever ... rough to so gentle and loving a brother?"<sup>12</sup> None of this changed James's nature, nor did it mar or weaken the brothers' close relationship, which lasted until Willie's death.<sup>13</sup>

* * *

While Koritskii (see Images 167–170) had been engaged solely to give drawing lessons to James, Willie took drawing lessons from their regular tutor, Mr. Biber, but there was a certain amount of interaction: Koritskii lent models to Mr. Biber;<sup>14</sup> Willie was present when Koritskii came to their home on Saturdays; and on at least one occasion Koritskii drew him. Willie was thus engaged in seeing Koritskii drawing and at work with James and participated in the excitement of that atmosphere. We know that he painted some watercolors for James when the latter was sick, that he went to the Academy in March of 1847 to sit to Koritskii for his portrait and saw the exhibits there, and that there is documentation for his acquaintance with Briullov (see Image 173). But James's enrollment at the Academy apparently prompted him to want to take a drawing course, too.

In 1846, when James was not enrolled, Willie, who was nine years and seven months old, was registered in Drawing Course 1: "From Originals of Heads" (see Image 162).<sup>15</sup> Koritskii signed the receipt book at the Academy on 18 February / 2 March 1846, and paid nine rubles for ticket No. 341, which was issued to "Villiam Uistler, son of a Major in American service" (see Image 161).<sup>16</sup> "Villiam" is also registered in the "Book of Addresses of Academy Pupils for 1846" (see Image 162),<sup>17</sup> but only his ticket number and name are recorded. In the columns for noting down documents presented in order to register, and for his address, nothing appears. He was one of 475 students registered for 1846.<sup>18</sup> Willie seems even to have submitted a drawing at a monthly examination just two weeks later: "341. Uistler, Villiam" in Course 1 was ranked "28" in a group of 52 students for his drawing at an examination held on 2 March 1846 (14 March NS).<sup>19</sup> His ranking was reassessed and changed to “38” (see Image 162).<sup>20</sup>

* * *

Willie was the only Whistler child to remain in St. Petersburg until his father’s death. Parting with James in the fall of 1848 distressed him very much “& for some time, [he] could not bear to hear [James’s] name mentioned without the tears coming to his eyes.”<sup>21</sup> Once he was back in Russia, the question of his education became paramount, and his parents did not know whether to hire tutors or send him to a private school. They considered hiring a previous tutor, Monsieur La Roche, to teach him again,<sup>22</sup> but ended up sending him to Baxter’s Commercial School.<sup>23</sup>

He tried very hard to please his parents by being a good student. He had hated boarding at Monsieur Jourdan’s in 1846, and the necessity of parting with his mother on Sunday night after a day-and-a-half weekend at home had inevitably reduced him to tears.<sup>24</sup> In his homesickness, he was “a complete Whistler,” very like his father and his half-brother, Joseph Swift Whistler.<sup>25</sup> While Anna Whistler had sympathized with him “tenderly” then, duty, she had felt, required her to conceal her sympathy in the hope that “time may reconcile him to his privations.” Asked by her whether he wanted to stay home instead, he had bravely answered that “it is right to go to school and I will do all fathers wishes.” He had brought her “the best testimonials from his masters,” and she did not think he would “disappoint his father.” It was the same when he was sent to Baxter’s. He “dislike[d] going there so much”<sup>26</sup> and “was sad when the weather forced him to have to board for a few days.”<sup>27</sup> For a while, Anna Whistler reported, “the boys flocked around him as a natural curiosity, because he is an American,” but then let him alone, “call[ing] him Independent.”<sup>28</sup> She also reported that he became “the pet of the whole school,” loved by “all the boys and all the teachers.”<sup>29</sup> How long “all the boys” loved him is not clear, because he wrote to James, telling him of the continuing hazing and rough treatment he received: “they cuff him and taunt him, call him ‘American monkey’, ‘Milk Sop’ etc., when he asks them about the lessons he is to learn, they ‘have to get their own’ and will not oblige him, yet when he takes out his white roll to eat . . . for the

3 o'clock recess ... they beg him and he never refuses to share it."<sup>30</sup> Each evening, he recounted to his mother "the vexations of the day," and she, who had held English boys up as an example of good manners for her wild sons, decided that "the English lads here are of a degenerated stock." Major Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) counseled him "either to become entirely independent of the boys in lessons play and all, or to knock down any who touches him" and "to become hardened to rough and tumble."<sup>31</sup> Willie pointed out that "they attack him in a gang" and wished that the fearless James "were at the same school with him to fight his battles which he cannot do himself" because "his gentle spirit is principled against tit for tat."<sup>32</sup> His parents, who could do nothing, simply hoped that eventually the other boys might "find out what a high principled lad the Yankee is and that merit and forbearance will meet its reward." Despite his unhappiness at Baxter's, close to the end of their stay in Russia he was second in his class.<sup>33</sup>

Dr. Rogers advised them to send him back to England to study, as apparently in the climate of St. Petersburg there was a risk even "to a healthy boy in going from heated rooms to extreme frosty atmosphere, before and after daylight."<sup>34</sup> Had Major Whistler lived, and had James come home for the summer of 1849, Willie would most certainly have gone back to England with his feisty brother.

When he stopped in England with his mother on the decimated family's journey home, she sent him for that brief period to take lessons from the clergyman with whom James was studying,<sup>35</sup> ever aware of the fragmented education both were receiving. They could also be a solace to one another and talk of their father.

Willie "scarcely knew Jim," who had "grown so very tall and look[ed] much fatter than he used to."<sup>36</sup> They both had their daguerrotypes taken, as did Anna Whistler, by Kilburn (see Images 29–30; the whereabouts of the daguerreotype of Anna Whistler are unknown to me).<sup>37</sup> One of the few cultural events in London that Willie and Anna Whistler attended was the Royal Academy exhibition, where they saw James's portrait by William Boxall (see Images 28, 209).<sup>38</sup> Aunt Alicia (see Image 39) took the boys on a trip to Scotland.<sup>39</sup> They visited Preston, Liverpool, Fleetwood, and all the old haunts, saying what at that difficult moment might have seemed permanent goodbyes to their relatives and friends.<sup>40</sup> On 29 July 1849 they sailed for home.

* * *

The documentation for Willie's biography comes from the diaries and the family correspondence. Neither contains any mention of him as a pupil at the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. The information in the Pennells' correspondence with the Academy, while surprising and confusing, revealed that perhaps Willie had also attended the Academy, and my own research in the Russian State Historical Archives in St. Petersburg and the Pennell–Whistler Papers at the Library of Congress showed that there was indeed documentation for this supposition.

NOTES

1. John S. Maxwell to George W. Whistler, Paris. September 13th? 15th? 1845, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers.
2. Entry for June [1848], AWPDP, Part II. This single entry covers all of June. A.I. Shtukenberg recalls in his memoirs that Major Whistler visited him for the last time in Pen'kovo, accompanied by his little son (Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fol. 516).
3. This and the following two quotations are from Anna Whistler to James Whistler, [St. Petersburg] Monday morning Dec. 11th [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W371.
4. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Thursday. Sept. 30th Oct. 12th 1848. St. Petersburg, GUL: Whistler Collection, W364.
5. His slowness of speech and deliberateness of movement were described by Mrs. Leyland (Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, p. 105) and in his obituary (Obituary, William MacNeill Whistler, M.D., Senior Physician, London Throat Hospital, reprinted from the British Medical Journal [16 March 1900]: p. 3, GUL: Whistler Collection, W1021). Whether they were present in the child and adolescent is not supported by any manuscript or printed document I have consulted. I assume that as the quality of excitability was present in the young James, so slowness and deliberateness were features of the young Willie. Perhaps they were the result of a birth trauma.
6. Entry for Monday July 1st [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I.
7. Anna Whistler to George W. Whistler, Tuesday morning June 8th 1847. Steamer Nikolai, GUL: Whistler Collection, W353.
8. Anna Whistler to James Whistler S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg. Feb. 19th Monday eve [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W383.
9. Anna Whistler to James Whistler S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg. Feb. 19th Monday eve [1849].
10. William Whistler to James Whistler, S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg 10th May 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W978. When Willie returned to St. Petersburg after having spent the night at Alexandrofsky, his father was dead.
11. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Sept. 30th Oct. 12th 1848. St. Petersburg, GUL: Whistler Collection, W364; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Sunday night November 5th 1848, W367.

12. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Wed. Dec. 13. 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W373.
13. There was a rift between them for several years late in their lives (Pennell and Pennell, Whistler Journal, p. 254).
14. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Monday Oct 2nd [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W974.
15. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 737. Klassnyi zhurnal po chasti Inspektora na 1846, 1847 i 1848 god [Inspector's Class Journal for 1846, 1847 and 1848], fol. 20r; Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735 Spisok uchenikov Akademii Koim vydany biletu dlia poseshcheniia klassov s pokazaniem poluchennykh imi na èkzamenakh medalei. S 1845 po 1849 g. [List of Academy pupils to whom tickets were issued to attend classes, showing the medals received by them on examinations. From 1845 through 1849], fol. 14v.
16. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 734. Kniga o vydache biletov raznym litsam poseshchaiushchim Risoval'nye klassy IAKh za 1845 g. i 1846 g. [Book concerning the issuing of tickets to various persons attending drawing classes at the IAFA in 1845 and 1846], fol. 40r. On the inside cover it says: Spisok poseshchaiushchim raznogo zvaniia litsam Risoval'nye klassy Imp-skoi AKh o vydache onym dlia vkhoda v klassy biletov s ustanovlennoi platoi i proch. Za 1846 god. [List of persons of various callings attending drawing classes at the IAF, about the issuing of tickets to them for entrance to the classes, along with the established price, etc. For 1846].
17. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 736. Kniga adresov uchenikov Akademii 1846 g. [Book of Addresses of Academy Pupils for 1846], fol. 48r; Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 14v (see Note 15 above for document title).
18. Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 17v (see Note 15 above for document title).
19. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 737, fol. 20r and Fond 789, op. 19, d. 735, fol. 14 (see Note 15 above for document titles). The entry for James and Willie in d. 735 reads "Uistler, Iakov, Villiam," but the 28th place is assigned to ticket holder No. 341, who was Willie.
20. RGIA: Fond 789, op. 19, d. 730. Èkzamennaia kniga za 1843, 1844, 1845, 1846 i 1847 g. Spisok Imp-skoi AKh uchenikov poluchivshikh N°N° za risunki po Èkzameni proiskhodiashchemu 3 Marta 1846 god. [Examination book for 1843, 1844, 1845, 1846 and 1847. List of IAFA pupils who have received numbers for their drawings in the examination taking place on 3 March [15 March NS] 1846], fol. 97v.

The documentation showing that Willie attended the Academy is confused and puzzling. The confusion arises when we consult the “Examination Book for 1843, 1844, 1845, 1846 and 1847,” which contains “List of IAFA pupils who have received numbers for their drawings in the examination taking place on 3 March (OS) 1846.” Of the fifty-two students (listed non-alphabetically by surname only from 1 to 52) who took the examination in the course “From Originals of Heads,” “Uistler” is rated “38.” There is thus in this document a discrepancy in the date of the examination (3 March [OS] instead of 2 March [OS]) and in the number received for the drawing (38 instead of 28). In this list “28” was received by the student named “Zubov.” Confusion could have been eliminated had each student’s class admission ticket number been noted down as well, but unfortunately it was not. If we compare a group (thirteen) from these fifty-two surnames with the same surnames listed in “The Inspector’s Class Journal for 1846, 1847 and 1848” for 2 March (OS) 1846, we find that the numbers they received for drawings coincide in both documents in the case of eight students, while in the case of five students, including Whistler, the numbers received for drawings do not coincide in both documents. Three of the five had a number which differed in each document. Two students received the same number in the class journal, but only one of them could and did receive that number in the list of fifty-two students, a decision probably made by the vice-president. The day of the examination and the evaluation of the drawing may have been changed, but, according to the records, the examinee was ticket holder No. 341, who was registered in the Academy in 1846, and he was William Whistler.

21. Deborah Haden to James Whistler, Riddings Derbyshire Saturday [September 15, 1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, H3. Saturday was 16 September.
22. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg friday afternoon Sept. 29th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W362.
23. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, In my room. St. Petersburg. tuesday evening Sept. 26th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W361; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Sept. 30th Oct. 12th 1848. St. Petersburg, W364.

24. Entry for Thursday evening 29th Oct. [1846], NYPL: AWP, Part II.
25. This and the quotations in the following three sentences are from Anna Whistler to Gen. Joseph G. Swift, St. Petersburg, Sept. 24, 1846, NYPL: Swift Papers.
26. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, In the drawing room, with Willie on sofa Friday 22nd Dec. 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W374.
27. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, Nov. 27th 1848. 4 o'clock Monday afternoon , GUL: Whistler Collection, W369.
28. Anna Whistler to James Whistler. Thursday. Sept. 30th. Oct. 12, 1848 St. Petersburg, GUL: Whistler Collection, W364.
29. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Nov. 27th 1848. 4 o'clock Monday afternoon , GUL: Whistler Collection, W369.
30. This and the following sentence are from Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Wed. Dec. 13th. 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W373.
31. George W. Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Jan'y 6 / 18-[18]49, GUL: Whistler Collection, W660. In this letter, Major Whistler expressed quite forcefully to James how Willie ought to conduct himself.
32. This and the following sentence are from Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Wed. Dec. 13th. 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W373.
33. William Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg 19th Feb. [1849], GUL: Whistler Collection, W977.
34. Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg. Monday evening Dec. 13th [OS] English Christmas Day [25 December NS] [1848], GUL: Whistler Collection, W375.
35. William Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., Sloane Street, June 16th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34.
36. William Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., Sloane Street, June 16th 1849.
37. Banta, "Portrait of an Artist as a Boy," p. 117; Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr. London, Monday 25 June 1849, LC: P-W, box 34. In this letter, Anna Whistler said: "Mr. Haden will take me [to Kilburn's studio], as you so flatteringly wish it & my boys too before we leave London."

38. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., London, Monday 25 June [1849], LC: P-W, box 34. In this letter, Anna Whistler does not say that she went to see Boxall's portrait of James, only that she gave her permission for James and Willie to go with Emma Maingay.
39. Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison, 62 Sloane St. June 19th 1849, LC: P-W, box 34; Anna Whistler to Mrs. Harrison, 62 Sloane St. June 20th [1849]; Anna Whistler to Mr. Harrison, Saturday evening. Preston. July 7th 1849; Anna Whistler to Mr. & Mrs. Harrison, Fleetwood. Monday. July 15th 1849.
40. Anna Whistler to Joseph Harrison, Jr., 62 Sloane St., June 19, 1849, LC: P-W, box 34; Anna Whistler to Mrs. Harrison, 62 Sloane St, June 20th [1849]; Anna Whistler to Mr. & Mrs. Joseph Harrison, Jr., Fleetwood. Monday. July 15th 1849.

THE ST. PETERSBURG DIARIES OF ANNA MCNEILL WHISTLER

PART I: 1843–1844

S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg, November 28th 1843.

My arrival in this beautiful city was under such trying circumstances that I could not record the meeting with my dear husband when it took place as I should have done for my twin-Sisters<sup>1</sup> gratification. It is exactly two months to a day since then, & my mind has been so absorbed by anxiety while watching over my darling Jemmie & Willie<sup>2</sup> whose health has alternately suffered from the effects of this climate & I have myself been often ill, & too much depressed to write when I had leisure, but I am spurred on to make the exertion to begin a journal now, on reflecting that however trifling the events of my home, they may be interesting to review in after years, at all events to my little boys, the training of whom is my sweetest employment. This evening I am alone, their Sister at an opposite neighbours<sup>3</sup> & their father<sup>4</sup> gone to sit with Mr Fair....<sup>5</sup> who is very sick. My James & Willie tho only 9 and 7 years old will never forget our voyage across the Atlantic last August, for the twelve days spent on board the Acadia<sup>6</sup> from Boston was a term of novelties & delights for them, they were such brave sailors that not even the shock we all felt (when the night after we left Halifax we run down a Barque) terrified them & when they made the acquaintance of the crew of that vessel which our Capt had taken on board just in time to save these 14 poor fellows from sinking in their own<sup>7</sup> — they were so eager to relate to me all the particulars of the adventures that I doubt not they felt like heroes themselves. Fondly does their poor mother now recal all those days! — when surrounded by her diminished family circle, & while thankful for present comforts — misses sadly her dear George<sup>8</sup> who has returned to our native land — & weeps over her loss of little Charlie<sup>9</sup> tho she knows he is a bright angel in heaven & she would not wish him again in this world of sin & trial — yet the sad void made by the death of this darling can never be filled to his fond mother, his 2nd anniversary was passed on board the Acadia the 27th of last August. “Charlie is two years old” he was so pleased to repeat to all who asked how old he was — he spoke so distinctly & had so many original ideas, that but for his fragile form & delicacy of skin so very infantine — he would have been thought older, he used to enjoy playing on deck as much as his two seniors Jemie & Willie, for his own kind nurse Mary<sup>10</sup> watched him & he was always happy if she were only by his side. I musn’t linger, but tell of our arrival in Liverpool at 6 o'clock on the morning of the 29th of August 1843.<sup>11</sup> & of the kind welcome we found at dear M<sup>rs</sup> Sandlands<sup>12</sup> to whose house we immediately went. she has since recalled (in a sympathising letter<sup>13</sup> to me) my Charlies remark as he watched her knitting “I remember Grandmother” he said in his gentle fond tones! Oh we shall never forget him! It would be quite impossible to describe the meeting with my Sisters,<sup>14</sup> especially the arrival of myself & children at Preston, my Sister Eliza’s face spoke volumes & she said there had not been such perfect satisfaction as hers, since Josephs welcoming his father & family in Egypt!<sup>15</sup> How much the weather combined to add to my enjoyment on revisiting England & meeting so many old friends after an absence of 14 years! I admired the perfect verdure of the green fields hills & valleys (even as much as I had Niagaras green wave when I gazed on it last June)<sup>16</sup> bright sunshine attended us every day, & my soul was filled with wonder & with adoration that God should thus distinguish us with such unclouded happiness. James & Willie played in their good Uncle Winstanleys<sup>17</sup> garden, or went with the little sons of M<sup>r</sup> Chapman<sup>18</sup> to ride on their donkey. My precious darling Charlie had his morning or afternoon strolls with his nurse Mary. his sweet voice was the first sound that attracted me at the hour of day. he would come in by himself to say good morning to his dear mother & stand by my window peeping out thro the blind to discover what was passing in Fishergate St.<sup>19</sup> & when I was dressed I carried him in my arms to the drawing room where he would point his tiny finger to a beautiful painting over the mantle piece (of Miss Maudes)<sup>20</sup> & say “Mama theres Raphael”.<sup>21</sup> Sometime he would stand at the head of the stairs where the full length portrait of Mary Maclean<sup>22</sup> hung in a vestibule & pointing to it say “theres the “Scotch beauty” it looks like Cozey Mary.

Cozey Julie!<sup>23</sup> The first drive we had, my dear Sister would take all the children, our friends M<sup>rs</sup> Sandland & her Eliza<sup>24</sup> being on a visit to her, were with us, so that the carriage was full & Charlies nurse was left at home, even tho seated on his mothers lap, his affection for Mary induced the little darling to miss her & before our afternoons drive was over to say “I wonder what Mary is doing! “Charlie must go home to Mary”! Oh how much intelligence this baby discovered! & he was so gentle so full of love I ought to have been warned that he was ripening for the skies — but he seemed to be improving in health & I flattered myself as his difficulties in teething were over he would become stout & Oh how often I fancied the delight his father would take in “Kirkies<sup>25</sup> own Charlie” as that little sainted brother used to call the baby — Charlie was no longer a baby, he did not fancy toys, but delighted in flowers, & his hymn book — as he called the nursery rhymes — was in his hand always, for he even took it to bed with him, Even ere we had left Stonington he had distinguished the Lords day & used to say “not to pay drum on Sunday” & he never omitted repeating the Lords prayer after Mary any night or morning, he discovered a remarkable fondness for music “Sissee pay for Charlie” then would lead Debo to the piano & ask for “Lucy Long”<sup>26</sup> Sometimes if he heard her hum a familiar air he would call it by name & add “come Sissee play that for Charlie” Friends flocked daily to my Sisters hospitable mansion to see us, for our visit was to be too brief to admit of our making many excursions — my boys used to ask their Aunts “who were to dine that day, or who coming to stay longer to see Mother!” but one morning we rose early enough to ride twelve miles to breakfast at Ribchester.<sup>27</sup> dear Jane Simpson<sup>28</sup> was with us. Aunt Eliza. Aunt Alicia & the three little boys. Never, never can I forget that happy morning! I loved the dear family at the parsonage<sup>29</sup> & felt it a privilege to take my children to visit them. How beautiful the valley of the Ribble looked as we gazed at it from the top of the rising ground just as we approached Ribchester! <sup>30</sup> How gratifying our welcome from the excellent M<sup>r</sup> Hazlewood,<sup>31</sup> his dear wife<sup>32</sup> & children!<sup>33</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Hazlewood wept as she embraced me for at that moment her grief for the loss of her Elizabeth revived, that sweet girl had been my pet when I was last in England, but when she attained her 17th year God called her to her heavenly inheritance, she died last July,<sup>34</sup> & had given so many evidences of her love for her Saviour that we ought to rejoice that she was released from sufferings here & so soon gathered to His fold, her mother only whispered me "I wish I could have shewn her to you!" After breakfast I went up stairs to put my darling Charlie to sleep, & while afterwards I walked with my friend & listened to all the interesting particulars of her Elizabeths life & death, he was being refreshed by a mornings nap. I felt while talking with M<sup>rs</sup> H how "good to be here! my affections became elevated as her devotion glowed in her words "Is it not comforting to reflect on the love of our Heavenly Father? Is it not delightful to think that He gives his Angels charge of us & tho they are invisible to us we are continually surrounded by them?" She spoke of the Coming of Christ of his 2nd Advent<sup>35</sup> as an event full of blessedness. Oh I felt if we all could make our intercourse with friends thus profitable, if every visiter was so fed with heavenly food! the hours flew as we walked & opened our hearts to each other, but we went into the old church with its fine old carved pulpit & richly colored glass windows,<sup>36</sup> so different to any my boys had seen we could hardly get them out but, Catherine H loom was even more interesting & novel to James who wove very readily. this sweet young girl only 12 years of age, weaves as a pastime that she may clothe the poor, she reminded me of her Sister Elizabeth, & may she become indeed like her. Every day of the fortnight spent under my dear brother Winstanleys roof was so precious, each is recorded on my memory, but I cannot write of each, his good Sister M<sup>rs</sup> Ainslie<sup>37</sup> died the last Sunday we were in Preston, she was a true christian, her "good works do follow her"<sup>38</sup> but her hopes in her Saviour alone made her so happy in her death, she had never murmured at her sufferings during two years, (from cancer), but was thro her illness, as she had been thro life, an example to us all. her funeral was to take place the very day we took the Cars for London. The kind Ormerods<sup>39</sup> who had been so untiring in their proofs of regard for us spent the day but one at my brothers half promising to come again to say good bye thus to avoid the pain of it in reality. My dear Sister Alicia had made up her mind to accompany us to London, at prayers that morning of the 14th of Sept my sister Elizas voice faltered & my tears fell silently. My brother Winny<sup>40</sup> had found an excuse for taking the early train for Liverpool, to avoid seeing us go from his house. My heart was full of sorrow & I followed him with my darling Charlie who ran after “Unc Winstanley for one more embrace. I think now I can see his little form tottering on the gravel walk, in his eagerness to reach that kind uncle — whom he was to be no longer with in this world! The only showery day we had in England was during our journey to London, which rendered it pleasanter. When we stopped our old friend M<sup>r</sup> Stevenson<sup>41</sup> was at the depot waiting to welcome me with a letter from my beloved Whistler. We found our lodging commodious & retired at Kents in Norfolk St Strand —<sup>42</sup> And I experienced more than ever the disinterested affection of my Sister Alicia, she took James & Willie to be her bed fellows & was unbounded in her indulgence to the little trio during that pleasant week. To M<sup>r</sup> Ralston<sup>43</sup> I am under great obligations for advising & aiding us in our arrangements for proceeding to my husband — And the attentions we received from D<sup>r</sup> Bootts<sup>44</sup> family were as unexpected as gratifying, the dear old lady his mother<sup>45</sup> was many times at our lodgings offering to take us to the Parks<sup>46</sup> &c. One afternoon my sister & self availed ourselves of her carriage & took the boys to the Zoological Gardens,<sup>47</sup> how delighted little Charlie was in Aunt Alicias arms, or running sometimes himself along the walks, he made many smile when he clapped his hands with delight at the Giraffes & called them pretty Peacocks. We spent another afternoon at M<sup>r</sup> Stevensons, all of us staid to tea even our little one for his nurse also could find a welcome there, I observed with pain the weight of a dozen years of sorrow upon dear M<sup>r</sup> & S Stevenson,<sup>48</sup> her Eliza<sup>49</sup> is now what she was beautiful & attractive Debo & she soon became fond of each other, Bell<sup>50</sup> the family nurse could scarcely look at any of the group for little Charlies fondness for his Mary carried her back to auld lang syne when she had been as blessed by the little Stevensons endearments, but even Frankey<sup>51</sup> the youngest had grown to be so great a lad he has a situation from home so that only Miss Eliza remains. We were glad again to find the Poizats<sup>52</sup> in London, they had been such acquisitions to us on board the Acadia, when they called upon us little Charlie recognized them immediately & went up to M<sup>r</sup> Poizat holding out his hand for him to put Cologne water upon it. At last we were obliged to bid adieu to dear Aunt Alicia & take the Steamer for Hamburg.<sup>53</sup> she sat up all that night & I most of it talking with that kind Sister. The children were aroused before dawn, my darling baby seemed at once to understand he was going to “father” for he was not the least peevish at being disturbed, tho Mary could not persuade him there was no time to say Charlies prayers - she found it was best to gratify him & let him kneel as usual & repeat the Lords prayer - As the boatmen rowed us down the Thames by lamplight & starlight how charmed this bright little creature was! And when we descended the ladies cabin on board the John Bull from the Wherry<sup>54</sup> he continued to tell us that “Charlie was wide awake” which I feared might disturb any passengers who might wish to sleep, but one of the ladies said the next day, how amused she was to hear such a baby talk. My darling continued well during the trip to Hamburg & the few hours we spent at the Hotel<sup>55</sup> in that city he was no trouble, but always a source of joy — George obtained two carriages for us as we were to travel all night, most comfortable they were — Never in my life have I enjoyed a ride as much as ours that night, I felt too happy to wish to close my eyes, my children all around me, all in health, & going to their father. Oh I often pondered on the mercies I felt I so little deserved & wondered from what quarter the black cloud would arise when the change should come — The road was fine, the stars shone so brightly I could see many interesting pictures of Denmark.<sup>56</sup> We stopped very frequently under large sheds to bait the horses<sup>57</sup> & many toll bars too there were. Willies nights rest was unbroken but James & little Charlie were as bright as the stars, & had so much to point out to Mother! George got out at one of the little Inns & procured us coffee & cakes at midnight, the best I almost ever tasted — The Entrance to Lubec<sup>58</sup> is very pretty, it was early dawn when our carriages stopped out side the gates of the town till our passports were inspected when we were allowed to pass thro without much detention. At the hotel in Lubec we made our toilette & breakfasted, my darling ate his bread & milk with relish & took a refreshing nap until we were summoned at Noon to take the stage for Travemunde. As we rode I watched all my family group, he the picture of health sleeping in the arms of his sleeping nurse. Our dear George was to bid us adieu at the Steamer Alexandra.<sup>59</sup> We were threatened at first with opposition to my taking my boys into the Ladies Cabin & a State room appropriated to us in the forward Cabin, but it seemed too solitary for us, & especially as I had a dread of meeting a storm on the Baltic<sup>60</sup> this being the 22nd of Sept. Ah how well it proved that we were not separated from the other lady passengers — whose sympathy & kindness I can never forget. At last the trial came of parting from our dear George. Willie was almost heartbroken & for two hours was inconsolable. When little Charlie observed my grief he said “Mary ! brother George gone! Mama cry! poor brother George, Charlie wants him back again” We exerted ourselves for each others sake & Debo & I took James & Willie to dinner table – when I returned from the saloon having left my baby apparently well I consented to walk the deck with Debo for an hour to cheer her knowing how much she needed it on losing sight of George who had been of such comfort to us on our former voyages. When I went back to the Ladies Cabin I observed with astonishment Charlies quietness. Mary then told me he had refused to eat & seemed sea sick, but we both hoped it would soon pass & relieve him. I took him to my own bosom for whenever he felt ill Charlie was most comfortable in his mothers arms, that night he never left them except to try change of position in the berth in hopes he might sleep, but no he did not close his eyes, I administered powders once or twice put up for him by his good Uncle Palmer<sup>61</sup> & which in all other attacks had benefitted this precious child, I must not omit in the evening when Mary would have lain her darling in the berth to pat him to sleep he tried to kneel down first to say “Charlies prayers” supporting himself by holding to the sides of it, “Charlie is too sick to kneel down, say them in bed” which he did clasping his little hands together as he was wont & repeating every word, it was the last time in his little life here below! tho he expressed the same wish again the next night. The next morning was Sunday 23rd, the symptoms of illness had increased, the little patient never murmured, but could retain no medicine, the last dose I administered he said gently “Most done, no more medi Mama for Charlie if you please” Debo was much concerned for her little favorite brother & longed for a physician, I knew that God alone could bless the means & I felt comfort in believing in His presence Once sweet Charlie turned & said “Sissee” as tho he would like to prove he loved her but he went not from his mother even to Mary, till she had gone to her berth on Sunday night, when I put him in her arms in hopes her warmth would impart some to him, his extremities had become so clammy! I walked the cabin with him after all had retired for the nausea distressed him, at last laid down wrapping myself around him to try to warm him, he put his cold little hands in my bosom saying “Charlies own, mama” but neither he or I closed our eyes from the moment we first embarked, as my baby neither fretted or moaned I was only aware of his increased sufferings by his struggles & starting out of the berth with him flew into the deserted cabin, my sobs aroused Debo from her berth & her cries of distress brought out all the ladies, the steward too ran in & as the kindest act he supposed was to conceal the agonies of death from a mothers eyes he hastily put out the light, but soon restored the lamp upon my pleading for it. A warm bath too he had ready in a few moments & I put my darling in it supposing he was threatened with a fit, as one of the ladies hinted it might be from his teeth. I cut his gums myself for none other was there to do it & God gave me strength in that hour or surely nature could not have supported it. Never shall I forget the look of fond recognition from my dying babys eyes & as<sup>62</sup> held him in my arms in the warm bath which evidently relieved him. I wrapped his little body in a blanket which the compassionate Stewardess tho she could not speak a word of English handed me, & sat down gazing on the angelic expression of my Charlie for now I realized that his mild eyes could not long be turned to his poor mother, mine were rivetted till his were glazed by death. I pressed my lips in agony to his fair beautiful brow, then gave up that precious body to stranger hands as they besought me & went to my state room to break the sad tidings to poor Mary whom no one had awakened, Oh how my heart bled as she uttered the grief my lips refused! And deploring her desolation I comforted her if I might with assurances of my love for her for Charlies sake who had loved her so much & for whose sake she had come so far from her own dearest ties.<sup>63</sup> May she meet him to be separated no more! And may the lessons taught us by this “little one” shine still on our path, tho dead he yet speaketh, little Charlie could not be persuaded to go to his bed or to rise from it without kneeling down to pray to God in the words which Jesus himself taught us to use, little Charlie distinguished Sunday & may his brothers remember the lesson I tried to draw from the sad event when I told them of their loss the next morning, that God had called this second little brother to a better world on the sabbath day to impress their minds solemnly on its return every week to keep it holy. Kirkie had left them for heaven on a beautiful Sabbath morning only a year ago last July, his hands clasped in prayer & his bright eyes raised in extacy as tho he saw what we could not - angelic messengers! his last words were "Mother I want to go to heaven" & now "Kirkies own Charlie" as he used to call the baby whom he loved so peculiarly! had joined him on the hallowed evening of the sabbath, how blissful the meeting of these two pure spirits! Jesus has assured us "of such is the kingdom of heaven"<sup>64</sup> little Charlie lost his Kirkie when he was not quite a year old, so he could not remember his beautiful brother of four years old, but his fondness for his miniature<sup>65</sup> was very remarkable & under any circumstances it was preferred by him to any thing that could be offered, he would kiss it many times, call the picture "Charlies own Kirkies" & hug it to his breast. And now they are forever together! happy beyond our conception. Oh may we so live that they may welcome us to where all tears shall be wiped from our eyes! I will not wring my heart by recording the sad task which I aided Mary to perform, but it was a privilege for me to hold him the next morning in my arms while she fondly arranged his beautiful ringlets in the vain hope that his father might look upon him even tho he could not speak to tell how much Charlie had loved him. his precious corpse occupied that lovely forward cabin which it had been proposed our family should have for the voyage, & poor Mary & I used to visit it every day, indeed she could not go to her berth at night till she saw her beloved charged<sup>66</sup> & thus assured herself nothing could harm the body she still loved. The fourth morning after my babys death we were at Cronstadt<sup>67</sup> & then I heard it was prohibited taking any corpse to St Petersburg & I must submit to leaving this that seemed indeed a part of myself at Cronstadt but it would be placed in the sanctuary - in the English church<sup>68</sup> - I was wound up to endure all that combined to deepen my distress without uttering complaint. knowing that our Heavenly Father ordered all this chastening for my good. Ah how clouded was my joy at the approaching meeting with my dear husband! My boys were continually exclaiming at the brilliant objects which presented, as we sailed up the Neva, each clinging to their new acquaintance the young count Strauganauf<sup>69</sup> who was so indulgent as to answer all their questions about the gilded spires, domes, &c. At last when our Steamer stopped at the English quay, I having once more to encounter the officers of the customs went into the Cabin to shew our passport, on returning to the deck I heard Whistlers voice calling Jemmie for most tantalizing case! he was not permitted to go on board to meet & welcome us - but at length after another officer had stopped me about our passport, we stepped ashore & my dear husbands happiness was complete, none but God knows the weight of sorrow at my heart to think I must so soon embitter his joy. I dreaded his turning round to look after the children as he did often, at last he seemed to wonder what our nurse had done with him he looked in vain for, but as he would begin with "where is the little one, I abruptly stopped by begging him not to ask me any questions till he could do so at home, he must have seen agony depicted on my countenance & he has since told me his heart sunk as [sic] the dreadful thought that our baby had by some fearful accident found a watery grave, I will not linger at the Custom house<sup>70</sup> for it was truly harrassing to stop there while our trunks were rudely overhauled,<sup>71</sup> however we were more civilly treated than at first promised & soon after Whistlers friend M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell<sup>72</sup> came there & was introduced to Debo & I, he very kindly offered to stay with Mary thro the rest of the examination, then Whistler gladly drove us home our St — the Galernia — being the very next back of the English quay. I felt much overcome, yet Oh so grateful as I viewed our comfortable home.<sup>73</sup> A fine ship offering to sail for Boston<sup>74</sup> our kind friend Major Bouttatz<sup>75</sup> went the very next day to Cronstadt, had the precious body put in a leaden coffin & sent back to its native land, which was a cause of thankfulness to Whistler & myself that it might be placed in the same grave with our Kirkie, in the same enclosure with our sainted boys Joe & Henry.<sup>76</sup> This climate was detrimental to my recovery for some weeks & my dear James & Willie were ill by turns from the effect of the Neva water, so that my cares did not cease, but I had such a desire to aid & comfort my dear husband who had I knew anticipated such, after his years exile from us. I tried to appear cheerful, I encountered fewer difficulties in housekeeping than I had expected too in the great Russian capital, found every convenience in our kitchens, pantries &c, the servants<sup>77</sup> speak some English, & Mary such a comfort to me! The weather was thro Oct very delightful, occasionally the Neva rose & the guns were fired to warn the inhabitants on the islands to be on their guard against an inundation! but we were not alarmed tho one day the water run thro our S<sup>t</sup> from the river. We are blessed in excellent neighbours M<sup>r</sup> W<sup>m</sup> Ropes<sup>78</sup> from Boston (who has the only American mercantile establishment here) he even insisted upon having our dinners cooked for us the first few days, & in every particular has evinced interest in his Yankee acquaintances. M<sup>rs</sup> R a nice young English lady with two nice little girls,<sup>79</sup> she proves a superior musician, & many times herself & our Debo practised duetts, alternately at either home, until on the 18th of this month M<sup>r</sup> R came over for us to rejoice with him in the birth of a third little daughter!<sup>80</sup> Winter kept off till about that time, the river closed suddenly & we have had snow almost every day. I have felt no wish to go out, but had to make the effort occasionally to return calls with Debo. Our fellow passengers M<sup>rs</sup> Nichol Baird<sup>81</sup> & her sister Miss Kremmer<sup>82</sup> were among the first who left cards for us, they are exceedingly intellectual and agreeable, & as I associate with them all their sympathy & kind attentions in my affliction I always am glad to see them. they are Germans but speak English perfectly, the Bairds are a rich English family<sup>83</sup> here — One of the first ladies who came to see me was M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst,<sup>84</sup> as her sister to whom I had brought a letter from Preston<sup>85</sup> was too great an invalid, I was also much inclined to make a friend of this English lady but my Willies illness made me unwilling to go out & after his recovery my own health was so feeble I have not yet returned that pleasant call. One day it is true Debo & I were just ready to step into a carriage to ride to M<sup>rs</sup> Hirsts when strange to tell our lad Alexander<sup>86</sup> who had never refused before to do any thing we required — refused to act footman, the carriage was dismissed & alas poor Alex in 1/2 an hour after, to the grief of Jemmie who was teaching him English — & to my vexation too, for now I had all the annoyance of teaching Maurice<sup>87</sup> the duties of butler &c. About that very time too we had a new Dwanick<sup>88</sup> so that poor Mary used to be perplexed how to tell these two foreigners the work of the house. but our cook<sup>89</sup> who is uncommonly good natured & speaks english left her duties whenever necessary to interpret for us. Our Crate of China, boxes of books, silver, Harp &c had to be unpacked by Mary with our aid, really we were almost in despair about our new Dwanick he was so like a bear, had not long been in S<sup>t</sup> P & never in a decent house before, he used to smoke us out when he lit the peeches,<sup>90</sup> every step he took shewed his dirty boot, & Debo complained of the smell of his sheep skin, & Whistler declared he would pay him his months wages & send poor Fritz<sup>91</sup> off. Another immediately was recommended but within the last few days after his successor was engaged, Fredric improved so astonishingly, he was up at five! the house thoroughly warmed before we left our rooms, we began to feel very sorry to think of turning the poor fellow off especially as cook told me he had left a young wife & child in the country & was trying to earn a subsistence for them. At length the newly engaged Dwanick came, new coat passport &c to enter our service, he was a nice looking fellow, but Whistlers sympathies were excited for poor Fritz, who was aghast when made to comprehend he was to be displaced, to reconcile him, my kind husband gave him his choice of 25 rubles in addition to his months wages to go - or, but he saw the tears flowing over his rough cheeks & consented to keep him — now what to do with the new candidate who had left a situation & bought a new coat to serve us — Whistler bought his coat & gave it to Fritz as an inducement to keep himself clean, & payed the other a months wages to find another place with. How glad we all felt at tea to hear this negociation was ended & our poor Dwanick retained. I hope he may prove a rough diamond, for he is very industrious & good natured, keeps every place under his care very nice now & as he wears his new coat now & has learned the way to the bath looks always tidy himself. I hear him sometimes practising english words, “good, instead of “harasho” —<sup>92</sup> this last word reminds me that I have not yet assigned a place in my narrative to one of my earliest acquaintances in St Petersburg, a poor little mendicant who so generally expresses his satisfaction by Harasho when we give him bread or money that I could almost mistake that for his name instead of Andrea,<sup>93</sup> whom our boys are so glad to see come up the back stairs & find his way to the parlor where he knows he is welcome for tho not more than three years old he has been a pensioner of my dear husband some months. Whistler was first attracted to poor little — Andrea in the arms of his degraded looking mother — by his resemblance to our departed Kirkie, his sparkling black eyes & remarkable forehead, — but on giving the poor woman money, she touched the pavement with her brow & kissed his feet before he could stop her, afterwards when he encountered them, he made signs that she should go into the yard, & it used to be a sad satisfaction to him to take the child to his own room & seat it on his knee, for he had provided for its coming clean to him, so these mendicants fell to my care, the first time I went down to see the mother & gave her money & food she kissed my feet ere I was aware of the custom here, it is so painful to me I always now send her any trifle by Mary or my little boys, but Andrea has not a cringing nature, he always comes up to shake hands with me & seems to feel at perfect liberty to play with Willie while his poor mother waits below in her sheep skin, till he takes her the 25 Kopeeks silver<sup>94</sup> which he always expects for her. he is a noble looking child & Oh that a way may be opened for us to serve him more effectually than by temporary relief. he looks so like our own bright eyed Kirkie, especially in a little plaid coat Willie has outgrown, which Andrea wears. Recalling incidents for the past two months I do so very irregularly. I should earlier have mentioned having had the comfort of hearing several times from home & of course I have had some enjoyment in answering these precious letters & in writing to my dear sisters in England. By one mail I was delighted to receive a package of papers the Christian Witness,<sup>95</sup> but the postage was so frightful about $28 on 1/2 doz papers I did not think it right to open them as coming to the Legation they could decline receiving what they had not ordered. Our Ambassador Col Todd<sup>96</sup> has been very polite to us, soon after our arrival he returned from Sweden<sup>97</sup> where he had been making an excursion of pleasure, & called immediately to welcome his country women to St P. Indeed we occupy Boberinskys House,<sup>98</sup> which was his quarters, & here Whistler had apartments (which he now lets to M<sup>r</sup>. Maxwell being on the ground floor)<sup>99</sup> until the gallant Col gave up the house,<sup>100</sup> which we hire ready furnished at about $18.00 per ann<sup>101</sup> — The Col has been extremely polite in offering us the use of his carriage & four greys! I had been out only two or three times except to church the first month after our arrival, but one very fine day he called & offered to shew us the Winter Palace,<sup>102</sup> of course Debo wished to go & as Whistler had never been thro it he consented to accompany us, so I had a strong inducement to overcome my disinclination to going into the gay quarter of this showy city. I was very much gratified by all shewn us. The situation of the Palace is very advantageous fronting the Alexandre

Square — thro which we approached it from the Nevski — on one side & the Neva on the other, where we entered it<sup>103</sup>, the view upon the river is beautiful, the old fortress & church with its gilded spire on the opposite side very imposing,<sup>104</sup> & all the buildings in the vicinity of the palace being being [sic] palaces, splendid barracks & also the Admiralty<sup>105</sup> in the next square which is noble in its dimension & style of architecture there are no gloomy contrasts, but all speak of the prosperous reign of the Emperor Nicholas.<sup>106</sup> I was not astonished at the magnificence within his Winter Palace tho the Stair case<sup>107</sup> appeared to me the grandest I had ever ascended & the suites of rooms of every splendid variety, but I was surprised at the freshness of every thing, the perfect neatness delighted me.<sup>108</sup> Whistler & I whispered each other how much we should have enjoyed taking our dear Jemmie thro so many attractive objects, he wished so much to be of the party! & we hope another year to have the satisfaction of hearing our dear boys remarks on the palace, but the Imperial family having come to town for the Winter<sup>109</sup> there will be no chance till they move out to Sarscanello<sup>110</sup> again. I have forgotten to mention that soon after the Cols return from Sweden he attended the royal baptism at Sarscanello, on Sunday 23rd of Oct,<sup>111</sup> the sons of the Grand Duke Alexander,<sup>112</sup> who is the Emperors eldest son, there was a partial illumination thro St Petersburg, our boys begged to sit up to look at it tho it was Sunday night, but it was so paltry (only lamps on the pavement) they were soon tired of it & willing to go to my room as usual for me to read the scriptures to them before kissing them for good night. And now as I am continuing to make up for lost time, in Dec<sup>113</sup> I will mention that last friday & Saturday being the 1st & 2nd according to our style but the 19th & 20th Nov by Russian calculation of time, they were anniversaries here not to be forgotten, the Greek churches all had solemn services in commemoration of the death of the late Emperor Alexander<sup>114</sup> on friday, & the next day was a holiday, for 18 years ago the present Emperor had been acknowledged, <sup>115</sup> there was an illumination of the Sts in the evening. The weather has been very variable notwithstanding Winter was so tardy in its approach & so suddenly locked every thing in its icy grasp, we have had two thorough thaws already, our dear boys have lost their pond & their ice hill from our yard for the present, the carts which frequently go round to take away snow or dirt from enclosures or streets, had alarmed James for the safety of his winter sports, but the attentive Feodore had always smoothed away all traces of wheels, & had swept their pond daily, we used to watch our dear boys with delight from our double-windows,<sup>116</sup> especially when little Willie took his first lessons in skating, he soon moved with as much ease as his Master Jemie on his skates & we did not wonder at their chagrin when the thaw came I have much to record for it is now after Christmas,<sup>117</sup> weather has continued variable, tho thro all the thaws the Neva has continued solid, & the Sleds have always had enough snow to run upon the middle of the streets, from the labour bestowed thro the vigilance of the police who make it a point that the dvanic of each house does his proportion of cleaning & levelling the snow from the side walks to the middle of the street, thus the walking is always good, for the instant snowing ceases it is cleared from the side walk & if slippery sand is sprinkled, & if a thaw during the day threatens uneven sledge drives, the ruts are filled up by the poor Dvanics<sup>118</sup> before the nights frost hardens them.<sup>119</sup> Certainly the long reign of winter in this capital is rendered very endurably [sic] by the precautions used, wrapped in our Shubes<sup>120</sup> we are in a glow when we walk or ride tho the cold may be 12 deg — And our houses are so thoroughly heated by means of Peeches, that we sleep comfortably upon mattresses under one blanket — We hear that some winters when the cold is 30 deg & that hardy bird the crow falls dead from the severity of the atmosphere, even furs fail to protect. We observe a multitude of doves about the caves of public building [sic], indeed in all our walks they cross our path, they are secured from destruction, from being held sacred birds. I never<sup>121</sup> so many birds in Winter!

My dear boys will remember their fathers first absence<sup>122</sup> from home since our arrival, just before Christmas, for it was a cold evening when he set out in a covered sled<sup>123</sup> with M<sup>r</sup> Trouvellier<sup>124</sup> for Col Melnakoffs camp<sup>125</sup> & we had some little stir to prepare, he had a sledge ride that night of 80 miles & gave us the joyful surprise of breakfast with us the next day but one, having travelled both nights to shorten his absence from home. That day of his return being 22nd of Dec I availed myself of M<sup>r</sup> Ropes offer & sallied forth in quest of Christmas gifts for my dear boys, & deposited a precious lock of our darling Charlies hair at a German jewellers<sup>126</sup> to have a brooche made for his own Mary, knowing it would be more acceptable than any present I could make her. On coming out of a confectioners in the Galernia<sup>127</sup> I saw Debo in a Sled with her dear father on their way to the English Magazine,<sup>128</sup> they had a plot to surprise me which I did not suspect, I wished to give my boys a merry Christmas, but only anticipated the satisfaction of gratifying them in observing this anniversary. I hoped no one would wish me a merry Xmas! Debo & I arranged the Russian pictures<sup>129</sup> bon bons &c for her little brothers in the Chancery, which no one was to enter till after breakfast. Very early their light spirits were in full flow awakening Mary-Sister - Father- Mother! too happy to realize our diminished family circle, reaching their stocking where Santa Clause had deposited sweets, after their toilettes were completed, they did not as usual pass thro my dressing-room on their way to the parlor to study their Scripture lessons till prayers, but staid in Sisters room - very mysteriously - how full of glee they seemed during breakfast! And when at last we led them to the Chancery to discover what Santa Clause had brought them their anticipations were all realized, the games just what they liked — & the little chairs just what they needed — but I really believe my surprise in the form of a most beautiful rose-wood Escrotoire<sup>130</sup> (which they had been privy to — for their names were signed under their dear Sisters in the affectionate note<sup>131</sup> which she presented with it to me) was more acceptable to them than their own gifts from me. their dear father took an ivory pen handle inlaid with silver with a card of gold pens from the complete Escrotoire & presented it to his grateful Annie as his own peculiar gift. I was much overcome! to think I should have been singled out as the favored one o[f] the family group! I longed to relieve my full heart by tears, for I dared not attemp[t] my thanks in words, lest I should weep as I kissed each dear one whose fore thought had made me happier than I believed it possible on this day — for busy memory mourned the absence of George, & made painfully visible the many broken links in our family group. But as I earnestly desired to contribute to the happiness of these left me, I courted the influence of happy childhood & smothered my sad reflections Debo took the boys over to M<sup>r</sup> Ropes to present some trifles to their nursery & as she staid to play some duetts with a Miss Mengies,<sup>132</sup> her father & I excused her to Col Todd when he called in his Sled — with four greys postillion, veils footman & all to take a Christmas drive with her, we invited him to dinner but he was engaged at Mr Gs<sup>133</sup> where we had declined going because I would not leave my boys on Christmas day. We had four American friends<sup>134</sup> to join us in roast turkey pumpkin pies &c. After the dessert while we were all still seated at table Willie & James spoke some french fables very prettily which they had prepared to surprise their father with. Jemmie had not committed all the lines upon the Solar System to memory<sup>135</sup> as he had intended, but Willie gave us an english peice in so touching a manner that his father said it was very pathetic. It was written by our countryman the Rev<sup>d</sup> Dr Hawks “Give us this day our daily bread.”<sup>136</sup> I had said to Debo in the morning I thought she would have her offering from across the brook — American letters! They arrived early in the evening by the Steamer which left Boston on the 1st We had much to be grateful for, our dear George had written & the dear girls at Stonington<sup>137</sup> also, but his was a farewell & it wrung sorrow from his fathers heart, what else could sustain us under such a trial but trust in God, who over-rules all the events of our lives for good “tho clouds & darkness surround His throne”<sup>138</sup> mercy is His prevailing attribute. Our affectionate tender George compelled to leave his native land to embark on a whole years cruise for health, with only strangers on board the ship Lausanne<sup>139</sup> his uncle the Gen<sup>l</sup><sup>140</sup> had written us an hour after our dear boy had left New York to say George had left in good spirits, well supplied with books — among them that best of all the word of God — I could have whispered to my husband “Oh can you not trust him to God whose presence on the great deep will comfort & sustain our beloved Son” but I felt that sympathy with his sorrow then would be best received, & wept silently with him, tho we talked nearly the night thro of our dear George. My solace is in prayer for this most dutiful Son & I have the hope that all which now seems against him shall by Gods blessing result in, enduring benefits. It comforts me now to recal all Georges amiable qualities, how devoted a Son to me he has been! ~~to me~~ especially after his dear father left Springfield — And during our voyage across the Atlantic, all this will cheer me until we meet again & his promise too to apply himself to the study of the Scriptures & to join himself to the Saviours little band of followers now, in the days of his youth. Upon my pillow I recal all our conferences on this subject & trust that George never forgets his mother in his prayers. We may not hear of our dear boy in many months, but God is with him. We heard by the same Steamer that the Middlesex with our precious Charlies remains had reached Boston — And that my beloved mother was on her way to Florida<sup>141</sup> — We are indeed a scattered family, but if our interests are beyond the reach of change our hearts must ever be united. I began writing my dear neice Julia on the 26th her 18th Anniversary & enjoyed writing at my own complete escrotoire. Whistler looked so gratified while he pretended to laugh at my childish fondness for my beautiful desk — I never was in possession of any thing I prized so much & to use the nice pen he gave me was quite charming. As I sat alone in the parlor on Thursday night<sup>142</sup> it was a temptation to scribble, for he & Debo were playing upon piano & flute in the next room. At 11 oclock I put my escrotoire away in the study to preserve it from dust while the parlor should be cleaned early in the morning. And when it was not in its place the next morning I suspected no evil but rather thought my dear Whistler might have removed it to his Chancery as he had much writing to do & my gold pens were so excellent. thus I lost some hours, for until he confessed himself as ignorant as the children & myself of what had become of their Christmas gift to their mother, I did not commence my investigation<sup>143</sup> — the servants of course would confess no knowledge of it. Maurice the German footman appeared most guilty & when Whistler on glancing his eye around the music room missed also his Flute we had much reason to suspect that this young man so professedly fond of music must be the thief — all said no common depredator from the S<sup>t</sup> would have selected such article[s] while so many more valuable articles were in the parlors & all agreed that it must have been one of our own servants. The master of the police of our quarter<sup>144</sup> took the poor Dvanick & Maurice to the guard house to question & threaten them separately but thefts in S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg are so frequent, we could not entertain many hopes of being more favoured than others, altho Whistler offered a tempting reward & no questions.<sup>145</sup> It pained me that I (who had known so many sorrows) should for several days allow this disappointment to weigh upon my spirit, it is not safe in this world to set too high a value upon any gift, we can at best only enjoy for an indefinite period all here below, but we a [sic]<sup>146</sup> only as “children of a larger growth & are fond of earthly toys”<sup>147</sup> the flute was dear to us from many tender associations, Whistler never can play upon another with as much pleasure, for it had been his solace after weariness during 15 years & had twice crossed the Atlantic with him!<sup>148</sup> it seemed really that the thief had considered more to vex us than to enrich himself. for had I been asked what I would most readily relinquish of all my goods & chattels the Escrotoire would have been the last superfluity I should have parted from. I shall always retain however the sweet emotions my dear Debo's affectionate note awakened on Christmas morning & the delighted countenances of Jemmy & Willie can always remain while memory lasts. They are almost consoled for my loss by having Alexander (our first footman who was deprived of his place by a fit of pride refusing to go behind the carriage) back again, as their father has been advised to discharge Maurice & also our poor Feodore. Our new Dvanick is a much more civilized looking creature & as his brother has for years been a faithful servant to M<sup>r</sup> Ropes<sup>149</sup> we must hope it will all prove for the best. as I profess to believe every event ordered for good, tho it is more difficult for us apply<sup>150</sup> this wholesome maxim to every day trifles. We recognize the Invisible hand which guides all things in life & death, and we kiss the rod because we are assured our heavenly Father does not willingly bereave us, it must then be for our good! & Oh we are secure that we have fallen into the hands of God & not of man — happy for us would it be that we should in every day vexations — which apparently spring only from the ground — also possess our souls in patience.<sup>151</sup> My dear husband has had a very severe cold ever since he went that sledge ride to visit Col Melnikoff. he has suffered so much from pain in his chest & cough, my hands & heart have both been entirely occupied with care about him.

January 1844. On the 1st or New Years day according to Russian style (tho the 13th of new style) we welcomed a letter from Stonington, the envelope contained one from Julie to Debo as usual whic[h] was the best of all New Years offerings, tho short it was the echo of her fondest affections — And there was also one to me from my own dear Sister Kate with such blessed accounts of her own home I felt my heart bound to meet her there, & her pen brought more vividly than ever before my minds eye all of the dear ones at Marias, but I was even more grateful to her for the minuteness of her account of the interment of those precious remains we had sent from us two months before<sup>152</sup> to find a grave with our departed Kirkie. To some it might seem unimportant, yet to us it is pleasant that death cannot divide these our two youngest darlings Kirkie & Charlie who loved each other so entirely. they shall mingle! their redeemed spirits now mingle! they are one in Christ — And so shall we all be if we can only give ourselves up to Him. How infatuated we are when we ever lose sight of the end for which we were created! Oh may we grow in grace & in the knowledge of our Lord & Saviour Jesus Christ! that when each of us must pass thro the valley of the shadow of death,<sup>153</sup> the hope of going to Him may support us. My precious little Charlies own Mary was very thankful to hear that her darlings body had been deposited where she might if spared to return to America, visit it. I am also very much relieved of anxiety on her own account since she has lately offered to wait our movements here, I was always pained to listen to her proposal to leave us to rejoin her brothe[r]<sup>154</sup> for Mary has seemed a part of our own family since Charlie loved her so fondly & I have fervently prayed that God would direct her in her choice whether to go or stay as would be for her good, for I would not selfishly urge her making a sacrifice of her own feelings to mine. How many there are bound up in my heart of hearts with my Angel baby! all who knew him loved him, thus I trust he may become to many a visible object to lead affections to the Eternal source of Love — his cousin Mary<sup>155</sup> who had delighted in him last summer will never forget the music of Charlies voice, she wept on the 6th of Nov — at his grave. but Oh may she not sorrow as those without hope, tho I trust she will retain the lesson how evanescent are all earthly enjoyments. And my beloved Mother! Charlie always talked of “Grandmother & the flowers” as tho he was the fonder of her for being so fond of them, next to Kirkies picture Charlie loved flowers, “Cousin Carri”<sup>156</sup> will think of him when roses adorn her parloure next summer, her kind George<sup>157</sup> used to delight my little one by filling his lap with them as he drew him around the grounds in Wilkies<sup>158</sup> straw carriage. Oh happy reminiscence! how glad I am to recal that pleasant visit to Pine Grove<sup>159</sup> now! dear Eliza Van Vechten<sup>160</sup> too was fond of my gentle Charlie & he never forgot “Cousin Eliza” then she was full of delightful anticipations, since then she has been required to give up the little one she thought her own.<sup>161</sup> Joy & sorrow are so mingled in this life of discipline — indeed at times we can scarcely distinguish them. I feel the “joy of grief”<sup>162</sup> as I contemplate that my loss is Charlies gain of happiness that cannot be clouded — And I must all my life remember how chastened was my pleasure last Summer after I had seen Niagara, had spent a happy week at Gen Swifts & been present at dear Josephines marriage)<sup>163</sup> on returning to Pine Grove to be with my darling baby again — I seemed to have accomplished so much in anticipation of leaving my native land — but ere I could kiss my little ones soft cheek I was intercepted by my own loved George with the startling intelligence that my own Jemie was at the point of death<sup>164</sup> — May God have prolonged his life for a blessing to us! he has comforted me as I lamented my loss of his darling baby brother who now rests in Kirkies grave — Which of us may be laid next in that hallowed enclosure is a solemn & interesting question — I cannot describe how touched is my heart when I hear of the illness of children of my friends, our kind neighbours the Ropes have had all three of theirs suffering from colds, Ellen<sup>165</sup> is so patient! yet has been so low I thought that the Angel of death stood beside her crib last sunday night, but they are all recovering — And when I have listened to such sayings of a child as M<sup>rs</sup> Bodiscos<sup>166</sup> little boy<sup>167</sup> utters “God has made me to live forever with Jesus”<sup>168</sup> & looked at his pensive, pale, countenance I have coupled him with my little one, who was born the same summer, & whose intelligence was so surprising. James & Willie having heard from Mary (who had been to see the nurse of little Bodisco)<sup>169</sup> how engaging he was & perhaps wishing also to see his grand playthings, called lately at the Hotel de Paris,<sup>170</sup> where they met with a most friendly welcome & came home laden with bon bons from the beautiful M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco which she had reserved for them from the Emperors own table, she is quite a favorite at court & is called the “beautiful American”<sup>171</sup> On the 22nd of this month I had an opportunity of studying her face & person. for I accompanied my husband & daughter to Col Todds birth day dinner,<sup>172</sup> where we also met our Pastor & family,<sup>173</sup> also the English & Brazilian Secs of Legation.<sup>174</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell went with us.<sup>175</sup> Averse as I now am to going to any party I yet was agreeably surprised into an interest in those around me. As I sat next my host he conversed more with me of his home in Kentucky than he had done before & as he alluded to his trial in losing three children in one week by scarlet fever,<sup>176</sup> I thought how few in the court circle would suspect he had such a vein of feeling — he usually appears so light & gay — When his health was drank by his guests, he recovered his usual tone of pleasantry & joked upon his being age. 21, and rising! the Col is certainly a young looking Grandfather, for his hair is not grey & his ivory is sound — yet he served under Gen Harrison during our late war.<sup>177</sup> while I only remember the illumination of 1815 as a child in New York<sup>178</sup> tho I suppose the Col judges me quite his contemporary, for he one day offered me his glass. my eye sight does not begin to fail yet,<sup>179</sup> tho at 39 I have many a silvery hair to warn me of old Times noiseless flight — But of this said dinner party. Mrs Bodisco wore a green velvet with short sleeves, her round fair arms bound round by three bracelets & a weighty necklace of pearls fastened with a very large rich locket of diamonds. I must confess I am not fond of seeing young persons who need no borrowed ornaments, so lavish of them, her teeth are pearls & her brow so smooth & fair, and if she were intellectual her eyes would be more sparkling than diamonds, for she seems perfectly amiable & is so frank she does not even hesitate to say she likes Russian society better than that of her own country & every night is glad to be in ball rooms or theatre,<sup>180</sup> the Bodiscos<sup>181</sup> left the Cols when it was time to go to another party. but the Laws seemed inclined not to go so soon. & as our pastor is the promoter of sociability he collected the young folks around him & seemed to afford them much merriment.<sup>182</sup> after tea was finished we understood the Col had an engagement for the evening so we returned home by ten. Mr Maxwell came up to our parlor where we had a cheerful chat about our native land. then he asked Debo if it was too late for music, she sung several songs at his request & I felt we need never go from our own roof for recreation, tho the Col had been exceedingly kind & hospitable, indeed had procured a piano & had it tuned purposely that his favorite Miss Debo should play upon it. but she was not required to sustain the whole obligation of yeilding the gallant Col sweet sounds for his politeness & forethought in providing the instrument. Our pastor is musical & joined with his daughters in singing Russian songs. When Debo sung Chorny-Tsvayts<sup>183</sup> she surprised M<sup>r</sup>. Law by her correct pronunciation, but this is all the Russ she knows.

Feb 14th 1844. Being alone at 10 oclock for Whistler has gone with our dear Debo to the last soirée at our Pastors<sup>184</sup> I shall endeavour to note some of the events which have been so absorbing as to interfere with my journalizing the past weeks. Although my life is a retired one I have many demands upon my time, for Debo is often in a bustle of preparation & requires her mothers assistance. The marriages in the Imperial family (of young Grand Duchess Alexandra youngest daughter of the present Emperor to the young prince Fredric of Hesse — & of the Grand Duchess Elizabeth (daughter of Grand Duke Michel) to the Duke of Nassau)<sup>185</sup> will long be remembered by my children, as these important events were much talked of by some of our visiters & we had a succession of ringing of bells firing of cannons & illuminations for a whole week — Of course the ceremonies were very splendid at the Winter Palace — our friend Maxwell had described the betrothals,<sup>186</sup> but poor fellow he took so severe a cold at the nuptials of Alexandra<sup>187</sup> on Sunday that he is yet quite ill<sup>188</sup> — the following Wednesday — being 19th of January Russian style — Debo accompanied Emma Maingy & some other ladies to be a spectator of the wedding festivities of the royal cousin Elizabeth,<sup>189</sup> her father was rather ashamed that his Yankee girl should condescend to mingle even in a fashionable crowd to be a looker on upon an assemblage she could not be received in, but his Indian pride<sup>190</sup> does not descend to his children, for Jemie tried to persuade Mother to avail of a ticket M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco pressed upon my acceptance & Debo did not complain of the fatigue of standing from noon till night to gaze upon the Emperor, Empress the court & all its splendor. royal brides & all! In the dining hall there were three tables spread that with service of gold for the Imperial family, the other two had silver services, but Debo looked very much exhausted when she came home & we should have been sorry if she had expressed any wish to go again the next evening to gaze upon the dancers at the ball at the Winter Palace. when tickets were brought by young Giraffeski<sup>191</sup> for her — the Trouvellers<sup>192</sup> had promised to come to our house & our kind neighbours the Ropes too came over, for then we had not become alarmed about our friend Maxwell as we became soon after — M<sup>rs</sup> T. is the finest pianist I ever heard, listening to her was a treat & especially so to Debo & M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes, it was music of a peculiar kind like liquid strains of soft & rich melody, she seemed also to enjoy Debo's harp & M<sup>RS</sup> Ropes singing & at the close of the evening gave a most ludicrous report of the crowd at the Palace where she had been induced to go on her way to us. I could only understand by her gestures that she was fortunate in having escaped without losing her sleeves or other parts of her dress! thus Debo congratulated herself that she could join in the laugh without being torn to pieces herself.<sup>193</sup> But I think it was the last merry mood our dear girl was in for some days, M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell became so dangerously ill that we all sympathised in the grief we feared awaited his parents, our boys walked on tip toe lest they might disturb one whom they love so fondly, Whistler sat up night after night with him & every moment he could steal from his duties during the day he spent at the bed side of his young countryman.<sup>194</sup> This day a week ago<sup>195</sup> was the crisis of his fever, his symptoms alarmed even D<sup>r</sup> Rogers,<sup>196</sup> who called in a consulting physician.<sup>197</sup> I ventured often into the room for the patient was delirious & could not be annoyed by it,<sup>198</sup> this night week Fairbanks was with Whistler beside him, when I came up stairs after 12 o'clock I feared I might not find M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell living, my anxiety roused me before day light, I made a hasty toilette & went down. Oh how cheered I was on entering the ante room at the sight of Whistler & M<sup>r</sup> Fairbanks taking a cup of tea which Le Ron<sup>199</sup> had just prepared them, & I returned with the good report to Debo that a favorable change had occurred during the night & the young countryman in whom we all felt interested we hoped would be spared to make one of our fire side again & to realize his wish to return to his native New York again — but I considered he had been on the verge of eternity & I earnestly prayed that he might experience that sense of the mercy of God in prolonging his life as would lead him to devote it to His honor & glory.<sup>200</sup> The Sunday after M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell was seized with the brain fever which has thus reduced him my James was quite poorly as he occasionally has been since his illness of last year, I therefore staid from church to read to him, Mary took little Willie & on their return they had so much to relate of the sudden death of old Admiral Hall!<sup>201</sup> We had heard his absence from his seat remarked since Christmas for he was one of those would have thought it a privilege to be even “a door keeper in the house of God”<sup>202</sup> but he was very aged & had been ill. Col Todd has always occupied the same pew with him, & as M<sup>r</sup> Law was not yet in the desk they had exchanged a friendly greeting, the aged christian telling our Ambassador that tho his wife & daughter<sup>203</sup> deemed it rather imprudent in him to go out his great desire had overcome their advice. for he added “I have been absent from church two Sundays! The service soon after commenced with the morning hymn, the good old man stood & praised God among the congregation until that verse (which I have always thought so elevating to the soul) “Wake & lift up thyself my heart, And with the Angels bear thy part”<sup>204</sup> when he suddenly fell dead against Col Todd! tho most there supposed he had only swooned, no doubt his spirit was instantly among that blissful company “Who all night long, unwearied sing, Glory to Thee, Eternal King!”<sup>205</sup> I went to church on the day of the old Admirals funeral,<sup>206</sup> there were only a few ladies, but a crowd of military, all with badges of mourning. the body covered with a purple & gold pall before the altar. Our service is so peculiarly solemn I hoped many might understand & feel it. Even the horses which drew the hearse were covered with black cloth as was the family coach the procession was preceded by men carrying flambeaus. Last Sunday M<sup>r</sup> Laws text was “dust thou art & unto death shalt thou return”<sup>207</sup> he alluded to the event of the sabbath before & the example of that soldier of Christ, urging us also to be ready, for who among us would be next called & how soon! is of thrilling import, the old admiral was long in the service of this country tho a Scotchman<sup>208</sup> by birth. His daughter sat in the pew with me, she wept during all the service & I observed when we all rose to join in the morning hymn, she knelt. Col Todd the other day was remarking on the excellent character of Admiral Hall & added he had avoided mentioning his death in writing to his own family lest they might be led to fear the like sudden call for himself as the other occupant of that pew died as suddenly last May! and Sir Ker Porter<sup>209</sup> was in the prime of life, he was brother to the Authoresses A-M & Jane Porter,<sup>210</sup> had just made his arrangements for returning to England when returning from court he fell dead at the door of his own house!<sup>211</sup> The Col certainly looks as tho he would go on the even tenor of his way a long while yet, for tho he is nightly at entertainments he is decidedly temperate in every way & looks as tho he could sing “be gone dull care”<sup>212</sup> he certainly strives to render unto all their claims upon him, regularly attends the Episcopal service in the morning, the Presbyterian in the evening<sup>213</sup> after which he pays his respects at the Count Nesselrodes<sup>214</sup> where there is always a Sunday night soiree, but the Col does not so far forget the sacred season as to make one at the card tables, tho gambling is the favorite recreation, the Col attends the French theatre<sup>215</sup> for the language & the company he meets there, the Italian Opera<sup>216</sup> because music is his passion! & the Palace on any day the Emperor signifies it to be his wish for in the court circle he is upon duty as the Ambassador of his country, but he whispers to his countrymen there is a dreadful wear & tear of conscience & he wishes his office could be changed for one tending to the interests of a better world! I think in whatsoever situation we are placed we may by self denial & a holy resolution honor God, who orders our sphere of action to try us whether we love Him better than all else. but I do not condemn those who act differently from my views & have no merit in declining amusements which I could not enjoy. But Oh I tremble for my children “the snares of the world” are so enticing until proved by christian experience that they are destructive to our love of Christ, and the young are slow to turn from the “voice of the charmer” whose reasonings are so plausible while tempting them to enjoy pleasure while they may for the dark days come so soon!<sup>217</sup> thus enticing them into scenes where they forget the divine presence of Him who has told us to be known as His disciples in the world.<sup>218</sup> My dear Debo may compare her rational domestic career with the dissipation of the youth of this gay metropolis & feel satisfied that she may sometimes attend a french play or the Opera without injury to herself, but Oh how much more happy she would be if she found no pleasure in them! she is a dear, amiable child, dutiful & always cheerful, yeilding to her fathers views of what is right, and already a favorite in the English circle here, the influence of a perfectly amiable young person, so gifted as she is might be so impressive in society with decided christian obligations, that I am too apt to lament that my dear daughter does not realize that she is required by her vows as one of Christs little flock to “let her light shine”<sup>219</sup> that those who are in error may be led into the way of truth, but Debo does not think with me on this subject, & I know that it must be wisdom from above which can convince her. I wish to be patient & to cast my care upon God. On monday last she was to have gone to a ball at the Hall of the Noblesse<sup>220</sup> where the presence of the Imperial family & all the court would make a splendid scene of novelty to charm her, but when Col Bouttatz<sup>221</sup> came soon after breakfast with tickets for the Opera & her father gave her the choice of the morning or the evening amusement she decided to give up the ball, so at 1 o'clock they went & returned at our usual dinner hour four o'clock, very much gratified with the Barber of Seville,<sup>222</sup> in the meantime I had gone out in a sledge under M<sup>r</sup> Ropes care to a German jewellers<sup>223</sup> to shew my dear Debo that tho I would not advocate her fondness for public amusements I yet enjoyed contributing my mite to please her. I selected a very pretty gold chain, which I was glad suited her taste when I presented it on her return home, she needed one to guard the pretty glasses her indulgent father had bought her some days before, & his approval of my additional purchase more than repaid me for venturing out in such a severe frost. It was 12 degrees below zero, yet I must confess I do not suffer from cold wrapped in my fox skin. The Ropes came in sociably to tea that evening thinking they might see Debo (whom they love & admire equally) dressed for the grand ball, but she could not have been better satisfied there than she seemed at the piano or harp with M<sup>rs</sup> Rs accompaniment, until eleven o'clock when they partook of some fruit & bade us good night. We all feel more cheerful since M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell is convalescing, tho it is slowly,<sup>224</sup> he still has some friend to watch by his bed side every night — Joseph Ropes<sup>225</sup> is there now. Debo & her father came from M<sup>rs</sup> Laws soiree just at 12. the party would not probably break up till 3. our folks were there just two hours, Debo found it pleasant dancing yet she expressed no desire to linger when her father proposed to leave. how much I admire her amiability she does not know! & surely she will retain the good opinion of those who revel longer, for moderation wins respect. The day before this ball at our parsons we went to M<sup>r</sup> Maingys<sup>226</sup> to dine at 5 1/2, they are not fond of parties so we only met two gentlemen, Miss Grant<sup>227</sup> whom we know thro M<sup>rs</sup> Baird<sup>228</sup> joined us at tea, she had invited herself that she might hear Miss W- play again! while the young ladies were in the music room I had some pleasing conversation with M<sup>rs</sup> Maingy<sup>229</sup> who is truly pious, we talked of our departed little ones!<sup>230</sup> of our churches & pastors in England & America,<sup>231</sup> it was a treat to me to listen to the opinion of one who expressed the undivided interest I feel in the Saviours kingdom. We afterwards went together to the sleeping apartments of her little Lily & Freddy,<sup>232</sup> he is between my boys in years & very fond of them. I did not wonder when I saw his play room that they should like a day on the Island so much, their rooms all communicate as is common in Russian houses numerous & small so that each of the girls have a separate establishment boudoir & all! Eliza<sup>233</sup> is most interesting to me, but I admire Emma<sup>234</sup> who is perhaps most talented & is very pretty. M<sup>r</sup> Maingy reminds me of my dear Brother Winny, in looks & character, he seems also to appreciate Debo as that kind Uncle did when we were in England. This was the coldest weather we have had this winter, I heard of many frost bitten faces! but really in these warm houses one can hardly be aware of the extreme changes. the days are lengthening rapidly almost 12 hours day light now, how cheering to me for I feel how little I accomplish. This is the week of the Carnival or butter week<sup>235</sup> as the Russians call it as they eat no meat now, in anticipation of Lent, but how strange their inconsistency, their eagerness for amusement because they are to be deprived of it for forty days proves they must think it is a season of penance instead of one of improvement. Architects have been very busy in erecting temporary theatres, swings, ice hills &c in the Admiralty Square <sup>236</sup> that all classes may enjoy recreations this week, while the Opera has become a morning revel this week, that the higher classes may devote the evenings to balls. The Col sent us tickets for a masked ball to be given at the Palace, 'tis the only occasion upon which the Emperor descends from his dignity to exchange words with the people who may gain admittance, of course even Debo's curiosity would not take her into such a mixed crowd altho the strictest decorum is observed even in public places here & of course at the Imperial Palace<sup>237</sup> — On the night of M<sup>rs</sup> Laws soirée there was also a great ball at the Palace of the Grand Duke Michel given in honor of his daughters marriage,<sup>238</sup> many wore costumes, M<sup>rs</sup> Bodiscos cost $1000. Col Todd had not reached the English Quay when Debo & her father p<sup>d</sup> their parting compliments — but he had promised the Laws to be there at midnight, for the Imperial family keep early hours & for the Empres's health<sup>239</sup> eight oclock is the hour for receiving, wherever she goes. so that the Col would find the night still in its meridian when the court should release him & could pay his devoirs in the English circle after twelve. How thankful I feel that our dear Debo is satisfied with a moderate participation in these things!

Feb 26th <sup>240</sup> During the last week the little leisure I could command I devoted to writing my beloved Sister Ktaie [sic] & my Springfield pastor,<sup>241</sup> if my letters convey half the pleasure theirs to me bring my time was well spent! We had hoped the mail which came in yesterday from England would have brought us intelligence by the Steamer of the 1st but too soon! we are too impatient! Oh what a vast obligation is ours to the poor mail driver! & to those brave mariners too who endure such hardships at this season of the year to bring us comforts! The extreme cold of the past fortnight has made me reflect deeply on the great difference in the lot of individuals of the vast human family. We within our heated mansions would be scarcely conscious how severe the atmosphere without but for our thermometers or the reports we listen to from those who ask our commiseration for the suffering poor. Such real Russian winter has not been experienced in St Petersburg in many years. Sledges have arrived from the country with driver & in some cases all frozen to death. Postillions found stiff & dead seated upon their masters equipages! Ah how can the rich reconcile it to themselves that their idleness & frivolity should so condemn their retainers to sudden death. that pride may be gratified while their coach & four stop the way. God will bring them to judgement! those who delight in mercy shall obtain mercy<sup>242</sup> may my children abide by the golden rule in every circumstance of their life. We have kept at home for a week, 30 deg below zero being too keen an atmosphere for a drive or a walk, but the sun shone brightly after the snow fell every day. Our pastor Mr Law & his ladies called yesterday<sup>243</sup> the cold having moderated, they mentioned upwards of 30 persons had been found dead from cold in this quarter alone last week 3 at the guard posts just at our corner. Ah the sad question! were any prepared to meet their Saviour? will solemnly obtrude as we listen to these melancholy accidents! That we are not removed from liability to sudden death within our comfortable homes must be often felt, for many have been the cases among the higher orders which we hear their associates lament, tho they seem not to lay it to heart. Last evening we had a few friends to join us at tea. Their two Excellencies Col Todd & M<sup>r</sup> Bodisco — with our beautiful young countrywoman. I listened to their remarks upon the last ball they had attended in the court circle & learnt the host then so full of health & spirits died of a fit at the age of 45 last Sunday!<sup>244</sup> We cannot judge of the heart, but Oh what comfort to surviving relatives when our lives bear testimony to our faith in Jesus. And alas in this gay city the many appear not to live as tho they loved Him better than the world. M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco spoke in raptures of the uninterrupted seasons of pleasure she has participated in at this dissipated court, & said she should never wish to return to her native land if she had her own relatives here — no society in America she says<sup>245</sup> — she must have lost relish for what is rational & intellectual & sincere! Oh I can think of no earthly delight to compare with that of our return to our native land! As I anticipate our approach to a sight of its shores within the beautiful harbor of New York or Boston I am afraid of growing too impatient to realize all this fond dream! but she thinks after having visited Niagara there is nothing more to induce even an American to desire ever to return there! She wants the patriotism of our little boys, who exalt their native land above all other countries upon Earth. I allowed them to remain in the parlor an hour after their usual bedtime last night for our favorite Miss Khremmer (who had won their hearts on our voyage upon the Bullie) was among us, Col Bouttatz also & Melnikoff. I was not sorry I indulged my darling boys. they behaved so like gentlemen their father commended them today upon it. Jemmie was part the evening enjoying the Spy to himself, I watched him laughing so heartily yet quietly over some of Ceasers speeches<sup>246</sup> I could scarcely refrain from joining in it. While Debo collected the circle of amateurs around her piano M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes aiding her with her fine voice I sat with M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco who has so little ear for music she did not even recognise our national air Yankee Doodle<sup>247</sup> when played, & seemed to like her seat on the sofa too well to leave it. M<sup>r</sup> Ropes regaled her with some histories of Russian depredations,<sup>248</sup> but afterwards as she unconsciously tossed about a few elegant little volumes on the sofa=table upon which she leaned her snowy arm, she discovered they were all on religious subjects, which induced her to tell me she had an extensive library of religious works at my service, they had been parting gifts from her pastor<sup>249</sup> on her bidding adieu to him, but she shrugged her shoulders & said she had never time to look into them. all her reading now must of necessity be in french as that is the language at court! When she afterwards described to me the death of her infant so suddenly taken from her on the day of her fathers funeral<sup>250</sup> too, just as she was packing up to leave Georgetown, I wondered she should not have sought comfort in these good books on her long voyage. I certainly shall borrow them that I may recommend their perusal to her! Miss Khremmer staid later than the others & was delighted with our Indian portraits.<sup>251</sup> I told her how glad I was we had anything to shew her which she had not met with in her travels. she is so sensible & agreeable she reminds me of my dear Charleston Cousins.<sup>252</sup> Debo has been spending today on the Island. I am always willing to spare her to the Maingys, much tho I miss her dear self from my side, I know she is delighting & delighted there, such companions will give her a distaste for those are less improved. I returned by her a book which Miss M had lent me & have been deeply interested in perusing it. Blunt upon the Epistles to the 7 churches of Asia from Rev:<sup>253</sup> I read sometimes to Whistler just at bedtime in it, & last Sunday<sup>254</sup> evening he gratified me by asking me to read a whole lecture which I did with all my heart! God bless him & teach us together by His spirit to enjoy such studies. how secure the family union where such subjects are understood & preferred! My dear husband is now reading beside me. since his french tutor<sup>255</sup> has left him free, we are momentarily expecting Debo, it is nearly ten, but as M<sup>rs</sup> Gellebrand<sup>256</sup> was to bring her in their sledge she waits her movements no doubt. My darling Willie was thrown out of a sledge yesterday, Jemie more active swung himself off. In such cases the driver in St Petersburg always drives off lest the Police should deprive him of vehicle & horse for his carelessness.<sup>257</sup> my boys were persuaded by Alexander the poor Swashdic<sup>258</sup> should not be pd (tho Willie confessed they had gone the worth of 50 kopeeks silver)<sup>259</sup> & they seemed to deem it quite a proper revenge for the bruises he was the cause of to little Willie, that he went off without his pay, until I pointed out to them their dishonesty. all today they have been urging me to send them up the Galernia to compensate the poor driver for breaking his sledge. but snow has been incessantly falling until tonight, they describe the roads like waves of the sea out of the city, such heavy falls of snow are not usual here, we have this winter had heretofore a little snow every day light & fine like dust, & have not minded walking out in them. I drove with M<sup>rs</sup> Gellebrand as far as the Gastinandva<sup>260</sup> in a snow storm which in America would be a sufficient embargo to keep ladies in the house, but had secured from cold by furs, I really enjoyed it, tho I had a great deal to shake off when I reached our own vestibule again. My errand had been to have a black satin dress fitted, & M<sup>rs</sup> G had gone very kindly gone to talk Russ with the mantua maker<sup>261</sup> for me. It has since been finished & I do not think it dear, silk lining for Cardinal,<sup>262</sup> rich gymp<sup>263</sup> &c &c 50 rubles paper,<sup>264</sup> about 10 dollars. I could find no bombazine<sup>265</sup> at the English Magazine which is the great shop here the satin cost me about as much as the making & trimmings, & as there was not attempt at a bargain I suppose it was a fair price. I must record the 1st day of March this year tho the 12th has arrived, but on that morning Debo & I had some exquisite enjoyment in listening to the choristers of the Imperial Palace, she because the music was so perfect of its kind & she could speak her delight to Emma Maingy who sat next her, & I — when I closed my eyes against the crowd, could imagine myself among those who sing heavenly hallilujahs. all all that have gone before me seemed to be near enough for me to hear & see their bliss! & my heart was so full I wept. It is not unusual for persons to be quite overcome by this choir of boys, their choruses are such perfect melody, but the solos are most melting! little fellows from the size of our little Willie stood in front & so the size uniformly increased up to manhood. there is an asylum appropriated to them for their education & home.<sup>266</sup> at the end of an hour the rehearsal was over, & on our way out to our sledges we saw their school rooms, & the apartment where their dinner tables were already set. Emma pointed out decanters of Quass (a sour but favorite Russian beverage)<sup>267</sup> several on each long table. the boys looked as if they would be glad when we should let them take their seats. they had been standing so very erect, for that hour, but tho Whistler allowed his imagination to embitter his pleasure in listening to them by the idea of how they must be dulled & punished<sup>268</sup> the home looked comfortable & their countenances happy. Emma came the next Sat<sup>269</sup> to spend the day & practise at our house with Debo, she brought me a favorite volume from her mother who was right in her assurance that I should enjoy it. “Reads meditations.”<sup>270</sup> I am told he died last Sum<sup>r</sup> in his native land England, he surely was in the full faith of our blessed Saviour & Oh may many be led by this work to esteem the knowledge of Christ as they ought, I shewed Emma an American prayer book,<sup>271</sup> as some one had misinformed them about the service of our church in my dear country. they had heard that we were not allowed to use a written form of prayer she admired the hymns exceedingly, in the English chapel here we have such a meagre collection of hymns & no chaunts sung – I often think over the devotion of the singing in the Westerly church<sup>272</sup> & wish here it was so! Since I last wrote upon the incidents of this Winter, we have heard from Stonington. no letter addressed to myself by the steamer of the 1st of Feb but one from dear Kate Prince<sup>273</sup> written in Dec, in sympathy for my loss in our darling Charlies death. what a treat it was to get it! I have so often thought of this warm hearted girl & really longed to hear from her. I had written her a few lines by the last mail in the hope she might go to Boston to see M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison<sup>274</sup> who is to leave there next month to join her husband here. My dear brother W<sup>ms</sup> letter to Whistler<sup>275</sup> was all I could wish, so cheerful, so confiding & so affectionate, his mention of our precious mothers welfare with Charles<sup>276</sup> caused my heart to lift itself up in thankfulness to God! I had had distressing dreams of Mother & her long silence is such a blank, that I began feel [sic] “all else availed little”<sup>277</sup> till I could be assured she was well. Debo had letters not only from her “Twin” but from Eliza Van Vee I entered into the interesting details of each & it was my painful duty that night to disclose to my dear husband the death of his brother James.<sup>278</sup> At this distance from all our natural ties how striking is the knell which sounds upon our hearts at such tidings. Oh may the warning be not lost upon us! how many have departed since Whistler left his country less than two years ago! And who of us may be summoned next becomes a startling question — The news of dear cousin Carri was truly gratifying this she calls the happy winter of her life — she is so thankful that she can walk again without crutches — and so blessed in her restored husband & snug home.<sup>279</sup> May God see fit long to continue this peace of mind to her & may her life shew forth her praise! for unless we appreciate every blessing as from the true source, it is lost upon us.

Fri 22nd [March] Again I find a leisure hour to record the little vanity in my life just now 10 oclock has just struck, I am alone by my old friend the study lamp & a cheering bright fire in our parlor, Whistler having just gone in a Sledge to bring our dear Debo home from Vassili Ostrow, across the Neva, where I took her this morning to pass the day with her friend Emma Maingy – the truth is we feel very careful of our only daughter now, she has been drooping lately, last Saturday she had an intense head-ache while we were spending the evening at M<sup>rs</sup> Bairds,<sup>280</sup> which confined her to the house all Sunday, & on her return yesterday from the ice hills (where she took little Willie & one of our Pastors nice daughters - she had again such a tormenting head ache she was obliged to give up the pleasant evening she had anticipated at M<sup>r</sup> Laws, & I to forego the sociable M<sup>rs</sup> Gellebrand had invited me to, which I felt an unusual inclination for as M<sup>rs</sup> Maingy & M<sup>rs</sup> Wood<sup>281</sup> were there. however as Debo received D<sup>r</sup> Rogers approval today she fulfilled her engagement, 15 deg frost early this morning — but a beautifully bright day, we should have enjoyed our drive, if the road across the Neva were not rough as waves of the sea — At last Debo grew frightened & called out “Stchoy”<sup>282</sup> to the Iswashtic,<sup>283</sup> but he did not stop his Sledge until she had actually been pitched out. we trembled, then laughed as no fall could have been more softly-While I was at dinner today our neighbour M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes sent me over a Russian doll to purchase dressed in the full costume of a nurse of this country<sup>284</sup> — which since I understand to be a means of support to a reduced but highly respectable lady — who once kept her equipage I shall buy — and who knows but yet little darling Julie Palmer<sup>285</sup> may see & admire it as her own — if any body will take it to Boston! My dear Jemmie lost his participation in Willie’s extraordinary pleasures last week of attending M<sup>rs</sup> Laws bazaar for the poor,<sup>286</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellebrands juvenile dinner party in commemoration of little Ellen Ropes<sup>287</sup> birth day — from his having caught cold in skating upon the Neva, he alarmed us by symptoms of croup & was confined to his bed until last sunday,<sup>288</sup> when he was allowed to welcome Mons Vaney,<sup>289</sup> for his having lost a drawing lesson was a greater chagrin than Willies going without him that day I left Emma with Debo while Whistler & M<sup>r</sup> Ropes accompanied me in a Sledge some versts on the Peterhoff road<sup>290</sup> to look at a house for the summer, we stowed Willie in for he takes such a wee space & Mr R chose to stand behind, which in this country is deemed more suitable to a gentleman than sitting with the “Tswashtic” the sun shone bright & after my weeks confinement I enjoyed the ride exceedingly. tho we had to encounter deep snow in approaching the houses four of which we inspected,<sup>291</sup> situated in extensive grounds with plenty of wood around I could imagine how pleasant the [sic] would be in June. I finished my despatches on tuesday<sup>292</sup> for the next Steamer and also wrote my Sister Alicia by that days Courier. Mr Harrison<sup>293</sup> had preceded it a week, by him I sent a few Russian slippers & gew gaws to our young friends & we managed to slip in a Russian puzzle<sup>294</sup> for Johnny Chapman<sup>295</sup> from Willie which is a great secret between him & I! for Father objected lest it should trouble Mr H. but he loves to gratify children & he proposed putting the box in his own trunk privately. We have heard of the travellers as far as Berlin.<sup>296</sup> Mr H will be relieved when he exchanges the Kabitka<sup>297</sup> for a Steamer, when he set out from this with a lady inside with himself, he could not have anticipated much ease, no room even to sit up, as persons are expected to recline in these covered sledges when travelling & to sleep all the way that is the only provision made. he will enjoy his return to Russia I trust, bringing wife & children,<sup>298</sup> what a transition from Winters snows, to Summers verdure! but he will experience that first in England. How cheering the long bright days are beginning to be here, we heed not the solid & interminable white pavement, for the sky looks benignly — & until 7 oclock I enjoy my work or book by day light — I send Mary with Willie to take a stroll now after dinner as it is necessary to take the fresh air regularly, for health, they reported this evening the rebuilding the temporary theatres &c in the Admiralty Square, in anticipation of Easter, when the people are to throng there for a weeks holiday again.<sup>299</sup> the secret of pulling them down during Lent, I am told is, that the proprietors may thus be obliged to afford work to the mechanics, whose families probably squander their hard earnings in these shows. The Emperor interest in the welfare of his people is very fair where he can judge for himself of what will be just. for instance there is now a bridge building across the Neva,<sup>300</sup> which it is so essential to have finished before the ice breaks up,<sup>301</sup> that the mechanics upon it work all night and all day. We observed them busy one sunday on our way to church & so did the Emperor I presume (for he is daily driving about the city in his one horse sledge pretending to be nothing greater than any other military man whose uniform he wears<sup>302</sup> – for an order was issued forbidding the work on the bridge on the Sabbath. It is well there is moonlight for the poor fellows, my Willie said to me as we walked on the English quay & I remarked to him how hard they toiled, while they sung a kind of sea song, “Dont you think mother the poor must be glad that God said there should be one day of rest in every week?” Indeed our heavenly parent who knows the eagerness of humanity for worldly advantages knew we should never reserve any time to prepare ourselves for eternity. & He has provided all things for our comfort if we will but have confidence in His wisdom & love for us his children

March 29th friday evening. Debo has gone with Miss Khremer to the Michel Theatre<sup>303</sup> this eve to a concert at which the wonderful Pianist Clara V<sup>304</sup> is to perform, as my dear daughter had a fine opportunity for listening to her performance a few days ago when she visited the Smoloff institution<sup>305</sup> with the Maingays, I was the more chagrined that she went tonight, for I cannot think it consistent with a communicant of our church & in Lent too — to give countenance to theatres, but Debo knows my opinion, so I say nothing only my heart is pained when our views are opposite. Ah how thankful I feel at this moment for the comfort my precious Mothers<sup>306</sup> yeilds me! & one from dear Maria too so circumstantial that I can almost imagine myself by her side. how thrilling her account of little Georgy Palmers<sup>307</sup> illness! May dear Kate be taught that the children God has given her are from a garden of paradise — not hers — but lent for her comfort, & to be recalled at any moment. Even in this world there is one place at which our souls all meet even which [sic]<sup>308</sup> seas roll between us, at the footstool of mercy. Oh what could comfort us as faith in prayer does! how earnestly do I daily ask the blessing of our Saviour on all I love, most especially upon my dear George & upon my Mother, & He is already granting my urgent request that she may be an instrument of good by example & precept leading many to Him. I can no longer regret her not coming to Russia — tho I wish for her dear society every day — it was mercifully ordered that she should go to my dear brother Charles & Oh may all her endeavours for his comfort be rewarded by his following in the footsteps of such a mother.<sup>309</sup> Debo will be so glad when she comes in presently to find a letter from her Twin for her — We were disappointed that our budget<sup>310</sup> did not come early in the week — When the Galignani<sup>311</sup> informed us of the arrival of the Hibernia at Liverpool in 12 days from Boston — we then read the awful account of the exploding the great gun on board the Princeton at Washington & so suddenly taking the lives of the Sec of the Navy. the Sec of State & four other persons.<sup>312</sup> & I have reflected much upon the providence of God which has in the past year, twice shielded our dear Donald Fairfax<sup>313</sup> from injury when exposed to death, for I presume he must be attached to this man of War — I trust his precious life may be prolonged on Earth to shine on the narrow path & induce his young companions to join him in it & as a blessing & comfort to us all. How much anxiety are we saved when those we love shew in their daily conduct that their devotion to the Saviour exceeds their love of earthly attractions, a feeling of security attends all my fond reveries of Donald. I must not omit recording our visiting the Gastinandva today. Col Bottatz [siz] was our pilot thro the crowd of purchasers & venders of artificial flowers, images &c in anticipation of Palm-Sunday.<sup>314</sup> this business has been most active all this week. Our dear boys were quite excited by the novelty of the scene, James animation attracted the wonder of many, for even in crowds here such decorum & gravity prevails that it must be surprising when there is any ebullition of joy.<sup>315</sup> Willie bargained for a Harmonica & a banner with the Russian Eagle — the latter he wishes he could send to Jacks!<sup>316</sup> Indeed both with Jemmie & himself usually an “All this availeth me nothing” if Willie Wyatt<sup>317</sup> & Jacky could only be with us it would be very well — Whistler gave James a Cosmorama of the Seasons,<sup>318</sup> which he exhibited to us this evening all lit up. The workmen are busy as they were before Lent rebuilding the temporary theatres-ice hills-&c in the Admiralty Square for Easter holidays. these temporary amusements are called the Catchells<sup>319</sup>

April 10th 1844. The sound of the poor workmens hammers driving piles for the new bridge across the Neva has been over some days.<sup>320</sup> I miss their song now when I take my stroll upon the English Quai. the ice must soon break up, for thawing has made rivulets thro out the streets. yet we have had 7 deg of frost at night this week — Last week was Passion-week<sup>321</sup> & our church as thronged every day for prayers as any Greek or Roman, we could not even find places in the pews sometimes, but sat around the walls. On Good Friday<sup>322</sup> I took my dear little Willie by the hand to the house of God, a string of equipages lined the Quai, for many attend even from Cronstadt at this season to receive the Communion. but my dear boy was separated from me by reason of the crowd in the church. I remarked his good behaviour with thankfulness. Debo was in like manner obliged to sit apart from her father, altho we went to the side of the church appropriated to the gents: the sexton would have shewn Whistler the respect of a higher place, but he is inclined in a place of worship to “take the lower room”<sup>323</sup> & could scarcely retain that from the urgent demand for places, so many young officers attended to receive the holy communion - as all in the service of Russia must of necessity be members of a christian church, & descendants of English parents naturally prefer that of their forefathers.<sup>324</sup> Debo was invited to go with the Laws to the Kezan<sup>325</sup> Church Sat night-to witness the Greek ceremony of hailing Easter, but we objected to her remaining out so long after her usual hour of rest, she has not been well lately - so she merely dined at the Parsonage & when we sent for her at ten she slipped away unnoticed. M<sup>r</sup> Ropes who once had attended the Kezan gave me so minute a description that I can imagine how imposing is the service & shall not brave the dense crowd. Just before midnight the priests form a procession, each bearing some holy vessel of gold & silver from the Altar, they chaunt solemnly as they leave the church ( thro a side door) & after making a circuit out side they re-enter, the people then chaunt tumultuously “Where is Christ” upon which the priests chaunt “He is risen”<sup>326</sup> instantly every one in that dense crowd hold up a lighted taper, such a sudden change from darkness to light discovers how closely they connect the good things of this life, with their Saviours resurrection. Avenues are formed thro the crowd for spreading out all sorts of food to be blessed by the priest. their fast having been so severe during Passion Week they immediately begin devouring curds, hard eggs &c at midnight — & either owing to this imprudence or the weeks revelling which follows, very many more deaths than usual occur. On Easter Sunday I was induced to rise as early as 5 oclock by M<sup>r</sup> Ropes coming for me to walk with him to the Catholic church<sup>327</sup> to hear the mass so beautifully sung there, the morning was clear & mild, I enjoyed the walk very much & was quite compensated for the effort it cost me to follow my guide thro the crowd which filled every corner, it was just 6 o'clock when the service began. A kind of martial music of triumph opened it, then the fine toned Organ accompanied the voices of the chaunters After the crowd dispersed we lingered near those who really came there to worship. I observed many prostrate upon the marble pavement, even their foreheads touching it in front of a door, & was told that had represented the holy sepulchre. At each Altar there are confessionals where were priests all in white even with white hoods, engaged in listening to the kneeling penitents whose lips were at the little window towards which they bent their ear, in french, german, or russ, the notice was printed on each stall — On our return thro the Nevski what a contrast all the Fancy shops presented filled with luxuries, but above all the Easter Eggs adorned them, & as we continued our route home thro the Alexandra square<sup>328</sup> it was still more shocking to see the preparations for commencing the Easter amusements, men at the booths unpacking refreshments of every kind, mead, cakes, fruit, nuts, but above all colored eggs — banners flying! & all looking as if they, rejoiced that the restraint of Lent was taken off, for it is so strictly observed here that all amusements are prohibited, & during Passion week the Imperial family leave the Winter Palace to seclude themselves some versts from the hum of the city.<sup>329</sup> I found my family just leaving their rooms, we assembled as usual for reading the scriptures & I read that beautiful prayer for Easter Sunday from the book my Twin Sister had obtained from Mr W<sup>m</sup> Hull<sup>330</sup> for my use. I felt sorry that custom should infringe in my home upon the sanctity of the day God has consecrated to rest, & if my life is spared to another Easter here I shall put off the exchange of gifts until Easter Monday, as I find they do at Mr Ropes — But there was the cooks ornamented loaf stuck full of flowers upon the breakfast table — & a small plate of colored eggs from each servant Dvanic, Porter & even Mr Maxwells man Le Rong had sent up his, with the motto “Christ is risen” upon some. Alexander had selected the choicest he could buy made of wax or sugur for each of us, so that we felt obliged to present him with 5 silver rubles to repay him, each one giving their proportion to make up the sum. & as I held my ruble for his acceptance he kissed my hand so gracefully as he said in good english “thank you M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler” My heart involuntarily prayed he might become the servant of the only true God. I begged him not to join in any of the amusements in the square on sunday promising him a holiday any other, he seemed sincere in his assurance that he would rather not go there, but to church as usual. I was glad too that our Mary proposed to go with us to the English church.<sup>331</sup> Willie had his mothers hand again. I love to listen to his remarks in my walks at all times when we are tête a tête, but never more than this morning when he was anticipating the full congregation we were going to meet “Dont you think Mother it is delightful to see a church quite full? I think it is a splendid sight but I should not think so if the people were all Germans like our man Maurice who could not understand M<sup>r</sup> Law when he went with me to church” “Perhaps if he had Willie, he would have learnt better than to steal.”— In the afternoon we had no service as administering the communion to such an unusual number had prolonged M<sup>r</sup> Laws duties. I was at no loss at home, read with my boys & afterwards in “Reades Meditations”<sup>332</sup> to my dear husband. We were just setting out for M<sup>r</sup> Ellerbys chapel<sup>333</sup> after an early tea when it began to rain, which is such a rare state of the weather we did not venture out.

Tuesday night April 22nd <sup>334</sup> Every day I have so many demands upon my time from anxiety to continue the boys studies — their sister being much diverted by visiters from teaching. indeed answering notes takes some time every morning for where so many servants are half their day idle it is a temptation to send them as couriers with friendly or complimentary billets from house to house but however agreeable, it interferes sometimes with more important duties. I hope in the country to have fewer interruptions, for the long winter has gone without my acquiring much either in French or Russ, but in the Summer by early rising I hope make<sup>335</sup> time. We have had some delightful weather this spring & thro the untiring perseverance of the Police upon the poor Dvanics the streets have been entirely cleared of their deep pavement of ice, the power of the sun which shines so bright in this climate, of course caused plenty of mud for a week or so, but the stones are quite clear now thro every thoroughfare. Debo & I had a charming drive this morning up the Nevski in a nice Droschky. little Willy stood up between us & by his attempt at speaking Russ in every shop was not only useful but amusing. today being dear M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes birth day & also the 4th Anniversary of her wedding<sup>336</sup> we were in search for some pretty & appropriate offering it being the custom in Russia always to make presents on birthdays (every servants [sic] even expects it) Debo could find nothing she liked (not too extravagantly dear but a pen handle at the English Magazine. I had gone as soon as breakfast was over to offer my best wishes of many happy returns of the day. the good young couple looked so truly contented with little Ellen seated in her high chair between Papa and Mama at their morning repast, which they told me had been delayed by M<sup>rs</sup> R having notes to read & answer, & so many pretty gifts from his brother, Sisters & their own little trio. <sup>337</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Gellebrands lines were worth all M<sup>rs</sup> R said for her heart abounds in love to the Saviour & to all around her. We have been invited to meet a party of friends at her house this evening in honor of the anniversary, but as Whistler has a sore throat & our darling James is still confined to his room I shall not be there. We had a very pleasant evenings [sic] at the Gellebrands last week & also at the Ropes the departure of the Maingays for England induces us to meet them as often as possible. The same little circle were with us last Wednesday evening,<sup>338</sup> my only alloy was that Jemie was confined to his bed, with a mustard plaister on his throat. he has been very poorly since the thawing season commenced, soon becoming overheated takes cold, when he complained of pain first in his shoulder then in his side, my fears of a return of last years attack made me tremble, & when I gaze upon his pale face sleeping, contrasted with Willies round rosy cheeks my heart is full, but I know that our heavenly Father permits it to be thus “Be still & know that I am God”<sup>339</sup> is ever sounding, to silence human wishes or repinings. Our dear James said to me the other day so touchingly “Oh I am sorry the Emperor ever asked Father to come to Russia. but if I had Willie Wyatt & Jacky<sup>340</sup> here I should not feel so impatient Mother to get back to Stonington.” yet I cannot think it the climate here which affects his health, Willie never was as stout in his native land & James looks better decidedly than when we brought him here. Our friend M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell is now well enough<sup>341</sup> to profit by the clean dry pavements, he usually invites Will to walk with him which is always a gratification to my little boy. James used to be his chosen companion in his rides, & soon I hope he may join his kind friend in his strolls, he is in our parlor every evening now, being lonely in his own & it not being thought prudent for him to venture out after dinner. At 8 o'clock I am often still at my sewing or reading without a candle & can hardly persuade James to put up his drawing to go to bed while it seems yet day light. Yesterday I took a stroll with Debo after dinner on the English Quay, she had promised to go to Mr<sup>s</sup> Ropes to tea & when I looked at my watch & told her it was seven o'clock she thought it must be a mistake for the sun was shining on our faces. the ice of the Neva looks like plains of mud now, so much dirt has gone from the s<sup>ts</sup> into it, every day we suppose it may break up, & they prohibit any driving across, altho people still walk upon the Neva. We cannot drink the water now it looks so thick & until we obtain a filterer, we melt ice from our ice house<sup>342</sup> for the table & for our rooms. We hope the bridge may not be as long away this year as prophesied. (there is we hear a vast quantity of ice from the Lake Ladoga to pass down our river this season) Debo will feel her being prevented going over to the Island to the Maingays as much as I shall the interruption to my visits to my christian friend Miss Hirst.<sup>343</sup> Willie & I walked over the bridge Sunday afternoon as I had promised her I would go to read to her, this is the first call I have made here on the sabbath, tho so much visiting is in fashion in St Petersburg. as we passed by those selling fruit &c at stalls & could not avoid hearing every demonstration of forgetfulness of the divine command to "Remember the Lords day to keep it holy"<sup>344</sup> my little boy made many remarks which I wished might have been in Russ to be understood by all who stared at the chatterbox. We saw two ladies in a coach in full dress going out to dinner I supposed, garlands of flowers on their heads & large bouquets in their hands. then I thought "she who liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."<sup>345</sup> I congratulated myself on at last seating myself by the bedside of the dear invalid, who always welcomes me with open arms. her nurse very soon prepared an orange for Willie's refreshment after his walk of two miles, & then he interested himself in a good little book which kept him quiet as a dozing kitten while I read aloud some of Miss Hirsts favorite chap from 2nd Corinthians, how forcible was every verse of the 4th & 5th chap<sup>346</sup> while she commented so clearly upon them. I felt it was good to be with one so near heaven,

& always wish Debo would be introduced to this true friend, whose cheerfulness would render religion captivating to a young person — she has suffered exceedingly the last month, not able to read even her bible for three weeks, but now better. today I had a note from her own hand by her nurse & in return for the books she brought my boys, sent back some nice calves foot jelly & Ainsley Ginger cakes,<sup>347</sup> knowing Miss Hirst relishes them

Wed. morning 23rd April.<sup>348</sup> I will not be tempted abroad by bright sun shine or balmy air until I note down my thankfulness for so many mercies as crown my lot, my darling James after more than a weeks confinement to his room, came to the breakfast table this morning. Last evenings mail brought me a letter from my dear Sister Alicia with the joyful promise that she is coming to Russia with Mr Harrison. I hope soon to record good news from across the brook it is such a blank when a month intervenes between letters. Emma Maingay dined with us yesterday & went with Debo to the Gellebrand tea party<sup>349</sup> at nine p.m Mr Maxwell seemed as much to enjoy the duetts they played on piano & harp while we were at our tea table as Whistler did. After they were obliged to leave us & I had read to my boys as usual I found Mr M alone in our parlor for Winans<sup>350</sup> was with Whis — in the Chancery, he cannot be absent from Alexandrofski<sup>351</sup> in the day & comes almost every night on business of the shop — so we were tete a tete until past eleven. I arose this morning at five oclock to put a mustard plaister to my husbands throat. the temptation to take a nap after it was strong. but I resisted & thus enjoyed reading my bible & held communion with my God an hour before the rest of the family awoke. having no longer a little Charlie to awaken me early I have not risen till after the sun this spring, but I must recover my old habit of early rising again. Last week Mrs Maingay was so kind as to drive me about in her carriage two days, shewing me the way to different places where she has been well served for twelve years. when I can speak Russ as she does I may bargain as profitably. I was surprised in passing thro the Moskoy<sup>352</sup> to see at a shop window the beautiful scarlet plaid which Mrs Ormerod<sup>353</sup> had given my boys for dresses, & which I had given to the tailor<sup>354</sup> (who made their g<sup>t</sup> coats — to make up into tunics a few days ago, I smiled & said he was enticing customers, yet I did not suppose he would steal a vest pattern or two from the ample measures allowed to make the tunics full & long enough to let out in case of their outgrowing. I shall never be sharp enough for the rogues I have to deal with here, so rare is honesty among the lower classes of this country that even Russians of the respectable sort acknowledge this is a nation of thieves. I paid the tailor 30 rubles banco for making the tunics, nor thought of examining them any further than that they fit nicely, the next day Mary detected how much they were stinted, the guilty rogue will not come, tho I have sent for him as if for further orders, he is self accused & I do not envy him. I did not know till Emma M<sup>355</sup> told us of the young Grand Dukes<sup>356</sup> wearing scarlet shirts that it was the favorite color for any but footmen of the Court, she admires Jemmie & Willie exceedingly in their scarlet tunics, which indeed are so becoming I wish dear Annie O<sup>357</sup> could see how fine her taste proves to be. M<sup>358</sup> Maingay & Emma called this morning as they did not expect to come again for a week at least, & we agreed it would be running to great a risk in us to fulfil our promise of spending tomorrow evening at their house, we might be obliged to spend a week, for there is every prognostic that the ice will move & the bridge taken to one side to give it free passage without a half hours warning. Debo however would enjoy an embargo with her friends & I promised if there was no disturbance on the Neva she should cross to the island bag & baggage tomorrow morning to stay some days. My dear Whistler was much disturbed today by a communication from a young friend.<sup>358</sup> time may disclose it, he retired to his room & I observed frequently traces of emotion all day. he could scarcely sleep tho we did not retire till midnight, for this something on his mind.

Thursday [April] 24th <sup>359</sup> Alas for my darling daughters dissatisfaction, she looked so ghost like at breakfast she had to confess herself more unwell than ever & we could not consent to her leaving home at a time too when if she became ill the doctor might be shut out from visiting his patients at the Island, her fathers tenderness deepens for her daily & I am sure I loved her more than ever for so amiably yielding her inclination to our prudence. I have never heard a high wind in St Petersburg, in the evening however there was a threatening moaning sound as of an approaching storm & we were sure the ice would go before morning. the wind was south east, Debo fancied she heard a cannon at midnight, which is the warning given when the Neva is rising an [sic] an inundation may be expected. we could not remember what was the 3rd agent which combined with the breaking up of the ice & the wind at south-east would prove fatal to St Petersburg.<sup>360</sup> but Debo was so uneasy Alexander was despatched to ask the Bushnics<sup>361</sup> opinion of the state of the river & his report lulled her fears, tho her head continued to ache.

Friday [April] 25th <sup>362</sup> We have rain very seldom, but the pavements shewed it had been raining in the night, and our suspence was over, the ice had freed itself at 4 o'clock & in its violent rush for the Gulf had carried the bridge with sixty soldiers upon it out of sight of the city, to prove how unusually intense the cold of Feb, the ice shewed itself double the thickness it guessed at,<sup>363</sup> six feet thick no wonder in its rapid movement it should carry [sic] the bridge of boats. Debo & I took a drive in a Droshky as the streets were too wet to walk that we might peep at the change of scene on the Neva. Yesterday our Dvanic trudged across on the ice with a note from Miss Debo to Emma,<sup>364</sup> but he trembled at the prospect of his not getting safe home again & took a loaf of brown bread under his arm — now there is scarcely a peice of ice as large as the Gondolas<sup>365</sup> which are rowed about in all directions, these boats are so gaily painted red & green outside, wreaths of flowers within & the oarsmen dressed in cold shirts over their trowsers complete the picture, our little Willie stood up in the Droshky as we could not squeeze him in between us, he was contented any way & chatted half Russ half English all the way. poor Jemmy is still confined to the house, where a cough has obliged us to keep him a fortnight, but today he is allowed to go down to Mr Maxwells parlor, where my boys would like to be always.<sup>366</sup> This evening while we were at tea American letters were handed Whistler, none for me however, Debo was happy at hearing from her constant Jule & her chum Josephine Mauran.<sup>367</sup>

Saturday [April] 26th <sup>368</sup> I wrote Sarah Adams <sup>369</sup> & Debo acknowledged the favors she had received, she had also a note from Emma & a paper of toffy with anxious inquiries as to the state of her health. I walked with her to Frazers<sup>370</sup> in the Grand Moskoj for some materials for her embroidery we observed at some of the fruit shop<sup>371</sup> windows little baskets of ripe cherries, strawberries & raspberries, it was a curious exhibition contrasted with ice in the canals, but they did not tempt us buy cherries at a ruble banco apeice! Radishes are more reasonable.

Monday [April] 28th <sup>372</sup> Yesterday proved showery. Debo remained at home with Jemmy, but Willie went with his father & I to the English Chapel, the attendance was good as most of the congregation keep equipages, & the morning service is generally crowded, in the afternoon there is a lamentable difference, tho M<sup>r</sup> Law is very urgent that the whole of the Lords day be honored & that we should not neglect assembling ourselves together. Whistler did propose going out to Sarsocello to see Col Todd<sup>373</sup> as he finds little leisure for visiting during the week, but I discouraged him by saying “You know as you spend Sunday so will your work in all the week days prosper or not” M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes sent over to offer a seat in her carriage if we would go to the “American & English Chapel at 6 oclock, I felt much pleased that I availed myself of the offer, M Ellerby<sup>374</sup> preached from Rev 3rd chap. 11th verse<sup>375</sup> and very deeply interesting was his subject to me, he applied his arguments to his hearers urging us to repent & hold fast. M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes is organist, the voluntary was very soft & composing to the mind, the hymns truly devotional. On my return at 8 oclock I kissed my boys good night & then headed the tea table. M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell has lately joined us at dinner & tea for as he had to submit to our taking care of him during his severe illness I have begged him to prove he is not dissatisfied with his fare by continuing to partake with us, for the Russian dishes from a Club house might be too rich until he is able to exercise more. so he very amiably agrees to my wishes.<sup>376</sup> After our social repast was over we adjourned to the parlor & as it is our habit to read separately some good book or one reads aloud, Whistler engaged us soon as his listeners to one of Blunts excellent discourses upon the life of St Paul.<sup>377</sup> I am so thankful to hear our young friend Maxwell speak of his favorite parts of the bible, for while he was at the point to die I took myself to task that I had never evinced the interest I felt for his immortal soul, that I should from false delicacy have been restrained from urging him to go to church with us, he did not like to venture into our parlor on Sunday for he was aware we received no callers, but his illness broke down the barriers & every day I become more & more interested in the young American thus brought into the bosom of our family. We have had a rainy day again today & have none of us been out to walk.

Tuesday [April] 29th <sup>378</sup> I was much amused today that Major Trouvellier should mistake M<sup>r</sup> M for Debos music master, he delights in music & could not resist the temptation of lingering to listen to her harp after he had come up with his Grandmothers address<sup>379</sup> to me, at an unfashionable hour for a call. the Major had much to relate as many weeks had intervened since he left the city — his wifes upsets in the Sledge on their journey to the country, & his own hardihood in venturing the day the river broke up to cross in his carriage upon the ice 1/2 an hour only before the stream was freed from its natural bridge, how very sudden the transition The Ropes came to tea at our house sociably, he was in his merriest mood, I could not resist the peals of laughter, tho my heart was sad after joining in it, she is a delightful combination of sweetness of temper, cheerfulness & affection, with much sound sense & love of music<sup>380</sup> I sent of [sic] a letter to my dear Kate by todays Courier. And now at 11 1/2 must try to dream of home.

[Wednesday] May 1st 1844. We had Major T & Col M<sup>381</sup> to dine with us. Debo not well enough to come to table, but after they had gone she came into the parlor, sewed until tea time, then played over all her songs at the request of M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell.<sup>382</sup>

Friday [May] 3rd M<sup>rs</sup> Maingay called yesterday & begged “Dasha”<sup>383</sup> might go over today to stay all night. I was very glad my dear daughter was so well she could accept the very friendly invitation, she acknowledges she was benefitted by the medicine recommended, she left us soon after breakfast today, indeed little Willie & I accompanied her across the Neva in one of those gaily painted gondolas we admire so much, the river was smooth as a lake & the weather bright & summer-like.

Sat [May] 4th I could not have dreamed that the bridge which was only replaced yesterday (at the expense of towing it up 1000 silver rubles)<sup>384</sup> should today be drawn aside because of the ice floating from the Lake Ladoga, for the weather is so warm we have the fortresque<sup>385</sup> in ever [sic] room open all day to admit the fresh air & no fire either in the parlor grate or any of the peaches. So I continued to expect Debos return from the Island until M<sup>r</sup> La Roche<sup>386</sup> came to give her a German lesson, then I understood that the crossing was impeded by the ice! Yesterday I forgot to mention was the Empress name day.<sup>387</sup> I should have liked to see the review,<sup>388</sup> but the heat of the weather made me tired after a drive up the Nevski to a Millener<sup>389</sup> for Debo's straw bonnet & then crossing the Neva with her. there was an illumination as usual on such anniversaries, but the moon light was so brilliant it shamed the dingy lamps upon the pavement. I understood too late! the ships decorated & hung with cold lamps on the river fronting the winter Palace looked very gala-like. This afternoon we dined at two & drove to our country retreat to explore it once more previous to our taking possession. I was sorry Debo was not along to choose her rooms Mrs Ropes went in her place, the drive was rather warm & very dusty, our dear boys enjoyed their range exceedingly, & I liked the house even better than before, our landlord had bought new furniture for our accommodation, which with newly painted floors &c promise us freedom from insects. The boys like the pond at the back door better than I do!

Monday [May] 6th Yesterday the river was full of floating ice, yet it felt like June weather, on our way to afternoon service however I observed the bridge in its place & no ice. I rather hoped the Maingays would bring Debo to church. Mr Law gave us a beautiful discourse upon the Jealousy of God, but few were present to profit by it. Lady Stuart<sup>390</sup> was one of the congregation, much improved by a half mourning dress, so much more suitable than bird of Paradise plume to one of her age & ugliness. On our return from church Whistler took a row across the Neva to see Debo. Mr Maxwell joined us at tea & we spent the evening quietly in serious conversation. I enjoyed reading in my room to my boys.

Thursday [May] 29th <sup>391</sup> I have been so constantly occupied as not to be able to note down what happened. we have been settled in our nice country house just a fortnight, & altho the rain has sometimes brought a chilly feeling we have been quite comfortable within doors as our Peaches render our rooms warm enough without double sashes, but before I remark more of our nice home upon the Peter hoff road I shall go back to the last week we were in the Galernia & mention a day we passed at Sarscosela with Col Todd.<sup>392</sup> At noon Whistler & Mr Maxwell accompanying us we rode to the station<sup>393</sup> & took the cars (upon the only rail road in Russia)<sup>394</sup> which soon transported us the 20 versts to the pretty town of Sarsco sela.<sup>395</sup> it would be ungenerous in me to remark how inferior this rail road, cars &c seemed to us Americans for the people were all civil to us & some of them seemed to know my husband & to be pleased to see him. the country is flat & uninteresting between St P and Sarsco.<sup>396</sup> the town itself with Macadamised sts<sup>397</sup> remarkably clean. After lunching at the Cols we all walked to the Catherine Palace<sup>398</sup> situated in beautiful grounds kept in the most exquisite order. we observed many peasant women sweeping the grass plaits & smoothing the gravel walks, gathering every speck from either into their aprons.<sup>399</sup> water in lakes & falls gives variety to the straight walks & avenues, but the trees are not noble<sup>400</sup> tho the evergreens are fine. The Palace is at present the quarters of the heir Grand Duke Alexander<sup>401</sup> when at Sarsco, for a New Palace<sup>402</sup> is occupied by the Emperor in another part of the town. This built by Catherine like all other of her designs is tasteful, costly & still in perfect repair.<sup>403</sup> we did not go into the chapel<sup>404</sup> at one end of it, as we had scarcely time to linger as long as we wished in the splendid suits [s'iz] of apartments,<sup>405</sup> which as we walked thro admiring the views of the grounds from the windows, seemed to exceed each in magnificence. & again I was astonished at the perfect neatness & freshness of a palace which has been built so many years. One suite of apartments in the Chinese style, furniture & all to correspond, the walls, ceilings, doors &c pannels of looking glass framed together by the finest chinese porcelain.<sup>406</sup> Another suite of rooms with inlaid floors of Mother of pearl in flowers,<sup>407</sup> as polished as a mirror, of course the path thro out the palace is upon cloth to preserve the polished floors as no carpets are used. & so much respect is required to be shewn to the place that servants are stationed to relieve gentlemen of their surtouts<sup>408</sup> on entering the Palace. I was troubled that Mr Maxwell should be exposed to the risk of taking cold. for we all felt the chilling difference between the atmosphere of the galleries & that of the warm sunshine the suite of apartments which had been furnished for the Grand Duchess Alexandrine on her marriage the past winter Debo thought most attractive for altho perfectly elegant they have a modern air of refinement not unsuitable to the taste & convenience of the present day.<sup>409</sup> but I was most interested by the room which the Emperor Alexander had occupied just before his death.<sup>410</sup> the camp bed behind the screen & simplicity of all its furniture shewed he wished only conveniences for himself, where splendor reigned. they pretend<sup>411</sup> that no article has been changed since he was there, fine damask napkins as if just used the day before are hung over the chair & all the paraphernalia of his toilette razors, brushes &c upon his dressing table. Debo was the only one who yielded to expressions of delight, my boys seem not yet to have their heart in these things & I could add a wish that they never might — Jemmie wished he could stay to examine the fine pictures & know who painted them,<sup>412</sup> but as we returned thro the grounds & I asked him if he should wish to be a grand duke to have them for play grounds, he decided there could be no freedom with a footman at ones heels! On our going back to the Cols a nice dinner was soon placed on the table, for dessert among the various temptations forms of cream, which were no doubt all the better for coming from the dairy of the Catherine Palace, as the Grand Duke A has fine cattle on his farm<sup>413</sup> — I had forgotten to mention the extensive Conservatories<sup>414</sup> attached to his grounds we had not time to enter them, they looked tempting so many exotics peeping thro the open glass, for the day was bright & warm as June. We returned to St Petersburg by the 5 o'clock train, & from the mirth of the young folks I judged they were not wearied by the rational pleasure we had been occupied with all day. Willie & James were bountiful with their riddles for Mr M & Sister to solve & laughter was infectious. Being engaged to tea at Mrs Maingays we had only time to dress when our neighbours the Ropes were ready for we had agreed to cross together in the same barge. the only stranger to me was a Miss Musgrove, who is English governess in some Russian family of distinction,<sup>415</sup> a very superior lady, I enjoyed conversing with herself & Mrs M while the girls & Ropes played at cross purposes.<sup>416</sup> At eleven o'clock we went home in our barge for we felt no fear tho there was no moon, it was not dark. On Monday the 13th it being 1st of May old style there was as usual a Fete at Catrineoff,<sup>417</sup> the sun shone bright & I suppose literally all the world of St Petersburg was there but ourselves, I was busy finishing my packing for our removal the next day.<sup>418</sup> we should have moved to the country on the 1st but that we did not wish to meet the gay throng, our road laying in the same direction.<sup>419</sup> Very few will take up their abode in the country so early, but I longed to try change of air for my dear James who the last night we passed in the Galernia was in a burning fever & kept me bathing his aching temples & wetting his parched lips, thank God the change has been blessed to him, he has not made a complaint since we came here. Our friends find the roads so good & the distance so easy we are not deserted. Mr Maxwell has been twice to see us<sup>420</sup> & promises to stay some days, the Maingays several times & Emma spent a week,<sup>421</sup> & tho it was for the delight of Debos society she sometimes sat in my room to read aloud in such books as comfort the christian. she is a very gifted girl, but to my ear her voice in reading is sweeter than at the piano & I shall have a pleasing association of her always for she was ever ready to gratify me by reading or serious conversation while I sat at work — How secure it is to love those who love the Saviour. I pray this young friend of my dear daughter may retain the same views in London she has been brought up with, that she may become the decided young Christian her Sister Eliza is<sup>422</sup> — Of course it is painful to part from those who have made friends of us when strangers in a foreign land, but the Maingays have paid their last visit to us & we to them ere they returned to their native land. I have been busy today writing by them to my friends & sisters in Lancashire. Mr Stockhol<sup>423</sup> has just arrived I must go out to do the honors, it is very friendly of him to come in a hard rain to see us. I cannot think as I did last month it never rains in Russia we have had complete April weather this week. the verdure around us is refreshing & the sun set thro the wood opposite our house we never tire of admiring, I always think of my dear Mother & wish her here. Our grounds are kept in the most perfect order without trouble to us & last Sat our landlord sent us in from his green house more than a dozen plants in full flower, Hydrangias, Roses, & Stocks every window sill is filled.<sup>424</sup> The quiet of the country accords with my wishes & altho it is the common practise to entertain guests on Sunday especially during the Summer which is the busy season among merchants, it is understood that I am averse to it, therefore our acquaintances favor us other days. Last Sunday we had our new Curate.<sup>425</sup> I liked his fervent manner he seemed not to think he was in a strange congregation, both himself & Mr Law officiated at the communion service. Lady Stewart took it for the last time among us!<sup>426</sup> Mr Laws was a farewell sermon (for the Summer) too<sup>427</sup> his text was from Coloss. 2nd 5th <sup>428</sup> but he never is personal in his application & indeed his discourse was more upon the descent of the Holy Spirit. as it was Whitsunday.<sup>429</sup> This is one of the great festivals of the Greek Church but the poorer classes seem to understand such anniversaries no further than as early holidays, the road was thronged, every shop filled with boughs of trees or flowers. I understand it is rejoiced in by them as the first day of summer, so tho the weather was less Summer like than any we have had for a month we saw many dressed in book muslins & gauzes<sup>430</sup> going to church of the better classes, & the lower order of women had managed to put on white gowns, yet still the very poor in their sheep skins crossing themselves before the Picture of the Virgin at the door. In the afternoon we saw bands of Peasants sauntering along the road, for their choruses attracted us to the window, but tho Emma professed to delight in their music I found even she could not persuade herself they sung hymns. Oh no their words she said were foolish & low beyond our conception. Ah if I could speak to them I would teach them how they should spend the Lords day! for tho they are all eager for Tracts,<sup>431</sup> the mass seem to reflect no more than the dumb beast which perish<sup>432</sup>

Friday [May] 30th <sup>433</sup> My dear husband brought me letters yesterday by the Steamer of the 1st Debo from Jule was sent to the Island to her, but as her father is to bring her from M<sup>rs</sup> Maingays today I shall perhaps have some news from Stonington, my letter was from my own dear mother, it was (as her voice always is) truly comforting. When last I was with my friend Miss Hirst as I spoke of this loved parent to her the tears (which her own bodily anguish never call forth) streamed over her pale face from joy that the poor negroes were so anxious for the scriptures & clasping her hands she expressed her thanks that God had devoted my mothers visit to Florida to so blessed a purpose, as to do His work.<sup>434</sup> Oh may it be thus while she is continued on Earth till she shall shine at the last as the perfect day on entering upon her rest! We had showers of rain again today my Willie was driven in from planting the daisies sent him by M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell for his little garden. & Whistler was wet to the skin while crossing the Neva in a barge for Debo, but he did not accomplish his purpose of bringing her home. M<sup>rs</sup> Maingay plead so earnestly to keep her their last evening at Vasili Ostrow he could not resist it.

Sat [May] 31st <sup>435</sup> My dear husband kindly wished me to accompany himself & boys to the city as the sun shone charmingly & they were to attend the annual review in the Champ de Mars<sup>436</sup> of 70,000 troops by the Grand Duke Michel (the Emperor having gone to England)<sup>437</sup> but as Debo was not to go I concluded to wait another opportunity & to avail myself of my loneliness to answer my dear Mothers letter, which I did, I had also to make arrangements for dining some gents who had promised to come out,<sup>438</sup> but with my excellent cook & good footmen it was only necessary to issue orders. I welcomed my dear runaways at four o'clock. Debo looking very sad from bidding adieu to the Maingays, she brought home Emmas & Freddys & Lilly pictures to keep them in their place in our memories. with an envelope from M<sup>rs</sup> M to me not to be opened till this day week at noon!<sup>439</sup> Whistler regretted I had not attended the Review the hard rains having laid all the dust & all the soldiers in new uniforms which they receive only once in two years it was brilliant in an unusual degree.<sup>440</sup> Our boys had pressed thro in front of all the crowd, & had not consented to let Alexander take them away until the very end, they gave me a full description & said they admired the Chevalier Guards (the Empress corps) <sup>441</sup> best of all. Our Ambassador of course was there,<sup>442</sup> he & M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell did not come to us until our other guests & selves had nearly finished dinner.<sup>443</sup> The Col brought me a present of a basket of American Apples, very choice, some countryman had sent him three barrels & when he discovered they had been at the Custom house a fortnight he could only out of the three save one — but even these were a treat to distribute.

Monday 2nd of June.<sup>444</sup> Yesterday we had clear weather tho we wore our cloaks in the carriage to church with great comfort. The road was full of troops all day, for it had also been the case before the review, poor soldiers they have not the privilege of a sabbath day — many of them were singing that wild strain to which we are not [sic]<sup>445</sup> becoming familiar, but I wondered to see ladies & gentlemen seated in their summer houses — which are always pitched close to the road to observe all that passes — not surprised however that the lower classes should fill the shop doors & windows to idle & to gaze. but Oh it makes my heart ache & I wish I could speak to these poor deluded souls! I feel as my friend Miss Hirst I'd give all but my own salvation, to convert them to Christ. plenty are ever to be seen crossing themselves before the shocking pictures of the Virgin in whatever direction we may go. but they turn from that to do evil & confess if questioned they do it as a form & not with any reverence. Our church was full as it always is of a morning & now we have only one service a day — Mr Law gone,<sup>446</sup> our new Curate preached, it was Trinity Sunday & he read the Athenasian creed<sup>447</sup> again, which he explained most satisfactorily, after having touched upon his new relation to us his text was taken from the Epistle of St. Jude 20 & 21st verses.<sup>448</sup> Every argument so clear, his manner so earnest, no wonder coming from the heart, he should touch the heart & keep the attention awake thro out. Debo felt his discourse to be short, & Mrs Gillebrand as we came down the aisle pressed my hand & whispered, delightfully impressive & convincing.<sup>449</sup> Today Debo commenced her instruction with the boys again, & after Mr Hadenscoff<sup>450</sup> had accomplished much in Whistlers drawings of Engines, he begged as a pastime they might go into the Chancery to sit to him for their pictures to present to “Mama”. We waited dinner in hopes Whistler would return from town, so it was nearly six o'clock as it rained after, we could not walk. Debo practised while her father read American papers to me while I sewed, after my boys had taken their bread & milk & gone to bed I went up to their room & read in one of the good books Miss Hirst supplies them with. we took our coffee after nine & had not to light a candle until to read the bible & prayers & for bed.

Wednesday June 5th Yesterday I accompanied my dear husband in the carriage to the city while he went to the Department to meet the railroad Commission.<sup>451</sup> I shopped & paid a call at Mrs Gillebrands to offer my services at the time of her taking possession of her country house — then had a lunch with my nice young friend Mrs Ropes & a two hours chat with her when my husband came for me to go over to the Island with him to look at Lodas house<sup>452</sup> which he has thought of renting. I was not so well pleased with it as I had expected, too much space seems to have been given to Show, in the grand staircase & five rooms designed for entertainment,<sup>453</sup> we recrossed the Neva in a boat & were dissappointed Mr Maxwell was not ready to drive home with us as we had planned to a 4 clock dinner, he followed us however before sunset & we hope he will enjoy his visit to our Dom on Drurys estate.<sup>454</sup>

We had a delightful saunter thro some of our neighbours grounds,<sup>455</sup> a winding avenue of birch enclosing sometimes a meadow carpetted with wild flowers, or a pond of water with pretty boats upon it gave sufficient variety to call forth our admiration & on our way back the setting sun gilded the woods, & my heart was warmed with adoration & thankfulness that God so bountifully provided enjoyments for us. it was late for my boys, & I could not read to them as usual when they went to bed, but we made no stranger of M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell & were glad to close our evening with family worship<sup>456</sup> & wish each other good night. This morning before we were out of our room, our dear Willies voice was heard welcoming our friend M<sup>r</sup> Ropes who had come 10 versts to breakfast with us. he soon joined Will & Debo at the swing. I let them enjoy it awhile as I stood talking with M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell on the front piazza then rung the prayer bell which soon assembled us all in the parlor. Our cook had excellent hot rolls, minced meat, fresh eggs & coffee on our table by eight oclock, we were all blessed with health, to appreciate her skill appetites were ready & we had a jovial meal. when M<sup>r</sup> R was about to mount his tall steed to return to his mercantile pursuits, I filled his side pocket with American apples for his Ellen<sup>457</sup> as she could not eat them here today. While writing just now Whistler who has staid at home today called me to the Piazza to see the troops passing from St Petersburg to Peterhoff. they proved to be the Chevalier Guards. mounted on fine black horses, all their officers are young noblemen I was pleased to discover M<sup>r</sup> M & our boys in the wood opposite also enjoying the sight of this noble cavalry. James has brought in a string of Perch which he caught & now both he & Willie are ready to read to me I must attend to instructing them till dinner time as their father proposes us a drive after, the weather is so very favorable & the late rains have laid the dust for which this road is notorious,<sup>458</sup> mosquitoes annoying!

Monday 10th June. Before noting down how profitably we have spent this day, quietly at home, I must touch upon the pleasant drive hinted at above. it was along the Peterhoff road but further than we had been, as we usually make our excursions on foot Whistler having the horses in town, we drove past some beautiful Seats occupied by Russian or English gentry<sup>459</sup>. Debo pointed out the Estate where the pretty M<sup>rs</sup> Anderson<sup>460</sup> as she is called spends her Summers she is near enough to be a neighbour to us & as she sings delightfully Debo wishes to have her among our few visitors, further on she pointed to an estate that our friends the Maingays occupied,<sup>461</sup> but it is not so conveniently near town as we must live so we cannot promise Jemie to try to rent it next year! We passed a fine Monastery<sup>462</sup> which my curiosity would have led me inside of for we saw there was an evening service performing. the last place we drove to was the finest the name on the gate which is always attached to the Dacha (or country house) told us a very rich Russian Nobleman was the possessor of the pretty Italian-looking villa Mr Maxwell said Count—— was master of horse to the Grand Duchess Helen.<sup>463</sup> Our friend on retiring to his room for rest confessed how much he had enjoyed his day with us. The next morning when we assembled at prayers Mary had a sad report from Miss Debo the mosquitos had feasted on her face during her last nights slumbers, & it proved that she must be a prisoner in her room all day. I never saw such swellings occasioned by these little insects before, altho James has been poisoned here by them also in an extraordinary degree. her forehead was in two puffs & her eyes half closed, she used iced water & vinegar all day, yet still the next morning her phiz was as unnatural as ever.<sup>464</sup> Mr Maxwell interests himself so much in the boys & Whistler being in the house time was not idle with him, he was kind enough to sit by me some part of the morning read to me a letter from his own dear mother<sup>465</sup> written just previous to her having heard of his late illness, she expresses her regard for me in the most gratifying terms, that she loves me as a sister & hopes she yet shall claim my friendship in my own native land.<sup>466</sup> I felt overpowered that her sons mention of our family in his correspondence should have elicited such an interested [sic] in unworthy me! Mr M also favored me by handing me a letter he had lately received from a Norwegian<sup>467</sup> he have [sic] spent some hours last Summer with this gentleman in Christiana, a correspondence had ensued, & the Norwegian wrote in as glowing terms of the United States as of his own republic, the hand was like copperplate & the English correct. I was not aware before how happily Norway is governed, titles have been abolished there seem to be no poor there, the religion is Lutheran & all who hold any office in that country must be members of the Christian church,<sup>468</sup> it is a cheap country for there are no duties & the most salubrious climate in northern Europe. What a pity that intoxication should be the besetting sin of the lower orders – but as wine & liquors are without duty they are sadly too cheap. I fear tho Mr M met not one beggar in Norway,<sup>469</sup> drunkenness will make many. God forbid! rather may a better spirit influence to forsake what will destroy the good effect of all the advantages they have within their reach. We had quite a trading at our front gate with a Russian Pedlar while Mr M was with us. little Willie & James talked him into some bargains Mr M sent their sister up a jumping rope a basket also for her work _ thus recommending industry & exercise. I was glad Debo was able to present herself friday evening<sup>470</sup> as it was the last of his stay. Mr Miller<sup>471</sup> & Curtis<sup>472</sup> arrived to tea, the former was once President of the Bank of England.<sup>473</sup> his hair is white as snow now & he talks of his wife & daughters in England,<sup>474</sup> still he is most cheerful & so great an amateur of music he is willing to ride this far at any time to listen to Debo's piano or harp — After they left at eleven o'clock we rung for lights because we must have our outside shutters closed to secure us from thieves. Mr M has been much amused with the tattooing the watchmen keep up at intervals thro the night to shew to the families they are on guard.<sup>475</sup> it is a shameful evidence of the defects of the religious system, but I trust when the gospel is preached freely to all nations this people so very apt to learn as they seem, may be honest thro love to God & not from fear of man. I felt very sorry Mr M found it necessary to leave us on saturday morning<sup>476</sup> to prepare for going in the next Steamer to Stettin,<sup>477</sup> he accompanied Whistler in his Droshky to town promising to come out again for 24 hours at least.<sup>478</sup> The Ropes drove out to see us about our dinner time, it is such a proof of their regard for us I feel as tho I could hardly be kind enough in my welcome of children nurses & all. We ladies & Mr R took a stroll about a verst on the public road & turned into the beautiful grounds belonging to Mr — Dacha<sup>479</sup> & brought away each a large bunch of every variety of pretty wild flowers, lilies of the valley among the rest. the circular avenue of birch encloses a rich prairie on a small scale the wild flowers make such a carpet. When we were taking an early tea my dear Whistler came back from the city & right glad was I we had a comfortable meal all ready to refresh him after his days fatigue. I could not be amused<sup>480</sup> at hearing Jemmies remark after the Ropes had gone, he wished Mr R or

Mr M might be with us all the time, one so merry the other so agreeable! he really felt sad to let them leave our house. My boys had their bath as usual Saturday & they needed it uncommonly after their romps with some Cadets who had come up from school to pass the Sabbath with Mrs Norman<sup>481</sup> their grandmother who lives on the same estate with us. Sunday<sup>482</sup> was so cold I was not too warm with my English woolen cloak over my velvet mantilla<sup>483</sup> & poplin gown<sup>484</sup> in riding to church. I regretted so few were there to listen to Mr Williams excellent sermon from St Luke 16th and 31st verse.<sup>485</sup> he preaches the word indeed with power. Oh my heart glowed with thankfulness to God that such a teacher of righteousness had come to supply our Pastors place. Whistler alluded to his sermon as he rode home & said he gave no quarter, Debo thought him bigotted altho she confessed she listened to his earnest pleading with pleasure. I gave it as my conviction Mr Williams would hold out the hand of fellowship to any thorough Christian whether Presbyterian or Episcopalian, but I thought he must condemn any who were lukewarm followers of Him who had Himself despised all such. And my dear husband agreed with me that Mr W brought every one to the Bible to try of what spirit they were. It always pains me to observe our road so full of people of all ranks intent on idleness or pleasure (falsely called) & I am so sorry so many English families when they move into the country for the Summer reconcile it to their consciences never to go to town to attend divine service, eleven oclock allows ample time, & if the drive took two hours instead of one I'd consider it a privilege to be able to accomplish it. I find after we dine there is not too much leisure to occupy with my boys in reading. they enjoy it for Miss Hirsts<sup>486</sup> supply of religious books yeilds us great variety, so that we never need a walk to add to it. Whistler kept beside us listening with pleased satisfaction to a story illustrating the 4th Commandment,<sup>487</sup> the contrast between mis-spending and spending-well the last day (in preparation of the first day of the week, & of those who loved to keep the sign that they were Gods people, my boys had many remarks to make, and that we may always experience the blessedness of the day of rest we here enjoy I earnestly pray. the little Normans<sup>488</sup> come in to listen to my Sunday afternoon readings, & as Jemmie and Willie take coffee with us they have many pleasures which those who live in the gay world could scarcely appreciate. After my boys had gone to bed & I had read to them a chapter I seated myself between Debo & her father by the parlor window admiring the effect of the setting sun upon the wood opposite our house. When it was ten o'clock having selected two beautiful chapters for our evening service I thought as we were without guests we would by day light join in family worship. I felt much as I read the 42nd Psalm, & the comforting words of the 40th of Isaiah<sup>489</sup> & was so absorbed in our Sabbath evening prayer in the conclusion that I heard not the approaching footsteps of Mr Miller,<sup>490</sup> tho Whistler did, he softly withdrew until our family service was over, then came in saying on his way from Mr F Bairds<sup>491</sup> where he had been dining he promised Mr Curtis to call & ask us to fix a day for the excursion to Lake Ladoga.<sup>492</sup> he sat half an hour with us & took the trouble to recount to me how he had spent his sabbath, at church in the morning by the sick couch of a friend afterwards until five o'clock when he felt it no harm to take a solitary ride to dine with friends in the country. Mr Miller & I always have a pleasant argument upon religion, he is very good tempered & altho he says I am too strict, he has too much good feeling to infringe upon my privileges as a Christian & manages his visits to us on week days that he may not intrude upon our Sabbaths.

Monday 17th June Any Indifferent person might judge we had leisure for journalizing or even idling hours of these long days in the retirement of Peterhoff road, but when the time of retiring to my chamber comes to review the day I invariably confess to how much I have left undone that ought to have been done, for between housekeeping, teaching my dear boys, studying a little french & Russ myself, a visit to our neighbours & receiving a visiter now & then from town I accomplish nothing with my pen, except in the way of hurried scrawls to England & to my dear native land. Last week we had a farewell visit of 24 hours from our favorite Mr Maxwell.<sup>493</sup> the same day W<sup>m</sup> Maingay<sup>494</sup> came unexpectedly, ensuring his welcome by bringing a letter from Emma dated Lubec giving Dasha a most entertaining sheet full of their voyage from St Petersburg.<sup>495</sup> We had a stroll between dinner & tea thro an estate about half a verst from our domicile,<sup>496</sup> where wild flowers abound. Mr M talked with me much about his fathers country seat upon our beautiful Hudson.<sup>497</sup> my little Willie is his shadow when he can be & as he used his Russian Jack knife to cut the stalks of flowers I gathered, he called to mind the bonnie wee pen knife mother had lost in her desk, whereupon our friend took his pen knife out of his pocket & offered it to me for a kopeck that it might not cut him out of my memory. I the next morning gave him half a kopeck<sup>498</sup> for it! and also a note of introduction to our kind fellow passengers<sup>499</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Baird,<sup>500</sup> who were to be his on board the same Steamer Alexandra! Ah how full my heart was as I recalled the scenes of my babys illness & death in that cabin, where the sympathy of these ladies M<sup>rs</sup> Baird & her Sister Miss Khremer bound me to them. And now they have gone from St Petersburg for 5 years<sup>501</sup> I can scarcely expect to meet them again in this life.<sup>502</sup> May we in a better! Many might suppose the name of the Alexandra would call up painful emotions so that I should not bear to hear it mentioned, but it is not so, it is an indulgence to me to visit the cabin in imagination where I last held my Charlie to my bosom, last heard his soft voice say he loved his own Mother, & say his evening prayer. even to go to the lonely State room A where I gazed on his body in death is a selfish indulgence to me which I cannot always suppress & I always feel the wish to be a passenger again on board the Alexandra that I may in reality occupy the same state room we were in together. But my chief desire is to keep ever in view that bright haven where we may meet at last to part no more, where we may “all be one in Christ Jesus our Lord!”<sup>503</sup> Only this far have I attempted to write up my journal being left by Whistler & Debo while they take a walk to M<sup>r</sup> Anderson,<sup>504</sup> when my dear little neighbour<sup>505</sup> comes in to sit with me. And another week has rolled over my head for this evening is Tues 25th June. Yesterday Debo received a letter by the last Steamer from her twin enclosing one from dear little Emma Palmer<sup>506</sup> to me. All well & my dear Mother<sup>507</sup> soon expected to be there. I was made very happy by the Steamer before bringing me letters from my own Mary<sup>508</sup> & also one from my kind young friend Kate Prince.<sup>509</sup> high as postage is I ever feel richer when I can purchase such treats than any other luxury. Last Sunday we all went to Church, it was the day of Saint Barnabas the Apostle & M<sup>r</sup> Williams text was “For he was a good man, full of faith & of the Holy Ghost”<sup>510</sup> from which he drew the character of a christian, comparing it with that of a worldly good man, moral benevolent, &c &c, but remarked no code of morals could satisfy a true christian which was not based upon faith in Jesus Christ our Lord & Saviour. The Sunday before I had been induced to give up the benefit of listening to him for the duty of spending the morning by the bed side of my suffering friend Miss Hirst,<sup>511</sup> she was speechless & it comforted her to hear me read the scriptures, she had greatly sunk within the week & continued so feeble I have gone purposely to spend an hour with her several times since, she is fond of flowers, the doctor says he needs not ask who has been with her the fresh bouquet shews my visits, & it is a privilege I may not long enjoy for she seems gradually sinking into the grave. I perceive from time to time she looks thinner & paler if possible, so I go once or twice a week now the 11 versts between us purposely to see her. no complaint arises from her increased sufferings, tho when I question her she tells me what by the Lords strengthening her she is enabled to endure, perhaps one hours sleep in a whole night & such perspirations her clothing has all to be changed ten times in the 24 hours! sometimes when I have been gently fanning her, or bathing her hands in Cologne or putting a small lump of ice in her parched lips, she exerts herself to whisper “Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the least of these my disciples, ye do it unto Me”<sup>512</sup> Oh to me she seems a distinguished Saint! and I wonder that I am selected when there are so many others more worthy the privilege of becoming her friend, she always addresses me by the tender epithet of Love & having lost her only Sister & both her parents<sup>513</sup> if God permits I will close her eyes in death & be as a Sister to her, she has an only & kind brother in M<sup>r</sup> Hirst,<sup>514</sup> but his school demands most of his time, her attentive Nurse Elona<sup>515</sup> tho neat & excellent in her capacity is a Russian, and lacks the attraction of the knowledge that is in Christ Jesus our Lord, when Miss Hirst has begged her not to sew on Sunday telling her it made her unhappy to witness the breaking of Gods command, she has answered the time would hang heavy without employment! my friend has said many times to me she would give all but her own soul to be able to talk Russ sufficiently well to teach the poor & ignorant the gospel plan of Salvation.<sup>516</sup>

Monday July 1st My dear Whistler left us last thursday<sup>517</sup> after a very early breakfast, for Moscow I had put him up a nice prog-canister<sup>518</sup> as he expected to be absent a fortnight, & gave him a Yankee plum cake<sup>519</sup> (which is thought so excellent in this land of few cakes — to take with my compliments to Col. Melnikoff.<sup>520</sup> We had the honor of entertaining that gent two days last week — Our early rising the day of my husbands departure yeilded me abundant leisure for putting my closets &c in order & installing Fedor, the Dvanic, in Alexanders place as footman, he having attended the Master, before the boys must come in to lessons at 10 oclock — We were in the midst of a two oclock dinner when we heard a footstep in the entry, no knock having announced it I hoped my gude-mon might have come back for another day, but in walked William Maingay, of course bringing a letter from Emma to Debo!<sup>521</sup> he spent the afternoon thereby preventing my writing to Stonington as I had purposed. We had promised to take tea with our kind neighbours the Gillebrands sociably as the rain on Wednesday had interfered with our meeting our pastor Mr Williams & a few others there, so we not only took James & Willie with us but W Maingay too. While M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes was gratifying Debo with a game out of doors with these three young lords of the creation<sup>522</sup> I had a nice chat with Mr & M<sup>ES</sup> G. about their party the day before.<sup>523</sup> it is gratifying that congregationalists & episcopalians can be so cordial, they were more than ever pleased with Mr Williams, some argument having been started, drawing a parallel between Hume<sup>524</sup> & Voltaire<sup>525</sup> as both Infidels, it was opposed by D<sup>r</sup> H<sup>526</sup> who thought Hume had tried hard to become convinced of the truths of Christianity. “No one ever tried without succeeding “(by prayer & studying the scriptures—” Mr W replied. He afterwards gave them most interesting incidents of his travels thro Greece & his sojourn in Syria for two years, he preached at Jerusalem & knows the Bishop intimately, he visited Mount Carmel where Eliza [siz]<sup>527</sup> offered the wonderful sacrifice by fire from heaven, he described it as if made purposely – a table on top of a mountain spacious enough for all that was exhibited there to display Gods power! & as the question of where the water was obtained has often been disputed he asked his Arab guide for a drink & to Mr Ws astonishment & delight he took him to an abundant source, a spring in the mountain! always full as deep as the height of two men! Probably it was miraculously formed for Elijah or how should Ahab have been ignorant of it, and it remains to this day to illustrate the truth of scripture.<sup>528</sup> Mr Williams is preparing a work upon Syria for the press.<sup>529</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Law thinks he studies too much but he always looks bright & in perfect health. M<sup>ES</sup> G shewed us quite a collection of articles for sale for the benefit of missionaries. brought from Toolar,<sup>530</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Maingay & I each made a purchase of an iron finger-ring. he did not leave us to return to his solitary quarters at Vasili Ostrow until 10 o'clock On Friday<sup>531</sup> we were obliged to give our boys holiday that our letters for the courier. might be ready for the courier. I answered dear Kate Princes letter & enclosed a half sheet in Julias from her twin, for it is long since I've been favored by either of my dear Sisters<sup>532</sup> & I cannot always write without encouragement, tho my heart is ever with them & I make allowances for their silence, yet Oh how I yearn to have it broken! We have rain every day & as this prevents my walking I suffer so much from cold feet I wish I had brought my little french warming foot stool & must send to Stonington for it. We feel obliged now to use the horses & about six o'clock as the sun shone out bright we took a drive meeting M<sup>r</sup> Joseph Ropes<sup>533</sup> at our gate we took him in by way of benefitting by his call, & he directed our "Coacher" a pretty circuit from the Crasnacello road<sup>534</sup> back to this, by which we passed the most beautiful seat I have yet seen in Russia It used to belong to Booterlin<sup>535</sup> & report says he lost it by a throw of the dice! when Jemmie heard it is now in the possession of Count Straugnoff<sup>536</sup> he was scarcely to be restrained from calling, forgetting he only knew the young Count & merely as a fellow passenger on board the Alexandra! there is a lake on the estate encircled by a walk in the nicest order & besides boat house, trees &c to render it picturesque a mill seat below. We had the finest view of the Gulf of Finland from the vicinity of this mansion & also of St Petersburg, the gilded dome of the Isaacs Church,<sup>537</sup> & the Spire of the Fortress<sup>538</sup> glittering in the distance. M<sup>r</sup> Joseph<sup>539</sup> had brought me a supply of Tracts in Russ, Finnish & German also the German bible which Jemmie wished to present M<sup>r</sup> Hadenskoug,<sup>540</sup> for all his kindness, when Whistler proposed to the Sweed three hours recess from his drawing table for necessary rest & walking, he begged to give James a writing lesson one hour & then to exercise with our dear boy, which plan had been adopted to their mutual satisfaction. Saturday<sup>541</sup> morning was bright & we had no dread of being overtaken by a shower when we set out for town to shop & make calls. Debo went to M<sup>ES</sup> Laws thro the court at the back of the church as we drove thro the Galernia when I had to stop at our Grocers.<sup>542</sup> with the help of little Willies fluency in Russ I obtained all I wished, then drove to the Island. while I called upon M<sup>ES</sup> Hirst<sup>543</sup> I sent my dear boy in to Miss Hirsts<sup>544</sup> apartment with a fresh bouquet for her & Fedor carried some jelly to the Nurse, also for this interesting invalid. when I entered her room Willie was arranging the roses in some vases beside her bed, she looked brighter than for many weeks past & conversed with ease, but soon requested me as usual to read some of Gods word for her support, as now she is dependent on others for this comfort. her sight is enfeebled & her hands more powerless than ever. I alighted at the Parsonage for Debo (after Willie & I had done our shopping in the Nevski, what should I do without this darling child, he is rather less excitable than Jemmie & therefore more tractable, they each can make their wants comprehended in Russ but I prefer this gentlest of my dear boys to go with me. having suited myself with Summer caps & gloves for them both my business was over, except to apologise for Whistlers not having called yet upon M<sup>r</sup> Williams,<sup>545</sup> the season for work in the field is so short<sup>546</sup> & his undertaking so vast, he has no leisure for pleasure. We had hardly regained our “Dacha”<sup>547</sup> or country house before the heavy clouds which had so suddenly gathered discharged thunder, & a tremendous rain. M<sup>r</sup> J Ropes was caught in the wood opposite our house & while he left his cousin M<sup>r</sup> Hooper<sup>548</sup> (just from Boston) under the trees he ran over to borrow an umbrella. M<sup>r</sup> Prince<sup>549</sup> & young Merrilies<sup>550</sup> also sought shelter under our roof, they had been with our Jemmie in a boat on the Canal at the end of our Avenue. When M<sup>r</sup> Ropes<sup>551</sup> came to see us after the weather cleared he described how droll they all looked in borrowed coats after their soaking! Just as we were seating us at tea, a carriage drew up to our door & M<sup>r</sup> Miller entered introducing Sir W<sup>m</sup> Allen<sup>552</sup> the great Scotch artist of whom we have lately heard who has come to S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg to revive on canvass some of the most striking events from the life of Peter the G<sup>t</sup>. They had been to the Monastery on the this [sic] road of Seergay<sup>553</sup> to listen to the chanting at vespers in the Greek chapel. & M<sup>r</sup> M laughingly congratulated his companion that they were just in the nick of time for our excellent home made bread & fresh butter, & above all the refreshment of a good cup of tea! When he offered the cake basket afterwards to Sir William he recommended the plum cake as being made at home & so like Scotch bun!<sup>554</sup> adding M<sup>rs</sup> W has visited Edenburg<sup>555</sup> & is partial to the Scotch! A slight interruption to his satisfaction was when a note from M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes caused Debo to leave the table, he protested against it saying “Miss W you should make them understand you attend to no business after dinner” his chat then turned upon the subject of Sir W Allens painting (Peter the G<sup>t</sup> teaching the Moozeecks<sup>556</sup> to make ships)<sup>557</sup> this made Jemmies eyes express so much interest, that his love for the art was discovered & Sir W<sup>m</sup> must see his attempts. When my boys had said good night the artist remarked to me “your little boy has uncommon genius, but do not urge him beyond his inclination” I told him it had only been cultivated as an amusement & that I was obliged to interfere or his application would confine him more than we approved.<sup>558</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Miller took a chance while Debo was playing for his countryman to say to me. “Do you know why I have come today? it is that I may not offend you by intruding on Sunday, sometimes I have such a desire to see you all so very much I cannot overcome it even on Sunday” I told him he must be sure I should welcome my husbands friends every day but upon the Sabbath when I considered myself engaged. he laughed & said “what is to become of poor Batchelors then? but I respect your views madam for in Scotland we are brought up to be very strict about the observance of the Sabbath, but the major is not so particular as you are, perhaps sometimes when he is at home you will excuse my coming from town to walk with him? I now laughed & answered tho I knew my husband would scold me for such inhospitable treatment of his friends, yet I must confess I missed him from my Sunday readings with our children & I really thought as the Merchants have no Change to go to on Saturday afternoon they must have set it apart as a holiday instead of being obliged for their health to steal half of the Lords day which I always found too short for reading the many good books, I am always intending to profit by. He always is so good tempered & so frank I can venture to tell him plainly what I think without fear of offending. He tried to extort a promise from me that I would consent to his driving Miss W & myself in his Phaeton<sup>559</sup> soon. but I told him we were obliged to use the Majors horses every day to keep them in order against his return,” for I well know how the busy bodies would talk if we should be met on this road where so many English are, & we have always endeavoured to go on our path of duty without notoriety. but I have been entering too minutely into our conversation [sic]. Altho we have had rain every day this month, it has not been ever until after our return from church on Sundays. the congregation was twice as full the last Sabbath as usual. Mr Williams text was from the 15th of Rom 2nd verse.<sup>560</sup> he first alluded to the text he had preached from the sunday (I spent with Miss Hirst) "If I please men I am not the servant of Christ"<sup>561</sup> & while he remarked upon the seeming contradictions of different parts of the bible, reconciled them by saying like its divine author it was full of mysteries, that hereafter these should be cleared away & we must read with prayer & meditation that our faith might be strengthened, but that the context of his present subject shewed how we should please our neighbour & to his edification, that we should put no stumbling block in his way. but strive all to be one in Christ Jesus" After church when Mr Curtis handed us to the Calash<sup>562</sup> he asked if we would go to see the launch of a frigate<sup>563</sup> on thursday, but really I felt sorry that worldly engagements should present themselves & thanking him said I could not so suddenly make up my mind, so he walked out on monday<sup>564</sup> to take tea with us, however we concluded as Whistler was absent we had better not venture into the crowd which of course would fill the Admiralty square for the spectacle. Mr C had heard at Sarsko of the continued sufferings of the favorite Grand Duchess whose life is now like a candle in its socket flickering, sometimes almost out, then blazing momentarily!<sup>565</sup> the young Prince of Hesse alas! appreciates not the blessing he is so soon to be deprived of. all Russians are indignant at his thoughtlessness. at times riding with boon companions as he was on Sunday last - or found playing cards with those beneath him in rank. How pained the fond Empress mother who watches beside the sick couch or that lovely daughter must be by such want of sympathy. Report says the Grand Duchess Olga is indignant at the unfeeling conduct of her new brother in law, & says while she weeps at the prospect of being deprived of her adored Sister, it is well she will be summoned to a happier world ere she could be aware of the heartlessness of the Prince.<sup>566</sup> How little we think in passing thro magnificent Palaces of the aching hearts at times there! I remember as Debo observed the perfection of taste displayed in that suite of apartments which had been newly furnished in the Catherine Palace for this young couple, I thought they at least might be exempt from all intrusion [sic] of evil upon their happiness in each other, both so young, so accomplished, so admired & she I knew deservedly beloved by all classes! but vanity is stamped on all perishable things! May she be happy in her Saviour! I wish I could have seen her once! she has been thought the most graceful & beautiful of all this Imperial family, so distinguished for beauty. We received a card of invitation today for a wedding to be at Col Todds on the 4th of July.<sup>567</sup> On tuesday I had a note from my dear husband, for now thursday<sup>568</sup> has overtaken me & as I have given my boys holiday, to celebrate the Independence of their country I shall write up my journal. their father was well, but felt the cold on his journey (this season is they say unusually cold from the incessant rains) he had made Alexander get his Shube on their way & it was lucky for the poor fellow would have shivered, out side, travelling night & day. Whistler says he must not indulge himself by staying so much at home again, as he suffers from home sickness dreadfully. but I should think the remedy painful as the effect. I wish we may never be reconciled to a separation from each [sic]<sup>569</sup> in this world! we miss him much! Debo has been amusing me with the new work by Prescott. “Conquest of Mexico.<sup>570</sup> we have finished the first vol in three afternoons, it is quite like romance. our neighbours the Gillebrands & Ropes took tea with us on Tuesday.<sup>571</sup> I told them of the charming report I had read in M<sup>r</sup> Maxwells letter to Whistler of his health & all the novelties he met at Berlin,<sup>572</sup> but I did not tell them of the gratification I had felt in receiving a kind letter from his mother,<sup>573</sup> it was more than I had expected for any attention in my power to bestow on her son. M<sup>r</sup> Gillebrand gave me the content of a letter he had received from the interior of Russia because it said I must be interested in the good cause. it was from an old German Baron<sup>574</sup> had been translated into excellent english, the strain was one of deep piety, devotion to the spread of the gospel. he described the blessed effects of the distribution of Tracts, the only channel now left in this land, for bibles are no longer allowed to be printed<sup>575</sup> & it is also forbidden that any should speak of any other faith than the Greek faith to the poor, who nevertheless seldom hear a sermon in their own churches, & the service being in a language they do not understand, the Slavonian, they quiet their consciences by bowing & crossing themselves before pictures of the virgin & child, unless when awakened by truths from the tracts, which they are so eager to obtain they will walk versts for them. the old Baron writes for thousands more for all classes, soldiers in particular. Landlords are glad to have them distributed among their serfs & tenantry. for the [sic] benefit by the change in their habits & lives from the good effects. I was indeed delighted to learn all this & as M<sup>r</sup> G promised Debo the original document for a german exercise, I shall hope to send her translation to my native land. Our boys have great pleasure in distributing Tracts, on Sunday especially when we observe a knot of idle young men playing, or lolling on the grass, we pitch out a Tract which they pick up as a prize, & thank us as if from their hearts, but the most satisfactory way of distributing them is when regiments are passing to give one to each soldier - asking permission first from the commanding officer, which they are too polite to refuse - this week thousands have in this way been distributed by dear M<sup>rs</sup> Gillebrand, for our road has been thronged by troops. she says they always halt at her gate, as for three years she has done thus. but yesterday she was made rather uneasy by the report Alexa<sup>576</sup> carried her of the displeasure of the officers, when the soldiers broke their ranks & shoved each other in the ditch, in their haste to receive the tracts for them, she so dreads a prohibition! but the word is now abroad in this land! May it produce fruit!<sup>577</sup> Yesterday<sup>578</sup> while we were reading Mexico, the boys out playing with their Russian playmates in this enclosure — M<sup>r</sup> Ropes drove up bringing a letter to Debo it was from Emma Maingay, dated Black heath<sup>579</sup> near London — After our tea we ordered the Droshky that Debo might call upon Miss Law<sup>580</sup> at M<sup>r</sup> Andersons, we were invited to take seats on the back Piazza, I found myself at the side of a kind of Miss Becky Dugude<sup>581</sup> a poor cousin of the family I understand & liked her much, she seems to have a heart overflowing with kindness, & loves little children. M<sup>rs</sup> Anderson (called the beautiful M<sup>rs</sup> A) came down all ready for a ride on horse back, we persuaded her not to let our call hinder her as it was already past eight o'clock — as she mounted & kissed her fair hand in adieu, leaving an invitation with her husband for us to take tea the next day, which I declined. Debo enjoyed herself with the two young ladies left to entertain her in a Russian “Gee joggle” formed by a plank laid across a low block of wood. they stood up one at each end & kept time with each other jumping, a gentleman on the ground by each, to hold the lady by the hand. the Peasant girls need no one to keep them at the end of the board for they are expert in this exercise,<sup>582</sup> but it would be dangerous if one jumped too far back, as a fall backwards would be rather awkward. the effect of the game is so pretty I told Debo, on our drive home, she must describe it to Jule that it might be adopted at Stonington. This morning Jemmie began relating anecdotes from the life of Charles the 12th of Sweden & rather to upbraid me that I would not let him do as that monarch had done at 7 years old, manage a horse! I discovered he had taken the volume to bed<sup>583</sup> & read while I thought him asleep. the truth is my Jemmie has fallen into those habits of late rising in consequence of keeping awake till ten o'clock that I have removed him from the nursery to my room, that in his fathers absence I may manage him, I should have been at a loss how to afford my dear boys a military parade today but there was an encampment of cadets about two estates off & they went with Col Drury's<sup>584</sup> sons to see them, they have several play fellows now Scharchinka (or little Alexander), Vaascha (or little William) are their favorites.<sup>585</sup> The flies are most tormenting! they really crawl into my eyes, there is no frightening them off by brushing. When our queer Virginia Randolph was Ambassador to this country he only staid a few days & complained he found "all the plagues of Egypt here with none of its fertility!"<sup>586</sup> but the country looks luxuriant now. It is hay-making time, I fear many of the beautiful fields of wild flowers have been sacrificed by the scythe. I have enjoyed so much pleasure in selecting from the many varieties in my walks with Willie to decorate my parlor, the delicate blue forgetmenot is very abundant on the marshy land here & keeps quite fresh a week in water. I every day wish for my dear Mother to delight in rambling thro the flowery meads with us! she would be stopped at every step to pick something new as I am. Willie has been seeking strawberries in the wood but none scarcely are ripe yet! we have had too much rain & too little heat.

Friday 5th July. Major & M<sup>rs</sup> Trouvellier<sup>587</sup> drove up from the city to spend the evening with us, we had not long returned from a drive of about 12 versts, having attended the vespers at Seergay Monastery. where the chaunting is delightful. we saw many poor & rich assembled at prayers, all alike at time [sic] touching their foreheads upon the pavement crossing themselves incessantly. I watched one lady with the deepest interest she was dressed in white muslin, put me rather in mind of Mrs Barns<sup>588</sup> & seemed truly absorbed in her silent devotions, using fewer gestures than the others & kneeling longer, her fair brow occasionally pressed against the hard cold pavement. We could understand when the priests offered the prayer for the Imperial family by the names, & we imagined when all there joined most vociferously it was for the favorite Grand Duchess Alexandrine. The little Chapel is richly gilded, the screen before the Holy of Holies — into which the foot of none but the Priests may never [sic] enter — filled with pictures of the Saviour, Saints & Virgin Mary. Shrines on every side with pictures of Saints & tapers burning before them. I observed where we first went in a priest at a table teeming with kopecks already — selling these tapers to the people to burn before their patron Saints. Three times during the service the gilded doors of the screen were unfolded & a beautiful Altar peice discovered, a painting of the Trinity. Our blessed Saviour bearing his cross but seated in Heaven beside the Almighty Father. The dove representing the Holy Ghost hovering above them. Incense was showered upon all at prayers before every picture. I could not discover the great difference between this & mass in the Roman church, tho the Greek church professes such a wide distinction. the prayers were in an unknown tongue rapidly run over (except that for the Imperial family) the cross & beads I only saw in the hands of the high Priest - or Bishop probably - his vestments much like those worn at Mass by dignitaries at the Roman Altar, but the long black robes of all the other brotherhood were more like nuns robes & their long hair parted in the middle gave them quite a feminine appearance.<sup>589</sup>

On our drive home we observed all the peasantry along the Mackadamised road busy watering it, using small buckets filled with mud from the ditches on either side of the Turnpike, for it becomes very dusty in a few hours. I looked up at the clouds & said to Debo “if they will wait a half hour it will be sprinkled from above,” but we concluded the Emperor must be expected at Peterhoff as had been reported in the morning. we did not meet him however, but after our tea there was a commotion on the road I joined our boys at the gate, for never having seen his Imperial Majesty I was willing to mingle in the throng of expectants. At last we learned when the company of Cadets were passing that the Emperor had only accompanied them as far as the Kras-nakabac (or red drinking house)<sup>590</sup> & had gone back to town, his two little sons, the grand dukes Constantine & some other name I forget,<sup>591</sup> were in the ranks. they had all been regaled with tea & good things on one or two of the Russian Estates in our neighbourhood & had a march of 19 versts yet before they could reach the camp at Peterhoff<sup>592</sup> - Poor little fellows I thought of them in the night while I listened to the pouring rain, & knew they must be drenched to the skin. some of them were only from ten to twelve years old, but soldiers at heart. One of the officers had singled out our Jemie & asked him first in Russ then in French what regiment he belonged to? "None here I must wait to get again to my own country" Thus the 4th of July proved as exciting a day in Russia for our dear boys as it was no doubt to their cousins in Stonington. James is rather a trial to his mothers patience, but I hope will reward my perseverance when his character developes further, he is so eager in the pursuit of all that interests him. I now adopt the plan of hearing my dear boys read directly after breakfast. Willie first while James practises on the piano half an hour, then [viz] Jem who hinders me not a little by his questions, he was much amused this morning on remarking that much which was said of the Russian character in touching upon the life of Peter the Czar, had come under his own observation. It is just so mother isn't it they will not kill or eat a pigeon yet, this is in the history of Charles 12th <sup>593</sup> which is the book he delights in now. And it is time I should stop scribbling, to talk with my darling boys before I join their Sister at Mrs Gillebrands, a shower detained her to dinner at our neighbours & they have sent to invite me to tea. I have been writing my dear Whistler this afternoon or I should have missed dear Debo who has not left me night or day since her father went away. Major Trouvellier expects to see him next week & will take my letter enclosing Mr Maxwells to him.<sup>594</sup>

Sat [July] 6th We had as heavy showers during the morning as I ever saw fall, but before dinner the sun shone gloriously. Mr Ropes comes always from town before dinner on Saturday for merchants have no Exchange the last day of the week, he dropped in to chat with Debo about the wedding at Sarsko on the 4th & I rejoiced we had not attended it as I like not to be where toasts are given & where the lavish distribution of Champagne makes at least slight innovations upon propriety. I think a religious ceremony ought not to become a carousal, it ought to be a joyous event, but if my daughter were the bride I should feel hurt that the gentlemen should forget the the [sic] delicacy & respect due to her so far as to let their mirth grow noisy. Mr Kirk cannot claim his bride until their marriage is confirmed by the Lutheran ceremony.<sup>595</sup> I had really shivered from cold in the house all the morning & took a quick walk cloaked & bonnetted upon our parterre while Debo was making her toilet after dinner, the sun shine made me feel comfortable & all nature looked so fresh & bright I wished for my dear mother to admire the clean-washed flowers as I did. I counted 24 varieties in full bloom, from the violet to the dahlia — We had promised to go with the Ropes to Saigay chapel, it being St Johns day<sup>596</sup> the chaunting would be finer than usual & so it proved, for the band of court singers were added to those we had heard before, the chaunting was the most perfectly harmonious singing I ever listened to, but Oh I have the painful conviction that this worship is not that which is right the poor people prostrate themselves seemingly soul & body. but their offerings are to Saints equally with the Saviour, who has said Look unto Me & be ye saved all the ends of the earth, for there is none else but me who can come between you & an offended God.<sup>597</sup> the higher classes seemed to cross themselves without devotion gazing round upon the assembling crowd & I observed the high Priest while his back was turned to the people take out a pocket comb & smooth his long beard! this was in the most solemn part of the service, for he immediately after turned to his flock as Moses might have done to the Israelites to deliver a communication to them from the Most High,<sup>598</sup> for as he hurried thro something in the Slavonic, they all fell on their faces on the pavement. There were more tapers than common sold, dozen [sic] were burning before the Saint Saigay (this picture has a tiara of real diamonds & its richly gilded frame corresponds with that of the blessed Saviour on the other side of the altar & has even greater homage pd to it. St. John had also many tapers burning before his shrine today. Mr Gillebrand said to me when we were again out in the open air, “I have lived among these people 20 years & am more & more convinced of the errors of the Greek church, but without the bible how soon we should also lose our light!” We had before service gone over the burying ground & saw some beautiful tombs, one in particular of two little boys only brothers affected me, the sculpture in pure white marble, their hands clasped in prayer upheld by the cross between them.<sup>599</sup> We saw wreaths of fresh flowers thrown upon some of the tombs. Debo & I took coffee at ten by ourselves, for Mary had bathed our boys & given them tea early. No visitors arrived.

Sunday [July] 7th <sup>600</sup> A bright morning for we have been favored with sunshine to attend divine service every sabbath. We took M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes in our Calash to town as she wished to be as little while as possible from her baby & M<sup>r</sup> Gs carriage leaves home early. I had warned M<sup>r</sup> R the day before that my dear sister Alicia was one of the passengers of the Mermaid<sup>601</sup> which he said might be in today, so he promised to let me know after church thro his Artelgic.<sup>602</sup> Our congregation of gentlemen was diminished by the prospect of the Launch!<sup>603</sup> Ah how I wished M<sup>r</sup> Williams excellent discourse from Dan<sup>l</sup> 6th part of 16th verse. “thy God whom thou servest He will deliver thee”<sup>604</sup> it was chiefly to urge the young to the service of their Maker, but it was full of good advice to all. I was thankful I had listened to it before I heard that my sister was actually at the English Quai, when my mind reverted to the past, my own arrival & its attendant trial! I could not restrain the impatience of Jemmie to meet Aunt Alicia he was flying off from M<sup>r</sup> Ropes yard without leave! so I called him back & we drove round tho I feared it was only to encounter the crowd which always collects, for none around allowed to go on board the boat, tho the police may long detain their friends during their examination, happily for us however we soon saw luggage passing to the Custom house & thro the favour shewn M<sup>r</sup> Ropes my Sister was in a few moments in our carriage, leaving her keys for them to open her trunks without her, we went again to M<sup>r</sup> Ropes & soon he brought the Harrisons I was so much pleased with her amiable, sensible, countenance I kissed her welcome & her darling little girl of 4 years old & boy of 6<sup>605</sup> most attractive, docile & neat children, how pleased I was that they did not resist my embraces. I really am proud of the appearance of these Americans. And as we rode out on the Peterhoff road how eager James & Willie were to shew off to Aunt Alicia all the novelties, distributing tracts to the soldiers they were sure would interest — Debo who had preceded us in M<sup>r</sup> Gillebrands carriage was the first to imprint a kiss of welcome upon my dear Sisters lips. After dinner while she took a nap for she had been up since three oclock, I read to the little Normans & my boys as usual. My dear Sister after tea walked thro the wood with us, she seems much pleased!

Monday [July] 8th,<sup>606</sup> This morning we sent to town for my sisters trunks, the custom house officers had not objected to any thing & the writing materials, gloves, hoisery, flannels &c which I had commissioned her to bring me I received undisturbed & with duty. M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes called while we were at dinner to be introduced to my sister, who afterwards retired to her own room to write to England, when Debo & I continued Prescotts Mexico.

Tuesday [July] 9th,<sup>607</sup> I ought to have noted we had no rain yesterday for it was remarkable. my sister feels the contrast between the verdure here this summer & the parched fields of England. Showers commenced again today, but the sun shines so gloriously between them & the atmosphere is so transparent my Sister cannot but notice it. I ordered the Calash & went with her to town to call upon the Harrisons & also upon Miss Hirst taking only little Willie with us. We sat an hour with my invalid friend who was so cheered at receiving one from Preston so highly recommended as my Sister & as a follower of our Lord that I never knew her so animated, I feared she would suffer for talking so much, afterwards, but she said "Never mind the suffering, that I am used to let me enjoy the present treat" twinges of pain often took her breath for a moment. My Sister said on leaving the house it was as if we had been visiting a being of a better world & that the celestial expression of Miss Hirsts countenance increased the happy effect. We drove up into the Nevski after crossing the bridge, to get some drawing paper for James at the palet de Raphael,<sup>608</sup> then told the driver Ne Dacha,<sup>609</sup> on our road home we had a slight sprinkle. In the afternoon the beautiful M<sup>rs</sup> Anderson & her guests called to propose a drive thro some fine grounds & to take tea with them afterwards. I declined, but Debo went with them. We had wild strawberries (the first) at tea, our Willie wished he knew where they grew, he would go to gather more! When I had seen my boys in bed I accompanied Aunt Alicia in a call upon our neighbours, she was charmed by their kindness, we found their pastor M<sup>r</sup> Ellerby & his lady<sup>610</sup> there, also Miss Mac Masters<sup>611</sup> & her pupils the little Woods,<sup>612</sup> come to make a visit of a fortnight at the Gellibrands. We were obliged to leave them at 10 o'clock as I had promised to send the Droshky then for Debo. while my Sister & I sat waiting for her (after we had had prayers with Mary) we naturally spoke of that little one who had been our delight when together at dear Uncle Winstanleys at Preston.

Wed [July] 10th This is a decidedly rainy day! We were most agreeably surprised today while at dinner by my dear husbands return, he had been travelling all night to reach home. he thought Sister might arrive today! how glad he was to find her already quite settled among us! And now as he has been inspecting the drawings &c done in his absence I can throw aside my fear to talk over the past fortnight. he has suffered from cold in travelling but looks well, thro [sic] rather browner than when he left us. he says he has been sailing thro bogs knee deep, what could he have done without water proof boots! sometimes on horse back seventeen hours at a sitting, no wonder his joints are unhinged!

Thursday [July] 11th <sup>613</sup> I awake this morning with mingled feeling of joy & sadness, these anniversaries always cause such mixture of emotion in the retrospect of the past, & we see more clearly the flight of time in our reduced numbers. I told Whistler it seemed longer to me than ten years since my Jemmies birth, so much has happened to mark the interval. When we assembled at prayers our dear boy came out of his fathers office - instead of just down stairs - where he had been shut up with M<sup>r</sup> Hadenskoﬀ <sup>614</sup> since six o'clock! at some mysterious employment, it was solved when we went to breakfast under each plate was a note to each,<sup>615</sup> mine tho not his own composition<sup>616</sup> as the others were, was so beautifully expressive of love to a mother that I felt as last Christmas day, quite overcome by the surprise & as the lines were my darling Jemmies own selection I shall copy them, that he may be reminded of his happy childhood when perhaps his grateful mother is not with him.

To my Mother . July 10th 1844

“They tell us of an Indian tree	Far better loves to bend its arms
Which howsoe’er the sun & sky	Downwards again, to that dear earth
May tempt its boughs to wander free	From which the life that fills & warms
And shoot & blossom, wide & high,	Its grateful being, first had birth.
“Tis thus, though woo’d by flattering friends,	Oh God hear my prayer recorded here that this holy feeling filial love <sup>617</sup> may never desert him!

“and fed with fame, (if fame it be)          “This heart, my own dear mother bends,          “With loves true instinct back to thee.          On my tenth birth day, your little James.	<table border="0"> <tr> <td style="border-left: 1px solid black; padding-left: 5px;">           prayer recorded here            that this holy feeling            filial love<sup>617</sup> may            never desert him!         </td> </tr> </table>	prayer recorded here that this holy feeling filial love <sup>617</sup> may never desert him!

As I contrast my darling James healthful appearance with his last years palid looks I feel the mercy of Him who holds our lives in His keeping & pray my dear boys may be prolonged to His honor upon Earth, then it will surely be to the comfort of his mother. Of course no school today! but a determined rain kept Willie & James within doors. Aunt Alicia, Sister & I answered the notes<sup>618</sup> while dear father had to drive off to town. A strawberry treat to all the children in the neighbourhood had been proposed to commemorate James birth day. but it so happened that a birth day at Mr Drury's<sup>619</sup> had engaged all there and the Normans, so when Mrs Gillebrand sent to invite us boys and all to tea at her house we agreed to go there. This is a great Russian holiday 29th June old style,<sup>620</sup> but what it is for I do not understand, only no business is attended to in the city therefore all the gents of the Ropes & Gillebrand clans are in the country today. & our boys will have a fine romp — they always expect it when Mr Ropes is at home

Friday [July] 12th <sup>621</sup> My dear husband brought from Alexandrofski the new flute which Mr Harrison had purchased in London for him at his request, he liked it at once & we listened to some delightful duets by his accompanying Debos transposing on the piano which happened not to be set high enough for the flute. Mrs Ropes & Miss Mc Master came in to listen. It was amusing at bed time to see with what care my husband wiped his flute & put it away in its case, giving it into my keeping, thieves in this country often plead an excuse for stealing by complaining that valuables are left in their way to tempt them! what a pity we had not put the dear old flute & my pretty escrotoire beyond their reach.

Sat [July] 13th <sup>622</sup> After the tremendous rains of the two past days the sun came out upon a clear blue sky today & Whistler agreed to Debos proposal to take herself & our dear boys to town, as she wished to go to Worrnozoffs<sup>623</sup> for a new muslin dress. While they were away I was occupied looking after the ways of my household, little Andrea & his mother came, I set her to scrubbing for I do think it wrong to encourage a system of begging. some jugglers came to the yard, little Andrea put me so in mind of my own precious Kirkie as he ran to me on tip toe with his fingers in his mouth looking half timid, half assured I could not deny him, with those full black eyes speaking so much more intelligibly than his Russian tongue! I opened the door for him, seated him there and threw out some kopeeks for the organist.<sup>624</sup> My sister Alice brought her work to my room, three gents came up the front walk, the Pratchka (or Laundress)<sup>625</sup> was washing windows in the dining room & would have been frightened away had I not told her “Nee tchevo”<sup>626</sup> so we went to the drawing room with M<sup>r</sup>. Joseph Ropes & his two cousins,<sup>627</sup> one had lately arrived from America & it proved that his brother M<sup>r</sup> Hooper had been in Whistlers employ in Springfield.<sup>628</sup> The party came back from town, in time for little Willie & I to take an hours walk with Aunt Alicia before dinner. In the afternoon while we were reading the Conquest of Mexico, we were not aware that M<sup>r</sup> W Maingay passed my room window, but when tea was ready found him seated in the parlor with Whistler. he & Debo played Duetts on the harp & piano (how Emma would have laughed had she listened to her brothers attempts) until eleven oclock — the twilight is so deceptive they were surprised to discover how late it was, but Whistler & I were each occupied with a book, & dear Aunt Alicia had long since stolen off to watch her darling James who was obliged to go to bed with a bad head ache. I received a most affectionate note from my friend Miss Hirst<sup>629</sup> in return for a form of calves foot I had sent her by them to town. how much I wished to go with it that I might read to her, she is so feeble again. And I always feel it such a benefit to myself to read the Scriptures to her. I forgot to remark this day (the 1st of July old style the Empress birth day) is the greatest holiday in the year in Russia, there has always been in this reign, a grand fête at Peterhoff to celebrate it,<sup>630</sup> but the illness of the Grand duchess Alexandra interferes with all gaiety at court now. We hear the flattering hope that she was better has proved false, her feeble frame could not bear longer than one night in the cow house, but she has been removed to the little lodge next the dairy.<sup>631</sup> God has found it best to withhold his blessing on all the means as yet tried. I trust He has better things in store for her than a restoration to health could enable her to enjoy. Oh may she put her trust in Him.

Sunday [July] 14th 632 A fine bright morning for us to drive into town to attend divine service & an excellent discourse from our young pastor as usual, it was upon Charity, his text was taken from Mat 26th 13th 633 and while he urged upon us to relieve the necessities of the poor in this land, he besought us not to forget our duty to the spiritual claims of those in all lands especially in our own. I never enjoyed uniting in commemorating the dying love of our Lord & Saviour at His holy table so much as on this sabbath M<sup>r</sup>. Williams low & solemn tone is so devotional. & as there were very few, the altar only three times filled, he repeated to each member separately the whole verse, thus allowing time for private prayer, my soul felt strengthened & refreshed. In the afternoon we had rain but not enough to prevent the little Normans coming to my room from the cottage to listen to my Sunday exercises with my dear boys.

Wed [July] 17th 634 My sister & self went to town with Whistler yesterday & had some rain to encounter for not 24 hours is without this cold summer. It was to attend to the exchange of her passport for a billet of residence, no stranger may sojourn in St P without this tax.<sup>635</sup> Col Bouttatz joined us as had been agreed, for in all such cases he is ready to serve us. We had first to go to the Count Benkindoffs<sup>636</sup> & as his house is almost a palace, he lives surrounded by palaces (near the Summer gardens<sup>637</sup> which the plentiful rains render uncommonly beautiful this season) so my Sister had a view of the finest part of the city, indeed we made a complete circuit before arriving at the Bureau for Strangers, while she went in to prove her identity I sat in the carriage exercising my Russ by reading the signs. We afterwards spent two hours at the bed side of dear Miss Hirst while Whistler went to the Railroad department, the Col promised to visit us. And as Col Todd also had told Whistler he would be with us this Wednesday, he made up his mind to be at home all day, however we had just finished breakfast when old M<sup>r</sup> Curtis stopped at our door to say he was on his way to Sairgay Monastery & begged us to take seats in his carriage, as the chaunting would be uncommonly fine & the ceremonies on St Sairgays day<sup>638</sup> brilliant. Debo persuaded Aunt Alicia to chaperone her notwithstanding her horror of going to such a place of worship & as they were early & met an old admiral<sup>639</sup> who knew M<sup>r</sup> C they procured places, tho hundreds could not gain admittance, as was the case of my husband & self, for he not having heard the chaunting of the Greek service ever, was induced to follow them, knowing he would be back in time to receive Col Todd. As we pressed our way thro the crowd in the chapel yard, a grand procession of priests & bishops came out, most magnificently dressed in light blue velvet inlaid with silver they looked so new we concluded they were so for the occasion. the higher order of the brotherhood wore splendid crowns glittering with diamonds & other precious stones & pearls, they showered incense on the prostrate crowd, & carried wax tapers lighted in their hands. but there was not apparently the least feeling in the clergy that they were worshippers of a great High Priest & the people looked with such awe upon them one might have thought they were their deities. Many hundreds were there & many Splendid equipages, the field opposite the church was filled with carriages of all descriptions & we understood many had been there from the night before. Oh if we could collect a multitude to join in our simple & pure form of worship to hear the word of truth happy would it be for them! Debo did not return home till after us, the Emperors carriage had passed theirs! I always just miss the sight! it was supposed he was on his way to Peterhoff, but we afterwards heard from an eye witness of his unexpected entrance thro the crowd into the Chapel,<sup>640</sup> when he asked for an especial service & prayers for his dear daughter the Grand duchess. As he knelt before the Altar in his devotions his tears were observed to flow, & all around him were struck to see the great man so humbled, & his form wasting thro grief, that she who a few months past was his pride as he gave her at the Altar a blooming bride to the young Prince of Hesse Castle should now be sinking into an early grave.<sup>641</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Curtis spent the day with us, but tho we waited for Col Todd, he did not arrive to dine with us, he came in his coach & four at six introducing young Parker<sup>642</sup> who brought a letter from M<sup>rs</sup> Mac Swift,<sup>643</sup> we were right glad to chat with him about the Chews,<sup>644</sup> he is an intelligent, modest young gentleman, we were surprised to hear his travelling companion thro Europe is Col Thayer.<sup>645</sup> It so happened that M<sup>r</sup> Miller came in to tea, and our friend Bouttatz was true to his promise & arrived just as we were surrounding the table, he stayed with us tonight. the boys are delighted.

Thurs [July] 18th By 6 o'clock this morning Col B<sup>646</sup> was in our garden. Whistler felt timid about imposing our form of prayer upon him & would have had family worship in retirement, but I felt we might pursue our usual course of assembling in the parlor without exhibition, for I have a dread of aught which might approach to being ashamed of Jesus in the world. Our kind friend knelt with us, & I have no doubt at breakfast he listened to my boys verses of scripture with approbation, for he loves children so much, he must like to see them trained in the paths of peace, he was even unusually gentle & kind, told them of his amusement in the garden in watching the old turkey with her family of young turkeys & ducks & chickens! she seemed so uneasy, with so many different sorts to take care of. We had most tremendous rains today, I really suffer from cold not being able to go out for exercise.

Friday [July] 19th <sup>647</sup> We were glad of tolerable weather for Col Thayer & Mr Parker dining with us, & they seemed equally delighted with our rural situation, at dinner they praised the fresh salmon, green peas & above all the iced mead,<sup>648</sup> which is a delicious drink. As Mr Gellibrand or Ropes could not meet our American friends at dinner, we invited the ladies to come with them to tea, & as Mr Curtis brought a German Mr Thal<sup>649</sup> sans ceremonie, we had quite a parlor full. much music of course as the two last are Amateurs. I sometimes tremble lest dear Debos music should prove a snare to draw her into too much notice & consume too much of her precious time.

Sat [July] 20th <sup>650</sup> I put on a good warm cloak when I seated myself beside Whistler in the droshky this morning. with a form of Jelly to take to my invalid friend. I parted from him at the bridge as he was bound for Alexandrofski, but on my alighting at Mr Hirsts gate I was disappointed to hear my poor suffering friend was in too much pain to see me, it was the first time I had ever been denied admittance. I went into the Summer house in the pretty garden & her good Elona provided me with writing materials that I might leave a few lines of affection & sympathy to comfort her, when able to read them. Rain came powerfully soon after my safe arrival at home, the house becomes so chilly we often are glad of the heat from one Peach, so in anticipation of my gude mons return I ordered that in the dining room, & he approved of it when he came at tea time.

Monday [July] 22nd <sup>651</sup> Yesterday morning we were again favored with clear weather. the subject of Mr Williams discourse was luke warmness in our devotions & service to the Saviour! Ah how well for a congregation when a preacher fearlessly points this lamentable fact for our consideration. In the afternoon the rain was very determined there was no holding up between the showers when the little Normans could run in to join James & William in our sabbath reading. Whistler & Aunt Alicia however listened with them to the instructive narrative of Archie Stewart. <sup>652</sup> and in the evening Debo read one of Blunts excellent sermons upon the life of St Paul to us. What a transition there was during last night in the weather! tremendous rolling of thunder awoke us all accompanying heavy rain, which has carried off the cold & brought us back a Summers heat, which even I feel quite oppressive, but I will not complain. the farmers are rejoicing & the hay makers are very busy trying to dry some of the grass which they had every prospect of losing thro the incessant rains. This is my darling Willies 8th Anniversary, he & James have no lessons & seem as lively as the birds among their numerous little friends. Of course we had each a note from Will for our breakfast, as he would not be out done by James. <sup>653</sup> And I have been very busy all this morning bargaining with the fruiterers for their strawberry feast A long table spread for a dozen, now collected in our grounds. the little Russian children are remarkably well behaved & polite, so that my boys have both pleasure & profit in such companions as the Druries. On rising from table they invariably come up to the lady & of the house to tender thanks with a graceful bow or courtesy

Wed [July] 24th <sup>654</sup> Fine warm weather continues. Yesterday my Sister & self went to the city with Whistler directly after breakfast, as Miss Hirst had expressed a wish we should partake of the Communion with her, but as we could not so early venture into a sick room we went to our house upon the English Quai, <sup>655</sup> where we found workmen busy at repairs. the view of the Neva now such a busy, gay, scene, is delightful from the balcony, but my husband is dissatisfied with our new accommodations, the lodgings like all in Russia are more for display than convenience, and Whistler could not help contrasting the rough corners, with the gilded cornises & painted ceilings. Ah how comfortable are the snug homes of America & England! still in Russia we have many domestic arrangements to reconcile us, the servants so respectful & willing. I will take the evil with the good every where, for it must be mingled upon earth. Sister & I took a gondola at the ferry steps opposite the Ritter House where our new quarters are, and were so attracted by the beauty of a Steamer on its way up the river we did not notice our little boat was crossing its wake until the tossing made us fear a capsize, my heart was in my throat & my Sister who is timid screamed “Mercy” while the oarsman or Pirasvostschi<sup>656</sup> quietly said “Neetcheevo” or never mind & tho I trembled I felt it was a false alarm. We walked slowly up to Mr Hirsts, (after paying our 5 cop-silv<sup>657</sup> ferriage which certainly was little enough for two crossing in a gaily painted barge under a nice awning) the heat tho not quite so intense as yesterday was enough. The dear Invalid was very feeble, the doctor<sup>658</sup> who had just left her had prohibited her saying a word, indeed she could scarcely whisper, but tho so low, she looked the picture of neatness & the slight flush on her cheek tho painful is beautiful to gaze up. she pointed to a book of Prayers for the Sick (by bishop Slade)<sup>659</sup> & I read the portions which were most appropriate from time to time. Never shall I forget the privilege of partaking of the sacred emblems of our Lords love for us, with one so truly waiting upon Him. I felt that He was indeed among us. M<sup>r</sup> Williams performed the service most feelingly, but as she was too feeble to converse promised to visit her again the next day to pray with her. We remained a while after him & found Whistler at the Quai waiting for us. M<sup>r</sup> Stockoll<sup>660</sup> drove out to tea & spent the evening till midnight! on our piazza. This morning looked unpropitious for Whistlers trip to Cronstadt with our American friends, but he left home by 8 o'clock supposing Col Thayer would be expecting him. After a slight shower the sun has come out & as the heat is less I hope they enjoy their sail Gen Distrain<sup>661</sup> was to go with them, he is in the Russian service & very intellectual, Debo had a joint-epistle yesterday from our friends at Marseilles, the kind Poizatts,<sup>662</sup> he took the pen first, to describe the lovely blue eyed girl his Cecilia had presented him on the 10th of May! she dilated on the improvement of her other children, Mary had learned to speak english while she was in America last Summer — & Charles was following in her steps in preparation for a promised visit to Philadelphia, she tenderly touched upon my bereavement of the gentle little Charlie she had fondled on board the Acadia, but was sure his mother would not wish to call back to this world of trial an angel from heaven! Indeed I could not be so selfish as to wish him back again, my most earnest desire is that those still lent me may feel that they are only pilgrims here, I have no earthly ambitious views for them but that as faithful followers of the Saviour they may be as lights in the paths of holiness & peace.

August 1:st Thursday.<sup>663</sup> Whistler for a wonder has staid at home today & while he is writing a report upon his late inspection of the railroad to Moscow for the Count Kleinmichel,<sup>664</sup> Debo Aunt Alicia & the boys have taken the Calashe to return the calls of Miss Morgan<sup>665</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> F Baird,<sup>666</sup> as they are 14 versts<sup>667</sup> apart the drive will give them appetite for a five oclock dinner. The only evening I have been out this summer except at our neighbours the Gellibrands was last week at the request of the beautiful M<sup>rs</sup> Anderson to keep her wedding day<sup>668</sup> I was surprised to meet so many there, W<sup>m</sup> Maingay came among the others from town & brought me the pleasure of a few lines from his dear mother,<sup>669</sup> for his father has come to St Petersburg from London. In the long twilight the young people walked about the grounds & engaged in Russian games, Debo stole away to take a peep at Emmas letters.<sup>670</sup> I wished my Jemie & Willie could see the Shetland pony fed from the hand of the Anderson boys,<sup>671</sup> so tame it follows them all over the house — As the piazza & trees were hung with colored lamps they had to be lit & then we adjourned to the music hall a lofty spacious room extending across the front of the house, M<sup>rs</sup> Anderson put me in mind of the picture of some Circassian maid<sup>672</sup> as she sung to her guitar & her black eyes looked so melting, the bloom of her cheek so soft & rich, but her greatest attraction is her unaffected sweetness of manner, she certainly is gifted, for I would rather hear her sing than any one I ever listened to, but yet my heart still holds my own dear Debo above all I contrast her with among these who assemble to be gay & I was so grateful to her when she declined waltzing! I hope she never will yeild to her fondness for dancing at the expense of what I conceive to be decorous. Our evening was concluded with assembling around a table for fruits & champagne. Water melons from Astracan!<sup>673</sup> scarlet strawberries from the Andersons own garden. But I must not linger over the last week when I have to record so much of this. My dear friend Miss

Hirst has been daily growing more ill, last Sunday<sup>674</sup> I sent her a form of Jelly before church & a bunch of flowers from my little Willie accompanied it, I was surprised that she should write me an acknowledgement. but she is so grateful! the doct came to see my James on Monday<sup>675</sup> but was in great haste as Miss Hirst was so extremely ill her brother had been sent for, I could scarcely sleep that night thinking of her & the next day<sup>676</sup> went to the city with my husband to offer my services at her bedside, I found poor Elona overwhelmed with sorrow for her suffering mistress, never shall I forget the patience of this true christian, she raised her eyes to heaven as if imploring strength, which surely was yeilded or she could not have endured without uttering a complaint what she did, at times when she could scarcely breathe for pain she would be raised in her brothers arms & rest her feeble head on his shoulder, she seemed burning up with fever & it was a mercy that she could from time to time take the smallest lump of ice in her mouth, as she could not swallow half a teaspoon full of water. But why depict her sufferings - except to shew the support of religion, when she could speak she would say to me “give me comfort” I cannot do without the word of God” — her moans were heart rending, we all wept silently at sufferings we could not remove, even her brother was often unmanned, then she would so gently say “Why distress yourself dear brother? you do all in your power, God comfort you!” And in the midst of all her agonies she was so considerate for us it was truly touching, she would point to a seat that her Sister might rest while I fanned her & I heard her trying to utter an order to the nurse to bring me a glass of nice cold milk, which she had used to like to see me enjoy. I did not leave her till eight in the evening, & as I walked sadly backwards & forwards in the 5th Line<sup>677</sup> to catch a sight of our carriage & prevent its rattling up to the gate I had the happiness of seeing my dear husband walking to meet me, we crossed the Neva in a little boat & were soon on our road home, we found the Ropes & music — I dont know a much more trying transitio[n] than mine proved my heart was sadder than ever as the Piano, Harp & Flute drew forth harmonies — to delight the rest, & I was thankful when we could all kneel around the family Altar & retire to our rooms. On Wednesday<sup>678</sup> we had a visit for the first time from our Pastor M<sup>r</sup> Williams, introduced to tea sociably. they came in unexpectedly & were listening to Debo & her father playing a sweet duett ere they were discovered, Debo was rather shocked for she had heard that M<sup>r</sup> W was not fond of music. I told her it must be only the excess (of spending whole mornings in practising & evenings in exhibition) which he could not help disapproving, & so it proved, he asked for sacred music, which alas she could not gratify him with, but he urged her to practise some he should send, & remarked that he wished every one of his congregation who had voices would use them freely in church to drown the wretched singing of the German boys who compose our choir, he lamented that the chaunts were not sung in church & said, he by comparison, had never known the beauty of the Psalms of David<sup>679</sup> until he heard them in the Cathedral service. Thus our young Clergyman proved himself not only a conmissier but an Amateur of the divine science of music, but he has been like many other christians greived that the gift has been devoted only to worldly amusement, & withheld from approving the perversion of the talent. No expence has been spared by the English Factory to make their Chapel all it ought to be, a new splendid Organ<sup>680</sup> for which they pd a thousand pound, a hired organist,<sup>681</sup> but as a young lady observed truly the other day the congregation rather praise God by proxy! M<sup>r</sup> Williams urges them to join in the responses & the hymns, which I have ventured always to do at the expense of being called a disturber of the awful silence! Debo & Whistler seemed to enjoy the cheerfulness & intelligence of our young pastor, my boys were attracted by his playful remarks about good children in church while Aunt Alicia was charmed with his accounts of Syria & Greece, he spoke of our missionaries M<sup>r</sup> Southgate<sup>682</sup> & Hill<sup>683</sup> with deep interest & said M<sup>rs</sup> Hill<sup>684</sup> was the most astonishing woman he ever met with, her school at Athens<sup>685</sup> I have ever been interested in & supposed her energy in carrying on her course of instruction to the heathen was what he lauded, but no it was her sweet dependence upon God, her devotion her faith & simplicity. The Gellibrands came in after tea, D<sup>r</sup> Handsides<sup>686</sup> asked for Scotch music & seemed quite enraptured by the accompaniment of my husbands flute to Debos piano. I observed our clerical guest had become wrapped in reflection. I thought of the close of our evenings at Stonington when dear M<sup>r</sup> Newman<sup>687</sup> had been our guest & longed for a pause in the music that I might consult my husband about asking for prayers ere we separated. When there was a movement as if to say goodnight I could wait no longer & whispering M<sup>r</sup> Williams my wish that he should conduct our family devotions I placed the bible in his hands, as he read from Ephesians,<sup>688</sup> he made some appropriate [sic] remarks after which he prayed most fervently. I have not felt so comforted since I left my own dear mother & her home. M<sup>r</sup> G drew aside & commended me for what I had done saying he should follow my example in his own house, but after I had retired to my room Whistler was silent. today he has talked with me about it, & has been uncomfortable lest our deviating from M<sup>r</sup> Laws practise should bring remarks upon him. May God direct us what is our duty! I feel that every Pastor might desire to close every visit thus, & as I am not afraid of any remarks upon my own conduct if I do not bring censure upon others, I shall hope to enjoy again this my share of the visit of our Pastor again. And now after the interruption of visitors I will close this days account. Col Melnikoff & his brother<sup>689</sup> (who holds some situation at court) came rather unexpectedly to dine with us today, for a rare event my husband was at home, having been writing an important document for Count K, so we made no strangers of them, Debos fluency in the french tongue is a great advantage here, she conversed entirely with M<sup>r</sup> M, I have felt a stronger desire than ever to acquire a knowledge of french since my predicament when this gentlemans wife<sup>690</sup> called one day in the Galernia upon me & we could not say a word to be understood by each other — About 8 clock in the evening the Andersons came also, these gents became so enchanted by the music, especially the voice of the beautiful M<sup>rs</sup> A they could scarcely tear themselves away at ten oclock tho they had to ride nearly 20 versts. They begged Whistler to let them come soon again to our country retreat “there is so much more enjoyment in visiting thus sociably, Madame M, would find it so!”

Friday Aug 2nd <sup>691</sup> This day has been in strong contrast to yesterday, yet I always feel on visiting Miss Hirst it is better to spend an hour at her bed side than in the most joyous circle, for I feel Gods presence there. this dear lady has been sinking in bodily strength rapidly & I have scarcely expected to find her breathing from time to time, my sister only went with me to town today as Whistler was still busy with his rail road document at home, she feared to intrude into the sick chamber & sauntered about the garden, the low moans of the sufferer sunk upon my heart as I approached her room, M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst sat fanning her, silently weeping. I thought to relieve her while I could stay & took the fan, the dear invalid knew I was there, tho when she spoke it was with so much exertion & in so feeble a tone I could only hear her say “Give me comfort” read the word of God to me” a choise collection of prayers & texts always shared her table with her favorite flowers, she never valued any thing but in connection with her Saviour, she did while able to admire them, read in every petal His goodness & indulgence to mankind. And now could not exist without His word. I would not be irreverent! but as I witnessed her agonies this day I thought perhaps since those He suffered on the cross none could have been more severe or lingering than hers. but I know it passeth human knowledge to judge of the agonies of His soul for the sins of the whole world! — At times she had to be lifted in good Elons arms to breathe, the dreadful disease having reached her throat she could not even swallow the water from the tiny lump of ice, while the surface of her body appeared consuming with heat, her feet could not bear even the linen sheet, they looked delicate as an infants, it is five years since she has stood upon them! Oh how often have I had my patient little suffering Kirkie before my minds eye this day! If God permits the “little ones” He loves thus to be afflicted how hateful must sin be in His sight. He scourges every Son whom He receiveth,<sup>692</sup> Oh how dangerous is death bed repentance! Oh that we might all give our hearts to Him in their freshness to be kept by Him as Miss Hirst did, her soul stayed on Him was free from terrors, her mind perfectly clear unto the last. After a paroxysm of great pain, when she could speak she asked me to read a prayer. I knelt beside her, & felt Oh so humbled! wondering that I should be permitted to comfort such a saint, & as I repeated the Lords prayer at the close of one I had read for a person near death, my emotion so entirely overpowered me, that she gently laid her hand upon my head & soothed me! Strength was lent her to fulfil her last desires, she distinctly said “I could like to kiss your Sister before I go” she put her feeble arms about me & blessed me & as she called over the names of my husband & children seemed to breathe a prayer for them, which may God of His infinite goodness answer! then taking M<sup>rs</sup> Hirsts hand she placed it in mine & said “promise me you will transfer the love you have shewn to me, to this Sister” I did so heartily, then she thanked me & blessed me again for the comfort I had been always to her & added “God brought you here, for He had work for you to do,”<sup>693</sup> then alluding to M<sup>r</sup> Williams visits, she added “I told you love, God was multiplying my blessings at the last of my days on earth” she embraced my Sister affectionately calling her her sister in Christ Jesus. We all wept thro this exciting hour but herself. I knew she must rapidly sink after it & whispering M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst, that I felt these precious moments should be sacred to themselves, moved as if to go, she called be [sic] once more to kiss & to bless me, then waved her hands as if to consent to my leaving her, whispered “If I live you will see me again, farewell now my love” I feel that this is our last interview on earth! If I ever enter that state of perfect happiness which I feel is awaiting her, I shall know if I am in error now, in imagining the joy of my children in welcoming to the skies their mothers friend! We shall know each other, even as we are known<sup>694</sup> “Oh that this reunion might ever be our strongest wish, that the trifles of earth might not enchain our desires. but Jesus must become the object of our supreme attachment or our affections can never mount on high, And His word must be our chief study, that in this life we may honor Him, or He will say at the awful day of Judgement “I know you not” — <sup>695</sup> Oh that we appreciated how precious is time.

Monday [August] 5th <sup>696</sup> My kind husband indulged the wish I had to go to the Island before Church time yesterday by driving early to town. I left him at our Consuls, for M<sup>r</sup> Gibson<sup>697</sup> is an invalid too - and went along to M<sup>r</sup>. Hirsts. poor Elona met me, she was weeping & raised her arms letting them fall disconsolately. I found both M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst in the sick chamber, the patient had not opened her mouth since Sat morning at 3 oclock — Oh how emaciated by suffering! I kissed her for the last time, yet she opened not her eyes. I hastened over to church as her brother desired the prayers of the church & it was too late to send a servant. M<sup>r</sup>. Ellerby had had to accompany his sick wife to Revel,<sup>698</sup> so his flock were added to our scanty number & the church was respectably filled, M<sup>r</sup> Williams text was from the 19th chap 18th verse 1st Kings.<sup>699</sup> it was liked by all of his mingled auditors for it was full of charity & brotherly love. I have just heard from M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst that her dear Sister was last night released! she is to be buried on thursday next,<sup>700</sup> she had seemed free from suffering many hours before she ceased to breathe, but neither spoke, or opened her eyes, all her worldly cares were over on friday & I do not doubt she held sweet communion with Jesus, while to observers she had ceased to notice any thing around her. M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes has just told me of a very afflicted Mother who lives about 4 versts off. I never saw M<sup>rs</sup> Hodges,<sup>701</sup> & from the style of her living should never have wished to visit at her house, for almost every Sunday they had a dinner party. but now I am drawn by sympathy towards her & wish I could go to her to weep with her. she had one of the dearest little babies who last Saturday afternoon was frolicing at her knee, it was taken uneasy that night & last night after hours of suffering died!<sup>702</sup> Ah how like this case to my little Charlies! he was the brightest of my family group on Saturday & the following night his eyes were glazed by death! God deals with us very gently, He takes these little innocents around whom He knows our tenderest affections are entwined, & it is well with us to be afflicted, but woe if we harden our hearts & turn to the world for comfort, then the next blow from our Heavenly Father must be more severe to make us feel our risk in delaying repentance. I am told M<sup>rs</sup> Hodson is a most fond mother & this is the first death in her family of little ones. May the affections of all the rest follow it!

Tuesday [August] 6th M<sup>r</sup> Ropes has just heard of the arrival of his ship which he has known to be a fortnight beating about in the Baltic, with his Sister, a young lady, of 18 on board.<sup>703</sup> but she alas is detained there by reason of some neglect in the want of a signature to her Passport. her brother has been all today running from one person in authority to another in St Petersburg to explain the awkward situation of his Sister, & to petition that she may land, but in vain. and now as a last resource is to go to Sarsocella to ask Col Todds influence.

Wed [August] 7th <sup>704</sup> Our dear Debo has been an invalid for several days, or rather saved a fit of illness by a general eruption on her skin, M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand have been so kind as to come by turns to read aloud to her as she was not allowed to use her eyes. This afternoon M<sup>r</sup> W<sup>m</sup> Maingay came so that I was bound to entertain him, for variety my Sister & I went into the fruit garden with him, ate plenty of currants, raspberries & goose berries, just as we were turning to leave the tempting spot our landlady M<sup>rs</sup> Drury<sup>705</sup> came in, & invited us to look at the grapes, peaches, nectarines & apricots in the green house, they were touch-me-nots, tho enough to excite the desire to pull & eat. As we passed last out I slipped a silver peice to give the old gardener into his hand, & heard “Bladastie”<sup>706</sup> but did not expect the old man would prove his gratitude by more than words, he gave my little Willie a sweet nosegay for “Maminka”<sup>707</sup> a bunch of sweet cluster roses & a damask rose. And much as I prized the possession I was made glad by it a second time, when a friend of Whistlers out of health<sup>708</sup> called in the evening & I made over my prize to him in a bunch of sweet peas, Whistler had waited in town for American letters, so Debo was cheered by a long one from Jule & I had one from Mary & Eliza<sup>709</sup> each, but so many gentlemen came in to tea I had to put them in my pocket until after tea, it was tantalizing, but I could not have enjoyed reading them in a crowd & I had to do the honors to our unexpected guests. I have just done feasting on Stonington news, my dear brother & all but Mary were off for West Point. Oh how I should enjoy walking about there with dear Maria, I cannot believe a friend they write me is to be married upon the hasty engagement they say. J. D. P.<sup>710</sup> is too prudent for such a rash measure. I have many times today thought of this being the anniversary of our loss of dear Henry. it is four years since that bright youth was so suddenly taken from us at Springfield, but my anguish of spirit then tho softened into a settled sorrow can never be obliterated. The anniversaries of those loved ones who have gone before us into eternity are as tenderly noted by my memory as the birth days of the dear boys left me. I did not write it, but all day the 10th of last month the scene of that Sabbath morning when we all stood around my Kirxies dying bed was vividly before me, two years have already passed since then & the anniversaries of his own little Charlies birth & death are rapidly approaching. Oh that those spared to me may live prepared to die!

Thursday [August] 8th<sup>711</sup> My Sister & I went in the Calashe with Whistler to town to attend the last service for dear Miss Hirst, the church was hung with black, that is the Altar, Pulpit & pews for the mourners, the case of the coffin was dark blue embroidered with silver, her age 37<sup>712</sup> in silver characters, some one approached it soon after we were seated with a basket of fresh flowers & strewed them with care upon the coffin forming a garland I liked this mark of attention & thought of her love of flowers. M<sup>r</sup> Williams read the burial service in the church with solemn feeling. There were eight pall bearers & as we followed the sad train down the aisle I observed poor Elona dressed in black (wearing a neat mourning cap as servants in Russia do not wear bonnets) she was weeping most heartily, I really respected her grief & sympathised in it for I had long seen proofs of her attachment I extended my hand across the pew to where she was, she pressed it as tho she would fain cling to me. Oh may the lessons she has learned from her dear Mistress continue to remind her to trust in God. As our horses could not take us to the Island where the burial ground belonging to the English Church<sup>713</sup> is, my Sister & I stood upon the balcony of our lodgings on the Quai & watched the mournful procession cross the bridge. No one can tell how much I shall miss my visits to Miss Hirst. On reaching home I heard that M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrands Sister had arrived, M<sup>r</sup> Ropes had brought her from Cronstadt (for the Cols representation of his young countrywoman gained permission immediately for her introduction to S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg)<sup>714</sup> they took a boat to Strenla [siz]<sup>715</sup> where M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrands carriage met them, and when I went to our kind neighbours to welcome her, the three sisters<sup>716</sup> looked so happy together & Miss Martha Ropes so joyous frolicing after the little ones I told her she seemed to have forgotten all the annoyances of her voyage, “All but being marshalled up to the Governers house in Cronstadt with a soldier at her heels, that can never be forgotten, for the indignity had caused tears of mortification” she said also as she was detained two days after the ship had made that Port, they could not wait her uncertain departure to unload the cargo, & that the fleas from the bales of cotton skipped over the page she was reading.<sup>717</sup> She is very fair & very youthful in her appearance, she reminds me of Sarah Bliss.<sup>718</sup>

Saturday [August] 10th <sup>719</sup> My beloved Mothers birthday,<sup>720</sup> may God continue to her health & comfort. This also the anniversary of our loved Henrys funeral.<sup>721</sup> but I had to appear more engrossed with things present, than the past. Our letters to England & America were sent by the Courier today. We were writing all yesterday. Today M<sup>r</sup> Maingay & his son are to be our guests at dinner. The sun shines. I shall walk in the garden My landlord has just sent me in a present of a plate of Nectarines & Peaches from his Green house very acceptable & at the rate they sell here very valuable I should probably pay a paper ruble a peice, these with melons & as fine cherries as I ever saw will make our dessert fine.

Sunday [August] 11th <sup>722</sup> I arose at six oclock & thus gained time for reading, dressing & breakfasting to leave early for town. The weather so propitious that Debos wish to go to church was granted, we all went, the sun shone so bright & the air so clear I was sure it would continue fine as it did the whole day. I did not observe old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon<sup>723</sup> waiting at the church door to greet me, it would appear that the mantle of dear Miss Hirst has descended upon me, for so many thank me for my having resorted often to her sick room & notice me as they never did before, they little know what a privilege I esteemed it that I was permitted to approach that blessed Saint. Old M<sup>rs</sup> L whispered also the news which had just reached town of the death of the Grand Duchess Alexandrine, it had occurred the day before she had died in giving birth to an infant.<sup>724</sup> Not yet 19 years old, how early has closed her brilliant earthly career! Oh that the young would only lay it to heart, that “this world is but a fleeting show”.<sup>725</sup> I saw many in church as we were there half an hour before the time - who had not attended all summer. Among them the family of the little baby who was buried last wednesday.<sup>726</sup> I was glad also that the invalid brother of M<sup>r</sup> Miller <sup>727</sup> was there for his rheumatism has prevented his going to the house of God. I never listened to a more impressive discourse in all my life than M<sup>r</sup> Williams gave us from 1st Kings again, “Hast thou found me Oh mine Enemy?”<sup>728</sup> towards the conclusion he said, none but God could know how painful it was the Servant of God to denounce His judgements upon any, & then spoke of the comfort experienced by the faithful Pastor among the sick or dying who leaned on the sure hope in a risen Saviour, to whisper consolation to the departing soul of a believer, to hold out the promise of those joys “which eye hath not seen, or ear heard”<sup>729</sup> to tell of the golden crowns & golden harps & of that swell of harmony from the innumerable voices of that redeemed company who feel an eternal Sabbath not too long to sing the praise of Jesus. Oh how fervently our young preacher pleaded with us for Christs sake to be reconciled to God — After our cold dinner I collected the books & children for my sunday school, I had an addition to our number in two nice lads of the family who took possession of the empty house on this estate last week — I read first a Sermon for children & questioned them upon it, then made each of them read aloud to me from Scriptural Instruction for the least & the lowest,<sup>730</sup> & was delighted with the behaviour of the new comers W<sup>m</sup> & John Drury,<sup>731</sup> so much gentleness & reverence in their manner of reading. Before dismissing my little friends I regaled them with a dish of delicious cherries which had been kept in the ice house till almost like ices, then I gave them lessons to commit to memory for the next Sabbath. As little affectionate Alice Handisides<sup>732</sup> wished to stay to tea I kept her & her Sister,<sup>733</sup> Debo played some hymns for them for little Mary loves music dearly she says.

Monday [August] 12th I have just done writing of yesterday (as I never write on Sunday) & now will merely notice of today how changed the weather is, we have had steady rain all day. all the common signs for good weather from change of moon, rising of Barometer &c fail here this Summer. Dr Rogers<sup>734</sup> has been with Debo & I, he finds her quite recovered, & sat an hour to cheer her with news of the day, yet that most talked of is certainly of a sad nature, the funeral of the Grand Duchess, in preparation for it the camp is breaking up & the troops going to town. our road has been full all day. The royal infant is to be taken to Denmark to be buried & it is supposed the Prince of Hesse will soon return to Copenhagen. he is to receive the dowry & jewels of his wife, the former is one million silver rubles, the jewels also must be [sic] very valuable, so the Prince will return to his court richer in money at least than when he came for his royal bride.<sup>735</sup> As her death is the first that has occurred in the Imperial family since that of her Empress Aunt the wife of the Emperor Alexander<sup>736</sup> it is the first in twenty years! we feel interested to hear how her mother the present Empress bears it.

Tuesday [August] 13th <sup>737</sup> Showery all today, tho the sun shone long enough for us to call upon our new neighbours the Drurys, the family of the eldest son of our landlord. I was much pleased with the lady, who is niece to the Empres's late physician, they have ten children & a french governess,<sup>738</sup> we saw & pitied the little boy whose face was so mangled by the great black dog last Sat evening it is a mercy his eye is not seriously injured for it has marks of having been in the dogs mouth. When Whistler returned from town he reported having been to Sarsco to see the Col, he had a mind to remain in town tonight to witness the funeral procession by torch light. At this moment while I am so happy in listening to the voice of my dear daughter what grief there must be at the Palace, the body of that daughter & sister & young wife is to be removed this evening to its narrow bed, it leaves Sarsco at 8 o'clock & is to be deposited in the old Fortress Church on the Island opposite St Petersburg in the dead of night, it certainly would have been worth while to see so vast a procession moving by torch light,<sup>739</sup> but Whistler never voluntarily remains from home. he has to leave us too soon to go to Moscow. We walked in Our landlords garden during half an hours sunshine this evening & had a feast of ripe fruits goose berries, raspberries, strawberries & currants, & brought some in for the boys.

Wed [August] 14th <sup>740</sup> This is the 2nd Summer day I have felt in Russia, all nature seemed to rejoice in the sunshine. I took a long walk thro the woods with my Sister, we met some family groups in our stroll my heart warmed towards an old lady dressed in black, who was so delightedly noticing her little Grand child in a Russian nurses arms. We were just in time to dress for dinner when Whistler arrived, & also Col Bouttatz & M<sup>r</sup> Stockol, my husband brought a letter from England containing much sad news, the death of Woodcock Winstanley<sup>741</sup> & the extreme illness of M<sup>r</sup> Rob<sup>t</sup> Smith of Chaddock<sup>742</sup> The conversation in the drawing room of course turned upon the affliction of the Imperial family. the crowd which met them last evening at the gates was so great that the royal carriages could scarcely press their way thro, the Emperor was gratified by this manifestation of the sympathy of his subjects there was not any display in the conveying the corpse to the Fortress Church, it was only attended by the Imperial family. I am told the Emperors letter to his subjects<sup>743</sup> is very touching, indeed as well as can be judged of a man so elevated by station, his conduct is natural.<sup>744</sup> Of course there will be a court mourning.<sup>745</sup> Col B now has his silver epaulets covered with crape. All places of amusement are to be closed for six weeks, what a pity they should ever be opened, if they are improper now they are always dangerous for "in the midst of life we are in death"<sup>746</sup> It is impossible to know what report to credit as respects the state of mind the grand duchess left this world in, they are so contradictory some say she did not dream of dying, others that she often spoke of it.<sup>747</sup> I like to think it true that her English Governess<sup>748</sup> (who is said to be a most devoted christian) never left her, it is said her hair has turned grey from watching & anxiety, we hear that after the birth of the infant the grand duchess felt better than for many months & expressed a desire to be left to repose, her governess retired, but in about half an hour returned finding her dead! her screams brought in the Empress, who embracing her said “I hope at my death I may have as faithful a friend near, as you have continued to be to this dear child”<sup>749</sup> — The corpse of the infant is not with that of the mother, it is placed in the Lutheran Church until it can be taken to Denmark<sup>750</sup>

Thursday [August] 15th <sup>751</sup> Mr Ropes had letters by the G<sup>t</sup> Western yesterday. I had hoped for one but was dissappointed! Today at eleven oclock my beloved husband bade me adieu for another fortnights absence to go to Moscow — Debo & the boys went 7 versts with him to meet his travelling equipage. I tried to rejoice in the unusually fine weather, but my heart so oppressed with sadness refused, & I retired to find comfort in communion with my Heavenly Father, & in His word to seek direction. Oh that I could cast all my care upon Him, who pitieth my weakness & who knoweth all my wants! It accorded not with my sadness to dress for a dinner party today, but for Debos & Aunt Alicias enjoyment I fulfilled my engagement to M<sup>rs</sup> F Baird. Their country seat is one of the finest on this road,<sup>752</sup> I had no idea of meeting so many — for she had invited us sociably herself. We sat down to dinner about 20, M<sup>rs</sup> Law her three daughters & Mr Williams among the guests, - I should not have relished being as she was the senior & lady of honor to be handed in by Mr Halliday<sup>753</sup> the father of M<sup>rs</sup> Baird a silly old man who lives without God in the world & every day loses the little intellect he has in drink. his wife<sup>754</sup> has lately had a second stroke of apoplexy therefore was not of the party, but she alas! has lived only for this world & now tho they think she cannot recover, they studiously keep death from her view by encouraging hopes for this world which she cannot realize. We had a sumptuous entertainment, the courses handed round by the servants in Russian style,<sup>755</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Baird seems to have all the hospitality of our friend M<sup>rs</sup> Dickerson.<sup>756</sup> We adjourned to the Balcony after dinner for coffee & to enjoy the extensive view of the Gulf of Finland. A variety of exotics lined the sides of this piazza, M<sup>rs</sup> B complimented Debo by placing a bunch of Orange flowers in her hair.

Mr Williams made quite a playful attack upon my daughter about the report she had circulated against his love of music, she very amiably acknowledged she was the author! In the course of the evening I had a tête à tête with our young Pastor, very much to my satisfaction for in it he thanked me for the way in which I had closed his evening at our house, remarking he felt he could do no good in visiting unless he was acknowledged as a servant of Christ & he felt painfully that few circles realized that a clergyman was present even when he was invited to meet members of the Church. Now I trust my dear husband will not feel afraid of remarks upon our irregular proceedings if at the close of another evening I ask our pastor to lead our family devotions, for I know he wishes to honor God whenever a suitable occasion offers) Mr Williams gave me an interesting account of a stranger who arrived in St Petersburg only last tuesday (with her husband the Capt of a vessel from Montrose Scotland & who was left a widow on wednesday.<sup>757</sup> he had visited her several times & begged me to do so. I felt grateful again this evening to my dear Debo that she was not among the waltzers & tho our Rev<sup>d</sup> friend made no remark on the dancing I am sure she would not have retained his good opinion if she had been whirled among the giddy throng. M<sup>rs</sup> Baird & her brothers<sup>758</sup> sung some Russian songs to admiration & even he clapped his hands & encored. Afterwards when Debo at her request played, he said to me “Your daughter’s selection is so delightful & her modest discretion in choosing short peices so remarkably I must think you have advised her, to induce her listeners always to wish she would not so soon leave the instrument, it is like temperance at a feast, our taste is never cloyed, — I did not detract from my gentle daughters merit by assuming any of the credit, due only to her innate delicacy. Indeed tho I make no outward demonstration, none can admire her as I do always when she mingles among the fashionables here. knowing as I do her power to shine & win attention, I love to watch how unassuming she is compared to other young ladies We ordered our carriage when M<sup>rs</sup> Law did hers at 10 oclock altho all cried out against the early hour. M<sup>r</sup> Williams said in good old England it was deemed a reasonable time & laughingly told our hospitable hostess she must not hope he would learn to behave better!

Friday [August] 16th This day a year ago we left Boston! so much has marked the twelve months it seems a longer time, yet how rapidly it had fled! what have we done in our Saviours service? & what to conquer evil propensities? Oh that we might be wise to improve the days God may yet allot to us on earth, to prepare to follow those whom He has taken to eternity! Today I wrote to my Sister Eliza & M<sup>r</sup> Winstanley<sup>759</sup> as my husband had made me promise to do, about our carpets for the town house. The Gillebrands & Ropes<sup>760</sup> came to tea, the weather very warm, mosquitoes so tormenting, now that the evenings close in early we require candles & were therefore obliged in self defense to close the casements. This was the day of the Grand duchess funeral. it is said the Emperor was quite unmanned. It is also reported that the Prince of Hesse Castle, left in the Steamer with the corpse of his infant for Copenhagen.<sup>761</sup> It is said he has endowed a hospital with part of the rich dowry of his deceased wife,<sup>762</sup> yet his follies are still trumpeted, & the report of his boisterous orders that plenty of champagne & segars should be put among his sea stores is shocking to think of. we must charitably hope it is only a presumption.<sup>763</sup> “A good name is better than gold.”<sup>764</sup>

Sat [August] 17th As I was bound by two promises to visit in town today & my Sister wished also to call upon Miss Morgan<sup>765</sup> we drove thither notwithstanding the excessive heat & dust. As I had understood the funeral of Capt Roy was to be early, I might perhaps comfort his poor widow & tho a stranger I ventured into the hotel in the Galernia. usually resorted to by English Sea Captains.<sup>766</sup> I was not unwelcome to poor M<sup>rs</sup> Roy. “I have met with a heavy affliction” was her first remark to me, but God has sent the staff with the rod,<sup>767</sup> I trust it will prove for my good. perhaps I thought too much of my dear husband, he was a quiet man, I never heard him say a rough word to any one & he never uttered an oath as some do to his sailors” She told me afterwards that she had only been six months married, after a seven years engagement, her husband had not been well & that had induced her to embark with him, she often repeated how thankful she felt she had come to be with him at the last. she spoke of the merciful arrangement of Him who over rules all events in bringing also another Capt from Montrose to the same house, as she should now return in his vessel to her Sisters.<sup>768</sup> she told me her husband had suffered so much during his few hours illness that she was made willing to let the Saviour take him from her, said he had repeated the Paraphrase from Job (the 188th hymn in our prayer book) “Few are thy days &c<sup>769</sup> - & had told her if God prolonged his days, how differently he should live, (yet he was a good man! had brought up & educated several brothers,<sup>770</sup> his marriage had been retarded that he might first work for them) When dying he repeated the 23rd Psalm!<sup>771</sup> I wished the poor bereaved widow to promise to go home with me after the funeral for it did not take place till two hours after my interview with her) I knew in our quiet life she might be undisturbed & thought the rural scenes around us might accord with her feelings, but arrangements were making for her going back to her husbands vessel, she knew all his crew,<sup>772</sup> they had loved him, they were from Montrose & she had much to do for her voyage, so while she seemed grateful, she was firm in declining my proposal. I am sure I shall never lose the sweet impressions the converse of this widow made upon me, her simplicity, her deep piety, her gentle submission to the will of Him who cannot err! I went to comfort, & instead received counsel to be treasured up against time of need, her Scotch accent & her bible language made it seem like some tale of Lights & Shadows of Scottish life,<sup>773</sup> but it was to her a sad reality! Only last sunday they had made the port of Cronstadt in one short week how much she had been called upon to endure! My Sister said much to strengthen the faith of this humble christian & our tears flowed while she wiped away her own as tho she dreaded making a display of her grief, to which at first tears had refused relief. We watched the funeral of the stranger as it wound its way across the bridge, while we stood upon our balcony at the English quai. My Sister preferred remaining there as she had a book, to crossing with me in a small boat to call on M<sup>rs</sup> Hirst. I had an opp- of gladdening another poor body without much trouble, a poor Russian girl was just seating herself in another boat, when seeing me she without ceremony sprung beside me the boat man would have lifted her back to her place, had I not said “Nee chee voo”,<sup>774</sup> and when paying my own ferriage, I told her “Nee naa da”<sup>775</sup> as she was about to offer her 10 kopeecks copper<sup>776</sup> & settled for hers at the same time, she could hardly refrain from embracing me, such trifles are favors to the poor! she no doubt was a servant of the lowest order & had been to the police to have her passport renewed,<sup>777</sup> as she held it in her hand, she followed me thanking me in Russ as far as she could. I had my hot walk for nothing M<sup>ES</sup> Hirst not returned from the country. As we had Marys trunk<sup>778</sup> to take home in our Calashe, we could not call on Miss Morgan. she was right glad to receive it, & the boys brought one old thing after another for me to look at which had been thrown in when we were leaving Stonington Ah how keenly nursery scenes there presented themselves, No one knows how much I yet miss that little one whose soft voice memory brings to my ear the sweetest music to my heart.

Sunday [August] 18th <sup>779</sup> We drove so early to church, that we might accommodate M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes with a seat to Chapel, that I had a half hour to read before the congregation assembled. M<sup>r</sup> Williams preached from the 1st lesson, that beautiful history of Naaman, his text 12th verse of 5th chap of 2nd Kings,<sup>780</sup> he applied it most plainly & forcibly to his hearers. I have not seen so full a congregation this summer. The Harrisons met us after church, I was glad to find them regular worshippers among us & begged them also to attend M<sup>r</sup> Williams preaching at Alexandrofski.<sup>781</sup> In the afternoon I had as usual my Sunday school collected in my parlor, I was most delighted with the new comers as my Willie calls the little Drurys next door. they had their bible recitation so perfect & read in their turn so attentively, I kept them to tea, as I did the little inattentive Normans, for I wish to give them happy associations of the sabbath day kept as it ought to be, not as they have been accustomed to keep it. In the evening Debo read aloud one of Blunts sermons to Aunt Alicia & I, Mary too came in.

Monday [August] 19th <sup>782</sup> I have quite forgotten to note down my refreshing baths (at Drurys bath house in the wood opposite where there is a pond, this hot week past, but this morning being cloudy I did not go, we however ventured to set out to spend the day at the Harrisons notwithstanding the threatenng of rain. We took Mary & the boys, leaving Fedor to take care of the house, the ride to Alexandrofski did not prove as interesting as it was agreable, for it was just a succession of manufactories and little log houses after the bounds of St P.<sup>783</sup> but the road was good & the weather not too hot, the Harrisons gave us a cordial welcome they had feared rain would prevent our visit. What a delightful house is theirs!<sup>784</sup> so spacious & well built, we admired the pretty view up the Neva from the balcony of their drawing room, there is also water at the side of the house, for their extensive garden rises from the borders of a canal, we walked there eating fruit, until the sun shone out in his full strength at noon & drove us in. I took a fancy to dear little Annie Harrison, she looks like a dark eyed sister of Johnny Barns<sup>785</sup> might, for she reminded us of him, & me she made think of Kirkie, such splendid eyes & forehead, rich dark ringlets and she is just the age he was when I lost him. Oh what a picture she was when she fell asleep at dinner, her bonnie cheek resting upon her arm, her unusual exercise with the boys in the garden had quite overpowered her, I stole away from the drawing room in the afternoon to look at her as she still slept on the sofa in the dining room. After M<sup>r</sup> H had taken my boys to see M<sup>r</sup> Winans at the works, we ladies were induced to accept his offer to shew us how they make Locomotives. It proved very interesting, certainly the Emperor will be much gratified when he visits them<sup>786</sup> & sees all the improvements the Americans are making in his government iron works, so many fine machines they have imported from the U States & from England. M<sup>r</sup> Winans pointed out some of the American mechanics which have come over to join this establishment, they all looked well & are contented .<sup>787</sup> We went down to the lower regions where they melt the iron & waited to see the process of running it into the moulds for wheels &c. My Sister grew frightened & scampered off not knowing the men were bound for that very end of the building We had a hearty laugh at her expense when we observed them following her with the red hot liquid hemming her up in a corner while they poured it into the moulds ‘alls well that ends well’<sup>788</sup> she good humouredly joined in the mirth. We were introduced to M<sup>r</sup> Kirk (the lately married) he did not look like a gallant bride groom in this dirty region, but he said he had known our dear George as a lad in Lowell<sup>789</sup> & I promised to call upon his wife when next I go to Alexandrofski, they occupy the house at the opposite side of the works corresponding with the Harrisons, Winans keeps batchelors hall in one story, certainly they have much to make their home in Russia delightful, Neva water conducted to every part of their houses, bath rooms, hot houses & all such luxuries. I urged them all to begin as they ought to go on with regard to the Sabbath, which is so seldom hallowed here, and to lead all their English & American mechanics to attend the service at the School room It certainly is the duty of each one of us, from the home of the Pilgrims to let our light shine, that those who dwell in darkness may learn to respect the commandments of God. The great work for each individual (no matter what the earthly calling of each) should be winning souls to Christ, & we find this work to perform by precept & example here. On our drive home we admired the splendour of the setting sun & the ruby colored sky, our party prophesied a fair day tomorrow, but I thought this summer all old signs had failed. Jemmy kept up a conversation in Russ with the coachman. little Willie tho buttoned up to the throat in his English great coat, crept under my good grey cloak for the air was chill & the vapours overhanging the fields & woods made them look as if covered with hoarfrost. We have only a few nights this summer dispensed with a blanket, tonight we need one.

Tuesday [August] 20th A raw cloudy morning, settling into rain. M<sup>r</sup> Curtis stopped just at our dinner time, I concluded he would join us sans ceremonie at our family meal as he had done before, & spend the afternoon in hearing Debo play & hurried preparations accordingly, but he came to bid goodbye, as he expects to take the Steamer next Sat<sup>790</sup> for Lubec, not to return this year from England! the old gentleman likes Russian society & regrets leaving it. I quite forget to say that last week we were very early surprised by a visit from a M<sup>r</sup> Robertson,<sup>791</sup> who as a graduate of West Point had claims upon Whistler tho he brought him no letters. he breakfasted with us. last Sat<sup>792</sup> he left for England to return to the U States. Dear little Willie had his little Russian cronies in to spend the afternoon Sarschinka & Varscha<sup>793</sup> & he got up a Russian play by inspiration. Aunt A & Sister & Mary were presented with tickets, while Jemmie was writing a note to M<sup>r</sup> Hadenskoug on his birth day,<sup>794</sup> poor fellow! I dare say he thinks of many a happy birth day under his own roof & now he is dependent on us for kindness, Jemmie loves him sincerely & gratefully I suppose his partiality to this Swede, makes him espouse his countrys cause & admire the qualities of Charles 12th so greatly to the prejudice of Peter the G<sup>t</sup>. he has been quite enthusiastic while reading the life of this king of Sweden this summer aloud to me. & too willing to excuse his errors.<sup>795</sup>

Wednesday [August] 21st <sup>796</sup> A very fine bright day, our boys rejoiced in their anticipated pleasure for this afternoon, we had invited

Martha Ropes to lunch with us, the Mr Millers also arrived from town by noon, our repast was enjoyed as a dinner for we were bent upon an excursion for some hours. But for our meeting so many troops within the last few versts of Peterhoff<sup>797</sup> we should have found the ride most agreeable, passing so many noble estates & palaces belonging to the Russian nobility,<sup>798</sup> it is supposed 40.000 troops were on this road today at the breaking up of the camp. some ordered to Barracks in St P others going to Peterhoff. we left them at its gates<sup>799</sup> & went immediately to the gardens, the imperial family being at the Palace<sup>800</sup> we could not see the inside of that, but it was pleasanter walking thro the extensive grounds, for they abound in beautiful objects & the fountains are perhaps the finest in the world, whenever the Emperor is at Peterhoff they are playing, the source must be inexhaustible for the reservoir at the entrance is supplied from the gulf of Finland.<sup>801</sup> I wish I could describe these gardens to convey some of the pleasure I enjoyed. The old Palace is situated rather elevated & the water descends in sheets over steps, all the heathen deities preside,<sup>802</sup> Jemie was delighted with the figure of Sampson tearing open the jaws of the Lion from which ascended a jet stream 100 feet high<sup>803</sup> he was diverted at the fencing of some of the gilded figures with water,<sup>804</sup> indeed which ever way we strolled we saw novelties the bath house painted within & without in the most fanciful yet chaste manner, its fountain in the centre, ropes covered with scarlet cloth all around it, the descent to the water by an inclined plain, sofas in the rooms at the end of the house for taking siestas after bathing, preparations were making for some of the ladies of the Court to bathe, a footman came with sheets & towels, we took the hint & retired.<sup>805</sup> I was most charmed by the Summer house<sup>806</sup> as it is called down on the border of the Gulf, it is encircled at the back by a most beautiful flower garden, & the view of the extensive sheet of water is enchanting, perhaps Peter here watched his fleet in its infancy, he built this retreat for himself, but after his death his daughters indulged their taste by adding many magnificent suites of apartments, he only had use for a few, his kitchen where he is said to have cooked all his own meals adjoining the room where he slept which looks out upon the gulf. there are some fine pictures,<sup>807</sup> but Peters own paintings of the feathered race<sup>808</sup> ought to be most highly prized tho our Jemie was so saucy as to laugh at them. I dare say our boys will not forget the dirty flannel night cap upon the pillows of Peter the G<sup>t</sup>.<sup>809</sup> A very fine carving in Ivory of Catherine being presented to Peter for the first time, is well worth examining.<sup>810</sup>

Thursday [August] 22nd.<sup>811</sup> The weather was propitious, but we had put off our excursion to Lake Ladoga until Whistlers return, no news from him yet! how much we miss his arrival from town every evening! No letters yesterday as we had hoped from Boston, but on our return from Peterhoff Mary handed us two, which M<sup>r</sup> Ropes himself had brought, one proved from Emma Maingay<sup>812</sup> the other from M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell to my husband, he was at Hamburg,<sup>813</sup> so well & in such good spirits I think he would not disapprove of our opening his favor as it contributed to our cheerfulness. The Gellibrands came this evening bringing a Miss Goodenough,<sup>814</sup> a lover of music. Debos harp never was in such perfect tune, M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes played duetts with her I dont know when their music has so charmed me, especially the sacred melodies “Thy will be done” and “Thou meet’st me where’er I go”,<sup>815</sup> pleased all. For my own part it is a cause of regret to me whenever I hear foolish words set to music, it ought always to elevate the feelings & no matter how melodious the air, I cannot enjoy what seems in direct opposition to the warning of our Saviour upon “idle words”.<sup>816</sup> My darling wish is, that if my dear James & Willie acquire any proficiency in music, they may contribute to the praise of God in public worship.

Sat [August] 24th Miss Morgan<sup>817</sup> came by 12 oclock in M<sup>rs</sup> Bairds<sup>818</sup> carriage from town to pass the day sociably with us, the old lady<sup>819</sup> had declined accompanying her, as a ride of ten versts to & fro she feared would unfit her for attending Church & the communion the next day. (How proper to make the last day of the week a day of preparation for the first! I was sorry M<sup>r</sup> Morgan<sup>820</sup> did not come until the meat was removed from table, especially as I had wished him to taste a great rarity among Russian vegetables (our Squash or Simlin,<sup>821</sup> our landlord had sent me in a present of “vegetable marrow” from his hot beds, but M<sup>r</sup> M is out of health, so calves foot jelly was just right for him, Debo had been invited to quite a dinner party at the Gellibrands & she wished to meet Miss Allen<sup>822</sup> the neice of Sir William A but could not leave our two guests without rudeness until, after she had contributed to entertain them, when we were at tea, she was excused & on her return at 10 o'clock told me she had been charmed by Miss Allens unaffected sweetness & intelligence, joined to her talent for music, she sings scotch & spanish songs.

Monday [August] 26th <sup>823</sup> I waited till late Sat evening in the hopes my dear Whistler might come home as he had not written, ere I sent a note to invite Miss Forester<sup>824</sup> to take a seat in our carriage to go to church, she gratefully accepted, as she wished to hear Mr Williams & yesterday was his last sermon. The church was filled in consequence, many were there who had not been the whole summer before! indeed he has so faithfully pointed out the sin of lukewarmness, that by degrees we have observed the number of his hearers increasing. He took his text from 2nd Corinthians 3rd chap 9th verse,<sup>825</sup> and introducing his subject by exalting the profession of a minister of the gospel, he most solemnly dwelt upon his duties as a clergyman of the Church & as if standing before the judgement seat of Christ asked the awful question had he been faithful to his charge? his own voice faltered often, & not many eyes were dry, his quotations from scripture were as they always are most forcible, the bible is his foundation always, therefore who can oppose the truths he advances. there were also an unusual number of communicants. I spoke to Mrs Law after service she was in deep mourning. she told me the death of her husbands mother<sup>826</sup> had put an end to his travels thro G<sup>t</sup> Britian & that we must expect him immediately to return to St Peters As we drove home Miss F — thanked me over & oft for taking her to church, she said she never heard such a sermon in her life, it had not been her will to stay from the house of God all Summer! how sorry I felt that she had to meet a dinner party in the afternoon thus to commemorate the 4th birth day of the only child spared her cousin,<sup>827</sup> was not to deserve the blessing. I wished in my heart I could send the vol of Legh Richmonds containing his simple lines on the 4th birth day of his little boy,<sup>828</sup> so appropriate, & which might offer to the worldly mother some valuable admonition for her boys happiness. And now that I have noticed the Lords day which has become my holiday from earthly cares, I will touch upon the pleasant afternoon we have had today (I forgot to note last friday, I drove to the city with my Sister to pay some calls, & at Mrs Woods was invited to take my family to meet hers at the gardens of Katrineoff<sup>829</sup> today. Mrs Gellibrands party also went, and our pastor Mr Williams soon joined us there, the sun shone upon us, as we sauntered about the pretty grounds admiring the serpentine streams flower beds & green grass (for the incessant rains have kept even this favorite resort so near the city quite verdant) We went into the old palace said to have been built by Peter the G<sup>t</sup>, himself<sup>830</sup> and certainly examined many of his attempts at the arts & sciences<sup>831</sup> within it, some very old & beautiful embroidery<sup>832</sup> we admired, but most of all its curiosities a chinese cabinet of ivory inlaid<sup>833</sup>. the hangings<sup>834</sup> thro out the apartments are of Peters time his spirit of economy might be a lesson, as it forms a striking contrast to the profusion of the present time. On our return to the Summer house where Mrs Wood rents a parlour<sup>835</sup> (that she may afford her children the range of these convenient grounds every afternoon) we found a large table set covered with sweet meats, fruits, home made bread & butter, tea & coffee, I had time for a nice chat with our hostess & friends before we assembled at the plentiful board, & was allowed to depart with my little boys & Aunt Alicia immediately after. Debo remained under Mrs Gellibrands wing, & on her reaching home made me congratulate myself upon having avoided a disquisition upon the Athanasian Creed<sup>836</sup> & also some stern remarks upon M<sup>r</sup>. Moleneux<sup>837</sup> view of the Lenten fast & Regeneration.<sup>838</sup> I always feel that our blessed Saviour precepts are so plain that he who runneth may read & that if we walk humbly as to our own merits, looking to Him as the author & finisher of our salvation “fulfilling all righteousness”<sup>839</sup> we may be saved without diving into mysteries, and these questions are so seldom without bitterness that I dread them. I certainly have enjoyed much christian fellowship with the Gellibrands, tho they are not of our church, & I have also felt refreshed & edified in listening to the gospel as preached by Mr Williams these three months past. In heaven all these walls will be broken down, we shall be one in Christ Jesus —

Tuesday [August] 27th <sup>840</sup> I have counted the days lately & in communings with my own spirit have thought of this day twelve months ago when we had our dear George with us on board the Acadia & I so fondly listened to my darling Charlie as he would answer to all who asked him of his birth day — “Charlie is two years old today.” And do I weep selfishly this anniversary that he is not still at my side? Oh no! I have learned to be quite reconciled to my loss, not that time has rendered the impression of my anguish at closing that dear babys<sup>841</sup> in death less acute, but faith thro which I see him rejoicing in his Saviours love comforts me. there is a chord in a mothers heart of such exquisite tenderness which as it vibrates to memory awakening is so of mingled pleasure & pain, of fondness & sorrow that none but a mother who has outlived a darling child can understand it. Sometimes it seems a burning spot of intense love in my heart. But as my Heavenly Father called home both my darlings on His own holy day of rest, every sabbath becomes to me an anniversary of their new birth. Thus also has the first day of every year become a consecrated day to me, when our Heavenly Parent took back one He had lent us for fifteen years even our bright & darling Joe. Praise be to Him for calling our affections from this world of toil & anxiety to rest with Him upon the many anniversaries of affliction which have thus been rendered good for us. My only wish is that all left us may so pass the time of their sojourning here that they may be faithful unto the end for Christ, labouring for Him in the world, not of the world.

Wed [August] 28th <sup>842</sup> When Debo proposed to me yesterday that we should avail of an invitation from Col Todd to pass the day at Tsarskoe Selo as when Whistler is here we cannot use the horses without interfering with his daily visits to town, I determined to yeild to her wishes that we might gratify Aunt Alicia with a sight of the Parks about the Palace in all their verdure, so we ordered the Calashe notwithstanding Coachers dread that 21 versts would be too much for our ponies. Willie took his seat at his side on the box & his prattle in Russ always charms poor Péotre. After turning out of the cross road into the turnpike we found ourselves in a beautiful avenue of Linden trees with noble mile stones<sup>843</sup> like monuments, on this route we passed some of the neatest villages I have seen in this country, the gable end of the log cottages facing the road is generally carved & painted,<sup>844</sup> & on either side the turnpike (which must be the original Imperial road to Tsarskoe before the railroad was built, indeed still preferred by the Empress) there is also a private country road along by the villages so that the avenue is very broad, we observed the peasants all in their holiday suits & many hurrying to church (for there are gorgeous Greek churches at suitable points of access wherever we drive) It was the Anniversary of the Virgin

Marys death!<sup>845</sup> I wonder what chronicler informs them — even all the children seemed to have at least a new shirt or frock, and we could see into the cottages young maidens braiding each others hair & tying the large bow of ribbons at the end of the braid which hangs down the back & of which the [sic] look so proud. I wish I could draw a sketch of the classic stone fountain<sup>846</sup> we passed just as we were turning out of this avenue to wind upwards into another leading into Tsarskoe, nothing in this country which the Emperor is likely to come in sight of can be built without his approving the style, so we find even the stone wells on these public roads are classic. On arriving at the Cols it was only 12 o'clock, his reception was flatteringly cordial, his carriage had been waiting upon us some hours, so we soon stepped into it & drove thro the beautiful grounds belonging to the New Palace,<sup>847</sup> within which is the Armoury,<sup>848</sup> there we alighted, the first object which rivetted my attention was a little visiter standing on the porch a beautiful black eyed boy! Willie said as I stooped to kiss the stranger “he looks like Andrea doesn’t he Mother?” and so said Aunt Alicia, but my heart whispered Oh so much more as my own Kirkie used to! and James discovered that the resemblance was to that “bright eyed” brother, so much more refined in beauty than Andrea. I could have lingered long beside him, but who ever he been [sic] brought there by called him off, as did the Col us at the same instant. My boys will not forget the suits of Armor in such variety of different countries, but especially those two which had been worn by the Emperor Nicholas & his eldest son the Grand Duke Alexander,<sup>849</sup> also the immense gun which it is the Emperors pride to handle so dexterously in going thro the exercises.<sup>850</sup> We saw some noble horses the veritable skins stuffed to appear like life,<sup>851</sup> one which had belonged to Tipoo Saib with a figure wearing his own armor placed upon his saddle.<sup>852</sup> An old helmet taken from Herculaneum<sup>853</sup> excited some wonder tho not for its beauty, and the massive lock upon one of the doors was pointed out by our guide as a great curiosity, known to be at least two thousand years old & taken from Jerusalem it is a ponderous but by no means rough specimen of mechanism.<sup>854</sup> Debo long gazed thro her glass & admired the accoutrements for an equestrian covered with diamonds presented to the present Emperor, those from Mahmoud in 1833 most gorgeous, but the other said to be the gift of the Pascha of Persia the saddle cloth lilac showered over with diamonds looked most brilliant, scabbard, stirrups, girths &c of each glittering with these priceless stones.<sup>855</sup> I should be laughed at in the Court of earthly Princes if I expressed a wish that the value of these might be transferred to the Missionary fund, instead of being shut up in glass cases to excite envy & amazement. My little Jemmie [sic] heart was sad as in examining other glass cases, he discovered swords which had been taken in the battles between Czar Peter & Charles 12th he knew from their rich hilts set in pearls & precious stones they must have belonged to noble Swedes.<sup>856</sup> Oh! he exclaimed I'd rather have one of these than all the other things in this armory, how beautiful they are!" The noble circular hall in the centre of the building which was formerly a palace, used in Alexanders time to be used as a banquetting hall, it is lighted from the roof,<sup>857</sup> we saw what used to be the sleeping apartment of the Empress of this late Emperor, for this was her favorite abode,<sup>858</sup> probably because too small for state, as we find the Imperial family now prefer their new Palace from this reason that they can live retired in it. We were told we could not enter that, as the room the favorite Grand duchess so lately occupied is being fitted up as an Oratory,<sup>859</sup> an especial service is to be performed in it on the return of the Court to Tsarskoe Selo,<sup>860</sup> probably prayers offered up for her soul? Ah when will the time arrive when all these errors will be done away with in the Greek Church "There is no repentance in the grave"<sup>861</sup> thro Eternity the soul must be as it leaves this world of trial! We did not propose gaining admittance into the Catherine Palace as we had been thro it with the Col on our former visit, & that also was undergoing a thorough refreshing for the Grand Duke Alexanders family soon to return to.<sup>862</sup> We had enough in the extensive grounds to interest my Sister, the serpentine streams, lakes (with snowy swans) & fountains, the water brought from a great distance,<sup>863</sup> the Chinese bridge with Chinese men & women keeping it<sup>864</sup> delighted our boys most, but they were willing to be driven home with the Col & Aunt A for a luncheon at 2 oclock, while Debo & I went to call on a friend of M<sup>rs</sup> Maingays<sup>865</sup> We were told the governess Miss M<sup>c</sup> Lean<sup>866</sup> was in, she was delighted to see Debo & I was as much delighted with her, Among the many agreeable ladies I have become acquainted with here, I have given the palm to three English governesses<sup>867</sup> for elegance, affability & intellectual adornments, this young lady so gentle & refined, is the bosom friend of Eliza Maingay, her politeness must spring from piety then or Eliza would not select her, in conversation with her time slipped away, until as we were rising to go Madame O Lainy<sup>868</sup> carriage was heard, just as we were moving to go, with regret at not seeing her she arrived, & Oh how pleased I felt we had not missed her, she is quite an invalid for all the sashes were closed ere she dared enter into the drawing room, she is about my own age, has one young daughter<sup>869</sup> to whom Miss M<sup>c</sup> L is governess. Oh how delightful a woman is Madame O Lainy! she reminds me somewhat of my dear friends Henriet & Alwina<sup>870</sup> in manner speaks English just as they do, she hopes to be our neighbour in town<sup>871</sup> & I am glad of it, for her character is that of a most benevolent lady & as she is in deep mourning for her husband<sup>872</sup> & out of health herself, we shall not meet dissipation within her doors, the fine paintings in her rooms exhibit a most refined taste, she has the remains of great beauty herself.<sup>873</sup> The Col expressed himself alarmed by our long absence & was just on the point of going himself to look for us when we returned to his house. I was somewhat annoyed that he had deemed it necessary to entertain us to have a dinner party in preparation for us, two gents had fortunately been engaged but three met us at five o'clock. One was a Russian Gen<sup>l</sup> who spoke English,<sup>874</sup> tho he did not avail himself of it to say much to any one. Madame O Lainys nephew<sup>875</sup> also spoke our language & made himself very agreeable, but the Capt of the Chevalier Guards<sup>876</sup> who sat next Debo tho he spoke only french was the greatest acquisition to the party, he had so much vivacity & politeness, the Col also felt himself bound to address him in the Court language! it was to me really ridiculous that he would interpret every speech he made, to me. I at last told him that I understood french tho I wanted confidence in attempting to speak The Col proposed in french drinking the Emperors health in champagne, which not even the Russian Gen<sup>l</sup> who declined wine, could refuse & even I put my glass to my lips tho I, invariably refuse, for I did not know if it might not be misconstrued into disrespect & for Whistlers sake I went thro the motions, this encouraged my little boys & they presented their glasses to be filled, and forgetting at their little side table the guests at ours, Willie in his glee called out aloud "Santé à l'Empereur" the Capt clapped his hands with delight & afterwards addressed the little

American in french, all at the table laughed & called the boys “bon sujets.” I had wished to be at home by eight oclock, the Cols arrangements frustrated my intention & when he urged that we would take a short drive of 20 minutes to Pavloski<sup>877</sup> that Debo might hear the bands of music I could not deny her the gratification, so we again took possession of his carriage after coffee & he drove with one of the young Gents, the boys were told by the Chasseur (who always of course takes his place behind the Cols equipage) as we drove thro the town & the soldiers doffed their caps to the carriage, that they were paying honors to him, to his green feather he ought to have said, but the truth is the Chasseur as readily as Miller<sup>878</sup> adopt all the consequence of our Ambassador himself & are divertingly happy in their conceits, tho they do provoke Madmoiselle Whistler by their airs, I do not mind them as they are remarkably attentive to us. Our short drive was really enchanting Tsarskoe is certainly the neatest place I ever saw in my life, not a stone out of place, the head gardener of the Imperial Grounds has also the supervision of the whole town<sup>879</sup> it is related of him that one of the Imperial family once found fault with his want of neatness in the Parks. he was alarmed! not a leaf was allowed to remain on the nicely sanded walks! no but he had forgotten spittoons!<sup>880</sup> But of our drive, it was shady just before entering the fairy scene at Pavloski<sup>881</sup> for the evergreens are of an enormous size, the rail road extends this far & by the 7 oclock train from St Petersburg the garden becomes filled, green benches are placed in every direction Hermans band (a famous German band)<sup>882</sup> plays alternately with a fine military band, Jemie liked the latter best, Sister the former, as to little Willie he unconsciously marched or danced as either measure was played, the Pavilion was being hung with variagated lamps, but we only were beguiled into lingering a half hour. Our own horses being quite refreshed, were ready for a start when we reached the Cols again. but Miller had tea ready & we must accept the refreshment, tho I thought proper to decline the loaf of home made bread just from the oven which he knew was a greater treat than plum cake to those who are only “bakers clients”. We had a full moon to light us upon our road, the peasants were all assembled before their doors in groups this holiday evening singing their own peculiar glees, or dancing, I was so in hopes to find my gude mon at home, but was disappointed.

Wednesday [August] 28th 883 Such a rainy day! we did not budge out, letters arrived from Boston to cheer us after our early dinner, but had not dear Sarah Adams sent me one I should have felt myself quite neglected by the loved circle of relatives across the brook, my brother had written Whistler<sup>884</sup> & I opened his letter, but it was so hurriedly written that my name was not even mentioned. All were well at both houses,<sup>885</sup> Charles, Soph, Kingsley & wife<sup>886</sup> added to the dear circle, there was cause for thankfulness, tho my heart was so full I wished for a place to hide myself away to weep. Neither Mother or Sisters had thought it worth while to fill the blank pages my brother had sent! In the midst of my sadness I was summoned to the parlor to entertain William Maingay, & moreover we were engaged to tea at the Gellibrands. I can exert myself where others are depending upon my efforts, so I trust I was not deficient either in acts of kindness at home or at our neighbours, we had our own round table surrounded at home for the childrens, & for M<sup>r</sup> Ms refreshment first & at eight oclock he attended us to the next estate, & kept his poor horses & Coachman waiting in the road until eleven that he might not be the first to leave the friendly circle. No one guessed how sad was my heart. I had not heard from Whistler either, & he gone a fortnight.

Thursday [August] 29th 887 My dear mother has often found “the darkest hour of the 24 is that preceeding day light”<sup>888</sup> in her many vicissitudes, and I find the old adage arising when anxieties are removed from my mind thro the merciful providence of God. Debo had very kindly read to me from her three letters from dear Jule, Mary Swift<sup>889</sup> & Sarah Adams what might interest me & also another just received from Emma, & I sympathised in her joy at such proofs of affection. I was writing this poor scrawl of a journal - which it is well is almost ended - when Mary came in saying “Oh Ma’am be happy ! M<sup>r</sup> Whistler has come! how delighted I was to kiss his sunburnt cheek & to hear he had been quite well, tho only one night in bed, he had one day walked 7 versts & rode 47 over such bogs! yet he looked as tho he had undergone all his labours cheerfully. M<sup>r</sup> Fairbanks returned in his carriage as he went, we soon had a cold cut ready with a fine musk melon out of the ice to refresh them. Whistler dismissed the jaded horses & muddy equipage, and soon our Péotre was in readiness to drive M<sup>r</sup> F to town as he was impatient to get the American letters he felt must be awaiting him. I always feel interested in his wife & children,<sup>890</sup> & hope he has good news to cheer his heart, he so often is home=sick & Pittsfield<sup>891</sup> is so far off! The Gellibrands came to tea in number about 7. Whistler was quite a lion, all so rejoiced to have my gude mon back again — by chance I found my chair close to his while M<sup>rs</sup> G & ourselves were in an eager discussion about the Sandwich Islands, we ladies hoping Queen Pomare might not be deserted in her need by Queen Victoria<sup>892</sup> — when M<sup>r</sup> G moved his seat to the side of his dear good wife & we involuntarily joined in the laugh which was raised against us by the Spinsters for being such Darbys & Joans!<sup>893</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Ropes declared he was the only disinterested man in the room. Yet after tea he took his usual station at his little wifes side to turn the leaves of her music book while she played duetts with Debo, or accompanied her harp. The Misses Wilks<sup>894</sup> also are fine musicians, and Whistlers flute was brought into the concert, what a pity all votaries of pleasure, would not have such resources at home! as my good husband, daughter & M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes played there's no place like home<sup>895</sup> on piano, harp & flute my heart sung with them, for my feelings were attuned to the truth of the sentiment. I was indulged at the close of the evening with my favorite Sacred melodies, & after our guest left us, we read the 1st chap of 1st Corinthians<sup>896</sup> & knelt around the family altar, my heart overflowing with thankfulness & love to our Heavenly Father for all His mercies.

Friday Sept 13th <sup>897</sup> How glad Whistler was to welcome his young friend Maxwell to St Petersburg the day before yesterday!<sup>898</sup> I rode to town with my dear husband whose only inducement for going was to meet him, in my heart I participated in the satisfaction of both on their embracing after a three months separation.<sup>899</sup> how entirely the health of M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell is reestablished! he too expressed great pleasure at finding us looking so well, he promised after paying his respects to M<sup>r</sup> Gibson our Consul,<sup>900</sup> to follow us out to dinner, we waited until 4 oclock, until 1/2 after & then sat down hopeless of his coming little Willie had been dressed & on the look out for his friend an hour & continually asked why he did not come as he promised, at last he did arrive,<sup>901</sup> I welcomed him home & regretted his not joining us at dinner, he took out his watch (it had not been regulated since he left Hamburg so of course we had a laugh at his expence he set it by Whistlers, & I went out to order him a beef steak. How happy Le Rond looked as he bowed to me in the vestibule, to be in the service again of his young master!<sup>902</sup> And how delighted my boys were to be on each side of their kind friend! we persuaded him to send the carriage back to town & take up his quarters for the night under our roof. he was not unwilling, provided he should not incommode us — if he had peeped in the nursery he would have been amused at the close stowing there, Aunt Alicia gladly gave up her room to him for she at once liked her countryman,<sup>903</sup> and she insisted that I should let her sleep with Willie, we allowed the boys to sit up till nine oclock that they might participate in our enjoyment. I fear they rather annoyed M<sup>r</sup> M for they both crept on his knees to watch his countenance while he told his travels, how charming the recital! we each longed to follow his advice & go the same route thro Prussia, Germany, France &c. He afterwards opened a box & presented me with some beautiful steel ornaments he had bought at Munich, he also gave the boys keep sakes & stocked Whistler with cigars.<sup>904</sup> Debo has had the youngest daughter of D<sup>r</sup> Law passing a week with her, Emily<sup>905</sup> & herself had amused themselves during the morning in making riddles of the names of all their acquaintance in S<sup>t</sup> P. they silyly added M<sup>r</sup> Maxwells to the list & gave them out to be solved at the tea table, which occasioned some merriment. I have not observed my dear husband so cheerful for a great while he played accompaniments on the piano, ending with Irish airs on the bag pipes. I persuaded Debo to close her concert with some sacred music that our minds might be attuned to Gods word & to prayer. I know not what our young friend felt at kneeling again at our family altar, but I hope he was grateful to God who had restored him in health to us after perils by sea. Yesterday when we assembled at breakfast I persuaded him not to go to town & also told Emily Law we could not send her home in the rain. so Whistler went alone. The sun came out gloriously, after my dear boys reading to me they went fishing with M<sup>r</sup> M, about noon the young ladies followed them, taking some currant bun for all to eat in the wood. About 2 hours after I heard James shouting forth his excitement & soon perceived a cart full Debo, & Emily seated on a log inside the rough vehicle, M<sup>r</sup> M at the back & our boys hitched on at the sides, James mirth had arisen from his “skoray”ing<sup>906</sup> the poor driver, & Sister begging him to go slowly over the jolting road. Whistler by way of a treat came home to dinner at 4 o'clock I had feared as neither butcher or fish monger came we should have short commons, but our good cook really worked a miracle out of two pair chickens, beef steaks, mushrooms, squashes &c in the shapes of pies & pasties so that, our board was bountifully furnished. The Gellibrands came to tea (all but Martha who was not well) and seemed as glad to talk with Mr Maxwell as we are to listen to him. M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & Debo played on harp & piano Whistler accompanying them. our visitors were obliged to leave before their usual time as baby was so naughty as to send for Mama.<sup>907</sup> After the rest of us dispersed to our several apartments Whistler sat some time talking with Maxwell who is soon to say farewell<sup>908</sup> — This morning he must return to town, so my sister & self have been left to take care of the boys, as Debo went with Emily, to spend today with her. I have had a heavy heart since they left, in reflection of the past year, & thinking of the future, prayer has comforted me & I have found hope in Gods holy word.

English Quai – Ritter–Dom.<sup>909</sup> Sept 23<sup>d</sup> <sup>910</sup> While Debo is at her piano in the front drawing room the boys dancing to her music I shall try to record the change which has taken place the past week, I am seated in my own snug chamber, but instead of looking out upon Mr Drurys flower garden it overlooks the yard of Ritter-Dom in St Petersburg. Our last evening in the country was spent at the kind Gellibrands, after my days hard work at packing up I felt it to be very refreshing, Mr G [sic] had such a charming bright fire in her parlor grate to cheer us for the evenings begin to get chilly. Tuesday morning<sup>911</sup> after our 6 carts of goods & chattels were underweigh & our Calash waiting at the door I stepped in to bid good bye to my neighbours on each side, the Drurys are so kind I could scarce find words to express my thanks, at the last moment our good old landlord sent me in a basket of “vegetable marrow” string beans to salt for winters use & a still more attractive basket of every variety of Dahlias, with another filled with grapes from his green house. Willie & Tscharsinka embraced tenderly bidding adieu & promising to visit each other in Russ. the weather was propitious, & we accomplished much in unpacking all our things. Mr Ropes insisted upon our dining at his house which is under the same roof with our own, we merely have to cross the head of our wide stair case from our front door to his,<sup>912</sup> we each selected these lodgings for their healthy situation on the English Quai, the view & the air of the Neva so fine, my dear husbands office is one of the snuggest of our rooms, we have just ten rooms including kitchens & for servants, our rent half of that of the Bobrinsky dom, is yet extravagently high $ 900! tho our flat is the 3rd story. And now we are in nice order I am sorry Whistler must leave us just when he could enjoy his home so much for he has laboured to procure us comforts. but the Count K goes to Moscow tomorrow<sup>913</sup> & he leaves us for a fortnight. he was too busy in his office to write last friday<sup>914</sup> as we did by the Courier, as we did [sic], however much I wished him to answer my brothers last few lines I know Whistlers letters number 3 to 1 of Macs<sup>915</sup> and that he would gladly write oftener if he could for his thoughts are continually turning to this friend of his youth. Our boys have been every fine day to see M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell which was a relief to me while I was in a bustle & could not attend to them, he one day took them a drive to Alexandrofski & dined them at the Hotel de Paris, another day he gave them a sail across the Neva & sauntered about with them on some of the Islands. Willie especially loves this countryman of ours & wishes I would only go back to America when he does then Willie would not hesitate to accompany him home! last Saturday<sup>916</sup> he dined with us, as did M<sup>r</sup> Joseph Ropes & M<sup>r</sup> Geo Prince, As we were afterwards seated in the drawing room, Debo having regaled us with coffee & music our boys spoke a french dialogue, Willie wished lights brought in to give effect, but there was applause enough without. We were somewhat annoyed by the interruption of the Swede M<sup>r</sup> F<sup>917</sup> who some time ago begged to be permitted to try his skill as a portrait painter upon our boys, he brought the caricatures to present to their father how provoking & he has the impudence to ask the modest sum of 35 silv rubles for them. Whistler could only throw them in the fire!

Thursday [Sept.] 26th <sup>918</sup> Last Sunday<sup>919</sup> was the only one I have staid from public worship for many months & yet we are within five minutes walk of the “Aaglitzkie Tscierkoff” or “English church”<sup>920</sup> but my soul was heavy with sorrow as the anniversary of my little Charlies removal from me, tho to a better world — brought back the sight of all his sufferings on board the Alexandra & all his patience & love seemed again visible. At family worship I felt near fainting & could scarcely repeat the Lords prayer to be heard tho it has become more full of meaning since my little one's fondness for it has so associated it with him. As I embraced my dear Debo (as is my custom on rising from prayers before breakfast every morning, my heart became relieved by weeping. I retired to my room again with my darling Willie & Jemmie & read with them until time for Mary to get them ready for going to church with their father, & felt soothing as was the sympathy of all I was best alone to pour out my soul in supplication to my Saviour to make me thankful as I ought to be that He has taken that little one He lent me two whole years at a time when I needed comfort & to beseech Him to forgive me if the renewal of my selfish grief should be in His sight sinful, I even felt grateful that my heart was soft enough still to weep over the remembrance of my trial of last year! but I ought rather to be grateful that I do not sorrow as those without hope!<sup>921</sup> Oh the extacy of the prospect of our all being united around the throne of the Lamb! I read that suitable chap the 15th of 1st Corinthians<sup>922</sup> alone, when my boys came to my side again I read a pretty little juvenile tract to them upon the raising of Lazarus in which family harmony is so touchingly described how strong was the bond of affection between Lazarus & his Sisters.<sup>923</sup> Our Lord could not have called them. His friends had it not been so, He would not have of resorted thither had not their love to each other been next to their love to Himself. May my Jemmie & Willie cultivate this love which will make them in humility - prefer each other. Our family is a scattered one upon this earth but love to Jesus can unite our hearts. How much I have thought of my gentle George this day! Where & how has he spent the last year since he bade us adieu at Travemundie!<sup>924</sup> In the afternoon I read to my dear Whistler from a volume lately sent me by a friend from England upon the re-union of glorified Spirits.<sup>925</sup> Ah how kindly considerate is my dear husband in spending his sabbaths thus separate from the world to please me. by & by I trust his own satisfaction will depend upon devoting all the hours of Gods holy day to the interests of eternity. I wept with Charlies Mary this day as we spoke of the past. she is a good girl & I trust is leading such a life that she may meet him to part no more. what a comfort she is to me! I pray God may reward her seven fold, she certainly does her duty in the state of life to which He has called her, is so patient & forbearing, so industrious & modest I trust in His sight her motive is for the praise of God. “Aunt Alicia” and I talked with our boys after they went to bed of those who were of as bright promise as themselves who have “gone before” them into a home prepared for them since the foundation of the world. even of our sainted boys Joe & Henry, and of Sweet Louly<sup>926</sup> too. Would that I could every day keep my thoughts elevated, what a privilege to have one day in seven set apart for holy contemplation. This week I have been in a whirl of business, work people of all descriptions pressing in to accomplish all that needed in our new lodging. My dear Whistler also has been obliged to go to Moscow, he left very early on tuesday<sup>927</sup> morning to be absent a fortnight, the Count Kleinmichel has gone with him to examine the rail road. of course Alexander attends him, so I am compelled to speak to Fedor in Russ, my little Willie is ready to explain for me & upon an emergency M<sup>r</sup> Ropes cousin Geo Prince comes in to aid me, I cannot direct the work people but this young countryman is so obliging & the counting house so near- under the same roof<sup>928</sup> – he comes in any moment, how glad I shall be when all these work people are done! they are so filthy in their persons! their long matted hair & beards, never disturbed by water or comb except in their monthly baths<sup>929</sup> which their church obliges them to take, I shudder as their long dirty robes sweep past me & fly from their sheep skins as from contagion, Aunt Alicia has a regular hunting for fleas now every day & says the odour of these men is dreadful. Oh how nice we shall keep our lodgings when they are rid of. We have had a regular Equinox<sup>930</sup> this week. Whistler went away under a tremendous rain storm & wind, but the weather today is mild as that of my own native land at this season, & as bright, last night<sup>931</sup> the moon light was enough to tempt us out, but Debo has had a cold & we enjoyed looking out upon the Neva from our drawing room, M<sup>r</sup> Prince took tea with us & M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell came after. all Americans together we talked of our native land, while we partook of a basket of delicious French pears (sent me in the morning by M<sup>r</sup> M — he said he should send some trees from France for his fathers farm upon the Hudson & hoped we might yet enjoy them there! We talked over our purchases of Furs & for our friends at home & planned going to the Gaustinandva today to make purchases, for the boxes must be ready to send to Cronstadt tomorrow for the Ship sails the next day for New York<sup>932</sup> thus at the last I am hurried, for tho I have looked forward all Summer to this gratification I could not shop while residing in the country, M<sup>r</sup> R always too busy to go with me to the market & I cannot talk Russ or make bargains. I at this moment hear the carriage from M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrands rattling into the court bringing home M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & children.<sup>933</sup> What lovely weather they are favored with & their lodgings in apple pie order thro M<sup>r</sup> Rs indefatigable exertions. I must run across our staircase thro all the painters to welcome them! But here comes my Willie with something to keep me in my seat. Such a treat! a long letter from dear Mary McNeill. Debo had reported the arrival of the Steamer this morning she watched the stepping ashore of the passengers – from our front balcony – at the English Quai, & we knew we should have letters!

Friday [Sept.] 27th <sup>934</sup> This is my 40th Anniversary. it is necessary to close this past years journal now as it is to go in a box to Stonington which must be ready to be sealed in an hour, therefore this hastily penned manuscript must be sent without correction, but my dear Mother will be indulgent to its errors as she has ever been to those of her children, & it is sacred to my family. My kind Sister Alice embraced me with tears on wishing me many happy returns of my birth day. how much I owe her for untiring interest in myself & children, may God help me to shew her the love she has ever shewn me. I must write my Twin Sister Eliza after my box is packed as I promised, this day last year I wrote her in my state room on board the Alexandra, with a heart aching from the loss I had then so recently sustained. When I review the past year my soul is filled with adoration to God for all His mercies to me. He has indeed revived me, my health is excellent & my spirit restored to cheerfulness. A birth day is a solemn mile-stone on our road to eternity! Oh may the Holy Spirit enable me to form new desires this day to live to my Saviour, & help me to examine my heart & my faith in Him. Yesterday afternoon I went to the Gaustinandva to purchase Moscow Silks<sup>935</sup> for sending to Stonington & Kazan Shoes,<sup>936</sup> My loves goes with them! M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell waits to seal my box.<sup>937</sup>

NOTES

1. Anna Whistler (27 September 1804 – 1 January 1881) is referring to her half-sister, Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (27 September 1788 – 20 August 1857; see Image 40), born on the same day in the same month as she, as her “twin” sister. Although this is the usual reference in Anna Whistler’s diaries, there are other situations in which the term is applied. When Major Whistler died, Anna Whistler received a letter of condolence in which the writer spoke of her own mother, widowed twenty-nine years earlier in the same month under similar circumstances, as Anna Whistler’s twin sister: “it is just 29 years today since my own dear Mother was deprived of her earthly stay, you are as it were twin sisters in this affliction for how similar are many of the incidents” (joint letter from Betsy Sandland and her daughter, Lizzie, April 27, 1849, LC: P-W, box 34). See the biography of the Sandland family in Appendix E (hereafter, Sandland) and Anna Whistler’s biography in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s.”
2. Anna Whistler is referring to her sons, James Abbott Whistler (11 July 1834 – 17 July 1903) and William McNeill Whistler (22 July 1836 – 27 February 1900). See their biographies in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s” and Images 24–30.
3. It has not been possible to ascertain who the neighbor was that Anna Whistler’s step-daughter, Deborah Delano Whistler (24 October 1825 – 3 December 1908) was visiting. See her biography in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s” and Images 17–19, 21.
4. Anna Whistler is referring to her husband, Major George Washington Whistler (19 May 1800 – 7 April 1849). See his biography in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s” and Images 7–8, 21.
5. “Mr. Fair. ....” is Reuben Goodale Fairbanks (29 December 1804 – 5 October 1882) (Lorenzo Sales Fairbanks, Genealogy of the Fairbanks Family 1633-1897 [Boston: Printed for the author by American Printing and Engraving, 1897], p. 225; Episcopal Diocese of New York Church Records, Register of Burials, 1767 – 1970). A railroad contractor from Massachusetts, he had come to Russia in April 1843 on the recommendation of Major Whistler and had successfully bid “to set up and supervise the operation” of steam excavators and pile drivers (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, pp. 108, 123). See the biography of the Fairbanks family in Appendix E (hereafter, Fairbanks).

6. The Acadia (see Image 77) was a British and North American Royal Mail Steam Ship and, as of 1840, regularly sailed between Boston, Halifax, and Liverpool (“Cunard Steamers One Hundred Years Ago,” Sea Breezes 3 [January–June 1947], p. 87). It arrived at Halifax from Boston (Capt. Alex Ryrie) on 18 August 1843 and sailed a few hours later for Liverpool. Listed among its passengers from Boston to Liverpool were “G.M. [sic] Whistler, Mrs. Whistler and Miss Whistler, 3 children, and servant” (Morning Herald, August 21, 1843, pp. 2–3). According to published mail schedules, the vessel would have left Boston on 16 August 1843 (Belcher’s Farmer’s Almanack for the Year of Our Lord 1843 [Halifax, NS: C.H. Belcher, 1843], p. 37). Anna Whistler confirms this date of departure in her diary entry for Friday [August] 16th [1844]. See also the Boston Post for 17 August 1843.
7. On the morning of 19 August 1843, when the Acadia was eleven hours out from Halifax for Liverpool, the weather being thick and hazy, it struck down the barque Merchant (Capt. Thomas L. Boss) from Amsterdam, owned at Newport, Rhode Island, in smooth water at 1:50 a.m. in latitude 44°37’N, longitude 60°58’W. The Merchant sank in about 45 minutes. The Acadia, however, had stopped immediately and sent out her boats. All officers and crew of the barque were saved. They were taken in the Acadia to Liverpool, arriving there on 28 August, and were given accommodations on the steamer Caledonia, which left Liverpool on 5 September, arriving in Boston on 21 September (Boston Advertiser, September 22, 1843). The account given by Capt. Boss to the Newport Rhode Islander is more detailed and exciting: Boston Post, September 22, 1843. See also Boston Shipping List, September 23, 1843, p. 28, col. 1.; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Pomfret, thursday p.m. Nov. 13th [18]51, GUL: Whistler Collection, W402).
8. Anna Whistler is referring to her step-son, George William Whistler (9 July 1822 – 24 December 1869), who had accompanied her and the children from the United States to Travemünde. See his biography in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s” and Images 12–13.
9. Charles Donald Whistler (27 August 1841 – 24 September 1843) died on route from Travemünde to St. Petersburg.
10. Mary Brennan (bap. 20 May 1828 – 25 May 1895) had gone to Russia with the Whistlers as nursemaid to Charles Donald Whistler. See Brennan, Bergen, Keefe in Appendix E.

11. Although Anna Whistler says they arrived at Liverpool on 29 August, the Boston Advertiser of 22 September 1843 states that it was on 28 August.
12. Betsy Hewitt (Dorlin) Sandland (bap. 3 July 1792 – 9 January 1859) was the widow of an English commission merchant who had died in Savannah, Georgia, in 1820 (J.D.S., “James A. Whistler, the Artist,” Pall Mall Gazette, June [?] 1874; Register of Deaths in Savannah, Georgia, vol. 4: Sept. 1818–1832, comp. the Genealogical Committee, Georgia Historical Society, 1989, p. 50). See Sandland in Appendix E.
13. It has not been possible to locate this letter. Anna Whistler’s letters from Major George Washington Whistler were among the few she kept.
14. Anna Whistler is referring to her half-sisters, Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (27 September 1788 – 20 August 1857) and Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (before 12 November 1790 – 20 September 1863); see Images 39–40.
15. Genesis 46:29–30: “<sup>29</sup> And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck and wept on his neck a good while. <sup>30</sup> And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive.”
16. Anna Whistler had been present at the marriage of Louisa Josephine Swift (30 April 1821 – 16 January 1859) to Peter Richards Jr. (28 October 1811 – 30 August 1893), the Rev. P.P. Irving presiding, at Geneva, New York, on 22 June 1843. Josephine – or Josée, as she was called – was the daughter of General Joseph Gardner Swift (31 December 1783 – 23 July 1865; see Image 11), brother of Major Whistler’s first wife. General Swift had written in his journal: “the wedding party dispersed, some to the falls, others to N. Y., etc.” (Harrison Ellery, ed., The Memoirs of Gen. Joseph Gardner Swift, LL.D., U.S.A., First Graduate of the United States Military Academy, West Point, Chief Engineer U.S.A. from 1812 to 1818. 1800-1865. To which is added a Genealogy of the Family of Thomas Swift of Dorchester, Mass., 1634 [Worcester, MA: F.S. Blanchard, 1890], p. 247. See also Geneva Courier, July 4, 1843, p. 3, col. 2).
17. This is John Winstanley (22 December 1776 – 22 May 1859), solicitor, second husband of Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (see Image 40). See the biographies of the Winstanley, McNeill, Wellwood, Picard, Ware, Hull, Simpson, Clunie, Wilkin,

- Biggs, and Cragg families in Appendix E (hereafter, Winstanley ... Cragg).
18. James Chapman (9 April 1791 – 17 May 1861), Railway Secretary, and his family were the Winstanleys' neighbors at Railway House on Fishergate Street (Mannex, History, Topography, and Directory of the Borough of Preston, with the Town and Parish of Chorley [Beverley, UK: W.B. Johnson, 1851]). The 1841 Census for Preston shows that James and Eliza (Hatton) Chapman (1805 – 18 February 1850) had four sons: James, nine; George, eight; Edward, six; Alfred, three (1841 Census for Preston, H0107/498, fol. 34, p. 15, Public Records Office, Chancery Lane, London, UK [hereafter, PRO]). See the biography of the Chapman family in Appendix E (hereafter, Chapman).
  19. Together with Churchstreet, Fishergate constitutes "the main thoroughfare of Preston" (Charles Hardwick, History of the Borough of Preston and Its Environs, in the County of Lancaster [Preston: Worthington; London: Simpkin, Marshall, 1857], p. 427).
  20. The 1851 Census for Liverpool, Parish of Everton, lists a household for an Edwin Maude, seventy-one years of age, Chief Searcher of Customs, Cape of Good Hope, Superannuated, born in Kendal, Westmorland. He was living at 3 Christian Street with his wife, Fanny, fifty-five years of age, born in Port Antonio, Jamaica, and his children, William, unmarried, twenty-four years of age, a student at home, and Sarah, unmarried, nineteen years of age, both British subjects, born in Cape Town (1851 Census for Preston, HO 107/2190 and RG 9/2737, PRO). In 1843, Sarah would have been eleven years old. It is not possible to say who the Miss Maude in the portrait was.
  21. The reference is to Raffaello Santi or Sanzio (1483–1520), commonly known as Raphael, Italian High-Renaissance painter. The reference to Raphael indicates the two-year-old child's precocity and suggests that art was a topic of interest to the family.
  22. Mary McLean was a close friend of Eliza Winstanley and the sister of Elizabeth Isabella (Cottnam) McLean (entry for St Petersburg. 1848. September, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II, and accompanying Note 1153). She has been incorrectly identified as the mother of Eliza Winstanley and Alicia McNeill by Kate R. McDiarmid and Elizabeth Mumford (McDiarmid, Whistler's Mother, p. 38; Elizabeth Mumford, Whistler's Mother: The Life of Anna McNeill Whistler [Boston: Little, Brown, 1939], p. 6).

23. Cousin Mary was Mary Isabella McNeill (19 August 1823 – 24 October 1867); Cousin Julie was Catherine Julia McNeill (26 December 1825 – 20 October 1897) (see Images 32–33). Both were the daughters of Maria Matilda (Cammann) McNeill (1799 – 29 December 1850) and Major William Gibbs McNeill (3 October 1801 – 16 February 1853; see Image 31), Anna Whistler’s brother. Catherine Julia McNeill appears in the diaries more than her sister and is called variously Julia, niece Julia, Julie, Jule, and “Twin.” She is not, however, “sister Julia” (entry for Saturday [May] 3rd [1845], NYPL: AWPD, Part II). She and Deborah Delano Whistler may have been called “twins” because they were both born in 1825. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
24. Eliza Sandland (c. 1820–2 November 1885) was the daughter of Betsey Hewitt (Dorlin) Sandland. Her married name became Boyd. See Sandland in Appendix E.
25. Kirk Boott Whistler (16 July 1838 – 10 July 1842) died of scarlet fever in Springfield, Massachusetts, while Major Whistler was en route to Russia, and was buried in Stonington, Connecticut.
26. “Lucy Long” or “Miss Lucy Long” was a popular “Negro melody” about a suitor’s courtship of Lucy Long. The words were altered and adapted for English (Gumbo Chaff, comp., The Ethiopian Glee Book: A Collection of Popular Negro Melodies, arranged for quartet clubs, by Gumbo Chaff, A.M.A., first banjo player to the King of Congo [Boston: Elias Howe, 1848]; Henry Russell, Songs, Dramatic, and Descriptive Scenes, Cantatas, Characteristic Ballads, and Negro Melodies [London: G.H. Davidson, 1846], pp. 39–40).
27. Ribchester is a small village on the north bank of the River Ribble, some 10 miles east of Preston. Between c. 79 and 400 AD, as the name implies, it was the site of a Roman fort. There is not “much written evidence about Ribchester” “until the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries,” at which time it was considered poor in comparison to its past history. “Before the second half of the eighteenth century,” it was a small village “with no more than a few hundred inhabitants.” In the seventeenth century, “the poorer sort of people” lived “by spinning and weaving linen clothes,” but “cotton manufacturing replaced that of linen” in the eighteenth century. By the late eighteenth century, the increase in the number of handloom weavers led to the building of many new cottages. Ribchester began at this time “to take on something like its present appearance.” For some fifty years after 1780, “handloom weaving and certain related trades like bobbin turning

- reigned supreme in Ribchester.” However, by the 1840s, when Anna Whistler visited Ribchester with James and Willie, hard economic times had come for the weavers because of “the advent of efficient power looms.” The population of the village declined steadily in subsequent decades as young people moved to towns to find work (A.C. Hodge and J.F. Ridge, Ribchester: A Short History and Guide, 2nd ed. (Preston, UK: Carnegie Press, 1986), pp. 4, 8, 9, 11).
28. Jane Simpson (b.1790, bap. 27 August 1797; d. 4 January 1852) was a Scotswoman of independent means, who lived in Kirkby Lonsdale, Westmorland (see Image 70), with the family of Richard Stuart Picard (bap. 16 January 1807 – 26 November 1887). See Winstanley ... Cragg in Appendix E.
  29. This is the parsonage of St. Wilfrid’s, the Parish Church of Ribchester, where the Haslewood family lived.
  30. “The village lies ‘in the midst of one of the richest and most smiling prospects we ever saw’ and is beautifully placed ‘at some distance all around enclosed with higher ground, well clothed with wood and hedgerows’ “ (Hodge and Ridge, Ribchester, p. 1).
  31. The Rev. Boulby Thomas Haslewood (Durham, 30 January 1796 – Ribchester, 28 May 1876) was for forty seven years Vicar of Ribchester with Stydd, Lancashire. He received the BA (Sen. Opt.) in 1818 from St. Peter’s College, Cambridge University, and was made a deacon in 1819 and priest in 1820. He married on 15 February 1822 (see following Note). He was instituted as Rector of St. Wilfrid’s Church in Ribchester on 16 April 1829 and was the “author of a Visitation Sermon.” “He was highly esteemed by his parishioners, although it is to be regretted that the old Parish Library was allowed to become gradually dispersed, and the numerous Roman Antiquities discovered during his incumbency to be irrevocably scattered.” He was “buried 1 June 1876 at Ribchester, M.I. A tablet erected by the parishioners describes him as ‘learned and eloquent’” (Francis Haslewood, The Genealogy of the Family of Haslewood, Staffordshire and Warwickshire Branches... [London: Mitchell and Hughes, 1881], p. 8; The Marquis of Ruvigny and Raineval, The Plantagenet Roll of the Blood Royal: The Clarence Volume [London: T.C. & E.C. Jack, 1905], p. 484; Alumni Cantabrigienses, comp. J.A. Venn, pt. 2: From 1752–1900, 6 vols. [Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1951], vol. 3, pp. 282–283; Thomas Charles Smith and Rev. Jonathan Shortt, The History of the Parish of Ribchester, in the County of Lancaster [London: Bemrose; Preston: C.W. Whitehead, 1890], pp. 156–157).

32. This is Margaret (Ogden) Haslewood (14 July 1798 – Ribchester, 21 February 1854) (Haslewood, Genealogy, p. 8; Marquis of Ruvigny and Raineval, Plantagenet Roll, p. 484; Smith and Shortt, Parish of Ribchester, p. 156). The dates given here are from the tombstone inscription (north corner of Ribchester Parish Church yard) (Smith and Shortt, Parish of Ribchester, p. 208). This death date is contradicted by a certified copy of an Entry of Death for Margaret Haslewood, Registration District: Preston, Sub-district: Alston, County of Lancaster, General Register Office for England and Wales (GRO), which gives 20 February 1854.
33. The Haslewood children were: Dickens Haslewood (20 April 1823 – 30 December 1897); Margaret Biss Haslewood (17 August 1824 – 30 August 1882); William Maude Haslewood (23 February 1828 – 20 October 1888); Boulby Haslewood (7 October 1829 – 19 October 1897); Catherine Haslewood (10 August 1831 – 21 February 1866); Mary Jane Haslewood (26 January 1838 – 26 September 1905) (Alumni Cantabrigienses, vol. 3, pp. 282–283; Marquis of Ruvigny and Raineval, Plantagenet Roll, pp. 484–485; Haslewood, Genealogy, pp. 8–9 and a chart drawn up by descendant, David Haslewood; National Probate Calendar (UK), 1905). The three surviving sons mentioned here all became clergymen. Except for Catherine, whom Anna Whistler mentions by name, it is not possible to say which Haslewood children were present when she visited the family.
34. This daughter is Elizabeth Boulby Haslewood (20 May 1826 – 25 July 1843) (Haslewood, Genealogy, p. 9), whom Anna Whistler had last seen when Elizabeth was three or four years old. There is a loose sheet of paper along with the manuscript of Anna Whistler's diary that contains "Lines written on the death of dear Elizth Haslewood," by her sister Catherine, aged 11 years, copied in Eliza Winstanley's hand. See Appendix C.
35. The Second Advent of Christ, or Second Coming, refers to "the future return of Christ in glory ... to judge the living and the dead, and to terminate the present world order. Primitive Christianity believed this event to be imminent, and this belief has often been revived" (Elizabeth A. Livingstone, ed., The Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, 3rd ed. [Oxford, London, New York: Oxford University Press, 2013] [hereafter, Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church], s.v. "Parousia").
36. St. Wilfrid's, the Ribchester Parish Church, dates from the thirteenth century. For a description of its history, see J.H. Finch, A Goodly Heritage: Being a Description of Ribchester Parish Church, rev.

ed. (Ribchester, UK: John Barton, 1984) and William Farrer and J. Brownbill eds., The Victoria History of the County of Lancaster, vol. 7 (London: University of London Institute of Historical Research, 1966), pp. 37–43, first published in 1912 by Dawsons of Pall Mall, London.

The pulpit of which Anna Whistler speaks “is of oak and octagonal in plan, with pilasters at the angles, richly carved panels and projecting cornice carried by shaped brackets. On the door are the date 1636 and the initials of Christopher Hindle, vicar, and attached to it is an oak reading-desk, probably of equal date, forming a two-decker” (Farrer and Brownbill, History of Lancaster, vol. 7, pp. 39, 42). There is a woodcut of the pulpit by J.S.B. Wallis, former rector of St. Wilfrid’s, reproduced on p. 16 of Finch, Goodly Heritage, as well as information about Hindle (pp. 17–18).

As for the “richly colored glass windows,” the East Window “contains fragments of late fourteenth or early fifteenth century stained glass, once depicting Our Lord in Glory” (Finch, Goodly Heritage, pp. 13–14). Attention is called by Finch to “the economy of line of the mediaeval craftsmen and the rich colouring of the glass” (Finch, p. 15). The rest of the stained glass was “no doubt ... destroyed by Puritan iconoclasts” (Finch, p. 18).

37. Jane (Hatton) Ainsley, aged 78, died in Preston on Sunday, 10 September 1843 (Preston Chronicle and Lancashire Advertiser, Saturday, September 16, 1843). Her funeral was to take place on 14 September. She was the widow of George Ainsley, gentleman, who had died on 18 July 1841 in Preston, aged 77 (certified copy of Entry of Death for George Ainslie, Registration District of Preston, Sub-district of Preston, County of Lancaster, GRO). Jane (Hatton) Ainsley was John Winstanley’s sister-in-law, as his first wife, Margaret, was also a Hatton and her natural sister.
38. 1 Timothy 5:10: “Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints’ feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work.”
39. “The kind Ormerods” are Richard (c. 1775 – 31 December 1861) and Esther (Smith) Ormerod (bap. 18 November 1777 – 4 July 1863) (The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, International Genealogical Index [hereafter, IGI]). Richard Ormerod and his father were engaged in business together as brass and iron founders (Slater’s General and Classified Directory for Manchester and Salford 1845 [Manchester, UK: I. Slater, 1845]; hereafter, Slater's Directory and the year).

40. It was customary for people related by marriage or friendship to call one another by titles used in blood relationships. Thus, Anna Whistler called her half-sister's husband, John Winstanley, "my brother Winny." In the days when Major Whistler was widowed but had not yet proposed to Anna McNeill, she called him "brother George." Jonathan Knight (1787–1858), part of the intimate circle of the McNeills in New York, was called "Uncle Jonathan."
41. Walter Stevenson (bap. 8 September 1788 – 10 May 1860) had been Chief Teller at the Bank of Scotland in Edinburgh but had been dismissed in 1840 for fraud. See the biographies of the Stevenson and Smith families in Appendix E (hereafter, Stevenson and Smith).
42. Kent's Hotel was a private family hotel at 32 Norfolk St., Strand, proprietor Ben. Kent (Post Office London Directory 1844 [London: Frederic Kelly, 1844]; hereafter, Kelly's Directory and the year).
43. Gerard Ralston of 21 Token House Yard, London, was agent to the firm of Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick, who were building the locomotives and the rolling stock at Alexandrofsky for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway (Joseph Harrison Jr. to Gerard Ralston, Esqre, Alexandrofsky, July 4 (OS), 1844 and Joseph Harrison Jr. to Mr. G. Ralston, Alexandrofsky, August 19/31, 1844, HSP: Harrison Letterbook No. 1). A Philadelphia bookseller, he had been living abroad some ten years already (Madeleine Elsas, ed. Iron in the Making: Donlais Iron Company Letters, 1782–1860 [Cardiff, Wales: Glamorgan County Council and Guest Keen Iron and Steel Company, 1960], pp. 190, 191).
44. This is Dr. Francis Boott, MD (26 September 1792 – 25 December 1863; see Image 80), brother of Kirk Boott, the Whistlers' friend in Lowell, Massachusetts (see Image 43). Born in Lowell, Dr. Boott had settled in England. He was a distinguished botanist as well as a medical doctor.
45. Mary (Love) Boott (1766–1856) was the mother of the Whistlers' friend, Kirk Boott, of Lowell, Massachusetts, and of the aforementioned Dr. Francis Boott.
46. "The Parks, which form one of the most beautiful features of the metropolis, are situated chiefly in a series from the back of Whitehall Street, in a westerly and northerly direction, and are thus blended with the fashionable end of the town" ("London: A Description and Guide to the British Metropolis,” Chambers’s Information for the People 1, no. 14 [1842]: p. 218; hereafter, Chambers’s Information 1842).

47. The Zoological Gardens are located in Regent’s Park, which “is situated considerably apart from the other parks, in a northerly direction from [Kensington Gardens], and consists of a circular enclosure of about 450 acres, which are laid out on the most approved principles of what is called landscape gardening; its centre is enriched with lakes, plantations, shrubberies, and eight beautiful villas. The park is surrounded by extensive ranges of buildings, forming splendid terraces, variously designated, and all decorated with sculpture in agreement with their respective orders of architecture; producing an effect of beauty and grandeur rarely witnessed ... [a]t the northern extremity of Regent’s Park are the Zoological Gardens, the property of the Zoological Society, and established in 1826. These gardens are very extensive, and being removed from the dingy atmosphere, noise, and bustle of London, they present an agreeable and truly countrylike aspect. The grounds have been disposed in the style of landscape-gardening – here a clump of shrubby trees and border of flowers, indigenous and exotic; there a pretty miniature lake; and at proper intervals is seen a neat rustic cot, with its straw-thatched roof and honeysuckled porch. Much of the ground, also, is occupied as green meadows, either subdivided into small parks for deer and other quadrupeds, or dotted with moveable trellis houses, the abodes of different kinds of birds which require the refreshing exercise of walking on the green turf. Throughout the whole, neat gravel walks wind their serpentine course, and conduct the visiter to the bear-pit, monkey-house, aviaries, and other departments of the establishment. The gardens are open every week-day for the admission of visitors, who must previously procure an order from a member of the society, and likewise pay a shilling each at the gate” (Chambers’s Information 1842, pp. 218–219).
48. This is Frances (Morton) Stevenson (bap. 27 April 1783 – 16 October 1845) (Old Parochial Registers of Scotland [hereafter, OPRS]; IGI for Midlothian, Scotland; certified copy of an Entry of Death, Registration District of St. Pancras, Sub-District of Kentish Town, County of Middlesex, GRO). One of the causes of Mrs. Stevenson’s sorrow undoubtedly was her husband’s dismissal in 1840 from the Bank of Scotland in Edinburgh. See Stevenson and Smith in Appendix E.

49. This is Eliza Isabella Wellwood Stevenson (c. 1821 – 11 February 1889) (1851 Census for Westminster, HO107/1480, fol. 156, PRO; National Probate Calendar (UK), 1889). She was named for Anna Whistler's half-sister, Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (see Image 40), who, in her first marriage, was the wife of Colonel Robert Wellwood (7 February 1747 – 7 July 1820). See Stevenson and Smith in Appendix E.
50. It has not been possible to identify Bell.
51. Francis Stevenson (c. 1826 – 1 February 1902) was described in the 1841 Census as an apprentice (1841 Census for St. Pancras, HO107/683, bk. 3, fol. 17, PRO). He became a civil engineer.
52. Jean Robert Poizat (7 June 1803 – 16 July 1868) and his wife, Louise Cecilia (Flour or Flouer) Poizat (14 May 1820 – 16 September 1888), boarded the Acadia in Boston with Anna Whistler and her family (see Image 78). They were listed as being from Philadelphia. Mrs. Poizat was born in Philadelphia, but they had only been visiting that city and actually lived in Marseilles, France ("Passengers" section, Boston Post, August 17, 1843; "Passengers" section, Halifax Morning Herald, August 21, 1843). See the biography of the Poizat family in Appendix E (hereafter, Poizat).
53. "From May to October the most expeditious mode of proceeding from London to St. Petersburg is by Hamburg and Lübeck, and thence by the Baltic steamer to Cronstadt and the Russian capital ... Assuming ... that time is an object, and that the traveler adopts the route by Lübeck and the Baltic, it will be desirable, as the Lübeck boats sail from Travemünde every Tuesday morning, that he should leave London by the Hamburg steamer of Friday ... At Hamburg it will be well to take a look at the vehicle and cattle which are to convey him to Lübeck; also to have a clear understanding with the driver that he takes the best road; ... The distance between Hamburg and Lübeck is 40 miles ... Travemünde is 10 miles [from Lübeck] ... The average passage from London to Hamburg is about 54 hours, from Travemünde to Cronstadt about 84 hours ... but these boats ... is [sic] sometimes 100 hours in accomplishing it, and has [sic] been as long as four or five days. The distance from Lübeck to St. Petersburg is rather over 700 miles." This route is considered "uninteresting" (Murray's Handbook for Northern Europe, vol. 2, 1849, p. 438).

Lübeck was a major seaport of Schleswig-Holstein and was located on the Trave and Wakenitz rivers. Travemünde was a city located at the head of the Trave River estuary on the Bay of Lübeck. See Images 81–84.

54. The word “wherry” is “said to be another form of the word ‘ferry,’ from the fact that wherries were often ferry boats. [...] The old Thames wherries [...] were wide and long with a high pointed bow ending in a sharp iron nose. [...] Where the wherry is actually a ferry boat, it is often pointed both bow and stern and rowed either way” (A. Ansted, A Dictionary of Sea Terms for the Use of Yachtsmen, Amateur Boatmen, and Beginners [London: Upcott Gill, 1898], p. 309). The high pointed bow allowed passengers to disembark dryshod where there was no landing dock. In 1820, “there were still 3,000 wherries plying on the Thames, while the hackney coaches could muster only a sorry 1,200 in the whole of London. As late as 1829, [the wherry was] the usual conveyance from the neighbourhood of Westminster to Vauxhall,” although they were shortly thereafter made obsolete by new bridges and steamboats (Edward Walford, “The River Thames,” in Old and New London, vol. 3, Westminster and the Western Suburbs [London: Cassell Petter and Galpin, 1873], p. 310).
55. This is Streit’s Hotel in Hamburg (see Image 82), Jungfernstieg 19, corner of Gänsemarkt, proprietor Christian Streit (Gerd Nauhaus, ed., Robert Schumann Tagebücher, vol. 2: 1836–1854 [Leipzig: Deutsche Verlag für Musik, 1987], p. 708). The hotel had partly burned down in May 1842 in a huge conflagration that “destroyed 1,450 houses, including 24 hotels along the Jungfernstieg” (Gerd Nauhaus, ed., The Marriage Diaries of Robert and Clara Schumann from Their Wedding Day through the Russian Trip, trans. Peter Oswald [Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1993], pp. 150, 348). The back premises remained standing among the ruins, so that the hotel business could continue while the house facing the street was being reconstructed. The work took from June 1842 to August 1843 (Rainer Hering, 150 Jahre Streit’s 12. Mai 1837–12. Mai 1987 [150 Years of Streit’s, 12 May 1837 – 12 May 1987] [Hamburg, Germany: printed by the author, 1987], p. 9). The hotel was therefore open for business when Anna Whistler and her children stopped in Hamburg for the first time. On subsequent trips between Russia and England, members of the Whistler family stayed at Streit’s Hotel.
56. Anna Whistler is referring to glimpses of Schleswig-Holstein, which was part of Denmark.

57. The meaning of “bate” in the sense of deducting or subtracting is probably meant here. Thus, some of the horses were removed and either reduced in number or replaced.
58. For a view of Lübeck in the 1840s see Image 83.
59. The Russian steamers Alexandra and Nikolai plied the route between Travemünde and Cronstadt.
60. The terrifying experience of encountering a storm on the Baltic Sea, especially in the autumn, has been described by a number of travelers. See, for example, in the 1840s, Thompson, Life in Russia, pp. 10–11.
61. This is Dr. George Edwin Palmer (15 April 1803 – 8 May 1868) of Stonington, Connecticut, physician (see Image 36). A widower, he married, on 23 March 1840, as his second wife, Anna Whistler’s youngest sister, Catherine Jane McNeill (c. 1812 – 20 May 1877). The Palmers’ home was “The Old Corner House,” at 24 Main Street (see Image 37), which had been built in 1785 by Dr. Palmer’s father, Captain Amos Palmer. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
62. Anna Whistler omitted “I.”
63. Mary Brennan had a brother, James Brennan (1 February 1822 – 4 September 1886), in Springfield, Massachusetts. See Brennan, Bergin, Keefe in Appendix E.
64. Mark 10:14: “Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the kingdom of God.” See also Luke 18:16.
65. It has not been possible to obtain information about a miniature of Kirk Boott Whistler.
66. Anna Whistler meant “charge.”
67. Cronstadt (see Image 84) is a fortress city on the island of Kotlin at the mouth of the Gulf of Finland. Given the shallow draft of the Neva River, ships headed for St. Petersburg are required to dock at Cronstadt and transfer their cargo – both human and freight – to smaller, lighter boats, which are called “lighters.”

Anna Whistler has already said they arrived at St. Petersburg two months from the day she began keeping her diary, i.e., September 28th. Here, she says they arrived four days after the death of Charles Donald Whistler. He died on September 23; four days later would have been September 27. Maxwell, however, confirms September 28 as the day of their arrival (John S.

Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Saturday, September 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22).

68. The English Church in Cronstadt, located on Alexander Street, was built in 1824 in late Classical style and opened on 15 June of that year (see Image 85). It was described in 1828 as follows:

The edifice is plain but elegant, and very neat and commodious within. It is 97 feet in length, and 43 in breadth, with 18 windows on each side; and has a portico of several columns, and a small belfry, after the shape of those in our [English] country churches. The altar, which is in a recess, in the form of a semicircle, with six columns, is covered with blue velvet and gold fringe. On one side of this stands the pulpit, and on the other the reading-desk; but these are too large, and out of proportion to the place itself ... This building is said to have cost 15,000 l.; part of which was defrayed by ... the English-Russian company, and part by a duty imposed on English vessels here. The minister has an income of 7000 rubles, with a house, etc. besides the emoluments derived from surplice fees. (William Rae Wilson, Travels in Russia, 2 vols. [London: Longman, Rees, Orme, Brown, and Green, 1828], vol. 1, pp. 321–322, 323)

The resident English population of the city was about 100. During navigation, about 700 English and 50 American vessels entered the port. Their crews averaged ten men to a ship. The average number of communicants was 40 to 50.

When the British Seamen's Hospital at Cronstadt was relocated in 1866, it was described as standing "opposite the English Chapel, frequented by seafarers, ... also the seat of the British vice-consulate" (Handbook for Travellers in Russia, Poland and Finland, new rev. ed. [London: John Murray, 1865]; The Illustrated London News, December 29, 1866). The church accommodated about 200 people. Support of the Church and appointment of the minister rested with the Russia Company. The Church had no resident poor and few casual calls upon its charity, so that communion alms were mostly distributed among the Russian poor (G.E. Biber, ed., The English Church on the Continent; or, An Account of the Foreign Settlements of the English Church: Including a Notice of the Times of Service, and Other Information Useful to Travellers and Foreign Residents [London: Francis & John Rivington, 1845], p. 73).

It was described in 1983 as having been preserved to the present day without any particular changes to its façade (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada [Architectural Monuments of the Leningrad Suburbs] [Leningrad: Stroizdat, Leningradskoe otdelenie, 1983], p. 571).

69. Count Aleksandr Sergeevich Stroganov (7 December [OS] 1818 – 26 July [OS] 1864) was at this time twenty-four years old. See the biographies of the Stroganov, Vasil'chikov, and Kushelev families in Appendix E (hereafter, Stroganov, Vasil'chikov, Kushelev) and Image 299.
70. The Customs House (see Images 95–96) formed part of the architectural ensemble of the spit of Vasilievskii Island and was built according to plans by the architect Giovanni Francesco Lucchini (1755–1826) almost at the same time as the warehouses of the Stock Exchange (see Image 152–153). Its construction in 1829–1832 was made necessary by the development of the port of Petersburg in the first half of the 19th century, when customs facilities could no longer fit into the old houses adapted for them on the bank of the Little Neva. In its silhouette, the Customs House – designed in the forms of Russian late Classicism – matches the Kunstkamera, which is located symmetrically with respect to the axis of the ensemble of the spit of Vasilievskii Island. Rectangular in plan, the main façade of the Customs House faces the Little Neva and is crowned by a sloping cupola on a tall drum. The main façade is distinguished by an Ionic portico that rests against the projection of the first floor, which is treated as the ground floor and is rusticated. On the pediment crowning the portico are statues of Mercury, Neptune, and Ceres (Pamiatniki arkhitektury Leningrada [Architectural Monuments of Leningrad] (Leningrad: Gos. izd-stvo literatury po stroitel'stvu, arkhitekture i stroitel'nym materialam, 1958), p. 97).
71. For a description of a reception by Russian customs officials of a ship arriving at Cronstadt see Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 1, letter 2, pp. 31–33, 37–39; Thompson, Life in Russia, pp. 11–15; Murray's Handbook for Northern Europe, vol. 2, p. 439.
72. John Stevenson Maxwell (February 1818 – 2 March 1870), Secretary of the American Legation in St. Petersburg (July 1842 – November 1844), described for his mother this first meeting with Anna Whistler and the children and the vicissitudes of their journey:

The day before yesterday Thursday I went out in the morning to walk. It was a fine morning, one of a few fines one's we have had lately. The house was all cleaned and the next Monday M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler was to arrive in the steamer from London direct. On my return home all the servants but one had gone out and this one could not speak anything but Russian. I saw, something had occurred but could not devine what it could be until Major Whistler came in and informed me that in consequence of a change of arrangements in the London line of steamers his family had come on by way of Lubec, that they were now in the Custom house, and that he had lost a little boy his youngest by death. He was in misery indeed and asked me to go with him to the Custom house as he had no one who could render him in this unexpected and sudden incident the least assistance. I went to the Custom house and found M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler there, with her daughter and two beautiful little boys. It was with difficulty I could get in the building and it was only by pushing an officer to one side that I succeeded. I prevailed upon the Major and family to go home, and superintended with the assistance of M<sup>rs</sup> Whistlers maid the examination of some dozen trunks etc. This and other form's gone through with, the passports examined, and the books, papers etc sent to the Censor's, I went home, and ordered a dinner for them from the Club and have done all in my power since to make them contented. I have not since seen the ladies of the family. They left Lubec all well, saying farewell to the eldest son who ~~has~~ turned back toward the U. States. After being out twenty four hours the youngest child hitherto in fine health was taken sick. Every attention was rendered by the passengers and the Captain, but there was not a bit of medicine on board and in spite of all they could do, without this, the child died with convulsions. By using strong entreaties they succeeded in prevailing upon the Captain to keep the body on board until they reached Cronstadt and here again M<sup>rs</sup> W prevailed so far as to have it landed and placed in the English Chapel there. Imagine the distress of the Father when he hastened to the boat, hearing his family had come, and was prevented by the police from going on board; when he ~~only~~ saw from the quai that one was missing, and when he called out to know where was this ~~other~~ one. It was terrible indeed and a sad winter will they have in this dreary land (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Saturday, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22). See the biography of the Maxwell family in Appendix E (hereafter, Maxwell) and Images 54–55.

73. The mansion they were renting (see Images 88–94), which has partly been described in “St. Petersburg and the Journey There” and “Their Home and Social Life,” belonged to Count Aleksei Alekseevich Bobrinskii (6/18 January 1800 – 4/16 October 1868; see Image 86). It was located in the First Admiralty District, Fourth Ward. The mansion occupied the territory where two houses had stood, one of which was rebuilt in the 1790s by a Swiss architect in Russian service since 1783, Luigi Ruska (1758–1822), in the style characteristic for an estate in the city at the end of the 18th century. In 1797, both houses had become the property of Bobrinskii’s father, Count Aleksei Grigorievich Bobrinskii (see Image 87), son of Catherine the Great and Count Grigorii Grigorievich Orlov (see Images 414, 443). The architectural treatment of the façades of the central mass of the house was more elaborate than that of the other structures. The middle section of the main façade was distinguished by an Ionic portico, which emphasized the projecting mass that contained the staircase. The portico was decorated with allegorical sculpture. The garden façade of the house was broken up by semicircular projecting bays, or pavilions, and a portico with four Corinthian columns and a pediment. In 1822–1825, the inside of the mansion was remodeled and an enfilade of reception rooms was created on the garden side. The main staircase was decorated in an extremely severe and simple manner. A round opening was made in the covering above the staircase, and through it could then be seen the walls decorated with a cornice with modillions, the light metal railing of the circular gallery of the upper floor, and the painted decorations of the cupola. Among the rooms of the house were a ballroom, the Red living room, the White Salon, and the Blue Salon. The Blue Salon had been included in Major Whistler’s apartment, in which Maxwell now lived (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22). The outstanding painted decor of the White Salon and ballroom is thought to be the work of Giovanni-Battista Scotti (1777–1830). Other rooms in the house contained similar decoration (Pamiatniki arkhitektury Leningrada 1958, pp. 228–229; Pamiatniki arkhitektury Leningrada 1975, p. 284; Levina and Kirpideli, Po ètim ulitsam, pp. 138–142). See Images 88–94 of the Bobrinskii mansion, and “Maps.”
74. John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22. The ship was the Middlesex (entry for December 1843 in entry dated S † Petersburg. November 28th 1843, NYPL: AWP, Part I).

75. This is Major Ivan Frantsevich Buttats (2/14 June 1809 – 25 July / 6 August 1876) of the Corps of Transport Engineers, who had been sent to the United States to accompany Major Whistler back to Russia in 1842. See his biography in Appendix E. His name will be spelled as it appears in Anna Whistler’s diaries (“Bouttatz”); it will be spelled “Buttats” if it appears in a Russian document.

Institut russkoi literatury Akademii nauk (Pushkinskii dom) (IRLI) [Institute of Russian Literature of the Academy of Sciences (Pushkin House)] Fond 2/Б-93 6696 contains a photograph of Buttats from an old portrait album (indicated on the photo itself) with the time of his death among the brief information written on the back: “Inzhener-Polkovnik Ivan Frantsovich Butats, stroitel’ anichkovskogo mosta, skonchalsia v Peterburge 25 Iulia 1876 g. v 2 ch. 45 m. po poludni [Engineer Colonel Ivan Frantsovich Butats, builder of the Anichkov Bridge, died in Petersburg on 25 July 1876 at 2:45 in the afternoon].” On the front of the photograph is written: “Stark au coin de Liteine and Panteleimonovskaya No 25/23 [Stark on the corner of Liteinaia and Panteleimonovskaia streets].” A request for permission to publish this photograph has not been answered at the time of publication of this manuscript.

76. Joseph Swift Whistler (12 August 1824 – 1 January 1840), the son of Major Whistler and his first wife, Mary Roberdeau (Swift) Whistler (August 1804 – 9 December 1827; see Image 10), died of typhoid fever on New Year’s Eve, while at home for the Christmas recess of 1839–1840 from boarding school (McDiarmid, Whistler’s Mother manuscript, GUL: Whistler Collection, F21, fol. 65). Henry Cammann McNeill (1 March 1828 – 7 August 1840), Anna Whistler’s nephew – the son of her brother, William Gibbs McNeill and of Maria (Cammann) McNeill – died by drowning in Springfield, Massachusetts, in 1840 (Springfield Republican, Saturday, August 8, 1840). Thus, Kirk Boott Whistler and Charles Donald Whistler were buried with their half-brother and their first cousin in the same plot in Stonington, Connecticut. According to the inscription on the monument, Henry’s body was later removed to be buried with the remains of his brother, William Wyatt McNeill (October 1833 – 4 June 1853), who died in New Orleans as a result of a streetcar accident. I wish to thank Richard Blodgett of N. Stonington, Connecticut, for taking me on a tour of Whistler places in Stonington, for sharing his notes, and for supplying photographs of the monuments in the Whistler family plot. Mr. Blodgett is writing a book on James Whistler and the members of his class (1855) at West Point.

77. What little information is available about the Whistlers' servants has been supplied in the entry for October 23rd [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II. Their surnames do not appear in the diaries.
78. William Hooper Ropes (10 March 1814 – 16 November 1891) was an American merchant of the firm of William Ropes and Company, founded by his father. The Ropes family also lived on the Galernaia, apparently nearby. See the biographies of the Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, and Hall families in Appendix E (hereafter, Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall).
79. William Hooper Ropes's wife was Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes (23 April 1822 – 11 December 1903). Their daughters were Ellen Gellibrand Ropes (15 March 1841 – 1924) and Mary Emily Ropes (10 August 1842 – September quarter 1932) (list of marriages and issue, HUBL: Ropes Papers; Mary Tyler Gellibrand to grandparents, Leeds, March 9, 1841, Ropes Family Papers, 1734–1952, Massachusetts Historical Society (MHS), Boston [hereafter, MHS: Ropes Papers], Ms. N-174). See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
80. The new baby was Louisa Harriet Ropes (18 November 1843 – 1 June 1903). Her married name became Mrs. Edward Abbs Cattley (list of marriages and issue, HUBL: Ropes Papers). All three children are described in Joseph S. Ropes to Wm. L. Ropes [his first cousin], St. Petersburg, April 20 / May 2, 1845, MHS: Ropes Papers).
81. This is Sophia Joanna (Krehmer) Baird (St. Petersburg c. 1805 – Derby 22 August 1885), widow of Nicol C. Baird (1/13 October 1800 – 1830) (1881 Census for Derby; National Probate Calendar [UK], 1885; PREC STP, no. 1825). They were married on 27 August (OS) 1828 (PREC STP, no. 3754).

This lady is a sister of a gentleman named Cramer, who was formerly Russian secretary of Legation in the United States and the sister in law of Gisborne, a prominent member of the British House of Commons [who married her sister, Sarah, in 1814]. She is of an old Livonian family, very accomplished, and a young widow with a good figure and most magnificent black eyes. Her father in law, named

Baird of Scottish blood died last winter [Charles Baird died on 28 November / 10 December 1843] in St Petersburg, leaving a fortune of $2 000 000. He left the most of this immense property to his only living son [Francis Baird] and to an only child [Sophia Constance Baird, baptized in Paris December 3, 1829] of M<sup>rs</sup> Baird, the lady in question, a handsome sum upon her attaining a certain age. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Berlin, June 23, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 37)

See also G.H. Prince to Mary T. Gellibrand, St. Petersburg, May 2/14, 1841, MHS: Ropes Papers. For information about Charles Baird and his son, Francis, see V.A. Chernenko, “100 let na blago Rossii: dinastiia Berdov v Sankt-Peterburge” [“100 Years for the Good of Russia: The Baird Dynasty in St. Petersburg”]. In Rossiiia – Velikobritaniia Piat’ vekov kul’turnykh sviazei: Materialy VI Mezhdunarodnogo petrovskogo kongressa Sankt-Peterburg 6-8 iunniia 2014 goda [Russia – Great Britain Five Centuries of Cultural Ties: Materials from the 6th International Peter the Great Congress, St. Petersburg 6–8 June 2014], ed. A.V. Kobak and O.L. Kuvaldina (St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii dom, 2015), pp. 484–501. See also Images 274–277.

82. Sophia Joanna (Krehmer) Baird had an unmarried sister, named Elizabeth, with whom she later lived in Derby, where she died in 1885 (National Probate Calendar [UK], 1885). They were both British subjects then and both born in St. Petersburg (1881 Census for Derby).
83. The Bairds, as the preceding notes make clear, were a rich Scottish family.
84. This is Margaret Gordon Hirst (c. 1809 – 22 March / 3 April 1891), whose husband, Thomas Nelson Hirst (12 November 1794 – 22 May / 3 June 1863), ran a private school in St. Petersburg. See the biographies of the Hirst family in Appendix E (hereafter, Hirst).
85. This is actually Mrs. Hirst’s sister-in-law, Mary Gent Hirst (bap. 22 March 1797 – 23 July / 4 August 1844) (Index to Huddersfield Parish Church Registers, YK/R301, Society of Genealogists, London (hereafter, SoG); PREC STP for 1844, p. 312). It has not been possible to determine who in Preston wrote the letter to Mary Gent Hirst. See Hirst in Appendix E.
86. Alexander was the Whistlers’ butler.

87. Maurice was a young man, a former waiter, “who had not been very long in St. Petersburg, who spoke German and a little Russian” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 4, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27).
88. “Dwanick” (see Image 362) is Anna Whistler’s pronunciation of the Russian word for “the man who takes care of the yard,” spelled “dvornik” and pronounced “dvor’nyeeek.” He was responsible for the care of the section of street in front of the house, too, but often, as was the case in the Whistler household, also did indoor work.
89. “The Major lives better than Col Todd did ... he has everything of the best - above all in this country a good cook who can give an English taste and turn to her dishes” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 30).
90. The Russian word for “stove” is spelled “pech” and pronounced “paych,” almost like “peach.” An English plural suffix is added here to the Russian singular. The spelling in the text of the diaries varies: peech, peitch, peach.
- The firing of the stove was well explained and its virtues extolled by Maxwell: “All the houses are warmed by the peitch which is a species of oven in which is placed several pieces of wood cut about the size of that which you were used to burn in your room. This wood is fired and the chimney is left open for the smoke to escape until the wood upon the floor of the oven is one mass of red hot coals. Then the Mugik [peasant] shuts down or closes the chimney and with his poker scatters within the oven the live coals. From these the oven soon becomes very warm and throws off a very pleasant heat, free from gaseous compounds and very agreeable to the feelings. If the thermometer indicates too much heat you have only to open the little door made in your double window and you soon have the right temperature” (John S. Maxwell to [his uncle] Dr. John B. Stevenson, St. Petersburg, May 6, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers).
91. The servant’s Russian name was Fyodor, but Anna Whistler calls him both Fritz and Fredric in this entry and spells his Russian name elsewhere as Feodore.
92. The Russian word for “good” is spelled “khorosho” and pronounced “hurrahshaw’.”
93. It has not been possible to identify Andrea and his mother.

94. This twenty-five-kopek piece was a silver coin, called a “chetvertak” (from the Russian word “chetvert’,” or one quarter), and worth one-fourth of a ruble (Iu. A. Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov ili Èntsiklopediia russkogo byta XIX veka [What We Can't Understand in the Russian Literary Classics; or, An Encyclopedia of Nineteenth-Century Russian Life], 2nd ed. [Moskva: Flinta–Knowledge, 1999], p. 54).
95. Christian Witness was an Episcopalian weekly published in Boston, beginning in 1835, for the Massachusetts Episcopal Convocation. It ceased publication in 1841 and was replaced in that year by Christian Witness and Church Advocate.
96. Colonel Charles Stewart Todd (22 January 1791 – 17 May 1871; see Image 278) was the American Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Russia: appointed 27 August 1841; letter of recall 27 September 1845; formal leave 27 January 1846.
97. Todd to Wheaton, St. Petersburg, 22 Oct. / 3 Nov. 1843, RG84, vol. 165, fols. 99–100, NAUS.
98. Count Aleksei Alekseevich Bobrinskii (Bobrinskoi) (6/18 January 1800 – 4/16 October 1868) was the grandson of Empress Catherine the Great and Prince Grigorii Grigorievich Orlov (see Images 414, 443). He was a member of the committee set up “to supervise the ... construction” of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway (Richard Mowbray Haywood, The Beginnings of Railway Development in Russia in the Reign of Nicholas I, 1835–1842 [Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1969], p. 227), of which Major Whistler, as consulting engineer, also became a member. See his biography in Appendix E and Image 86.
99. Major Whistler and John Stevenson Maxwell lived from the time of their arrival in Russia in 1842 in the house of Count Aleksei Alekseevich Bobrinskii. The house, which then served as the American Legation, had been rented by Colonel Charles Stewart Todd, who was living in it when they arrived in St. Petersburg and rented accommodations to them (John S Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Oct. 8/20, 1842, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 3). When Colonel Todd, who had been hearing rumors that he was to be recalled, found it financially expedient to give up the house, Major Whistler took the entire house for his family (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, September 9, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21). Maxwell, too, was making preparations to move and had already decided where he would live “when Major W. took the house and offered me the rooms he occupied last winter at the same rent I was going to pay elsewhere, with the privilege of leaving them at any time I choose. I of course was glad to accept his offer, upon his stating that he did not want the rooms and would not let them to any one but me” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21). The freedom to give up his lodgings whenever he might choose, instead of paying three months in advance elsewhere, appealed to Maxwell, who expected his own recall to follow Todd’s. But they were not recalled, and Maxwell, comparing his lodgings to those of his colleagues of the same rank in the diplomatic corps, felt he had “far better rooms for comfort and for show than any” of them (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Oct. 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23).

His description of his rooms enables us to know how a portion of the house looked during the Whistlers’ stay:

Well I am settled for the winter. have taken the rooms in the basement [ground floor] formerly occupied by Major Whistler ... My expenses will not be greater than they would have been elsewhere except in one particular. In the house in which I expected at first to hire apartments. the fuel or heat was a fixture, and formed part of the rent, which is the same I pay here except that I provide my own fire. I can do this for $50 for the winter and it is worth 50 dollars to be in a house where you live with one family you know ... You enter from the Porters Hall into a large room in blue. which I will call the Anti-chamber. It contains a large looking glass, three sofa’s, a number of chairs, and has three curtained windows looking into the street and a highly polished oak floor. In this room there are two doors, one leading into an apology for a buffet, thence into my little bed room, and thence again into my dressing room. Out of the buffet or pantry a door opens leading to the court yard etc. The other door in the blue room leads into my parlour where I am now writing this. The walls are ornamented with a kind of woollen paper representing large red grape vines in a very flourishing state. Around the edge of the ceiling there run’s a gilt or brass band about two inches in breadth, and a chandelier of golden look hangs from the middle of the same. The two windows upon the street are hung with white figured curtain’s which look very well when newly washed, and in opposite corners fastened into the two peitchs for heating the rooms are mirrors of large dimension. The furniture is all of mahogany and the curtains the chairs and sofa of red figured velvet as soft as down can make them. There are four tables, a fire screen, three good ~~views~~ paintings representing charming views in the Crimea etc etc all belonging to Count Boberinsky our landlord excepting a picture of Peter the Great hanging over my head which belongs to Major Whistler. A grate has been inserted in one of the peitches, and a good Liverpool coal fire now blazes away diffusing quite a radiance on all within its radeii which is again reflected from the bright surface of the newly waxed and varnished oak beneath my feet. If I can keep out the dust and dirt, if the heat dont melt off the legs of the tables and chairs, if bugs dont breed in the cushions and sofas I think I shall be snug for the winter. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22)

It is not clear what happened to the portrait of Peter the Great, but the frame is referred to in the later family correspondence (from the GUL: Whistler Collection, Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Scarsdale, 11 July 1855, W458; and Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Scarsdale, 18 July 1855, W456).

100. Colonel Todd (see Image 278) had been hearing rumors that he was to be recalled and therefore was uncertain about the type of accommodations he would take when required to renew the lease. Finally, on quarter-day he “concluded to give up the house ... having no news of a decided character by the last steamer, by which he could regulate his future movements” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21). He set out for Stockholm, intending to be absent three weeks, and to take up lodgings on his return at “M<sup>rs</sup> Benson’s a boarding house on the key where he has engaged a suite of rooms” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1843). The boarding house of the misses Elizabeth and Sarah Benson was located on the English Embankment in the house of Rall, numbered variously as No. 39 and No. 240–241 (RGIA: Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 13. British Residents and British Congregation St. Petersburg 1845 [hereafter, BRBC STP 1845], fol. 5). Maxwell’s reaction to Todd’s choice was that he would “be comfortable, pay dear and loose [sic] caste” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22), for “according to the notions that prevail here and the established etiquette he might as well live in a stable” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Oct. 20, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 23). Maxwell himself later stayed at the misses Benson’s boarding house and has left a delightful vignette of its atmosphere and landladies (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43). See the biography of the Benson sisters in Appendix E (hereafter, Benson).

101. Anna Whistler meant $1800. When they moved to Ritter’s house in 1844, she spoke of the new rent as being $900, half of the old (entry for English Quai – Ritter-Dom, Sept. 23<sup>d</sup> [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I).

When Major Whistler sent for his family, Maxwell accompanied him to look for a suitable house for them: “Rents here are enormous, particularly for furnished houses. and it is almost impossible to get a house to one’s self as they are all so large. Many families live together, each occupying a floor, and in one house here there are 4000 inmates. The Major has not yet made a choice, but he cannot get one to suit him under $2000 per annum furnished and $1500 unfurnished” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Aug. 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17).

102. The Winter Palace (see Images 114–117) was the residence of the Imperial Family. The sixth Winter Palace, it was built in 1754–1764 by Francesco-Bartolomeo Rastrelli (1700–1771). It stands on the site of the razed fourth Winter Palace that he had started to build with his father, Carl Bartolomeo, in 1732. As had the fourth palace, it faces onto the Palace Embankment and Palace Square. It is in the shape of an irregular square around a courtyard, and is four stories high. The main façade of the Winter Palace, which faces onto Palace Square, has gates in the middle consisting of three entries that lead into the main courtyard. To the sides of these gates are porticos with lanterns: the one on the left is the portico of the Heir Apparent, on the right that of the Commandant (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, p. 241; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 240–242).
103. One side of the Winter Palace faces the Neva along the Palace Embankment (see Image 114). Between the front of the Winter Palace and the semi-circle of the Main Staff Headquarters building opposite it is a vast area called Palace Square, sometimes called Alexander Square because of the Alexander column in the center of it (see Images 116, 132). Palace Square may be entered from the Nevskii Prospekt by passing along a short section of street called Malaia Millionnaia, which is irregularly perpendicular to the Nevskii Prospekt, and then through the arch in the building of the Main Staff Headquarters (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 43, 178–179, 341). One then crosses Palace Square and emerges onto the Palace Embankment. Driving along this embankment, one could see across the Neva the Peter and Paul Fortress, with the golden spire of its church (see Image 130). On the Palace Embankment side of the Winter Palace is located the main, or Ambassadors', staircase (also called the Jordan staircase; see Image 115), which leads along a magnificent portico into the main salons of the Winter Palace (Grech, p. 241). This is where Colonel Todd and the Whistlers entered the Winter Palace.

104. The Peter and Paul Fortress and Church (see Image 130) are discussed in the entry for Monday 27th of July [1846], NYPL: AWPB, Part II, and accompanying Note 453, when the Whistlers visited these buildings.
105. The first ships' wharf in St. Petersburg was established by Peter the Great (see Image 411) on 1 October (OS) 1704 on the left bank of the Neva, where the Admiralty now stands (see Image 118). The most outstanding improvements to the building were made in the reign of Alexander I (see Image 418), according to the plans of Academician Andreian Zakharov (1761–1811). The entire length of its façade, from the side where the Nevskii and other two prospects fan out, extends for 200 sazhen. (A sazhen equals 7 ft, or 2.13 m.) The building has three projections: the center projection extends out 10 sazhen and the two side projections 17 sazhen. In the center of the first projection, there is an arch, which constitutes the main gates. The gates are decorated with bas reliefs by Terebenev (1780–1850) and with statues of sea nymphs supporting the heavenly sphere and the figures of Achilles, Ajax, Pirrhos, and Alexander of Macedon. Above the arch is a tower with twenty-eight Ionic columns that form a kind of gallery. Above the cornice are twenty-eight statues representing, among other things, the seasons, the elements, and the countries of the world. The tower rises from the cornice in a round column and ends in a cupola with clocks on three sides. Above that is a lantern surrounded by a gallery with light iron railings. From here, the gilded iron spire begins, at the top of which is a ship 10 feet tall. Under the ship can be seen a crown and an apple, the latter having a diameter of three and a half feet. The height of the spire from the ground is 33 sazhen. On both sides of the central projection the building extends for 37 sazhen and is decorated with military fittings instead of bas reliefs. From here start small projections, of which the first have six columns, while the second have twelve columns, all eighteen Doric. The superb façades, enriched with bas reliefs by Terebenev, give both these projections a magnificent appearance. The roof is decorated with statues by Anisimov. The façades of the sides of the Admiralty that face the Winter Palace and the Senate perfectly match those buildings and are 50 sazhen long. On the Neva side, there are two pavilions; one covers the end of the side façade of the Admiralty and serves as the boundary of the two parallel lines of this building. In the center of the pavilion is a high arch, under which small vessels with masts freely pass. Every day from dawn till dusk the Admiralty flag flutters above the roof of this pavilion (Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 303, 305–306).

106. An excellent, judiciously balanced biography of the complex character of Emperor Nicholas I (Nikolai Pavlovich Romanov) (1796–1855; see Images 420–423) in English, by W. Bruce Lincoln (1938–2000), is Nicholas I: Emperor and Autocrat of All the Russias (Bloomington and London: Indiana University Press, [1978]). As Lincoln states in his preface, “Perhaps no ruler left more of an impression upon nineteenth-century Russia than did the Emperor Nicholas I, for the origins of nearly every major change or event during the last century of Romanov rule can be traced to his reign” (Lincoln, Nicholas I, p. 9). He was “admired, even venerated,” on the one hand, and seen “as the personification of oppression,” on the other (Lincoln, p. 9). Because there are so few historical works on him, it is from the “biased, often bitter” “autobiographical and memoir accounts” of men “who suffered the ravages of censorship during his reign” that we have received “an untempered portait of a cruel, perhaps even mentally unbalanced tyrant” (Lincoln, p. 9) Lincoln recalls as a contrast the nostalgic words of Baroness Frederiks that “during the lifetime of Nikolai Pavlovich, Russia had great and noble stature ... [and] he heaped still greater glory upon her” (quoted in Lincoln, p. 10). See also T.A. Kapustina, “Emperor Nicholas I, 1825–1855,” in The Emperors and Empresses of Russia: Discovering the Romanovs, ed. Donald J. Raleigh, comp. A.A. Iskenderov (Armonk, New York and London: M.E. Sharpe, 1996), pp. 256–293.
107. For the Jordan Staircase, see Image 115.

108. When the Winter Palace was not occupied by the Imperial family, its rooms and galleries were open to select visitors. The Winter Palace the Whistlers were viewing was a restored edifice. It had burned down in December 1837, and what the public viewed had been restored to its original appearance. The restoration was carried out with astonishing speed under the supervision of Count Pyotr Andreevich Kleinmikhel' (see Image 243), head of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings and Major Whistler's superior, and was completed around Easter of 1839. This is one reason why everything seemed fresh to Anna Whistler. For an account of the fire and restoration, see Richard Mowbray Haywood, "The Winter Palace in St. Petersburg: Destruction by Fire and Reconstruction, December 1837 – March 1839," Jahrbücher für Geschichte Ost-europas [Yearbook for the History of Eastern Europe] 27 (1979), H. 2: pp. 161–180.

The New Hermitage (see Image 113) was being built for exhibiting the Imperial collections because the Hermitage was crowded and could not be expanded, as well as because it was the living quarters of the Imperial family. Leo von Klenze (1784–1864), who had been the architect of the Old Pinakothek and the Glyptothek in Munich, was invited to design it. The two persons responsible for supervising the work were the minister of the Imperial Court, Prince P.M. Volkonskii, and the head of Transport and Public Buildings, Count P.A. Kleinmikhel' (see Image 243). The latter had been responsible for rebuilding the Hermitage after the fire of 1837. Construction of the New Hermitage was begun in 1840 and completed in 1852 (V.A. Suslov, "Nikolai I i Novyi Ėrmitazh" ["Nicholas I and the New Hermitage"], in Nikolai I i Novyi Ėrmitazh, Katalog vystavski "150 let Novomu Ėrmitazhu" [Nicholas I and the New Hermitage: Catalogue of the Exhibition "150 Years of the New Hermitage"] [St. Petersburg: Izdstvo Gosudarstvennogo Ėrmitazha, 2002], p. 9–17).

109. The Imperial family would move to Tsarskoe Selo in early spring and back to St. Petersburg in November. In 1843, they moved back to St. Petersburg on 9/21 November (M.A. Korf, Dnevnik God 1843-i [Diary for 1843], in Vremena i nray: memuary, pis'ma, dnevniki [Times and Mores: Memoirs, Letters, Diaries], ed. I.V. Ruzhitskaia [Moscow: Akademiia, 2004], p. 344).
110. The name of the town was Tsarskoe Selo (pronounced "Tsar'skuhyuh Sillaw"; see Images 383–394). The simple explanation of the name is that it began as the Finnish "Saari mois" ("high place," "elevated land"), which in Russian became “Sarskoe Selo” (“Saari Village”) and later “Tsarskoe Selo” (“The Tsar’s Village,” “The Imperial Village”) (George Heard Hamilton, The Art and Architecture of Russia [Baltimore, MD: Penguin, [1954], p. 283; William Craft Brumfield, A History of Russian Architecture [Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press, 1993], p. 221, to name but two sources). S.N. Vil’chkovskii, the author of a guide prepared for the two-hundredth anniversary (1910) of Tsarskoe Selo, offers a plausible fuller explanation for the name of this ancient settlement, which passed from Russian into Swedish hands and during Peter the Great’s war with Charles XII of Sweden was returned to Russia. The Swedish feudal lord, on receiving the ancient Russian ancestral lands of Saritsa as a fief, naturally changed its name to Saritsgof, because the suffix “gof” meant there was a landlord’s house in the given settlement. Such settlements with a noble owner living in them were in Russian usage of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries referred to in this locale as a “myza” (grange, farmstead), probably because the local Finnish population called them “mois,” which means “myza.” Thus, the noble Saritsgof became in the speech of the Finnish settlers Saarimois, while it passed into Russian speech as Saritskaia and Sarskaia myza. The name Sarskaia myza changed in the time of Empress Elizaveta Petrovna to Sarskoe Selo because there had by then arisen around the former “myza” an entire settlement with a church attended by all the peasants from the surrounding Russian villages. Gradually the word “selo” began to replace “myza” in official documents as well. In the reign of Catherine the Great, everyone said and wrote “Tsarskoe Selo,” but “Sarskoe” appeared in some official documents up to 1808 (S.N. Vil’chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, reproduction of the 1911 edition [St. Petersburg: Title Publishing House, 1992], p. 12). However, Pushkarev said in 1842 that the place continued to be called “Sarskaia” up to the present time, while “Tsarskoe” was the name used in all official documents as of 1725 (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 48). As we see from their correspondence, Colonel Todd and Maxwell wrote “Sarscacello” even in the 1840s.

In addition to “Sarscacello” one also sees the spelling “Sarscocello” in the diaries, but they are pronounced identically: “Sar’skuhsillaw’.” In these English versions, “c” represents in the first instance the sound of “k” and in the second instance the sound of “s,” as though it is first “c” from the Roman alphabet and then the Cyrillic “c,” the equivalent of English “s.” Thus, where one would expect the English pronunciation “chello” as in Monticello, we get instead “sello.”

111. Grand Duke Nikolai Aleksandrovich, the Heir Apparent (see Images 428–429), was born on 8 September 1843 [20 September NS] (Korf, Dnevnik 1843, p. 282). His christening took place on Sunday, 10 October 1843 [22 October NS] (Korf, pp. 303–305). Eventually, it was decided by Nicholas I that the child’s birthday would be celebrated on 10 October (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 278, Wednesday, December 8 [December 20 NS], 1843, p. 1273). Anna Whistler was in error about the date of the christening.

Maxwell has left an amusing account of Todd’s invitation to and attendance at the christening:

I think I told you in a former letter of the birth of a prince; the lineal heir to the Imperial honours. Great has been the rejoicing thereupon. The first intimation I had of the event was an unusual firing of cannon; the next, a visit from a Master of Ceremonies ‘pour annoncer l’heureuse délivrance de Son Altesse Impériale, Madame la Grande Césarevna Grande Duchesse Marie Alexandrovna et la naissance de Son Altesse Impériale le Grand Duc Nicholas Alexandrovitch’. Then followed a proclamation from the Emperor to his well beloved subjects directing a general Te Deum throughout the empire and finally a circular was issued to the Court giving the necessary information respecting the process of baptism. I enclose you one of these Circulars in French; let Ag [his sister, Agnes] translate it for you. In the Circular no mention is made of the place or position assigned the ‘Corps diplomatique’ and I verily thought at one time that this interesting set of wise acres were intentionally left out. His Excellency Colonel Todd was really quite astonished at the oversight and only recovered his ministerial composure upon the reception of a note inviting him, and not me, to the holy ceremony. The Secretarys and such small fry were beneath notice on such an occasion and Ambassadors and Envoys ‘all the go’ As to my individual self it was a matter of perfect indifference whether I went or not and the truth is it was greatly for my interest not to go at all. The place of ceremony is fifteen miles from here and I would have had to incur considerable expense to have gone and returned and I would not have seen more than I am almost tired of seeing already. His Excellency left here at 6 in the morning, was on his feet most of the day, soiled his uniform in the rain, and has been laid up with a cold ever since; the only particular indemnification he received on this particular occasion being (to use his own words) ‘the honour of dining for the first time at the very same table with an Emperor’. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Nov. 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 24)

See also his description of his and Todd’s attendance at the “revelailles, which being translated, signifies the churching and giving thanks upon recovery,” which took place on 25 October / 6 November (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Nov. 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 25; Korf, Dnevnik 1843, p. 329).

112. The parents of the Grand Duke Nikolai Aleksandrovich (Tsarskoe Selo 8 September [OS] 1843 – Nice 12/24 April 1865) were Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (Moscow 17 April [OS] 1818 – St. Petersburg 1 March [OS] 1881), the future Aleksandr II, and Grand Duchess Maria Aleksandrovna (Darmstadt 27 July / 8 August 1824 – St. Petersburg 22 May [OS] 1880) (born Maximiliana-Wilhelmina-Augusta-Sophia-Maria, Princess of Hesse-Darmstadt) (Yu. A. Kuz’min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familiia 1797–1917 Biobibliograficheskii spravochnik [The Russian Imperial Family 1797–1917: A Biobibliographical Handbook] [St. Petersburg: Dmitrii Bulanin, 2005], pp. 72, 203, 266). See Images 425–427.
113. Anna Whistler did not indicate a new entry, but at this point she was writing in early December.
114. Emperor Alexander I (b. St. Petersburg 12/23 December 1777; see Image 418) died in Taganrog on 19 November / 1 December 1825.
115. The accession of Nicholas I (Tsarskoe Selo 25 June 1796 [OS] – St. Petersburg 18 February 1855 [OS]; see Images 420–423) took place on 14/26 December 1825; he was crowned in Moscow on 22 August / 3 September 1826. For an explanation of the events occurring between his brother’s death and the events of 14/26 December, see Lincoln, Nicholas I, pp. 13, 17–47. For the date of his coronation, see Kuz’min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familiia, p. 238.
116. They are the equivalent of Western storm windows, but with a larger space between the two panes.
117. Anna Whistler was now writing in late December.

118. “Dvanic” (see Image 362) is Anna Whistler’s pronunciation of the Russian word for “the man who takes care of the yard,” spelled “dvornik” and pronounced “dvor’nyeek.” When she uses the term a few lines later, she adds the English plural suffix -s.
119. Image 97 shows the care of the Nevskii Prospekt in winter: Nevskii Prospekt by Moonlight (Nevskii Prospekt pri lunnom osveshchenii) (1855–59).
120. A “shuba,” pronounced like “shoe” + “buh,” is a loose, hooded, ankle-length, fur-lined cloak or pelisse. Anna Whistler renders this pronunciation as “shu’be” (two syllables). The anglicized plural would be “shoe” + “buzz” (see Image 13).
121. Anna Whistler omitted the verb in this sentence, probably “saw.” See “St. Petersburg and the Journey There” regarding the symbolic meaning of the pigeon for Russians.
122. Major Whistler was away from the evening of 20 December until the morning of 22 December 1843.
123. The covered sled was called a “kibitka” (see Image 354).
124. His name on his Russian service record transliterates as Vil’gel’m Ivanovich Truveller (born c. 1809) (RGIA: Fond 200, op. 1, d. 8101. Formulianiyni spisok o sluzhbe i dostoinstve Korpusa Inzhenerov putei soobshcheniia Maiora Truvellera. Za 1841 god. [Service and merit record of Major Truveller of the Corps of Transport Engineers. For 1841.]), but he was an Englishman named Frederick William Trewheeler (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 57; PREC STP for 1834, p. 192). In early 1843, he had submitted to P.P. Mel’nikov (see following Note) a project for building a railway from Peterhof. Mel’nikov had responded that Truveller’s drawing and note were not sufficiently complete to permit a positive conclusion to be drawn [RGIA: Fond 207, op. 5, d. 85. Po pis’mu Maiora Truvellera, s pro’ektom na ustroistvo zheleznoi dorogi ot Petergofa k vnov’ predpolagaemomu soobshcheniiu mezhdru obeimi stolitsami. 7 fev. 1843 g. – 12 fev. 1843 g. [Concerning the letter of Major Truveller with a project to build a railway from Peterhof to the again proposed connection between the two capitols. 7 Feb. 1843 – 12 Feb. 1843], fols. 6r, 7r and v, 8r-13r). When he met Anna Whistler, he was retired and a civilian contractor under contract to build the Volga bridge for the Department of Railways (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 205). Except for Russian documents cited, his surname will be spelled as it appears in Anna Whistler’s diaries.

125. Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel'nikov (22 July / 3 August 1804 – 22 July / 3 August 1880) was in charge of the Northern Administration of the tract of the future St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. The Northern Administration ran from St. Petersburg to the Kolomenets River in the Valdai Hills of Novgorod Province. Mel'nikov made his residence in the town of Chudovo. See the biographies of the Mel'nikov family in Appendix E (hereafter, Mel'nikov) and Image 247.
126. As there were several German jewelers on the Nevskii Prospekt and on streets running off the Nevskii, it is not possible to say which one they went to.
 For a discussion of Victorian hair jewelry and its significance as a memory of death (momento mori) object, see Karen Bachmann, “Hairy Secrets: Human Relic as Memory Object in Victorian Mourning Jewelry” (master’s thesis, Purchase College, State University of New York, 2013) and Helen Sheumaker, Love Entwined: The Curious History of Hairwork in America (Pittsburgh: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2007); see also Image 367.
127. There was one confectioner on Galernaia Street. This was Kalats, whose shop was located in the house of Shitt at 24 Galernaia Street (N. Tsylov, Gorodskoi ukazatel' ili Adresnaia kniga vrachei, khudozhnikov, remeslennikov, torgovykh mest, remeslennykh zavedenii i t.p. na 1849 god [City Directory, or, Address Book of Doctors, Artists, Artisans, Places of Trade, Artisans' Establishments, Etc. for 1849] [St. Petersburg, 1849], p. 174). Twenty-four Galernaia Street was the second house from the corner of Zamiatin Lane. See “Maps.”
128. The English Store or Magazine (Angliiskii magazin) was the best and most widely stocked of all Petersburg stores (see Image 108). Founded in 1789, it had belonged since 1815 to Konstantin V. Nichols and William F. Plincke. Located on the corner of Nevskii Prospekt and Malaia Millionnaia Street (entrance from this street) in the house of Vasil'chikov, No. 61, it remained in this building for almost one hundred years. The store had no sign, and its only distinguishing external feature was that half of each window was frosted glass. Everything from wine and china to velvet and diamonds was sold here. In the basement, there was a wine cellar on the left, one of the best in the capital; on the right were sold cigars, faience, and porcelain wares. Upstairs there was a series of gallery-like rooms containing toiletries, cosmetic goods, bone, bronze, leather and steel articles; stationery; silverware; silk, wool and cotton fabrics, muslin, tulle, ready-to-wear dresses, mantillas, etc.; gold and silver articles, insignia (for orders); diamonds; broadcloth, velvet, carpets, rubber, etc. Foreign goods were ordered for it directly from abroad from the best factories, and the best Petersburg artisans filled orders for it as well. The prices were high, and no haggling was permitted, but even the most inexperienced customer could rely on the word of its salesmen. The store was famous also for the politeness and attentiveness of its floorwalkers (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 17–18; Vikentii Kishkin-Zhgerskii (P. Kiszke-Żgierski), Kommercheskii ukazatel' goroda St. Peterburga na 1831 god [Commercial Guide for the City of St. Petersburg for 1831] [St. Petersburg: Litografia Varmonta, [1831]], p. 5; Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaiia, pp. 25–27; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 622).

129. The “Russian pictures” are probably the facsimile portraits of Russian peasants by Russian artists that Anna Whistler wrote James in 1853 she had found among some books in her trunk (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, New York, Dec. 1st thursday evening [1853], GUL: Whistler Collection, W427). Whatever the work was that she gave her sons for Christmas, it had to have been published no later than December 1843. The work that comes to mind is the bilingual collection of lithographs Sobranie risunkov izobrazhainshchikh raznoshchikov v S. Peterburge – Cris de St. Pétersbourg. Collection de petits dessins à l'usage de la jeunesse, dessinés & coloriés dans l'établissement de Charles Beggrow [The Cries of St. Petersburg: A Collection of Small Drawings for the Use of Children, Designed and Colored in the Workshop of Charles Beggrow [Karl Beggrow]] (St. Petersburg: Charles Beggrow, 1834) (see Images 364–365). That they were individual (loose) pictures seems attested to by Anna Whistler’s comment that she “arranged” them.
130. The word is “écritoire.” This desk was stolen and never retrieved, but an earlier laptop desk belonging to Anna Whistler can be seen at the Lighthouse Museum in Stonington, Connecticut. It is 7½ by 11½ inches and bears a silver plaque with the initials A.M.W. and the date 1833. It was given to the museum by “Mr. and Mrs. David M. Johnstone in the 1970s after Mrs. Stuart, his mother, moved from the 24 Main Street house [“the Old Corner House” of the Palmer family]” (Mary M. Thacher, librarian, SHS, to E. Harden, 2 June 1996).
131. It has not been possible to locate this note.
132. Emma Elizabeth Maingay (6 February 1826 – 27 December 1904) became Deborah Whistler’s closest friend in St. Petersburg. They remained lifelong friends in England. See the biographies of the Maingay family in Appendix E (hereafter, Maingay) and Image 263.

133. William Clarke Gellibrand (31 March 1791 – 20 April 1884), husband of William H. Ropes's sister, Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (13 October 1812 – 16 April 1894), was an English merchant and a partner in Hubbard and Company. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E and Images 265–267.
134. Anna Whistler does not identify her guests, but one of them was Maxwell, who described “the history of my Christmas day” to his mother:

Soon after ten I went above stairs and wished the Whistlers a merry day and offered the Major and the Majors daughter, tickets to the first great ball of the Nobility in the evening. The Major who had been sick for some days was still too ill to think of going out and I myself could not expect to take charge of the youthful daughter, even if agreeable to herself or her Father, for it would not be proper as things are constituted here. Miss W was a little disappointed but had not much to regret as we will see hereafter. Having accepted to dine with them at 4 P.M. I left ... After two or three other calls. I returned and dressed for dinner. Soon after going aloft I handed M<sup>rs</sup> W, to the table and with three other American guests sat down to an excellent dinner. Just as I finished my coffee I was summoned to attend my German Professor ... Then it was time to dress for the ball ... I presented M<sup>rs</sup> W. with a few jars of Russian preserves, and divers specimens of Russian cakes and confectionary. To the young lady I sent some bonbons and three of the ~~best~~ Opera's of the best composer's, to the Major I sent some fine French fruit, including St Germain pears, for which I paid one ruble each, and the boys I gave some trifling affairs as playthings. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27)

Maxwell also made clear in this letter that he was talking of “Christmas our style,” that is, according to the Gregorian Calendar. In saying that Deborah Whistler did well by not being present at the ball, Maxwell had in mind that the ball at a later hour changed to a masquerade, which was open to all classes of society who chose to buy tickets to it, and she might, therefore, have been offended (see Image 374).

135. In order to help his children commit the dry and difficult facts of the solar system to memory, Rev. Legh Richmond (see Image 189) presented the material in a poem called “The Solar System.” It consists of an introduction, eleven stanzas describing the sun, planets, asteroids, and comets, and a conclusion devoted to the glorification of God the Creator. The poem was published in 1833 for its usefulness to other children. See Domestic Portraiture, pp. 36–40. It is not possible to say when Anna and Major Whistler became aware of the book, but by 1843 it had passed through several editions.

Legh Richmond (Liverpool 29 January 1772 – Turvey 5 May 1827), evangelical divine, entered Trinity College, Cambridge in 1789, where “he obtained considerable proficiency in the practice and theory of music.” He suffered from weak health, as well as being permanently lame from a childhood accident. He received the BA (aegrotat degree) in 1794. In 1797, he married Mary Chambers of Bath. In 1799, he received the “M.A., and was ordained to the curacy of the parishes of Brading and Yaverland in the Isle of Wight,” with his residence in Brading. Under “the influence of ... Wilberforce’s ‘Practical View of Christianity,’” shortly after coming to the Isle of Wight he “first adopted those strictly evangelical views with which his name was thenceforth associated.” Here, too, he gathered the material for “his three famous tales of village life”: “The Dairyman’s Daughter,” “The Young Cottager,” and “The Negro Servant,” which he wrote in 1809, after having left the Isle of Wight, and published between 1809 and 1814 under the name “Simplex.” Instantly popular, “they were reprinted by the Religious Tract Society in 1814 under the general title of ‘The Annals of the Poor.’” The book was translated into many languages, “obtained a very wide circulation in America,” and was estimated to have reached a circulation “in the English language alone” of two million copies during Richmond’s lifetime. In spring 1805, Richmond became “assistant chaplain to the Lock Hospital in London,” but on 30 July of the same year “was inducted into the rectory of Turvey in Bedfordshire.” Here, he became a popular preacher, drawing an audience from other towns as well, as “[c]lergymen of ability holding evangelical views were rare.” He was also “among the earliest clergymen to initiate and encourage” village benefit societies. He was, as well, deeply involved “in the establishment of the great evangelical societies like the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Church Missionary Society, and the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews,” undertaking “extended and successful preaching tours ... to collect money for them.” In 1806, he became editor of the series Fathers of the English Church. Eight volumes “of selections from the writings of the English reformers” appeared between 1807 and 1812, but the venture was not a financial success, and in 1814 his friends “with some difficulty” covered the losses. In 1814, he was also appointed personal chaplain by the Duke of Kent. In 1820, while on a preaching tour in Scotland, Richmond visited Iona, which had no church or resident Christian minister. Although he raised some £92,000 to remedy this lack, the Duke of Argyll, owner of the island, himself undertook to build “a church, minister’s house, and school.” Richmond’s fund was used instead to set up “a free library for the island.” In 1822, memorials were erected in the Isle of Wight to the cottagers whom Richmond had made famous, and he himself was present at the ceremony. In 1825, Richmond’s second son, Wilberforce, died at Turvey of consumption, and, shortly after, his eldest son, Nugent, died at sea of fever, while returning home from India after a long absence. Richmond’s already-delicate health was further undermined, and he died on 8 May 1827 (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Richmond, Legh [1772–1827]”; Domestic Portraiture; Grimshawe, Memoir of Richmond).

136. Francis Lister Hawks (Newbern, NC 10 June 1798 – New York 24 September 1866) graduated from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill in 1815. He studied law in the only law school in America at that time, in Litchfield, Connecticut, and at twenty-one was admitted to the bar in North Carolina. The death of his wife, Emma Kirby, whom he had married in 1823, influenced a decision to become a cleric. In 1827, “he was ordained ... a minister of the Protestant Episcopal Church.” He served for about a year in New Haven, Connecticut, where he also married again, and then in Philadelphia. He next was called to New York, serving briefly at St. Stephen’s Church and then, for twelve years, at St. Thomas’s. He came to be considered “a pulpit orator” of “very remarkable ability.” In 1835, he published several volumes in a children’s series called the “Boys’ and Girls’ Library,” which consisted of dialogues between a knowledgeable “Uncle Philip” and an inquiring audience of children. In 1836, he “visited England ... for the purpose of obtaining copies of ... documents ... related to the early history of the Episcopal Church in America,” some of which he later published. In 1837, he established, with a colleague, the New York Review, to which he contributed two outstanding articles: one on Thomas Jefferson and the other on Aaron Burr. In 1839, he established the St. Thomas' Hall School on Long Island that failed financially and bankrupted him. He was also connected with the N-YHS (founded in 1804), which he helped "to restore ... to life and usefulness" in the late 1830s, when it was in a period of decline. From 1849 to 1859, he was on its Executive Committee; from 1855 to 1859, he was the First Vice-President of the American Ethnological Society (organized in 1842); and from 1855 to 1861, he was President of the American Geographical and Statistical Society. From 1836 to 1863, he published works "relating to American history, civil and ecclesiastical." In 1843, he accepted a call to Mississippi, where he spent about one year before accepting a call to New Orleans, where he served for five years. In 1849, he "was recalled to New York" to become rector of Calvary Church, and a subscription was raised to eliminate the debt he had incurred in establishing the St. Thomas' Hall School. In 1861, out of sympathy with the Southern cause, he resigned from Calvary Church and accepted a call to Christ Church in Baltimore. He returned after some two years to New York and eventually became rector of a new church, which was called the "Chapel of the Holy Saviour." On 4 September 1866, he spoke at the cornerstone ceremony of this new church. On the twenty-seventh, he died. He was buried in Greenwich, Connecticut. (All quotations are taken from Evert A. Duyckinck, A Memorial of Francis L. Hawks, D.D., LL. D. Read before the New-York Historical Society May 7th, 1867 [New York, 1871], pp. 9–40. See also "The Late Francis L. Hawks," Putnam's Magazine [January 1868]: pp. 100–105.) There is "a list of his sermon titles from ... October 1864 to June 1866" at the N-YHS; almost "all of his titles are short lines of New Testament scripture." As "most of his sermon-writing was done during his rectorship at St. Thomas Church ... (1831 to 1843)," I was directed there. (All quotations are from Mariam Touba, N-YHS, to E. Harden, 17 August 2004). An enquiry sent to Saint Thomas Church resulted only in acknowledgment of my letter but no subsequent information (Rev. Andrew C. Mead, New York, to E. Harden, 21 October 2004).

137. The only daughter, at this time, of Anna Whistler's sister in Stonington, Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer, was Julia McNeill Palmer, who had been born on 25 March 1841 (d. 22 February 1902) (Donald P. Stanton to Kate McDiarmid, Stonington, 25

- November 1928, GUL: Whistler Collection, S191). Therefore, Anna Whistler had to be referring to her nieces, Mary Isabella McNeill and Catherine Julia McNeill (see Images 32–33), daughters of her brother General William Gibbs McNeill (1801–1853; see Image 31) and Maria (Cammann) McNeill (1799–1850). They must have been making one of their frequent visits to Stonington. It has not been possible to locate their letters. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
138. Psalm 97:1–2: “<sup>1</sup> The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof. <sup>2</sup> Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.”
139. The Lausanne was cleared for departure from the port of New York on 29 November 1843 (New York Herald, November 29, 1843, vol. 9, no. 316, whole no. 3538). It has not been possible to locate young George Whistler’s letter.
140. In a letter dated 26 November 1843, General Joseph Gardner Swift (1783–1865; see Image 11), brother of Major Whistler’s first wife, requested of Colonel John J. Abert (1788–1863), Commander of the Corps of Topographical Engineers, that he get a Protection from the Secretary of State for George W. Whistler Jr. of New York, his nephew, who was “on the eve of sailing for the Sandwich Islands, mouth of the Columbia River, Manilla and Home again and had to act on the spur of the moment because of delicate health and the fact that the only ship travelling to that particular destination was to sail on Wednesday” (NAUS: Passports, M1371, roll 2, passport no. 1737). See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
141. It has not been possible to locate this letter containing information about Charlie’s remains and Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (10 August 1775 – 7 April 1852; see Image 22). Martha (Kingsley) McNeill was going to visit her younger son, Charles Johnston McNeill (6 March 1802 – 2 March 1869) at Reddys Point, Florida (Ida Brooks Kellam and Elizabeth Francenia McKoy, St. James Church Wilmington, North Carolina Historical Records 1737–1852, 3 vols. [Wilmington, NC: I.B. Kellam, 1965], vol 1, p. 75; Schafer, Anna Madgigine Jai Kingsley, pp. 114, 153; Anna Whistler to [Mr. and Mrs. Gamble], London, May 6, [18]69, GUL: Whistler Collection, W356; biography of Anna Whistler in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s”; biography of Charles Johnston McNeill in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E).

142. Anna Whistler is referring to Thursday, 28 December 1843.
143. “A few days since Major W’s little boys and daughter presented their Mother as a Christmas gift a very pretty rosewood writing case of very rich workmanship. Two or three mornings after it had disappeared, and we are all at a loss how to account for the robbery. It was taken from the drawing room – during the night. Some of the servants undoubtedly have stolen it, but what can be done? To apply to the police would be to create expense and difficulty, and to turn away the servants would be to take others perhaps worse than those on the premisses” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27).
144. It has not been possible to ascertain the name of the Master of Police of their quarter.
145. Maxwell elaborates on the loss of the flute, the servants on whom suspicion fell, and the Whistlers’ kindness to their servants:

The Major has discovered that he has lost his flute as well as the writing case. This flute, a very fine one he paid 20 guinea’s for many years ago in London and he valued it as an old companion above all price. We have sent to the police, the officers have been here, searched without finding, carried off a young man who was a waiter, who had not been very long in St. Petersburg, who spoke German and a little Russian, and who is generally suspected as the robber. They attached a rope to his arm and in this way took him off. At the police office, he charged it upon the Dvornik or Court yard keeper, a poor ignorant wild Russian who is half frightened to death and who has likewise been before the police. But they have both been released, and the officers after manifesting very little care in the matter seem to have dropped ~~the matter~~ the enquiry. My old fox of a servant [La Ronne] was out with me late on the night of the robbery. I sent him home from the French theatre with the carriage, and returned myself with a friend sometime after midnight when we took supper. It is impossible to say with confidence whether he knows any thing of it or not. He has access to every thing I have, and as I trust to him I thought best to inform him that if any thing was gone I would shoot him, a privilege I have by virtue of my office. But I really pity the Majors family in such a state of affairs. They have been so unaccustomed to lock up from their servants, but to treat them kindly and with confidence. Those they have they pay better and treat better than they ~~are~~ could expect, and to be plundered in this impudent way is outrageous. The man that is suspected cannot speak one word of English and the only way of directing him was through the quickly acquired German of Miss W. The worst of the matter is, that having applied to the police, he (Major W) will be exposed to the extortions of this body of swindlers for some time to come, nor will he ever recover his things, if they are found, without paying the finder their full original value. The only way to live in security here is, either, to have little and lock that up yourself as securely as you can and trust to luck or to have much and pay a princely salary to the man you think honest enough to be your maître d'hotel, and master of your house from top to bottom. In this last case. you hold one person responsible. and are relieved from much embarrassment. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 4, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27)

This was not the first time that Major Whistler's premises had been robbed. In September 1843, not long before the arrival of the Major's family, Maxwell wrote his mother at length about the theft of a large sum of money from the Major's rooms, his carelessness with his money, the preferential treatment he received, and crime in St. Petersburg in general:

Our quiet household has been disturbed by a very serious occurrence. although a common one in St. Petersburg. Major Whistlers rooms upon the basement [ground] floor were entered from the windows on the street night before last [Thursday, 8 September], his desk drawer broken open and six hundred dollars in paper roubles taken therefrom. In a port folio in the same drawer there was about the same amount of money, (all of which he had received from the Government the day before) which the robbers did not discover. They took however two gold eagles, ~~of~~ American coin, and left one which they, in their haste could not have seen. There was much other valuable property in the room and the Colonel of the Police and Aide de Camp to Pevrofsky [L.A. Perovskii (1792–1856)], Minister of the Interior, who visited the premises, expressed it as his opinion that the theft was committed by some person living on the premises and knowing the money to be in the drawer. This is the opinion of the Major and mine, and Colonel Todds. for no one could, except some one who saw it, know that the money was in that particular drawer. The officer who visited the house at the request of his Excellency Col Todd; for we are exempt by virtue of our position from the voluntary attentions of the police; requested permission to work secretly and use extraordinary measures to detect the robbers. The permission has been granted and I have no doubt agents are about us who will discover something, although Major W. will never recover a cent, as I am informed that nothing is ever restored to the owners. Major W is rather careless with his money, and as there are no ordinary banks of deposite, is liable to meet with accident, particularly ~~here~~ as there are very numerous thefts now every day in the neighbourhood. It is a little remarkable that the police force of the quarter or district on the morning preceding the robbery, summoned before them our ~~dwor~~ dwornick or person who sweeps the sidewalk and court yard, and informed him that as the long nights were approaching fast, he must keep a watch with his neighbour dwornicks, for they would not answer for any burglary that might be committed in the neighbourhood. Certain it is many robberies are committed, and murders too. We hear of them occasionally, but the great majority of cases are never known to the public, as there are no newspapers or person's permitted to mention such events. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1843, entry dated Sept. 10, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 21).

It has not been possible to ascertain the name of L.A. Perovskii's aide de camp.

146. Anna Whistler meant "are."
147. "Men are but Children of a larger growth" is a line spoken by Dollabella in John Dryden's All for Love; or, The World Well Lost (1678) (Menston, UK: Scholar Press, 1969), p. 46.
148. The two trips made by Major Whistler were the one to England in 1828–29, where he was sent by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and the one in 1842 to Russia.
149. It has not been possible to determine the name of the new dwornik or of his brother.

150. Anna Whistler meant “for us to apply”.
151. Luke 21:19: “In your patience possess ye your souls.”
152. Emma Woodbridge Palmer (24 November 1835 – 28 July 1912), Anna Whistler’s step-niece, writing to Elizabeth Robins Pennell in 1906, said of Charlie’s funeral:

H. Clay Trumbull in a little sketch of the Whistlers speaks of the arrival of his little body, as follows An incident that made an impression on my mind in connection with the absence of the Whistlers in Russia, was the death then of their youngest child, and the bringing to Stonington of a casket containing his body, everything was different from the plain N England style Instead of the red mahogany, or cherry, there was an ornate oaken sarcophagus ornamented with silver lace, including a Greek cross of this lace, on the top of the sarcophagus. I was asked by my Aunt Mrs Palmer to act as bearer to the little one! (Emma W. Palmer to Elizabeth R. Pennell, Letters Relating to Whistler, LC: P-W, box 296)

It has not been possible to locate the letter from Catherine (McNeill) Palmer. Maria mentioned here is Maria (Cammann) McNeill, sister-in-law of Anna (McNeill) Whistler and Catherine (McNeill) Palmer. Julie is Maria (Cammann) McNeill’s daughter.

153. Psalm 23:4: “Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.”
154. Anna Whistler is referring to Mary Brennan’s brother, James, in Springfield, Massachusetts (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Stonington, August 23, 1849, GUL: Whistler Collection, W389; Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Scarsdale, Monday evening Dec. 15th [18]56, GUL: Whistler Collection, W472). See Brennan, Bergin, Keefe in Appendix E.
155. This is Mary Isabella McNeill (see Image 32), daughter of General William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31) and Maria (Cammann) McNeill.
156. This is Caroline (Whistler) Bloodgood (12 March 1810 – 26 November 1893), daughter of Major G.W. Whistler’s eldest brother, William (see Image 34). She married (c. 1826) Lt. William Bloodgood (1801 – 1 August 1874), USMA Class of 1824. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.

157. George Bloodgood (1830 – January 1909) was the son of Caroline (Whistler) and Lt. William Bloodgood. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
158. Wilkins Bloodgood (1841–1862) was the son of Caroline (Whistler) and Major (New York Militia, 1838–54) William Bloodgood. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
159. Pine Grove was a small town in Schuyler County, New York. It was located some forty miles south of Geneva, Ontario County, New York. Along with Tyrone and Tobanna, it was a post office (John W. Barber and Henry Howe, Historical Collections of the State of New York [New York: S. Tuttle, 1844], p. 532). It is here that Anna Whistler left Charles Donald Whistler for at least a week with Cousin Caroline (Whistler) Bloodgood.
160. Eliza M. (Hamilton) Van Vechten (9 July 1824 – 30 December 1898) was the daughter of Major Thomas Hamilton (U.S. Army), and Catherine (Whistler) Hamilton, Major G.W. Whistler's sister (James Whistler Wood [son of Major G.W. Whistler's youngest sister, Caroline (Whistler) Wood], comp., Whistler Family Genealogy, Chicago Historical Society [hereafter, CHS: Whistler], p. 4; see also Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E). She is also called "Eliza Van Vee" in the diaries.
161. Eliza M. Hamilton married (22 September 1842) Abraham Van Vechten (24 December 1819 – 7 May 1894), an attorney. Their first child, whose name we do not know, died. Eliza was again pregnant at the time of this diary entry. A second child, Hamilton, was born 3 October 1844 (d. 19 May 1894) (Peter Van Vechten Jr., The Genealogical Records of the Van Vechten's from 1638 to 1896 [Milwaukee, WI: Radtke Bros. and Kortsch, 1896], p. 44; James Brown Van Vechten and Marquis E. Shattuck, comps., The Van Vechten Genealogy [Detroit: Printed by the author, 1954], p. 116).
162. "The Joy of Grief" was written between 1802 and 1806 by James Montgomery (Irvine, Ayshire 4 November 1771 – Sheffield 1 May 1854), a Scottish poet belonging to the Moravian Brethren. It appeared in The Poetical Works of Rogers, Campbell, J. Montgomery, Lamb, and Kirke White: Complete in One Volume [Paris: A. and W. Galignani, 1829], p. 124 of "The Poetical Works of James Montgomery" therein; William Anderson, The Scottish Nation; or the Surnames, Families, Literature, Honours, and Biographical History of the People of Scotland, 3 vols. [Edinburgh and London, A. Fullarton, 1863], vol. 3, pp. 184–185). "Montgomery's reputation today rests on his hymns, which are well-represented in modern hymnals ... he played a significant role in establishing the use of

- hymns in worship ... He not only contributed original compositions to Thomas Cotterill's collection, but his support and encouragement helped to ensure official sanction of this, the first authorized hymnal of the Church of England" (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. "Montgomery, James [1771–1854]"). It is possibly from this hymnal of her church that Anna Whistler knew "The Joy of Grief." The phrase refers to the "sweet relief" that comes "while the wounds of woe are healing" and "pensive memory ... retraces scenes of bliss forever fled," and one's hopes ascending to heaven, "triumph ... over death and time" (Friends' Intelligencer, 33 [1876–77]: p. 638).
163. Anna Whistler had been present at the marriage of Louisa Josephine Swift (30 April 1821 – 16 January 1859) to Peter Richards, Jr. (28 October 1811 – 30 August 1893), the Rev. P.P. Irving presiding, at Geneva, New York, on 22 June 1843. Josephine, or Josée, as she was called, was the daughter of General Joseph Gardner Swift (31 December 1783 – 23 July 1865; see Image 11), brother of Major Whistler's first wife. General Swift had written in his journal: "the wedding party dispersed, some to the falls, others to N.Y., etc." (Ellery, Memoirs of Gen. J.G. Swift, p. 247).
164. "On board the steamboat at Albany, I unexpectedly met Mrs. McNeil Mrs. Whistler Debo. and George hurrying on to Stonington where they expected to find Cousin Anna's eldest son on his death bed" (Alexander J. Swift to his father [General Joseph G. Swift], West Point July 1st 1843, Alexander J. Swift (1810–1847) Papers, USMA Library, West Point, NY, [hereafter, USMAL: A.J. Swift Papers], CU 587).
165. The child is Ellen Gellibrand Ropes (1841–1924).
166. This is Harriet Beall (Williams) Bodisco (c. 1824 – 20 June 1890), American wife of the Russian Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States of America, Baron Alexander Andreevich Bodisco (18/29 October 1786 – 11/23 January 1854). At the time of their marriage on 9 April 1840, Harriet Beall Williams was sixteen and her bridegroom fifty-three. Mrs. Bodisco was considered strikingly beautiful. See the biographies of the Bodisco and Williams families in Appendix E (hereafter, Bodisco and Williams) and Images 283–285.
167. The child is Nicholas Alexander Bodisco (b. Georgetown, DC, 6/18 April 1841). This information from the records of Christ Church in Georgetown has very kindly been provided by its director of administration and archivist, Glenn A. Metzdorf. The - dates given in the will of Baron Alexander Bodisco, dated 1 July 1853, agree with it. I wish to thank Robert W. Lyle, curator, Peabody Room, Georgetown Regional Branch of District of Columbia Public Library, for supplying a copy of the English translation of the will, originally in French (hereafter, Olographe Testament); see also extracts in the newspaper Georgetowner, February 2, 1956. Anna Whistler was comparing the child with Charles Donald Whistler. See Bodisco and Williams in Appendix E.

168. This may be a child's version of John 3:16: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."
  169. Nicholas Alexander Bodisco had an English nurse named Marie Trueman. This information is taken from Baron Bodisco's request on 6[/18] June 1844 in St. Petersburg for a passport to return to his post in Washington. It was to be issued for Mr. and Mme. Bodisco and their three-year-old son, Nicholas, accompanied by their personal servants: Marie Trueman, Englishwoman and nurse to the child; Cyrille Bigle, of Paris, maid; and Samuel Dohna, Swedish subject (Arkhiv Vneshnei politiki Rossiiskoi Imperii (AVPRI) [Archive of Foreign Policy of the Russian Empire], Moscow: Fond MID, Kantseliariia, 1844, op. 469, d. 175, Washington/Bodisco-Cte Zabelo/, l. 76 [Fond of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Chancery, 1844, op. 469, d. 175, Washington/Bodisco – Cte Zabelo/, fol. 76]).
  170. The Bodiscos were staying at the Hotel de Paris (proprietor: Louis), a first-class hotel located on the corner of Malaia Morskaia Street and Brick Lane (Kirpichnyi pereulok), in the building belonging to Voronovich (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, p. 160; Konechnyi, Prigulki, p. 284n6).
  171. In giving his mother an account of the Americans staying in St. Petersburg in the winter of 1843–44, Maxwell said of Mrs. Bodisco: "The lady has been presented to the Emperor, Empress etc who pronounced her beautiful while every body wonders how the old fox without a hair on his head or a tooth of his own won so stylish a republican lady. Having charmed the Emperor she is invited every where and has commenced her first lessons in Russian life" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Dec. 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 26).
  172. On January 22, 1844, Colonel Charles Stewart Todd (see Image 278) celebrated his fifty-third birthday.

173. Reverend Edward Law (7 August 1790 – 10 November 1868) was from 1820 to 1864 Chaplain to the British Legation at St. Petersburg (Joseph Foster, The Peerage, Baronetage and Knightage of the British Empire [Westminster: Nichols and Son, 1882], p. 253; Alumni Oxoniensis: The Members of the University of Oxford, comp. Joseph Foster, vol. 2, 1715–1886 [Oxford, UK: Parker, 1891], p. 822). His wife was Mary Elisabeth (Mosley) Law (bap. Rolleston, Staffordshire 12 September 1792 – 11 May 1877). Those of their children likely to have been present were their daughters, Henrietta Maria (25 October / 6 November 1822 – 18 November 1892), Caroline Frances (7/19 August 1824 – 24 November 1897), Emily Mosley (7/19 November 1827 – 2/14 February 1880), Isabella Sarah (30 March / 11 April 1830 – 2 February 1865); and their son, Alfred Markham (7/19 November 1832 – 9 November 1870). Of their two married daughters, Mary Eliza (Law) Cattley (9/21 March 1821 – 22 February / 6 March 1859) could have been present (Foster's Peerage, p. 253). See also the biographies of the Law family in Appendix E (hereafter, Law) and Images 253–255.
174. The Honourable John Arthur Douglas Bloomfield (1802–1879; see Image 291) was Secretary of the British Legation at St. Petersburg in 1843 and at this time in 1844 (Bloomfield Papers, FO 356, National Archives, Kew, Richmond, UK (NAUK); Sir Bernard Burke, A Genealogical History of the Dormant, Abeyant, Forfeited, and Extinct Peerages [London: Harrison, 1883]). The Secretary of the Brazilian Legation at St. Petersburg in 1844 (appointed 6 October 1842) was José Maria do Amaral (Rio de Janeiro 14 March 1812 – Niterói 23 September 1885) (Antônio Carlos Gonçalves Valerio [coordinator] and Rodrigo Aldeia Duarte [responsible for the information], Ministério de Justiça Arquivo Nacional, Rio de Janeiro, to E. Harden, 18 December 2012).
175. Maxwell left no record of Colonel Todd's birthday celebration in his letters. No. 27 is dated January 1st, 1844 (with an entry for January 4); no. 28 is dated March 6th 1844 (with entries for March 7 and 8). In the interval, Maxwell was seriously ill.
176. In 1828, Susanna Hart Todd (b. 1821), Charles Stewart Todd Jr. (b. 1822), and Henry Clay Todd (b. 1823), three of the twelve children of Colonel Charles Stewart and Letitia (Shelby) Todd (11 January 1799 – 22 July 1868) died (Genealogy of the Family of Colonel Charles Stewart and Letitia (Shelby) Todd, Todd Family Papers, Cincinnati Historical Society, fol. 8).

177. Todd volunteered when the War of 1812 broke out and “was made acting quartermaster in the advance of the left wing of the Northwestern Army. He served on Gen. William H. Harrison’s staff, his courage and intelligence winning him steady promotion until in March 1815 he was inspector general with the rank of colonel” (Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. “Todd, Charles Stewart”).
178. The War of 1812 was concluded on 24 December 1814, with the Treaty of Ghent. The news of the peace was received in America on 11 February 1815 and celebrated by a general illumination of New York City on 27 February 1815 (I.N. Phelps Stokes, The Iconography of Manhattan Island, 1498–1909, 6 vols. [New York: Robert H. Dodd, 1926], vol. 5, pp. 1579–80; see also New York Evening Post [February 28, March 1 and 2, 1815] for “detailed descriptions of the transparencies and the fireworks”).
- According to General J.G. Swift’s mother-in-law, the family of Dr. Daniel McNeill was to leave Wilmington, North Carolina, in April 1815, for New York (M.M. Walker to Louisa Swift [her daughter], Wilmington March 25th 1815, USMAL: J.G. Swift Papers). But a notice in a Wilmington newspaper, dated 10 April 1815, indicated that “he intends early in May, to depart with his family for New-York” (Wilmington Gazette, April 27, 1815, p.4, col.5; see also Raymond Parker Fouts, Abstracts from Newspapers of Wilmington, North Carolina 1807–1810, with Extant Issues of 1812–1816 [Cocoa, FL: Gen Rec Books, 1984], vol. 5, p. 116, item 885). See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E for a discussion of when Dr. Daniel McNeill was living in New York.
179. Anna Whistler later had serious and recurrent eye trouble. James and Willie took her to an eye specialist in Coblenz in September 1865 (Anna Whistler to James Whistler [Coblenz, Germany], 25 November [1865], GUL: Whistler Collection, W520; Anna Whistler to Margaret Hill, London, 22 Oct. 1865, LC: P-W, box 34, fols. 45–46).
180. “Mrs. Bodisco was not well known in Washington previous to her marriage. Her family did not visit the first people there and she herself left school to become a wife. She is thought very beautiful here, and here she is indeed a beauty. She has a fine fresh complexion very unusual in St. Petersburg. Her features are those common to thousands of our young countrywomen, rather pretty than classic and that win rather than command. She has nothing of the elegance or ease of manner that distinguishes the ladies of the Court nor has she the advantages of a superior education. But these are difficulties she will easily conquer. Under the eye of so distinguished a piece of patch work as her husband, she takes a lesson every day and evening and will be re-transplanted the next summer a perfect model of a courtly dame. ——” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, January 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27).

181. Nothing specific is said in the diaries about Baron Bodisco, whose acquaintance Major Whistler had made in Washington, DC, in 1842, when Bodisco, as Russian Envoy, had negotiated with Major Whistler the conditions under which the latter would accept the invitation to supervise the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. Maxwell, however, portrayed him at the first great ball of the nobility with total candor:

He is a very ugly man but an amiable in manner as are all Russians. He is very old, wears a wig, and reminds me very much of Brahem [John Braham (1774–1856)] the singer in looks and carriage. His dress, which is of a very fashionable cut, gives his figure the forced expression of youth, denied him in every particular of shape and every lineament of feature. You can detect even in the uncombed locks of his handsome peruke and in the bespotted appendages of his dress all the slovenly indications of the dandy in dotage. His mouth is toothless, his breath horrible and the tout ensemble justifies the opinion of those who considered him the ugliest man in the United States. But then he was considered the most agreeable by many. Concealing his decrepitude in the make of his habiliments, illuminating his phiz with a smile skin deep, and yet deep enough to erase the wrinkles, assuming a manner that seems as natural as it is condescending and agreeable, the old fellow becomes the admiration of the Washington ball-rooms and wins the love of a pretty damsel of sweet seventeen. Age cannot conquer the cunning of the Russian diplomatist” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, January 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27)

It is interesting that in his book Maxwell transposed details of his description of Bodisco from this letter to describe the Russian secret agent (J.S. Maxwell, The Czar, His Court and People: Including a Tour in Norway and Sweden, 3rd ed. New York: Charles Scribner, 1854), pp. 279–280). For this reason, Maxwell’s letters should be consulted in preference to his book.

182. Maxwell spoke of Rev. Law as “the merry Parson with a fine family” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Mar. 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29).
183. The song Debo sang was a popular romance of the period called “Chornyi tsvet” (“The Color Black”) (Liubimye russkie romansy i pesni dlia odnogo golosa [Favorite Russian Romances and Songs for Solo Voice]. St. Petersburg: M. Bernadaki). Translated line-by-line, the text is as follows:

Color black, gloomy color
 You are dear to me forever.
 I swear that with another color
 I shall never fall in love.

Refrain:

Don't force me,
 Don't make me
 Stop loving the color black,
 I haven't strength to, I haven't the power.

Why, the world will ask,
 Am I in love with the color of shadows,
 I shall say, the color black
 Is the color of my friend.

Refrain

And even if suddenly my dear friend
 Should forget me,
 The color black, the gloomy color
 I shall continue to love.

Refrain

I have one thought
 The color black and She.
 With her forever I shall fuse
 My gloomy soul.

Refrain

Saying farewell to the earth
 I shall array myself in the color black
 And as long as there is light in my eyes
 I am in love with the color black.

William Bonamy Maingay (see Image 260) made a stilted, rhymed translation of it that is reproduced in Note 382, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33). The music, without words, appears in M. Bernard, Sto russkikh narodnykh pesen' aranžirovannykh dlia odnogo fortepiano [One Hundred Russian Folk Songs, Arranged for Solo Pianoforte] (St. Petersburg: printed by the author, n.d.), p. 83. See Appendix F for a copy of the sheet music for “Chornyi tsvet.”

184. The Law family had “given a ball every other week all winter” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29). This was the last before Lent and was held on 2/14 February.

In 1844, the Western and Orthodox Easter Sunday fell on the same date: 27 March / 7 April.

185. Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (Tsarskoe Selo 12/24 June 1825 – Tsarskoe Selo 29 July / 10 August 1844; see Images 434–435, 444–446, 451), youngest daughter of Nicholas I (Nicholai Pavlovich Romanov) (Tsarskoe Selo 25 June / 6 July 1796 – St. Petersburg 18 February / 2 March 1855; see Images 420–423) and Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna (born Frederika-Louisa-Charlotte-Wilhelmina) (Charlottenburg, Prussia 1/12 July 1798 – Tsarskoe Selo 20 October / 1 November 1860; see Images 420, 424), married His Serene Highness Prince Friedrich Wilhelm of Hesse-Kassel (26 November 1820 – 14 October 1884), later Landgraf Elector of Hesse-Kassel (see Images 444–445 of the engaged couple). Her first cousin, Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna (Moscow 14/26 May 1826 – near Wiesbaden 16/28 January 1845; see Image 441), daughter of Nicholas I’s brother, His Imperial Highness Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (St. Petersburg 28 January 1798 / 8 February 1799 – Warsaw 28 August / 9 September 1849; see Image 439) and Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Elena Pavlovna (born Frederika-Charlotta-Maria, Princess of Württemberg) (Stuttgart 28 December 1806 / 9 January 1807 – St. Petersburg 9/21 January 1873; see Image 440), married His Serene Highness Duke Adolphe Wilhelm of Nassau (24 July 1817 – 17 November 1905; see Image 442) (G.I. Studenkin, “Romanovy Tsarstvuiushchii dom Rossiiskoi Imperiii s 1613 g” [“The Romanovs The Reigning House of the Russian Empire Since 1613”], Supplement, Russkaia starina [Old Russian Days and Ways] (1878): pp. xxii, xxiii, xxiv; Kuz'min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familia, p. 95, 97, 144, 149–150, 232). For an assessment of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna’s appearance and character, and a description of her engagement, marriage, illness, and death, see the diary of her sister, Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, Queen of Württemberg, written between January 1881 and January 1883. Here also will be found loving and generally frank appraisals of the entire Imperial family. The diaries were written in French and published in German (1955) and Russian (1963) translations. I have used the Russian translation: Son inosti Zapiski docheri Imperatora Nikolaia I Velikoi Kniazhny Ol'gi Nikolaevny, Korolevy Viurtembergskoi [A Dream of Youth Memoirs of the Daughter of Emperor Nicholas I, Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, Queen of Württemberg] (Paris: s.n., 1963). See also Images 444–460.

186. Anna Whistler gave no details of Maxwell's oral account, but fortunately he also left a sparkling and amusingly written vignette of the betrothal of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna in the chapel of the Winter Palace and of the ball given the evening of the same day (26 December 1843 / 7 January 1844):

I repaired to the palace in the ordinary way, and where I was received in much the same way as I have heretofore described. The only remarkable ~~event~~ and sensation I experienced on the way at all novel was the excessive cold. The morning was beautiful, bright and clear but so cold that every thing seemed ready to crack. The manes of the horse's and the beards of the men were white with frost and whatever was touched with the naked hand sent an icy chill into every nerve and muscle of the arm. The Thermometer stood at 2 degrees and  $\frac{1}{4}$  below Zero Fahrenheit and at  $16 \frac{1}{2}$  Raumer. The temperature of the Palace was very agreeable. I joined the Corps in the Salle des Maréchaux or hall of the Marshals, and from there went with them into the Imperial Chapel. We were the first introduced into this magnificent room, and took up a position next the railing, which divided the alters from the main body of the room. so that we had a fine chance to observe all that occurred. All the diplomats were there except Lord Stuart. In our select company were included Lady Stuart, the ladies of the Saxon and Sardinian Ministers, a few distinguished strangers and the Roman Catholic Bishop. We had remained long in our places when the doors were thrown open and the Grand Masters of Ceremony with their ~~use~~ batons ushered in the procession, headed by the Metropolitan and the Bishops in long robes of all colours, with great big chimney pot looking caps on their heads, and their beards and hair hanging on their backs and breasts - Next came the Imperial family according to age and rank, and finally came the officers of states and ladies of the court. The priests and the Imperial family passed through a gate in the railing, directly in our front and the Court people filled up the room directly in our rear. The Priests commenced reading prayers, when the Emperor took the Prince Hesse by the arm and placed him in position before the alter, and the Empress took the G Duchess Alexandra and placed ~~on~~ her next him. The Metropolitan then placed a lighted candle in the hands of each one and then the ceremony of the service was continued for a long while, by ~~rea~~ the prayers and responses of the clergy. Then the Metropolitan placed rings on their fingers after which the Empress approached and taking the rings from off the finger of the Prince she placed them on those of the Duchess, and ~~then~~ ~~the~~ ~~rig~~ rings of the Duchess she placed upon the fingers of the Prince. Then commenced delicious music from the choir - all vocal, but superior to any instrumental music you ever heard and said to be the finest sacred melody in the world - After this the Greek Cross was carried about with the invocations of the Bishops, and was presented to the bride and groom to kiss - which being done, the happy pair, approached the Emperor and Empress and the rest of the family and kissed and were kissed again in the most affectionate matter. Such kisses it was good to see and hear. They were none of your half and half affairs, but regular smacks which resounded beneath the arched vault above us. After this interesting process the affianced couple repaired again to the alter, and kneeled down. The Imperial family done the same and the whole audience of course followed suite. I went down on my marrowbones without any difficulty for I never strap myself up as many do for these occasions, being perfectly satisfied with the shape nature has imposed upon me. But unfortunately this is not the case with courtiers generally and old diplomatists in particular. Some of these from the unbending stricture of their stuffed coats and the unyielding nature of their unmentionables found it hard work to get down. I saw one on all fours, another leaned on me for support, and his Excellency who stood in front as stiff as a poker, let himself down by a masterly manouvre, and without apparent damage, although ~~a~~ I thought the sound I heard of rip and tear proceeded from angry discussion ~~any~~ among the seams of his tightened garments. As soon as the prayers were over, the cannon commenced firing, the Imperial Family retired as they came and we were at liberty to retire too. As I was going out I met M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco in full Russian costume . . . The Colonel hastened away with such trepidity that I finally concluded he had damaged his pantaloons, although I did not like to ask him if such was the fact, for he is too much of an Adonis in his own estimation, to have any one else think otherwise and I did not think it safe to offend him by seaching [sic] the truth more particularly for so an un-adonis-like mishap. The ceremony interested me more ~~particular~~ than any thing I have witnessed in some time. The solemnity, the importance of the parties, the novelty of the scene the peculiarity of the Greek devotions, the dress of the Bishops, the sounds of the prayers uttered in the ancient Slavonian, and the beautiful music, all combined, made a powerful impression upon me. I shall never forget it. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Jan. 1, 1844, entry dated Jan. 8, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 27)

187. The marriage of Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna and His Serene Highness Prince Friedrich Wilhelm of Hesse-Kassel took place on 16/28 January 1844 (see Image 446) (Studenkin, "Romanovy," pp. 23–24; Kuz'min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familia, p. 95).
188. "I attended soon after the marriage ceremony of the Grand Duchess Alexandra which resembled the betrothal very much . . . A few days before this ceremony I was frequently called to the palace for various fêtes and on one of these occasions I must have taken cold. The morning of the marriage I was quite unwell, but felt obliged to attend as a matter of importance as well as the ball in the evening. The next day I felt much worse and had to get Colonel Todd to excuse me to the Grand Master of ceremonies for not attending the marriage of the G. Duches Marie to the Duke of Nassau and whatever other of the almost nightly feasts I omitted. I sent for the Doctor" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 6, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 28).
189. The marriage of Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna and His Serene Highness Duke Adolphe Wilhelm of Nassau took place on 19/31 January 1844 (Studenkin, “Romanovy,” p. 24; Kuz'min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familia, p. 150).

190. “Indian pride” is false pride.
191. Engineer Lieutenant Dmitrii Ivanovich Zhuravskii (17/29 December 1821 – 18/30 November 1891; see Image 249), graduate of the Institute of Transport Engineers in St. Petersburg, Class of 1842, was in charge of building the railway bridge across the Vereb'ia River, which he “had assisted Whistler, Mel'nikov, and Kraft in designing” in 1842–1843 (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 317). His name was pronounced “Zhoorahf'skee.” Anna Whistler rendered the spelling as “giraffe” plus “ski.” The ball for which he brought tickets took place on 20 January / 1 February 1844.
192. For Mr. Trouvellier, see Note 123 above. Maria Vladimirovna (Kozliakinova) Trouvellier was his second wife, listed in his service record of 1841. I have no information about when they were married. His first wife was “Ann Woolff, Spinster of the Russian Greek Church,” whom he “married according to the Rites of the Greek Church on the 7th of February 1834.” She died in 1835. He had a seven-year-old daughter from this first marriage, who is also mentioned in his service record (RGIA: Fond 200, op. 1, d. 8101 (see Note 124 above for document title); PREC STP for 1834, p. 192). The BRBC STP 1845 gives his second wife's surname as Kozlianoff (fol. 57).
193. This is a reference to the fact that at a later hour the ball changed to a masquerade, which was open to all classes of society who chose to buy tickets to it (see Image 374).
194. “I remember ~~for~~ well the circumstances attending my sickness for the first three days, of being bleed and leached etc - After that time I lost all consciousness and for six weeks was in a delirium. I have very narrowly escaped death. In fact they thought I would not live and about the time for ~~wright~~ writing by the last steamer it was a matter of discussion between Col Todd and Major Whistler as to the propriety of writing you about me, but the Major carried the day, as he showed that I was so low that it would be as bad almost as communicating my decease. It seems my disease was a fever of the Typhoid class (not Typhus) It was a brain fever and congestion of the brain was feared. I acted very wildly they tell me. On one occasion I jumped out of bed in the night, beat my servant and the friend who watched over me and in a state of nudity run from my parlour (in which my bed had been placed on account of its being a better chamber in every respect.) to a little cold room I used as a dressing room or cabinet.

March 7. It was only when Major W made his appearance that I consented to go to bed. Another strange fancy was I am told a continued and fierce desire to go to the 6th Ward Hotel and at the crisis of my disease this formed by [sic] constant endeavour and I thought the Loco Focos had made a conspiracy to keep me from going. Fortunately about this time among the many other kind American friends who watched me, was a M<sup>r</sup> Fairbanks a contractor of the railroad a man of great strenght [sic] - He was with me 3 nights when my disease took a turn for the better. To him and a half dozen others I feel much indebted and to my dear good Doctor also. But how can I describe the care and anxiety of M<sup>r</sup> and M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler. You yourselves could not have manifested more solicitude. I am told they were constantly at my bedside and the Major slept near by me” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St.Petersburg, March 6 and entry of March 7, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 28).

195. The crisis of Maxwell’s fever, therefore, took place on 7 February.
196. This is Dr. James Rogers (1810 – 11 July 1890), physician to the British Legation. See his biography in Appendix E.
197. Dr. Rogers called in Dr. Nikolai Fyodorovich Arendt (Kazan 1785 – St. Petersburg 14/26 October 1859; see Image 343), surgeon, considered “the most popular and most accessible doctor” in St. Petersburg in the first half of the nineteenth century. In the reign of Alexander I (see Image 418), he participated, as a regimental doctor, in the military campaigns against Napoleon and against Sweden and acquired extensive experience in battlefield surgery. In 1814, he served as chief medical inspector of the Russian troops in France and, through March 1815, was in charge of the hospitals he personally organized. As of 1820, he was head doctor of the St. Petersburg Artillery Hospital. He devoted himself to surgery and became known for his outstanding success in averting post-surgical deaths. As a result of his long service and the level of knowledge exhibited by him in both medicine and surgery, he was awarded in October 1821 the degree of Doctor of Medicine without taking the examination for it or writing a dissertation. This was unprecedented in the history of Russian medicine. In March 1827, he retired and took up private practice. From 1828–1845, he was chief consultant at the Obukhov Hospital, where he worked without salary. In 1829, he treated Nicholas I and was appointed His Majesty's personal physician, serving in this capacity for the next ten years. He was initial in establishing the code of regulations of the St. Petersburg Children's Hospital (December 1834) and was the hospital's first consultant. He rode about the city every day in his carriage, attending both rich and poor, treating the latter without remuneration. It was his great grief that he could not save the life of Pushkin (1799–1837), when called to the latter's bedside after the fatal duel. He died on 14/26 October 1859 and was buried in the Smolensk Lutheran Cemetery (Bukharkin, Deviatnadsatyi vek, bk. 1, pp. 174–175; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).

198. "March 8 ... Major W told me last evening what I did not know before and that is that the Doctor himself was at one time in great fear and held a consultation with a German physician who examined my body. His greatest relief in the midst of his doubts was that in my wildest moments I always recognised him and called his name when asked for it - in fact I knew every body I had ever seen before except M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler and the Major says that one evening while he sat at one side of my bed while M<sup>rs</sup> W was smoothing a pillow on the other side I looked earnestly at her trim black dress and white cap and asked if that was a Catholic. I took her for some sister of charity" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Mar. 6, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 28). "M<sup>rs</sup> W has ... manifested great solicitude for me and I have been told that this dear lady wept for me often, fearing I would die" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29).
199. The following composite portrait of La Ronne Schipouloff, Maxwell's servant, is taken from Maxwell's letters: "To finish this picture of a bachelors life and a bachelor's quarters in St. Petersburg I will go still further into particulars. I have a room for my servant, coal, house, stable if necessary etc in the Court yard. My servant at present is the old chasseur of his Excellency. His name, La Ronne. He pretends to speak English, French, Swedish and Russian but I doubt if he fully comprehends either. I have to give him ten dollars a month and he finds himself. All servants here have to find themselves. This is the rule, but if one does not lock every thing up, they find themselves at the expense of the master" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22). The verb “to find” has here the meaning of “to provide food and lodging.” This is most familiar in the British (often naval) expression “all found,” which is said of an employee’s wages and means “with board and lodging provided free: your wages would be five shillings all found.” (Oxford English Dictionary, 3rd ed. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2010], s.v. “find, v.”).

In describing Todd’s coach on the day they rode together to the “revailles” of Grand Duchess Maria Aleksandrovna (see Images 426–427), Maxwell enables us to see one of the attractive aspects of La Ronne’s previous duties as chasseur for Todd: “the dashing four horse equipage of his Excellency with outrider and Coachman in blue and ~~gold~~ silver, and a Chasseur in green and gold, armed with a blade that would have astonished Sir William Wallace and decorated with a plume, that would be the admiration of the militia, drove up in great style ... My servant, my valet and footman, the ancient chasseur, La Ronne, besides his mustache, had nothing else to recommend him. He had been stripped of his finery when he left the Colonel and came to me. He looked very fierce and with great contempt upon the new chasseur dressed in the old insignia of office” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Nov. 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 25). Like his fellow Orthodox Russians, he adhered to the strict fasting of Lent: “I offered my servant some [calves foot] jelly. and although he loves good things and had eaten nothing but ~~four~~ bread and salt for 5 weeks he would not touch it” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Mar. 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29).

La Ronne’s surname we learn when Maxwell is leaving Russia for the summer in 1844: “even my faithful Laronne Schipouloff, my very diplomatic valet, preferred to keep the money I had given him to pay his way to and from the Alexandra, to going with ~~the~~ his master any further than the quay” (John S. Maxwell to George Washington Whistler, from Berlin, Thursday, June 20, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). Maxwell came to know his virtues. “I have had to increase the wages of my servant La Ronne in order to retain him in my service. I now pay him at the rate of sixteen dollars a month. He is worth that to me, for he knows how to wait, knows a little of all the European languages, finds out every thing that is going on, understands all the etiquette, is respectful, well dressed, and wears a very fine pair of mustaches, in fact he is a person who unites the knowledge and experience of the servant, the courtier and the Diplomat. So I consider La Ronne and the German teacher as justifiably expensive to me and look sharp to cut off all useless expenditures to preserve their service” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Nov. 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 24). See also Maxwell, Czar, pp. 128, 206, 217, 226, 231, 237, 240, when La Ronne was still Ambassador Todd’s courier (1842).

As chasseur, La Ronne wore a “uniform of green and silver, chapeau and white fountain plume, and sword. The chasseur appendage is a court relic ... He generally rides behind the coach, and is its ‘protector’ I suppose. In the house he is the valet. Our valet is a fiene looking fellow when rigged out in his war paint – his black moustache waxed to points, and he is ‘every inch a soldier’ – but in the house, he promises to be as obedient, and ~~kind~~ gentle, ‘as a sucking dove!’” (BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fol. 10).

Anna Whistler spells his name Le Ron, Le Rong, and Le Rond.

200. Her prayers seem to have been answered. Certainly she must have felt free on his recovery to make known to Maxwell what she had prayed for. In any case, he wrote to his mother, in words rather resembling Anna Whistler’s: “God has in his mercy, by his miraculous power, rescued me from the very jaws of death, and to him be all the glory” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 11, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 34). “The Doctor has promised to let me be shaved and dressed by the end of this week and go up stairs, but he says I must not listen to too much music — A treat it will be to hear a song, and talk with M<sup>rs</sup> W as I used to do of home” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29).
201. Admiral Robert Hall (2/13 September 1761 – 23 January / 4 February 1844), an Englishman in the Russian Navy, aged eighty-three years, “died (suddenly in the Church)” (PREC STP for 1844, p. 306). The Russians called him Roman Romanovich Gall. See his biography in Appendix E.
202. Psalm 84:10: “For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.”
203. Admiral Hall’s wife was Natalia Elisabeth (Pegelof) Hall (31 December 1780 [OS] – 21 September 1855 [OS]) (Amburger Datenbank, ID 84207). Admiral Hall’s daughter Elizabeth (25 May / 6 June 1801 – 21 August / 2 September 1887) was married

- to Nikolai Petrovich Tumillo-Denisovich (9/20 May 1791 – 9/21 October 1864), a Lt. General in the Russian Navy (Amburger Datenbank, ID 84212; BRBC STP 1845, fol. 27; Irina Reyfman, How Russia Learned to Write Literature and the Imperial Table of Ranks [Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2016], Appendix: Table of Ranks). Both women were members of the Reformed Church. After the Admiral's death, the two women continued to live in their house on the 9th Rota (Ninth Line) in the Liteinaia District (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 27). "Rota" was the word used in the Semyonov Regiment instead of "liniia" to mean "line"; both words mean "street" (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 328–329). Ninth Rota was also called Basseinaia Street (Grech, p. 329).
204. These lines are from the fourth verse of the hymn "Awake my soul and with the sun" by Thomas Ken (1637–1711).
205. These are the remaining two lines of the fourth verse of "Awake my soul."
206. Admiral Hall's funeral took place on 27 January / 8 February 1844 (PREC STP for 1844, p. 306).
207. On 30 January / 11 February 1844, Rev. Law's text was "dust thou art & unto death shalt thou return." It is a paraphrase of "In the midst of life we are in death" and "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," taken from The Book of Common Prayer (The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and Other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, According to the Use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America: Together with The Psalter, or Psalms of David [Philadelphia: Female Protestant Episcopal Prayer-Book Society of Pennsylvania, 1839], p. 265) and used in "The Order for the Burial of the Dead" (pp. 262–266).
208. Admiral Hall, as has already been noted, was an Englishman (Robin Inglis, Historical Dictionary of the Discovery and Exploration of the Northwest Coast of America, Historical Dictionaries of Discovery and Exploration 4 [Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2008], p. 148).
209. Anna Whistler left a blank space for his first name. Sir Robert Ker Porter (b. Durham 26 April 1777; bap. 10 July 1777; d. St. Petersburg 22 April / 4 May 1842; see Image 288) was a painter, traveler, and diplomat (IGI for County Durham; PREC STP, no. 5172, p. 285).
210. Anna Maria Porter (b. Salisbury 22 December 1778; bap. 7 September 1779; d. 21 June 1832; see Image 290) and Jane Porter

(b. Durham 3 December 1775; bap. Durham 17 January 1776; d. Bristol 24 May 1850; see Image 289) were both writers. The monument to their father and his children, from which their death dates are taken, is in Bristol Cathedral (see also “Jane Porter,” Orlando: Women’s Writing in the British Isles from the Beginning to the Present, Cambridge University, Cambridge, UK, accessed 28 April 2021, <http://orlando.cambridge.org/>; Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Porter, Jane”).

211. The widowed Sir Robert Ker Porter, who was serving as British consul in Venezuela, had spent the winter of 1841–42 in Russia, visiting his daughter, Maria Robertovna (b. 27 May 1813 [OS]), who was married to Pyotr Evgrafovich Kikin (Elizaveta Renne, “Ser Robert Ker Porter Khudozhnik v Rossii” [“Sir Robert Ker Porter: Artist in Russia”], Nashe Nasledie [Our Heritage] 63–64 [2002]: p. 152). He suffered a seizure at the door of his house and once inside passed into a coma and died the next morning. In his obituary in The St. Petersburg English Review, his death is described as follows:

The severity of a polar winter, acting on a constitution acclimated to warmth alone by so many year’s sojourn under the tropical sun of South America, gradually undermined his health and weakened his frame ... he cheerfully made his preparations for re-embarking for her shores by the first homeward steamer in May ... On the 3rd of that month, he went by appointment to take his leave of the Emperor ... The farewell he received was accompanied by an invitation for a revisit, when the just begun new bridge of granite, to unite the two shores of the Neva, should be finished ... Meanwhile the heat of a summer sun, in a land which has no medium transition between the seasons like our spring, had that morning burst the hitherto winter cloud over the city. Every creature, more or less, feels the abrupt change; but the effect on him we lament was almost instantaneous. During his drive home, which was short, the excessive heat appears to have suddenly thawed the hitherto almost frozen up blood in his veins. In that extraordinary congelation, to his feelings, was always the term in which, whenever he did suffer himself to complain of his sensations, he described them and their petrifying influence oftentimes on his spirits. And, alas! before he reached the house door, the fearful reaction of the blood set a-flow had gushed with such violence towards his head, that when he stepped from his carriage, which he did without assistance, he was observed to stagger; and then, by the aid of his servants, he walked into the house. But when he had reached the room where his sister was, he neither spoke nor opened his eyes more. Two physicians were instantly on the spot. Every means that medical skill could apply were used to produce some sign of revival, but in vain. For fourteen hours he continued to breathe, but lay pale and motionless as a statue, and at half past six o'clock, the ensuing morning, his mortal life became extinct." (Obituary, Sir Robert Ker Porter Papers: box 6, no. 665, Huntington Library, San Marino, CA)

The extensive "Memoir of the Late Sir Robert Ker Porter" appeared in The St. Petersburg English Review of Literature, The Arts, and Sciences (S. Warand and Thomas B. Shaw, eds., First Year, vol. 4 of The St. Petersburg English Review of Literature, The Arts, and Sciences [St. Petersburg: Hauer, 1842], pp. 554–562). It was probably written by his sister, Jane, who had accompanied him to Russia. Dr. George Lefevre, outgoing physician of the British Embassy (the predecessor to Dr. James Rogers), who had resigned and was returning to England, attended Porter's "last agony" (Lefevre, Traveling Physician, vol. 3, pp. 75–76).

Porter was buried in the Smolensk Cemetery (Renne, "Ser Robert Ker Porter," p. 162). There is a discrepancy between his year of birth on the monument there (1781) and the monument in Bristol Cathedral (1777).

212. "Begone, dull care!" by an unidentified author, is "17th-century glee still sung in Victorian times" (Arthur Burrell, ed., English Lyrical Verse [New York: E.P. Dutton; London and Toronto: J.M. Dent and Sons, 1927], p. 23; Charles G. Wheeler and William A. Wheeler, eds., Who Wrote It? An Index to the Authorship of the More-Noted Works in Ancient and Modern Literature [Boston: Lee and Shepard, 1881], p. 21). The second and final stanza states: "My wife shall dance and I will sing / And merrily pass the day / For I hold it one of the greatest things / To drive dull care away."
213. Colonel Todd (see Image 278) attended the English Church in the morning and the British and American Chapel in the evening (see Images 110–111, 125). For the latter, see George H. Prince to Hardy Ropes, St.P., Feby 7 NS 1842, MHS: Ropes Papers.
214. Charles Robert, Count Nessel'rode (Karl Vasilievich Nessel'rode) (2/13 December 1780 – 11/23 March 1862; see Image 309), chancellor of the Russian Empire as of 1845, was foreign minister

- throughout the thirty-year reign of Nicholas I. Nessel'rode was a Protestant and was buried in the Smolensk Cemetery on 15/27 March 1862, after a funeral service in the English Church, performed by Edward Law, DD (PREC STP, no. 7372).
215. The French troupe permanently performed in the Mikhailovsky Theater (Viktor Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi po S. Peterburgu i ego okrestnostiam [A Walk with Children about St. Petersburg and Its Environs], 3 vols. [St. Petersburg: Guttenberg Press, 1838], vol. 2, p. 254; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, p. 366; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 641). From June to August, French plays were usually performed in the Stone Island (Kamennyi Ostrov) Theater (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, p. 282; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 641).
  216. For the Italian opera, see Note 222 below.
  217. Psalm 58:3–5: “<sup>3</sup> The wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies. <sup>4</sup> Their poison is like the poison of a serpent: they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; <sup>5</sup> Which will not harken to the voice of charmers, charming ever so wisely. Also Proverbs 14:27: “The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life, to depart from the snares of death.”
  218. John 13:34–35: “<sup>34</sup> A new commandment I give unto you, That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another. <sup>35</sup> By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.”
  219. Matthew 5:16: “Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.”
  220. The Assembly Hall of the Nobility (Dvorianskoe sobranie) (see Images 145–146) was opened on 6/18 December 1835 in the building belonging to Engel'gardt. Since the end of 1839, it has been located in a building built for it on the corner of Novo-Mikhailovskaia Street and Mikhailovsky Square (or Italianskaia Street). The purpose in setting it up was to create a gathering place in which the participants could find pleasure in dances, permitted games, the reading of newspapers, and other pursuits appropriate to an educated society. Members are hereditary nobles from all over the Empire. Guests at balls and masquerades and visitors on ordinary days may be non-hereditary nobility, honorary citizens, famous artists, and Russian and foreign merchants. Males under 17 years of age and females under 16 are not permitted. There are two categories of membership: permanent members, who have access to the hall at any time; and visitor members, who have access only to the six balls or masquerades held annually. Permanent members each receive two tickets to the balls for the ladies in their family. The number of permanent members is reckoned to be over six hundred. Persons belonging to the social groups named above and temporarily in St. Petersburg may be visitors on ordinary days, while nobles owning their own homes in the capital, in service here and already members of other assemblies and clubs may not. The latter must be members. Twelve visitors are permitted each day and may retain this privilege for no longer than six months. The Assembly Hall is open daily from nine in the morning until two in the morning. On the days when there is a ball or masquerade, the public may not enter earlier than one hour before the event. The Assembly Hall is closed the last three days before Easter. The balls, which in recent years have been combined with masquerades, constitute the main charm that the Assembly Hall of the Nobility holds for the capital. The magnificent and spacious hall illuminated by crystal chandeliers offers many conveniences for these festive occasions. The hall is encircled by columns, behind which are raised galleries accessible by a few steps. From these galleries one can watch those dancing and make one's way around the hall without crossing the dance floor. In front of the columns around the entire hall are three rows of red divans arranged like an amphitheater. Adjoining the hall are elegant rooms for the public that are opened only on these occasions. Buffets are set up here and the public takes its ease in the coolness of these rooms after dancing. The Assembly Hall is also used for charity balls, private concerts, lotteries, etc. (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 183–185; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 650–655). The ball Deborah gave up for the opera took place on 24 January / 5 February.

221. Major Ivan Frantsevich Bouttatz held the rank of lieutenant colonel as of 6/18 December 1843 (RGIA: Fond 446, 1844, op. 13, d. 4. Vsepoddanneishie doklady GUPSiPZ 12 Dek. 1844 g. 1229 Buttats [Most Devoted Reports of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings 12 Dec. 1844 (OS), 1229 Buttats].

Institut russkoi literatury Akademii nauk (Pushkinskii dom) (IRLI) [Institute of Russian Literature of the Academy of Sciences (Pushkin House)] Fond 2/B-93 6696 contains a photograph of Buttats from an old portrait album (indicated on the photo itself) with the time of his death among the brief information written on the back: "Inzhener-Polkovnik Ivan Frantsovich Butats, stroitel' anichkovskogo mosta, skonchalsia v Peterburge 25 Iulia 1876 g. v 2 ch. 45 m. po poludni [Engineer Colonel Ivan Frantsovich Butats, builder of the Anichkov Bridge, died in Petersburg on 25 July 1847 at 2:45 in the afternoon.]” On the front of the photograph is written: “Stark au coin de Liteine and Panteleimonovskaya No 25/23 [Stark on the corner of Liteinaia and Panteleimonovskaia streets].” A request for permission to publish this photograph has not been answered at the time of publication of this manuscript.

222. Col. Bouttatz’s gift was a rare commodity. The first season of the Italian Opera of St. Petersburg ended on 29 January / 10 February 1844, and tickets had been at a premium the entire time. The repertoire consisted of ten operas: Rossini’s The Barber of Seville and Otello; Bellini’s La Sonambula, Capuletti e Montecchi, Il Pirata, I Puritani, and Norma; Donizetti’s Lucia di Lammermoor and Belisarius; and Mozart’s Don Giovanni (A. Rozanov, Polina Viardot-Garcia, 3rd ed. [Leningrad.: Music Publishing House, 1982], p. 43). Deborah attended the matinee performance of “The Barber of Seville” on 24 January / 5 February 1844. It was one of the six operas in which Viardot-Garcia (see Image 198) sang that season (Rozanov, p. 43). One Russian newspaper had predicted that the subject of conversation during New Year’s Day visits on 1 January 1844, would be the Italian Opera, the singing of Viardot-Garcia, and how impossible it was to get a ticket in the loges (Rozanov, p. 43).

The Barber of Seville by Gioacchino Rossini (1792–1868) would have been performed at the Big Stone Theater (Bol'shoi Kamennyi teatr), which was built in 1784 on the spot where its wooden predecessor had stood. On 1 January 1811 (OS), it burned down, and 7 years later the reconstruction of a new building was completed. The main entrance has a portico with eight Doric columns and a statue in Carrara marble of Minerva, whose spear is a lightning rod. In 1836, the theater was remodeled by the architect Cavo. Its spaciousness and magnificent decor make it one of the most outstanding buildings in the capitol. When completely full, it can hold more than 2000 persons. During masquerades, a floor is placed over the orchestra seats on the same level as the stage for one-and-a-half hours, making the entire theater resemble a huge hall. Along with the foyer, it can then easily accommodate up to 12,000. The theater is intended exclusively for ballet and opera (Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 638–640). It is located on Theater Square in the Second Admiralty District, Fourth Ward, on Nikol'skaia Street, between

- Ofiterskaia and Torgovaia streets, and faces the Kriukov Canal (Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, pp. 20, 51, 52). See also I. Bozherianov and V. Nikol’skii, Peterburgskaia starina. 24 ocherka i rasskaza [Old Petersburg Days and Ways: 24 essays and stories] St. Petersburg: N.I. Ignatov, [c. 1903], pp. 108–113.
223. This may be the same German jeweler to whose shop Mr. Ropes took Anna Whistler at Christmas 1843. She is no more specific here.
224. “My diet is very low but I am fast recovering. It is awful tedious work. The D<sup>r</sup> will not let me read any thing or talk much. As a great favour I am permitted to write this, but it is because I insist upon it... The Major offered to write for me but I could not let him. I have not even been able to be shaved so afraid are they of excitement. I am lifted out of bed by two men I now employ and I do not know as yet that I have my legs on my body, for I cannot feel them — so reduced have I been. I am a perfect skeleton. My constitution has suffered a check which it will take many months if not a year to recover — I am now satisfied this climate will never do for me. Another winter would almost kill me if not quite (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry for March 7 in letter of March 6, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 28).
225. Joseph Samuel Ropes (6 February 1818 – 14 March 1903) was the brother of William Hooper Ropes. He also worked for William Ropes and Company and was a translator of religious tracts. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
226. William Maingay (8 May 1791 – 24 April 1862) was an English merchant in St. Petersburg. See Maingay in Appendix E and Image 258. The dinner took place on 1/13 February. William Maingay reminded Anna Whistler of John Winstanley of Preston.
227. “Miss Grant” may be Elizabeth Wylie Grant (c. 1813 – 4/17 October 1901).
228. This is probably Sophia (Krehmer) Baird, Nicol Baird’s widow, whom Anna Whistler met on the boat coming to St. Petersburg. It is quite clear when she is speaking of other Baird women, such as Charles Baird’s widow (“old Mrs. Baird”) or the wife of Charles’ son, Francis (“Mrs. F. Baird”).
229. This is Eliza (Lamb) Maingay (16 January 1801 – 28 June 1877), wife of William Maingay. See Maingay in Appendix E and Images 258–259.

230. Two of the Maingay children had died in St. Petersburg: Amelia de Jersey Maingay (20 October / 1 November 1833 – 23 November / 5 December 1835) and Charles George Maingay (21 October 1830 – 15/27 January 1843; see Image 261). Anna Whistler had lost Kirk Boott Whistler (16 July 1838 – 10 July 1842) and Charles Donald Whistler (27 August 1841 – 24 September 1843), but she probably would also have included Joseph Swift Whistler (12 August 1825 – 1 January 1840), her step-son.
231. Anna Whistler could have spoken of Rev. John Nichols, her Lebanon, Connecticut, pastor; Rev. William H. Newman, her Westerly, Rhode Island, pastor; Rev. Theodore Edson, her Lowell pastor; or Rev. Henry Washington Lee (see Image 44), her Springfield pastor. I do not know what church she attended when living in Paterson, New Jersey, in the early years of her marriage. When she was a young girl living in Brooklyn, her family attended St. Ann's Church (today St. Ann's and Holy Trinity Church). Mrs. and Miss McNeill are recorded as communicants in 1821 and Dr. McNeill in 1823, during which period the Rev. Henry Ustick Onderdonk (1789–1858) was Rector ([Fish], St. Ann's Church, pp. 51, 193, 200, 201). It has not been possible to ascertain precisely who Mrs. Maingay's pastors were. One of them could have been Rev. James Moore (1769–1846), vicar (1814–1846) of St. Pancras Church in London, where her eldest son, William Bonamy, was baptized in October 1819 (Samuel Palmer, St. Pancras; Being Antiquarian, Topographical, and Biographical Memoranda, Relating to the Extensive Metropolitan Parish of St. Pancras, Middlesex: with Some Account of the Parish from Its Foundation [London: Samuel Palmer; Field & Tuer, 1870], pp. 42–43; PREC STP, no. 5563, p. 330).
232. The children are Emily Maingay (23 January / 4 February 1834 – 25 December 1890; see Image 264), who was called "Lille" or "Lily" by her family, and Frederick Thomas Maingay (1/13 May 1835 – 11 October 1862). Anna Whistler mostly wrote "Lily" and once "Lillie" and "Lilly" in the diaries.
233. This is Eliza Anne Maingay (12 February 1821 – 20 November 1899; see Image 262), called "Nina" within her family but not in the diaries.
234. This is Emma Elizabeth Maingay (6 February 1826 – 27 December 1904; see Image 263), Deborah Whistler's closest friend in St. Petersburg, maid-of-honor at her wedding, and lifelong friend in England.

235. Maslenitsa (Shrovetide) (pronounced “Mah’slineetsuh”) is derived from the word “maslo” (pronounced “mah’sluh”), which means both “butter” and “oil.” It is the equivalent of Mardi Gras week and “maslo” is equal to “gras.” The usual English translation is “Butter Week.” After this week, Orthodox Russians may not eat any animal products, including butter, in their food until Easter Sunday (T.A. Agapkina, Èntsiklopedicheskii slovar’ A–Ia Slavianskaia mifologiia [Encyclopedic Dictionary A–Ia Slavic Mythology] [Moscow: Ellis Lak, 1955], pp. 253–255, 299–301). For a detailed description of the entire Easter season, see Robert Sears, An Illustrated Description of the Russian Empire, rev. ed. [New York: Hurst, 1881], pp. 547–566.
236. Admiralty Square (see Image 118) is part of a vast expanse of three contiguous squares stretching from the building of the Guards Staff past the Winter Palace, the Admiralty, and St. Isaac’s Cathedral to the buildings of the Senate and Synod. Admiralty Square is the name given to the area in front of the main line of Admiralty Boulevard, from which boulevard Nevskii Prospekt, Gorokhvoi Prospekt, and Voznesenskii Prospekt fan out like rays. On this square, General Staff Headquarters are on the corner of Nevskii Prospekt; further along, between Nevskii and Gorokhvoi prospekts, are the provincial offices; and between Admiralty and Voznesenskii prospekts stands one of the biggest hotels of the capital: the London Hotel, and the Civic Society, or Burger Club. Along this same line, closer to St. Isaac’s Cathedral, stands the former home of Lobanov, which now belongs to the War Ministry. Ice hills and booths are put up on this square for Shrovetide (Maslenitsa) (see Image 344), while swings and booths are put up for Passion, or Holy, Week (Sviataia Nedelia) (see Image 345) and the public parades both in carriages and on foot (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, p. 1; Pushkarev, Nikolaenskii Peterburg, p. 74).
237. On 4/16 February 1844, there was to be a public masked ball at the Court of His Majesty for Russian and foreign gentry and merchants (see Image 373). Children under fifteen and members of the gentry not in costume would not be admitted. The distribution of tickets had begun on 30 January / 11 February (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 26, Wednesday, February 2 [February 14 NS] 1844, p. 113). “The Col” is Anna Whistler’s usual reference to Colonel Todd.
238. The ball in honor of the marriage of Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Elizaveta Mikhailovna to his Serene Highness Prince Adolphe of Nassau was held on 2/14 February 1844. The Grand Duke Michel is her father, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich. See Images 439, 441, 442.

239. Among the materials accompanying the manuscript of Anna Whistler's diaries is a single, abridged quotation from the Marquis de Custine's La Russie en 1839, in English translation. It is his description of the exhausted and nervous appearance of Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna, attributed by him to the stress of (1) the Decembrist rebellion in 1825, which threatened her husband's accession to the throne and the entire Imperial family with assassination and (2) her years of bearing children (Marquis de Custine, Empire of the Czar A Journey through Eternal Russia, foreword by Daniel J. Boorstin; introduction by George F. Kennan [New York: Anchor – Doubleday, 1990], pp. 137–138; see also pp. 159, 161). This passage, copied in Anna Whistler's hand, is followed by her response to what she deemed to be Custine's lack of generosity and of justness in attributing the empress's debility to a subservience to the emperor and thereby suggesting an unhappy marriage. But although Custine was implying that the emperor had power, he was not saying the marriage was unhappy. Anna Whistler entitled the quotation an "Excerpt from the Marquis de Custines travels in Russia In 1842" (see Appendix B). In his biography of Aleksandra Fyodorovna, whom he knew personally, A. Th. von Grimm corroborates in detail Custine's statement and also does not suggest an unhappy marriage (A. Th. von Grimm, Alexandra Feodorovna Empress of Russia, trans. Lady Wallace, 2 vols. [Edinburgh: Edmonston and Douglas, 1870], vol. 1, pp. 157, 246).
240. Anna Whistler sometimes made mistakes in recording dates, but rarely in recording days. The date of this entry – 26 February, which was a Monday – indicates that all the events Anna Whistler records for the previous day would have taken place on a Sunday. The Whistlers normally did not entertain, work, or amuse themselves on Sunday. Although the diaries do show that she occasionally made an exception on Sunday, I believe the date of this entry is wrong, and it cannot be a Monday. Moreover, Anna Whistler does not refer to having or not having attended church the day before, which she usually referred to when writing on Monday.
241. Reverend Henry Washington Lee (29 July 1815 – 26 September 1874; see Image 44) was rector of Christ Church, Springfield, Massachusetts, 1838–1847. He was terminated there in November 1847 (Christ Church Guild, Christ Church Parish [Springfield, MA] [s.l.: s.n., 1927], pp. 30–41). “Sister Katie” is Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer.

242. This Biblical quotation may be a combination of two sources: Matthew 5:7, “Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy”; and Micah 7:18, “Who is a God like unto thee, that pardoneth iniquity, and passeth by the transgression of the remnant of his heritage? he retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in mercy.”
243. If the diary date of 26 February, a Monday, were correct, it would mean Rev. Law (see Image 253) and the females in his family visited them on Sunday, 25 February, but Rev. Law usually held two services on Sunday and he would also have respected the Whistlers’ request for Sunday privacy.
244. Because the diary date, 26 February, a Monday, is in doubt, the Sunday referred to here could be 18 or 25 February. It has not been possible to ascertain the name of the deceased.
245. “M<sup>rs</sup> Bodisco has been quite a lioness all winter. She is I fear spoiled for although she is pretty she is weak and ignorant – I had a conversation with her at one of the balls at the palace. The poor little fool said she would never be able to live with comfort in America there was no society there etc etc” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Mar. 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29). See Bodisco and Williams in Appendix E and Images 283–285.
246. Caesar Thompson was a Negro servant in The Spy (1821), a historical novel by James Fenimore Cooper (15 September 1789 – 14 September 1851).

Cooper’s family moved from his birthplace of Burlington, New Jersey, in 1790 to “a huge tract in central New York,” where his father established Cooperstown and “built a pretentious manor estate on Otsego Lake.” Cooper “spent his boyhood” here, “learning much about frontier and wilderness life from the rude inhabitants of the place” that he used “in his later writings.” Educated at Yale, he also “shipped as a merchant seaman and served for three years as a midshipman in the navy.” “He lived in New York, later in Paris, ... [and] in 1833 ... [returned to] Cooperstown” permanently.

The Spy (1821), his second novel, caused a furor that made him decide to be a writer. It is considered “an entertaining mixture of fighting, espionage and love.” “The central character is Harvey Birch,” “based on a real personage” who was “a secret agent employed during the Revolution to gather information on British activities” and ran the risk of being hung by either side. Birch is “a Yankee peddler on whom George Washington (in the novel called William Harper) relies strongly. The action takes place in Westchester County, N.Y., where two bands operate, the Americans and the British. Captain Henry Wharton, of the British faction, visits his Westchester home and is almost captured, but his patriotic sister Frances persuades Mr. Harper to aid her brother. The leader of his pursuers is Major Payton Dunwoodie, betrothed to Frances. Urged by Frances to delay his pursuit, Dunwoodie uses an immediate marriage ceremony as a pretext for the delay. Birch is active in all these events, sometimes in the manner of a Yankee peddler, sometimes in the lofty style of the aristocrats. But he is depicted throughout the book as a man of noble instincts and deep patriotism who refuses all rewards.”

Cooper, while “not especially concerned with Negro rights, ... enjoyed describing Negro characters, and in ... the servant Caesar ... presented the first of his numerous full-drawn portraits of Negroes.”

“Sir Walter Scott’s Waverley (1814) influenced Cooper in writing [The Spy] and later novels. At times he makes the somewhat primitive Westchester seem like a land of chivalry transported from the Scotch Highlands or the Middle Ages. Mr. Harper resembles Bonnie Prince Charlie ... rather than the actual commander of the American armies.”

The Spy is also said to demonstrate “that Cooper was always ... ‘a loose, slovenly author’” (Herzberg, Reader’s Encyclopedia of American Literature, pp. 209–210).

247. “Yankee Doodle” is a traditional American folk song with its roots in the political conflict between the British and the nascent American nation of the eighteenth century. “Dr. Richard Shuckburgh, a British army physician, is credited with penning the ‘Yankee Doodle’ lyrics [during the French and Indian War (1754–1763)] to mock the ragtag New England militia ... – ‘Yankee doodles’... An old English nursery rhyme provided the tune, which was also used in a musical play popular in the British colonies in the mid-1700s. (Chris Carola, “Dandy New Theory Suggests ‘Yankee Doodle’ is Now 250,” Atlanta Journal-Constitution, July 5, 2008). At the outset of the American Revolutionary War, “as opposition to British rule in the American colonies heated up, satirical songs took on a new edge. Rebellious colonists sang songs insulting Britain’s king, George III, as a drunken tyrant, and British soldiers answered with songs ridiculing the Americans as backwoods yokels.” Written years earlier for a similar purpose, “Yankee Doodle” “was so popular with British troops that they played it as they marched to battle on the first day of the Revolutionary War. The rebels quickly claimed the song as their own, though, and created dozens of new verses that mocked the British, praised the new Continental Army, and hailed its commander, George Washington. By 1781, when the British surrendered at Yorktown, being called a ‘Yankee Doodle’ had gone from being an insult to a point of pride, and the song had become the new republic’s unofficial national anthem” (“Yankee Doodle,” Historical Period: The American Revolution, 1763-1783, Library of Congress online, accessed 30 April 2020, http://www.loc.gov/teachers/lyrical/songs/yankee\_doodle.html).

248. It has not been possible to determine what these depredations were.
249. Mrs. Bodisco’s pastor was Rev. Stephen Griffith Gassaway (Baltimore, MD 25 September 1818 – St. Louis, MO 16 February 1854), seventh Rector of Christ Church, who served from March 1843 until 1850. “Mr. Gassaway ... came to Christ Church via Ohio, on the recommendation of [the] third Rector, the Reverend John Thompson Brooke, who was then Rector of Christ Church in Cincinnati. Mr. Gassaway went on to be Rector of Saint George’s Church in St. Louis in 1850, where he was tragically killed in an explosion on a river boat in 1854.” His pastoral skills “apparently were exceptional” (Glenn A. Metzdorf, Christ Church, Georgetown, DC, to E. Harden, 22 August and 14 September 1994). See also Missouri Republican, February 17 and 19, 1854, for the announcement of his death when the Kate Kearney exploded and for tributes to him.
250. Mrs. Bodisco’s father, Brooke Williams (1790 – 1 September 1843), Chief Clerk in the Adjutant General’s Office, died in Georgetown, DC, and was buried on 2 September 1843 (National Intelligencer, September 2, 1843). The infant who had died was the Bodiscos’ eleven-month-old son, Alexander André (b. 10 October 1842; bap. Christ Church 9 April 1843; d. Georgetown, DC 2 September 1843; funeral service Christ Church 3 September 1843) (Glenn A. Metzdorf, Christ Church, Georgetown, DC, to E. Harden, 22 August and 14 September 1994). See Bodisco and Williams in Appendix E.

251. If the Indian portraits were brought from the United States by Major Whistler in 1842 or by his family in 1843, some of the Indian portfolios available to them before their departure were: James Otto Lewis, The Aboriginal Portfolio; or, A Collection of Portraits of the Most Celebrated Chiefs of North American Indians (Philadelphia, 1835–[1836]); and part of Thomas L. McKenney and James Hall's History of the Indian Tribes of North America... Embellished with One Hundred and Twenty Portraits of the Principle Chiefs, from the Indian Gallery in the Department of War at Washington (Philadelphia, 1838–1844).

It is less likely that Anna Whistler may be referring to George Catlin's portraits of North American Indians. Catlin (26 July 1796 – 23 December 1872) began creating a gallery of paintings of North American Indians in 1829–1830, which he completed in 1838. This gallery of paintings and objects was exhibited in the United States in 1837–1839. In 1839, Catlin took it to London. The exhibit opened on 1 February 1840, at Egyptian Hall in Piccadilly (see Image 79), where it was on view for three years. Major Whistler, on route to Russia, was in England from some time in the latter part of June 1842 until 18 July 1842, and might have seen the exhibit then. The collection remained in England until the end of 1844 and was exhibited in Manchester, where Anna Whistler and the children could have seen it in 1843. But it is not clear whether either the Major or they could have obtained pictures in 1842 or 1843.

There was a forty-eight-page English catalogue published in 1840 with the following on the title page:

A descriptive catalogue of Catlin's Indian Gallery, containing portraits, landscapes, costumes etc., and representations of the manners and customs of the North American Indians. - Collected and painted entirely by Mr. Catlin, during seven years' travel amongst forty-eight tribes, mostly speaking different languages. - Egyptian Hall: Piccadilly, London. - Admittance, one shilling. - 1840.

Catlin's North American Indian Portfolio did not appear until late 1844 (London) and was available by subscription only, but when Nicholas I was in England in 1844, Catlin forwarded to him in June all the plates of his Portfolio then finished (Thomas Donaldson, The George Catlin Indian Gallery in the U.S. National Museum (Smithsonian Institution), with Memoir and Statistics, from the Smithsonian Report for 1885 [Washington, DC: Government Printing Office, 1887], pp. 1–8, 11, 701, 775, 779–793). See also, Colonel Merl Moore, Falls Church, VA, to E. Harden, 22 July 1997; “Foreign Correspondence of the Atlas,” The Boston Daily Atlas, Sept. 5, 1844, Dec. 24, 1844, Feb. 5, 1845; “Catlin’s North American Indian Portfolio,” The Times (London), Nov. 24, 1844; John C. Ewers, ed., Indian Art in Pipestone George Catlin’s Portfolio in the British Museum (Washington, DC: British Museum Publications & Smithsonian Press, 1979, pp. 12, 14). Colonel (Ret.) Moore was researching pre-1860 printed sources for material about American artists when we became acquainted at the National Portrait Gallery.

252. The Miss Krehmer mentioned here was the sister of Mrs. Nichol Baird (Mr. Baird’s given name also appears in documents as Nicol and Nicholas). Anna Whistler had met them on board the John Bull, where they had witnessed the death of two-year-old Charles Donald Whistler. Anna Whistler’s maternal grandparents came from England to Charleston, South Carolina. She refers in her letters to Charleston cousins, who are in New York in 1867 and whose house in Charleston was destroyed (Anna Whistler to Mr. James H. Gamble, Homeland, August 3, 1867, and 27 [August 1867], GUL: Whistler Collection, W526). The persons she mentions are cousin Anna Johnstone (1787-1870) at East 41st St., New York; Anna Johnstone’s niece, Mrs. Margaret Corbett (b. 1804); and Mrs. Corbett’s daughter, Elizabeth Duclos (Mrs. Polydore P. Duclos) (Anna Whistler to Mrs. Wann, Tues. morning 6th [1867], GUL: Whistler Collection, W527; Anna Whistler to Mr. Gamble, London, Sept. 7, 1870, W539). The addressees were James H. Gamble (b. 1820) and his sister, Jane (Gamble) Wann (1822–1875). Their domicile was Homeland at Vanderbilt Landing on Staten Island. See the biographies of the Charleston cousins in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
253. Expository Sermons on the Epistles to the Seven Churches, published in 1838, was a work written by the English divine, Henry Blunt (12 August 1794 – 20 July 1843), born at Dulwich; BA, Pembroke College, Cambridge, 1817; “Priest’s orders 20 Dec. [1818].” He was famous as a preacher, doing most of his work at Chelsea, and the author of many popular printed works arising from courses of lectures he delivered each year during the Lenten season on “various leading persons in the Old and New Testament.” These are considered his best works, “full of human interest,” practical, and marked by beauty both of language and of style. Even before going to college, he helped establish “the first Sunday school at Chelsea,” an interest that he continued to maintain later (and one that probably endeared him to Anna Whistler). He also “introduced bible and communicant’s classes” and “published the first parish magazine, . . . the ‘Poor Churchman’s Evening Companion’” (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Blunt, Henry [1794–1843]”). “Miss M” is one of the Maingay daughters, probably Eliza, whose piety Anna Whistler admired.

254. If the diary date, 26 February, a Monday, is correct, the Sunday referred to here should be 18 February.
255. It has not been possible to establish who Major Whistler’s French tutor was; however, Major Whistler did not achieve fluency in French. Anton Shtukenberg (see Image 250), a Russian colleague engaged in building the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway, who had great respect and affection for him, said: “Whistler frequently visited the works and would stay with me. He spoke French badly and although our conversation was a bit labored, still it was very useful for me” (Shtukenberg, Memuary, vol. 2, fol. 514).
256. This is Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (13 October 1812 – 16 April 1894), wife of William Clarke Gellibrand and sister of William Hooper Ropes. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Hall, Prince in Appendix E and Images 266–267.
257. The Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti had carried a warning on this subject just a few days before:

His Majesty the Emperor has taken note of the unusually great speed of cab traffic and, in order to curtail it, has ordered the following: to announce once again to the inhabitants of the capital the Ukase of 1808, which has many times been reconfirmed and from the strict adherence to which no one and no one’s cab has been made exempt. According to the Ukase of 1808 cab drivers are not permitted to drive rapidly and carelessly. For failure to carry out this regulation and for any accident arising as a result, cab drivers will be arrested and their horses confiscated. Anyone injured as a result of such speeding will be treated in the city hospitals at the expense of those who were riding in the cabs. (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 33, Saturday, February 12 [February 24 NS], 1844, p. 145)

258. The Russian word for “cabman,” “driver,” is spelled “izvozchik” and pronounced “izvaw’shcheek” (see Images 352–352).
259. If they had paid for it and with a single coin, they would have used the silver coin called in Russian “poltinnik” or “poltina”

- (pronounced “polteen’nyeek” and “poltee’nuh”) worth half a ruble or fifty kopeks (Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 54).
260. The Russian phrase for “trade rows” or “arcade of shops” (literally, “merchants’ yard”) is spelled “gostinyi dvor” and pronounced “gosstee’nee dvor’.” Designed in 1752 by Francesco-Bartolomeo Rastrelli (1700–1771) in the Baroque style (“to replace a similar structure destroyed in the 1736 fire”), the plan for it was revised in the early 1760s by Vallin de la Mothe (1729–1800), who “preserved the basic features of Rastrelli’s monumental plan” of “long arcades and massive porticos,” “but stripped the design of its statuary in favor of a simple detailing of the structure,” where the “classical element appeared most explicitly in the use of Doric columns to frame the entrances.” Built from 1758 to 1785, it consists of two tiers of arcades on both the exterior and interior of the building, which has the form of a trapezoid, and stands between the Nevskii Prospekt, Bol’shaia Sadovaia Street, Chernyshev Alley, and Gostinaia Street. Its external appearance had not changed by the 1850s, but had been enhanced in recent times by the presence of luxury stores rivalling some of the best stores on the Nevskii Prospekt. Here there were individual shops selling, for example, mirrors, perfume, tobacco, china, table linens, yard goods, furniture, antiques, and paintings. Inside the Gostinyi Dvor, with its arcades paralleling the exterior of the building, was a second set of shops with storerooms and warehouses and shops selling iron and brass wares. In the central courtyard was a weighing station (all material in the design of the building and all quoted material is from Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 261; the rest is from Bur’ianov, Progulka s det’mi, vol. 2, pp. 161–163; Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, pp. 160–164; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 561–562). Mrs. Gellebrand in this entry, also called “Mrs. G,” is Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (see Images 266–267).
261. A “mantua maker” is a dressmaker (C. Willett Cunnington, Phillis Cunnington, and Charles Beard, A Dictionary of English Costume [London: Adam and Charles Black, [1960]], p. 133).
262. In the 18th century, “cardinal” referred to “a ¾-length hooded cloak” worn by ladies, usually of scarlet cloth. In the 19th century, it referred to “a shorter cloak ending about waist-level and without hood or collar” and was “fashionable in 1840s” (Cunnington, Cunnington, and Beard, p. 38).
263. “Gymp (gimp)” refers to “silk, worsted or cotton twist with a cord or wire running through it,” which was used for trimming or decoration on clothing and upholstery (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “gymp”).

264. There was a dual monetary system in Russia: paper money and silver. Paper money, which appeared in Russia in 1769, was called “assignatsii” or “bankovskie biletii” (bank notes). At first, a paper ruble was equal to a silver one, but because too much paper money not backed by silver was released, the rate of exchange began to fall. Copper and paper money were treated as equal, but silver money was valued at a higher rate. One silver ruble began to be considered the equivalent of four paper rubles. In 1839, the rate of exchange was officially fixed, making one silver ruble equal to 3.5 paper rubles. Around 1843, state credit notes (kreditnyye biletii) were introduced instead of “assignatsii,” which were removed from circulation. People nevertheless called these notes by the old name for a long time (Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, pp. 56–57). Anna Whistler sometimes refers to the paper ruble as “banco,” from the other term, “bankovskie biletii” (bank notes), used to mean “assignatsii.”
265. “Bombazine” was a “twilled or corded dress-material, composed of silk and worsted; sometimes also of cotton and worsted, or of worsted alone. In black the material is much used in mourning” (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “bombazine”).
266. The first school for training the choristers of the Imperial Court Chapel Choir (so renamed in 1763) was established by Imperial decree in 1738, during the reign (1730–1740) of Empress Anna Ioannovna (1693–1740). The school and lodgings are housed in a state-owned building on the Moika Canal at Choir Bridge (Percheskii most). The boys are recruited when young and come mainly from the Ukraine. They receive a general and musical education in classes at the choristers’ school and are salaried. Those whose voices change enter the civil service, while those whose voices do not change remain lifetime members of the choir.

The director of the Imperial Court Chapel during the Whistlers’ St. Petersburg sojourn was Aleksei Fyodorovich L’vov (1798–1870; see Image 195). L’vov had no particular expertise in church music but was an “accomplished amateur violinist,” whose travels in the retinue of Nicholas I enabled him to meet “the leading European musicians of his time” and to gain “an international reputation as a musician.” He was chosen for the director’s post in 1837 by Nicholas I because of close personal ties, forged in part by his musical reputation and his training as an engineer and military officer, a training that always appealed to this emperor. More importantly, “in 1833 he won Nicholas’ special favor by composing the hymn ‘God Save the Tsar’, which became the Russian national anthem.” Wishing “to establish a uniform standard of church singing throughout his realm,” Nicholas I gave L’vov enormous powers of censorship, which he exercised to an intimidating degree. During L’vov’s 24-year tenure as director, “the only compositions added to those already approved under Bortniansky [(1751–1825) [a predecessor] were his own.” If the choice of repertoire was conservative and limited, the ordinary one-time visitor to the choir’s rehearsals would probably be unaware; however, Clara Schumann (see Image 199), who did not like L’vov, was aware. Together with her husband (see Image 200), she attended the choir rehearsal on 25 February / 8 March 1844. Her response was: “Unfortunately they sang really mediocre compositions, surely including some by L’vov” (Nauhaus, Marriage Diaries, p. 250).

Still, what particularly struck “visiting foreign musicians,” but other visitors as well, were the technical excellence and sonority of the Imperial Court Chapel Choir performances, the unique mellowness of the singing, which made the “choir resemble a grandiose organ, the magnificence and effect of which upon an impressionable listener’s nervous system is beyond description.” Clara Schumann recorded that it was “the first chorus we have ever heard, the basses resemble organ basses at times, and the sopranos often sound quite supernatural, more beautiful than the most beautiful women’s voices” (Nauhaus, p. 250). And Berlioz, visiting Russia in 1847, noted: “In our time we have no doubt that the Choir of Court Singers in Russia surpasses all choirs that exist at this moment in the entire world ... To compare the choral performance in the Sistine Chapel in Rome with these wondrous singers is the same as comparing a miserable little troupe of fiddlers in a third-rate Italian theater with the orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire. The effect of the music performed by this choir upon nervous people is irresistible. At those incredible accents you feel that you are being overwhelmed, almost to the point of pain, by a nervous state that you don’t know how to control. Several times I attempted in these circumstances to remain calm, straining my will power, but I could never succeed” (Most of the information in this note and all quotations, except the Schumann quotations, are taken from Vladimir Morosan, Choral Performance in Pre-Revolutionary Russia [Madison, CT: Musica Russica, 1994], pp. 57–83. Additional information is taken from Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 463–464; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 416–419). Predisposed to a similar nervous receptivity by a constitution overwrought with grief at the loss of two young children in the previous two years that released in turn memories of others “that have gone before,” Anna Whistler, too, was overwhelmed.

Rehearsals took place every Friday morning and entrance was by ticket (Nauhaus, Marriage Diaries, p. 250). Major, Anna, and Deborah Whistler, together with Emma Maingay, attended a rehearsal on 18 February / 1 March.

267. “Kvas” “is the plainest and cheapest sort of drink, extracted from malt, sometimes from bread-crusts – and is commonly drunk by the people; at first its taste is quite insupportable, but one soon gets accustomed to it and prefers it to any other beverage, especially in summer, on account of its cooling properties. It is very wholesome, not intoxicating, and constitutes the chief drink of the Russian people” (Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 69). There are various kinds of kvas, some with fruit or herbs added. The recipe given here is for a simple Russian bread kvas (russkii khlebnyi kvas):

Cut black bread into small slices and dry in oven. Pour boiling water over the rusks. Strain after 10–12 hours. Mix yeast and wheat flour in a small amount of rusk infusion. Leave in a warm place to rise. Brew some mint in the rusk infusion, boil well, and add sugar. As soon as the yeast rises, pour it into the sugar infusion, add the mint and sugar, mix and put it in a warm place until a thick foam appears. Remove the foam carefully, strain the liquid and pour into bottles, without filling them to the top. Seal the bottles tightly with corks and stand them in a cold place. In twelve hours the kvas will be ready. (V.S. Mikhailov, Pravoslavnaiia kukhnia [Russian Orthodox Cooking] [Moscow: Kubka, 1996], p. 65)

268. Carolyn C. Dunlop, The Russian Court Chapel Choir 1796-1917, vol. 1, Music archive publications, series F (Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Publishers, 2000), pp. 21, 22.
269. Emma Maingay (see Image 263) spent 9 March 1844 with the Whistlers.
270. The volume was Christian Meditations; or, The Believer's Companion in Solitude by Thomas Shaw Bancroft Reade, Esquire (1777 – Leeds 12 April 1841). It was published soon after his death (London: Hamilton, Adams; Leeds: J.Y. Knight, 1841). He was also the - author of Christian Experience (London, 1832) and Christian Retirement (12th ed., Kirkby Lonsdale: Arthur Foster, 1840) (Laureen Baillie, ed., British Biographical Archive [New York: K.G. Saur, c. 1986], microfiche; British Library catalogue). Anna Whistler's information about when Reade died does not coincide with the facts (The Leeds Intelligencer & Yorkshire Advertiser, April 17, 1841).

271. For the United States, see The Book of Common Prayer, and the Administration of the Sacraments, and Other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, According to the Use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America: Together with The Psalter, or Psalms of David (Philadelphia: Female Protestant Episcopal Prayer-Book Society of Pennsylvania, 1839). For England, see The Book of Common Prayer, and Administration of the Sacraments, and Other Rites and Ceremonies of The United Church of England and Ireland: Together with the Psalter or Psalms of David, Pointed As They Are To Be Sung or Said in Churches; and the Form and Manner of Making, Ordaining, and Consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons (Oxford: Printed at the University Press, 1839).
272. As Calvary Church, the Episcopalian Church in Stonington, Connecticut, was not completed until May 1849 (consecrated on 31 May 1849), when the Whistlers lived in Stonington they attended services at the Westerly Church, the Episcopalian Church in Westerly, Rhode Island (Minor Myers Jr., History of Calvary Church, Stonington [Stonington, CT: Calvary Churchwomen, 1973], p. 14). Their means of transportation was a handcar ("The early years and boyhood of James MacNeill Whistler," by Miss Emma W. Palmer, GUL: Whistler Collection, P44).
273. This is Katherine Prince (13 April 1820 – 19 November 1906), daughter of the Whistlers' friends, John Dynely Prince (12 August 1779 – 5 January 1860), superintendent of the Merrimac Print Works in Lowell, Massachusetts, and Susan (Travers) Prince (d. 15 June 1867). Her married name was Livermore. It has not been possible to locate this note.
274. This is Sarah (Poulterer) Harrison (21 September 1817 – 21 July 1906, wife of Joseph Harrison Jr. Her husband, who had gone to Russia in 1843, was a partner in the firm of Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick, making the locomotives and rolling stock in Russia for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. See the biographies of the Harrison family in Appendix E (hereafter, Harrison) and Images 226–227.

275. It has not been possible to locate this letter written by William Gibbs McNeill to Major Whistler.
276. Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22) was with her son, Charles Johnston McNeill, in Florida.
277. As a verb, “avail” has among its meanings “to be of use” or “to afford help.”
278. James Whistler (c. 1796 – 11 October 1843), brother of Major G.W. Whistler, had at his death “no family” (CHS: Whistler, p. 3; Cheryl Whistler Garrison, “Descendants of Major John Whistler,” ancestry.com; Times-Picayune, Tuesday, October 17, 1843). It would be logical to assume that the announcement of his death was made in the letter from his niece, Eliza Van Vee (Eliza Van Vechten), to his niece, Deborah Whistler, rather than in the letter from Catherine Julia McNeill, his other niece, known as Deborah’s “Twin.” See his biography in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
279. The reference is to Cousin Caroline (Whistler) Bloodgood and her husband, William. See Note 156 above and Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
280. This is Sophia (Krehmer) Baird, whom they visited on Saturday, 16 March 1844.
281. This is Lydia (Procter) Wood (26 November 1810 – 22 April 1880), whose husband, Charles, was engaged in the manufacture of cotton cloth in Russia. See the biography of the Wood family in Appendix E (hereafter, Wood) and Images 271–272. Anna Whistler had hoped to see her at the sociable on Thursday, 21 March.
282. The Russian command for “Stop!” is both spelled and pronounced “stoy.”
283. Here, Anna Whistler comes much closer than before in rendering the pronunciation of the Russian word for “cabman,” “driver,” spelled “izvozchik” and pronounced “izvaw’shcheek” (see Images 352–353).
284. Anna Whistler also sent via Maxwell “a doll dressed in the Russian national costume for his sister, Agness” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry for June 8 in letter of Sunday, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
285. This is Julia McNeill Palmer (25 March 1841 – 22 February 1902), daughter of Catherine Jane (McNeill) and Dr. George E. Palmer

- (see Image 36) of Stonington, Connecticut. Her married name was Boardman.
286. It has not been possible to ascertain when this “bazaar for the poor” was held during the week of 11–16 March. Maxwell writes on 26 March of “a fair only three days ago at the English Parsons” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29), which took place after Anna Whistler’s entry of 22 March.
  287. It was the third birthday of Ellen Gellibrand Ropes, born 15 March 1841.
  288. Because James had been ill and missed his drawing lesson, Anna Whistler broke her rule and allowed him to have a lesson on Sunday, 17 March 1844. On the same day, she drove with her husband and William Hooper Ropes, as interpreter, to look at a house on the Peterhof Road for the summer because Mr. Ropes was free on Sunday.
  289. Among the tutors hired by the Whistlers in 1844 was a drawing teacher named Monsieur Vaney. We know only that he was in their employ until they left in May to spend the summer in a dacha on the Peterhof Road.
  290. The Peterhof Road runs along the shore of the Gulf of Finland in a broken line, sometimes approaching the shore, sometimes receding from it. Its length, measured from Kalinkin Bridge in St. Petersburg to the Imperial Palace and town of Peterhof, is twenty-eight versts. The road consists of a highway with elevated paths for pedestrians. Along its tract are to be found the Gates of the Russian Guard, Tentelev Village, Krasnyi Kabachok, the Hospital of All That Mourn (an insane asylum), the Trinity-Sergius Monastery, Strel’na and, just before Peterhof, Alexandria, the personal palace of Nicholas I (see Images 395–403). In addition to these places of interest, magnificent dachas are to be found along both sides of the road (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, pp. 432–433). Dachas of far greater simplicity are also to be found here, some built on land on which villas have been razed. Such was the dacha the Whistlers finally rented.
  291. Which four houses they inspected cannot be determined, but they chose a house on the estate of Thomas Drury Sr., located “about 3½ miles from the city barrier.” It was “a fine large house with improved grounds. furnished,” for which they agreed to “pay $225. for the season,” which meant they could stay the entire year, if they wished, but it was “not intended for cold weather” (Major

- G.W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, entry of May 18 in letter of April 4, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers). “The house stands upon the spot once occupied by the large house of the Princess Narishkin, the Mistress of Alexander. This villa has long since been pulled down and the property sold - It was bought by a man named Drury who built three country houses upon it - one of which is his own residence and another of Major W” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). See M.I. Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe okrestnostei Peterburga [The Forgotten Past of the Environs of Petersburg (St. Petersburg: A.S. Suvorin, 1889; Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1994), 1889 ed., p. 129.
292. Anna Whistler finished her despatches on Tuesday, 19 March 1844.
293. This reference is to Joseph Harrison Jr. (20 September, 1810 – 27 March 1874), American locomotive engine builder from Philadelphia, partner in the firm of Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick, which was engaged in constructing in Russia the locomotives and rolling stock for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. See Harrison in Appendix E and Image 226.
294. This may be a reference to a jigsaw puzzle. See Yevgenia Petrova, ed., Play and Passion in Russian Fine Art (St. Petersburg: Gosudarstvennyi Russkii muzei, 1999), p. 47.
295. There was no Chapman child named John. Perhaps “Johnnie” was used to distinguish the child James from his father of the same name (conversation with Robin Spencer [retired] of St. Andrew’s University in Scotland).
296. There is no letter from Mr. Harrison from Berlin among the correspondence to the Whistlers. The carbon copies he made of his letters in a special letterbook indicate that while in Berlin he wrote letters, but did not use the letterbook, called “Wedgwood’s Patent Manifold Writer.”
297. This is the Russian word for a “covered sledge,” spelled “kibitka” and pronounced “keebeet’kuh” (see Image 354).
298. This reference is to Sarah (Poulterer) Harrison (see Image 227) and their children, William Henry Harrison (23 December 1837 – 10 March 1886) and Annie Harrison (25 December 1839 – 1915) (RG84: Records of Foreign Service Posts of the Department of State, Diplomatic Posts, American Embassy, Great Britain, C18.2: London Passport Book 1836–1845, NAUS [hereafter, NAUS: Passports, RG84, C18.2], passport nos. 1097

- and 1099, destination: St. Petersburg). See also Harrison in Appendix E.
299. Anna Whistler is referring to the resumption of celebrations in Admiralty Square during Holy Week (see Images 378–379 for icons of the Holy Week feast days).
300. The first 147 bridges across the Neva were floating bridges (see Image 99). Work to replace them with permanent ones started in the 1840s and Annunciation Bridge (see Images 140–142) was the first built (G.I. Bogdanov, “Problemy sokhraneniia mostov Sankt-Peterburga” [“Problems in the Preservation of the Bridges of St. Petersburg”], Peterburgskie chteniia 96 [1996]: p. 281). Work on it had commenced on 1/13 January 1843. Major Whistler did not live to see it completed. It was being built “from a point where the Kriukov Canal entered the [Grand] Neva on its left bank to a point on the right bank between Lines 5 and 6 near the Academy of Arts on Vasilievskii Ostrov. The left bank end of the bridge was near the Annunciation Church [see Image 131] and square of the same name” (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 362), which the Whistlers lived very close to. Work was being carried out under the direction of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings, headed by Count P.A. Kleinmikhel’ (see Image 243), and under the chairmanship of Lt. Colonel (after December 1843) of Engineers M.G. Destrem (see Image 246) (Haywood, pp. 362–363). In charge of building the bridge was Major of Engineers S.V. Kerbedz (Haywood, pp. 361–363). It was completed in 1850 and opened on 21 November / 2 December 1850 by Nicholas I (see Images 420–423), who walked across it (Haywood, pp. 364–365). It was popularly called the Nicholas Bridge. “Harrison, Winans and Eastwick played a secondary but still very important role” in the construction of the bridge, “producing and installing in ... 1848–1850 the cast iron works for [it]” (Haywood, p. 360).
301. Anna Whistler’s statement implies that the bridge had to be completed by the time the ice broke up in 1844, but the driving of piles for the piers had just begun. “Because of the difficulty of laying the foundations of the piers, which was the most difficult task of all, work began to fall behind schedule” and “had to be suspended once the ice was about to break up, which in that year happened in early April” (Haywood, p. 363). “The driving of piles” was not completed until “spring of 1846” (Haywood, pp. 363–364).

302. “The Emperor, is frequently seen in the Nevsky. His approach will be noticed by the unusual flutter of the crowd ... Hats fly off, and each one wheels to the right-about, and waits the approach of his Imperial Majesty. If he rides, it is in an old and forlorn barouche or sleigh; if he walks, it is alone and at a moderate pace. There is nothing in his appearance to attract attention. A tall figure in a chapeau and plume, a dark cloth cloak and strapless pantaloons, passes along, receives the homage of his subjects, gives them the military salute in return, and disappears before the multitude have recovered from their surprise” (Maxwell, Czar, pp. 91–92); see also the entry of June 19 [1847], BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 57–58.
303. The Mikhailovsky Theater, also called the Michel Theater, was located on the square of the Mikhailovsky Palace (see Image 135), in which Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (see Image 439), brother of Emperor Nicholas I, lived. The theater, built by the architect Aleksandr Pavlovich Briullov (1798–1877), was located on the corner of Engineer (Inzhenernaia) Street and is a brief walk from the Nevskii Prospekt. Its architecture renders it undistinguishable from the private homes in its vicinity. It can seat up to 900 persons and has a large stage and good acoustics. It was opened on 8/20 November 1833. Mainly performances by the French troupe were given in this theater, but sometimes the German troupe presented comedies here (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 365–366; Jerermann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, pp. 99–100; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 640–641).
304. Clara (Wieck) Schumann (Leipzig 13 September 1819 – Frankfurt 20 May 1896; see Image 199) played her fourth and final public concert in St. Petersburg on 17/29 March 1844, at 8 p.m. at the Mikhailovsky Theater to a full house. Each half of the concert also contained a vocal performance by Wilhelm Versing (1811–1879), bass of the German Opera and also of the Italian Opera in St. Petersburg (Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhibizn' Peterburga, p. 172). The program for the first part of the concert consisted of: Overture; Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra by Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; aria by Mozart (Mr. Versing); Scherzo by Clara Schumann; “Gretchen am Spinnrade” by Schubert/Liszt; Étude in A minor by Chopin. The second part of the concert consisted of: Overture; “Lied ohne Worte” by Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; Étude “Wenn ich ein Vöglein wär” by Henselt (1814–1889); Prelude and Fugue by Bach (by request); songs (sung by Mr. Versing); Concert Piece in F minor for piano and orchestra by Weber (Nauhaus, Schumann Tagebücher, p. 542n648). Clara Schumann recorded that without the “clear profit of over 1000 rubles silver [they] made [they] would have had trouble leaving Petersburg” (Nauhaus, Marriage Diaries, p. 266). I wish to thank Dr. Gerd Nauhaus, Director of the Robert-Schumann-Haus, Zwickau, Germany, for supplying photocopies of the programs of the four public concerts given in St. Petersburg by Clara Schumann. Anna Whistler, who did not attend either of the concerts she mentions, probably knew of Clara W. Schumann only from Debo and her friends, nor did she know German. She could not recall Schumann’s last name when writing the diary entry and probably wrote “V” for her middle name, given the pronunciation of “W” like “V” in German. She probably heard Debo, who was studying German, pronounce the name.

305. The Smol’nyi Institute for the Education of Young Noblewomen (see Image 147) was founded by Catherine the Great in 1764 and “modelled after Mme de Maintenon’s seminary at St Cyr” (Hamilton, Art and Architecture, pp. 180, 190). The boarding school was first housed in the Resurrection Newmaiden Convent, “an establishment for orphan girls,” which had been designed by Rastrelli (1700–1771) for Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413) (Hamilton, pp. 180, 190). The more usual name for this Convent was the Smol’nyi Convent, from the Russian word for “tar” (smola), because of its proximity to the area where tar had been stored for the navy in the time of Peter the Great. The future building for the school (1806–1808), built next to the Smol’nyi Convent, was designed by Giacomo Quarenghi (1744–1817), who considered it his masterpiece (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, pp. 250–253, 271, 292, 295–296, 319; Dmitrii Shvidkovskii, St. Petersburg: Architecture of the Tsars, ill. Alexander Orloff, trans. John Goodman [New York; London; Paris: Abbeville Press, 1996], pp. 65–66, 71, 100, 102, 103; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 1, pp. 65–71). It was located on the corner of Voskresenskaia Naberezhnaia Street and Orlovskaiia Street on the Grand Neva in the Rozhdestvenskaia District, Fourth Ward (Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, pp. 103, 104). For a detailed description of the pupils’ activities, chiefly in the time of Catherine the Great, see Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 46–55; for the 1830s, see Bur’ianov, Progulka s det’mi, vol. 2, pp. 324–331.

Clara Schumann played informally at the Smol’nyi Convent on the afternoon of 15/27 March 1844. In her diary, she did not indicate what she played. She dwelt rather on her embarrassment at the attentions paid her by the young women: “Wednesday the 27th/15 ... Around 1 o’clock at the invitation of Prince von Oldenburg [see Image 294] we drove to the Smolny Convent, where aristocratic young women are educated and for whom, since they are not allowed to go out, I was supposed to play. ... I played a lot, and afterward had to make a tour among all the ladies, all of whom wanted to thank me - I could well have been like a queen if my face hadn’t revealed my embarrassment and the unfamiliarity of this role. Later we made the tour through the inner rooms of the institute, always accompanied by a troupe of young girls, one of whom wanted to carry my gloves, another my wrist warmer, the third my shawl, etc., and wouldn’t give these back until we had arrived at the staircase, where a unanimous chorus of repeated thank-yous rang out. Despite the many embarrassments that followed one another here, the thing did give me much pleasure” (Nauhaus, Marriage Diaries, pp. 264–265). Deborah Whistler attended the concert with the Maingay family.

306. Anna Whistler omitted the word “letter” here. It has not been possible to locate this letter.
307. This is George Edwin Palmer Jr. (8 May 1843 – 24 March 1909), son of Dr. George Edwin Palmer and his second wife, Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer, of Stonington, Connecticut. The writer is Maria (Cammann) McNeill. It has not been possible to locate this letter. For the obituary of George Edwin Palmer Jr., see The Cincinnati Enquirer, Sat., 26 March 1909, p. 7, col. 7. See also his biography in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
308. Anna Whistler probably meant “when.”
309. Rather than come to Russia, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22) had decided to go to Florida to stay with her younger son, Charles. Anna Whistler’s remarks to Mr. and Mrs. Gamble, on receiving the news in April 1869 of her brother’s death, reflect her certainty that he had indeed been positively influenced by their mother: “A fortnight since came to me from Florida tidings of my brothers sudden death, for which however I am thankful in feeling assured he was prepared. his was a life of cheerful resignation to our heavenly Fathers will diligent in his labors for the maintenance of his wife & many children, he was fervent in spirit, I may truly say he walked with God & is with for God has taken him!” (Anna Whistler to my dear friends, London May 6th [18] 69, GUL: Whistler Collection, W 536).

310. The word “budget” means “a bundle.” Anna Whistler is referring to the bundle of mail they had received.
311. Galignani’s Messenger was a newspaper founded in 1814 in Paris by Giovanni Antonio Galignani (1757–1821), a bookseller, and carried on by his sons, John (1796–1873) and William (1798–1882). It was popular among English residents on the Continent. They also published reprints of English books (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Galignani, John [1796–1873]” and “Galignani, William [1798–1882]”; “Unique Mission of Gallagnani’s Messenger Has Ended,” New York Times, August 21, 1904).
312. On 28 February 1844, the man-of-war USS Princeton was making an excursion with some 350 guests on board. On its return journey, when about two or three miles from Alexandria, Virginia, the large gun called the “Peacemaker” was fired for the third time. The gun burst, “split into two parts and [broke] entirely off the gun’s barrel,” killing the secretary of state, Abel P. Upshur (b. 17 June 1790); the secretary of the Navy, Thomas W. Gilmer (b. 6 April 1802); Colonel David Gardiner (b. 1784) of East Hampton, New York, formerly a state senator; Commodore Beverly W. Kennon (b. 7 April 1795), chief of the Bureau of Construction, Equipment and Repairs of the Navy; Mr. Virgil Maxcy (b. 5 May 1785) of Maryland, “the recent U.S. chargé d’affaires at The Hague”; two sailors; and I. More, the valet of the president of the United States. Captain Stockton was injured (Edward L. Beach, Captain, U.S.N. (retired), The United States Navy: A 200-Year History, The American Heritage Library [Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1986], pp. 196–222; The National Intelligencer, February 29, 1844; New York Herald, March 1, 1844). For a conversation on the subject of accidents between Major Whistler and Nicholas I after this event, see Major G.W. Whistler to Gen. J.G. Swift, St. Petersburg, April 4, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers.
313. Donald McNeill Fairfax (10 March 1821 – 10 January 1894), Anna Whistler’s nephew, was the son of her elder sister, Isabella Kingsley (McNeill) Fairfax (c.1798 – c.1850) and of George William Fairfax (5 November 1797 – June 1853). He was at this time a “passed midshipman” in the United States Navy. He had indeed been on the Princeton. The other incident in which he had escaped death was the destruction of the Missouri by fire in Gibraltar Harbor on 26 August 1843 (Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. “Fairfax, Donald McNeill”; ZB file for Donald McNeill Fairfax, information sheet dated 22 March 1917, Naval Historical Center, Washington, DC). See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E and Image 38.

314. Palm Sunday, celebrating the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem, is the Sunday immediately preceding Easter Sunday: 19/31 March in 1844 (see Image 378). In Russian it is called “pussy willow” Sunday (verbnoe voskresenie). Generally the cycle of spring holidays began a week before Easter, on the Saturday of the eve of Palm Sunday. In St. Petersburg, there was a kind of fair called “the pussy willows” that was set up in front of the Gostinyi Dvor along its Nevskii Prospekt and Sadovaia Street sides. The populace celebrated under the arches of these arcades of shops, and there was a brisk trade, mainly in bunches of pussy willow branches decorated with paper flowers and wax cherubs, and in balloons, toys, and sweets. As Lent was not yet over, there was no real revelling, but the appearance of masses of people in the streets, the noise and shoving of the crowd, the witty loud cries of the pedlars and hawkers and the sellers of pussy willow branches and toys was all taken as a kind of rehearsal for the big popular celebration of Easter to come in Admiralty Square (A.F. Nekrylova, Russkie narodnye gorodskie prazdniki, uveseleniia i zrelishcha. Konets XVIII nachalo XX veka [Russian Folk Holidays, Amusements and Entertainments Celebrated in the City: From the End of the 18th to the Beginning of the 20th Centuries], 2nd ed. [Leningrad: Iskusstvo, 1988], p. 20). This fair, according to Anna Whistler, who was writing on the Friday before Palm Sunday, had been going on all the previous week (see Image 345).
315. Maxwell took James and Willie to Admiralty Square during Easter Week, and, making a comparison of this same “ebullition of joy” to the sombreness of the Russian character he was observing, pompously and patriotically interpreted their vivacity as the manifestation of freedom by the citizens of a free land, not understood for what it was by those who were not free:

Last week (Easter week) I took my dear little friends the Major's boys. in my carriage and falling into line with the procession of vehicles. went up and down the Square of the Admiralty, where the clown's of the circus upon the balconies and the clowns of the crowd upon the street excited equal laughter. These boys besides their beauty are very different from all the children you see in this country. The early intelligence of youth with us is well known to be remarkable. Here this is very striking - when these boys are compared with those around them, but this character. is nothing in point of singularity to that which I especially noticed on this occasion. The Russians great and small, in hundreds filled the great square gazing upon the various objects presented for their admiration. They were not a merry nor a noisy assemblage as we comprehend ~~this~~ the merriment and noise of an assembly. ~~and~~ but the very youngest of them all seemed as demure and sedate as if stricken in years. This population from whatever cause always and on all occasion's presents this sombre and melancholy picture and I would not have had my attention particularly attracted by it, had it not been for the noisy companions I had in charge. Every thing at all extraordinary, a Harlequin Punchinello etc were noticed with a noisy vivacity that not only drew the eyes of the bystanders, but also those of the police as I imagine - and had I not been rather more than an ordinary person, one having privileges, I would have been disposed to check my merry friends. Look there! haurra! hallo! sung out the youngsters in great glee every few moments, to the astonishment of the passers by. who perhaps trembled for the audacity of the rising generation. Little did they dream that the musical voices that were ringing in their ears, and the sparkling eyes and fine curling heads of hair, they saw belonged to a free and far off land, and that in their midst, these gifts of nature seemed alone the gifts of God to the sons of freedom. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 32)

316. Jacks is Patrick Tracy Jackson McNeill (3 October 1835 – 22 April 1898), son of Maria (Cammann) and William Gibbs McNeill. He is also the Jacky mentioned in the following sentence of the diaries. See his biography in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
317. Willie Wyatt is William Wyatt McNeill (October 1833 – 4 June 1853), brother of Patrick Tracy Jackson McNeill. See his biography in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
318. A cosmorama is a collection of views, of truly remarkable monuments, buildings, sites from all over the world, illuminated by daylight or fire and constructed in such a way that one looks at these views from a dark room through a magnifying glass. Such a public cosmorama was available all through the winter of 1845

- in St. Petersburg near the Alexandrine Theater on the Nevskii Prospekt (Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 306–309, 309n133).
319. In the week before Easter Sunday, swings (see Image 346) were added to the carousels and theater booths being rebuilt in Admiralty Square. Just as Butter Week, celebrated when it was still winter, was characterized by ice hills (see Image 344), so Easter week, part of the spring celebration, was characterized by swings (kacheli), a wooden ferris-wheel with four cars (Nekrylova, Russkie narodnye gorodskie prazdniki, p. 22; Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 269n65). The Russian word for “swings” is spelled “kacheli” and pronounced “kahchay’lee,” and is a plural. Anna Whistler was using the Russian singular form with the English plural suffix -s, probably the usage of her friends.
320. Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 363.
321. Passion Week was 19–25 March / 31 March – 6 April 1844, culminating in Easter Sunday, 26 March / 7 April.
322. Good Friday occurred on 24 March / 5 April 1844.
323. Luke 14:10–11: “<sup>10</sup> But when thou art bidden, go and sit down in the lowest room; that when he that bade thee cometh, he may say unto thee, Friend, go up higher: then shalt thou have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee. <sup>11</sup> For whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.”
324. “By the way let me say a word on Good Friday. These days of high church festival are observed here with much more particularity than elsewhere in Europe. In our Country, we know nothing of them and I am sure like nine tenths of the people of the US. I could not tell when I first arrived whether Lent preceded or followed Easter. Good Friday in St. Petersburg is the only real Sabbath in as far as the observance of religious worship is concerned that is known here. I knew that the folks up stairs, (as M<sup>rs</sup> W is very pious) had gone to prayers every morning in the English Chapel, ... but on this day, Good Friday, I did not hear the piano going, the organ grinders who have just thawed out, did not pass my windows as usual, and there was a remarkable quiet in every respect. ~~On~~ From the family on their return from church I heard that it was crowded to excess, that many English, who have become half Russian in their habits, were present, and that Count Nesselrode [see Image 309], who is a protestant, paid his annual visit to the holy alters. In fact there are hundreds of the upper or wealthy order, who like Count Nesselrode think it sufficient for them to attend only on Good Friday” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 7. Easter Sunday. 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 31).

325. The Cathedral of the (Icon of) the Kazan Mother of God (see Image 126) is located on the Nevskii Prospekt in the Second Admiralty District. The earlier Kazan Cathedral was built in 1733. The present cathedral was designed and built by the architect Andrei Nikiforovich Voronikhin (1759–1814). Constructed over a period of ten years, it was consecrated on 15/27 September 1811.

Both the exterior of the Kazan Cathedral and the Corinthian columns adorning it are made of Pudozh limestone, which is yellowish-gray in color. It was used as well for the architraves, bas reliefs, statues and other decorations. The capitals of the columns are also of Pudozh stone, while the bases are of cast iron. The portico on the Nevskii Prospekt side is embellished with colossal bronze statues of John the Baptist and princes Vladimir, Alexander Nevsky, and Andrew the First-Called. The magnificent bronze doors located on this side were modeled on the famous “Gates of Paradise” of the Baptistery in Florence. The semicircular colonnade consists of 132 columns and is 40 sazhen in diameter. It contains a colossal bronze statue of the Archangel Gabriel at one end and the Archangel Michael at the other, each on a granite pedestal. The cupola of the building, 9 sazhen in diameter, consists of six rectangular Corinthian pilasters and is covered by an oval vault with a gilded cross on top. The cathedral, including the cross, is just over 33 sazhen high. The internal structure of the cathedral is cruciform. In the center rises the cupola with its sixteen windows. From the four pillars under the cupola there is a double-rowed Corinthian colonnade of 56 pink Finnish granite columns going in four directions, to the main altar and the three main doors of the cathedral. Each column has a bronze capital and base. There are three altars. The main altar is dedicated to the Kazan Mother of God, that on the right to the Birth of the Most Holy Mother of God and that on the left to Antonii and Feodosii, the miracle-working saints of the Kiev Cave Monastery.

The miracle-working icon of the Kazan Mother of God, in a mounting (rižu) of pure gold decorated with precious stones and pearls, is to be found in a special case on the main iconostasis to the left of the Royal Doors. This icon accompanied the Russian Army in 1812. The iconostasis of the main altar is covered in silver donated by the ataman of the Don troops, who had seized it from the French, who had pillaged it in Moscow. Trophies of the wars of 1812, 1813, and 1814 hang over the tomb of Prince Mikhail Illarionovich Golenishchev-Kutuzov-Smolenskii (5/16 September 1745 – 16/28 April 1813), commander-in-chief of the Russian Army, who was buried here in 1813. In the square in front of the cathedral on the Nevskii Prospekt are bronze statues of Prince Kutuzov and Prince Mikhail Bogdanovich Barclay de Tully (1761–1818), also a hero of 1812, which were unveiled on 25 December 1837 / 6 January 1838. On the east side of the cathedral is the Catherine Canal and Kazan Bridge; on the west side there is a semicircular square (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 2, pp. 197–208; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 277, 552; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 1, pp. 83–87; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 132–136).

326. On re-entering the church, it is the priest who speaks. He calls out “Christ Is Risen!” and the congregation responds “Verily He Is Risen!”
327. The Catholic Church of St. Catherine of Alexandria, Maiden and Martyr, the oldest and largest Catholic church in St. Petersburg (see Image 127), is located on the Nevskii Prospekt across the street from the tower of the Town Hall. Its court yard and building come out in back onto Mikhailovskii Square. The church is built on a spot granted by Empress Anna Ioannovna in ukases of 1738 and 1739. The project for designing the church, entrusted first to Pietro Antonio Trezini (1710–1768), was given in 1759 to Vallin de La Mothe, who basically changed it. The foundation of the building was laid on 16/27 July 1763, but because of financial difficulties it took more than twenty years to complete. Initially the construction was directed by Antonio Rinal'di (1710–1798), at the culminating stage by the architect D. Minchaki (b. 1754). The money for its construction was given partly by the state treasury, partly by donation. The most extensive help in collecting the money and in building the church and church buildings came from a Bavarian merchant, Andrei Pirling, who for a long time carried on his business in the so-called Nuremberg shops, which were set up on the lower floors of the façade wings of the church building. The solemn consecration of the church by the Papal Legate of Pope Pius VI, Cardinal Giovanni Archetti (1731–1805), took place on 7 October 1783 (OS). The church has the form of a Latin cross and is crowned with a cupola. It is 44 meters long, 25 meters wide, and 42 meters high, and holds about two thousand people. The main façade has a monumental arched portal, which rests on free-standing columns. The façade culminates in a high parapet on which are placed statues of the four Evangelists and a group of angels holding a cross. Above the main entrance, to which used to lead nine wide steps, are the words “My house shall be called the house of prayer” (Matthew 21:13) and the year 1782. The interior of the church is magnificent. The altar, made of various-colored marble and crowned with a gilded bronze cross three metres high and two silver reliquaries, was the gift of Antonio Branca of Livorno. The last Polish King, Stanislaw Poniatowski (1732–1798), who died in St. Petersburg on 1/12 February 1798, is buried here, as is Marshal Jean-Victor Moreau (1763–1813), who was fatally wounded in the battle of Dresden. The clergy of this church in its early years and again from 1816 to 1892 were from the Dominican Order. During the reign of Nicholas I, the church received the boon of a loan of 500,000 paper rubles at advantageous terms to expand the church building. In 1851, it was stated to be one of the most extensive and profitable buildings in the city, with excellent stores still to be found on its Nevskii Prospekt side. On the Mikhailovskii Square side of the building was the book store of Krashennnikov and the sale of church books took place. The entire court yard was occupied at that time by artisan tenants and others (Shul'ts, Kbramy Sankt-Peterburga, pp. 232–240; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 216–217, 290; Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 301; Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 265; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 220–221; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 3, pp. 221–223).

328. They went home by the same route by which they had gone to church, since Anna Whistler writes: “On our return through the Nevski what a contrast.” The reference here is to Palace Square in front of the Winter Palace (see Images 116, 132), which she elsewhere in the diaries correctly calls by its other name “Alexander Square,” but in this entry calls “Alexandra Square.” In Russian, it would be called “ploshchad' Aleksandra” (“square of Alexander”); here, Aleksandra is the masculine genitive case, although it looks like the female name Alexandra. From Alexander Square, she saw “the preparations for commencing the Easter amusements” in Admiralty Square. Confusion about the route they took is caused by the fact that there actually is an Alexandra Square. It is located between His Majesty's Own Palace and the Public Library, which are on the other side of the Nevskii Prospekt, about opposite the Church of St. Catherine. Alexandra Square takes its name from the Alexandrinskii Theater, which it is located in front of (Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 75). The Alexandrinskii Theater is named for Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna.

329. Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna (see Image 432) wrote in her memoirs that her parents always spent Passion Week in the Anichkov Palace (see Images 133–134) with the family, preparing for confession and Communion (Son iunosti, p. 19). They returned to the Winter Palace when “Christ is risen” was proclaimed in the churches and the church bells “throughout the city [began] to peal, and the cannon in the fortress to thunder” (BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 3, fols. 75–76). The Anichkov Palace is located on the Nevskii Prospekt, about two versts from the Winter Palace (von Grimm, Alexandra Feodorovna, vol. 1, p. 140).
330. William Winstanley Hull (15 March 1794 – 28 August 1873), Esquire, barrister-at-law, was the eldest son of Dr. John Hull, MD, and of Sarah (Winstanley) Hull, John Winstanley’s sister (Henry Fishwick, The History of the Parish of Poulton-le-fylde, in the County of Lancaster [The Chetham Society, 1885], pp. 55, 85–86). Neither the book nor the Easter prayer can be identified. See Winstanley ... Cragg in Appendix E.
331. Mary Brennan was a Catholic, but she did not accompany Anna Whistler and William Hooper Ropes to St. Catherine’s Catholic Church earlier in the day. Anna Whistler also mentions that she and Aunt Alicia had prayers with Mary (entry of Tuesday [July] 9th [1844], NYPL: AWP, Part I) and that Mary came in to listen one Sunday when Debo read aloud one of Blunt’s sermons (entry of Sunday [August] 18th [1844], NYPL: AWP, Part I). It was Mary who took Willie to the English Church on the Sunday Admiral Hall died there (entry of Feb 14th 1844, NYPL: AWP, Part I). She also seems to have attended afternoon services at the English Church frequently in 1846 (entry for March 9th 1846, NYPL: AWP, Part I). She may have been too timid to leave the Whistler circle.
332. Thomas Shaw Bancroft Reade, Christian Meditations; or, The Believer’s Companion in Solitude (London: Hamilton, Adams; Leeds: J.Y. Knight, 1841).
333. Reverend Thomas Scales Ellerby (18 March 1810 – 11 June 1892) was pastor from 1840 to 1853 of the British and American Congregational Church, which was located on New Isaac (Novo-Isaakienskaia) Street, near the Post Office in the First Admiralty District, Third Ward (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, p. 52; Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar', p. 42). See the biographies of the Ellerby family in Appendix E (hereafter, Ellerby) and Images 125, 256.

334. Tuesday was 23 April.
335. Anna Whistler meant “I hope to make time.”
336. These two events occurred on 23 April 1822 and 23 April 1840.
337. These family members were Joseph Samuel Ropes, Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, Elizabeth Hannah Ropes, Ellen Gellibrand Ropes, Mary Emily Ropes, and Louisa Harriet Ropes (see Images 266–267).
338. Anna Whistler is referring to 17 April 1844.
339. Psalms 46:10: “Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.”
340. Anna Whistler is referring to William Wyatt McNeill and Patrick Tracy Jackson McNeill, the sons of her brother, General William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31) and Maria (Cammann) McNeill.
341. Maxwell suffered the effects of his illness for a long time. Even by May he was still not able to open his fingers completely and his hair was coming out by the handful. He took the advice of a hairdresser to remedy the latter condition by having his head shaved and temporarily wearing a wig (letters from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell: St. Petersburg, May 11, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 34; St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, no. 35; St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, no. 36).
342. “When the Neva is frozen to the thickness of a foot and a half or two feet, great slabs, five feet long and three feet wide, are hewn out of its icy covering, and with these the cellars are filled. The ice, however, is not stowed away in these great blocks, but is first crushed into small pieces, which are stamped down into a compact mass in the cellars. This mass again freezes into solid layers of ice, the lowest or ground-tier of which is never taken out, when the cellars are well constructed, but remains perpetually there, a frozen foundation two or three feet deep, upon which, each successive winter, fresh ice is piled up to a height of five or six feet. Ice is deemed such a necessary of life in St. Petersburg, that the finest house would obtain no tenant if its ice-cellar were bad. People literally cannot exist there without ice. It is in constant use. In the first place, all kinds of eatables—meat, milk, butter, etc.—are kept in the ice-cellar. Then it is mixed with water, beer, quass, and with almost all cold drinks. When there is a superfluity of it, the Petersburgers place it on the stoves and

- under the beds, to cool the apartments” (Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 69). “In bad (mild) winters there is often a great deficiency of natural ice, for enough is wanted to fill all the cellars not only of the city but of the surrounding country villas” (Jerrmann, p. 69).
343. On Sunday, 21 April, Anna Whistler and Willie went to visit Mary Gent Hirst, who was living in the house of her brother, Thomas Nelson Hirst, on Vasilievskii Island, on the Fifth Line, between Bol’shoi and Srednii prospekts, at No. 31. See Hirst in Appendix E.
  344. Exodus: 20:8: “Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy.”
  345. I Timothy 5:6: “But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth.”
  346. Chapters 4 and 5 of 2 Corinthians were appropriate readings for someone near death, their message being that affliction works glory and that absent from the body we are at home with God.
  347. Ainsley ginger cakes may be a recipe provided to Anna Whistler by Jane (Winstanley) Ainsley, sister of John Winstanley. There are several recipes for gingerbread in Margaret MacDonald, ed., Whistler’s Mother’s Cook Book (London: Paul Elek, 1979), pp. 110–113), but none is called an Ainsley ginger cake.
  348. Wednesday was 24 April 1844.
  349. Emma Maingay (see Image 263) and Debo (see Images 17–19, 21) went to the tea party at the Gellibrands on 23 April 1844. This was the abovementioned celebration of Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes’s twenty-second birthday and fourth wedding anniversary.
  350. Thomas DeKay Winans (6 December 1820 – 10 June 1878), son of Ross Winans (17 October 1797 – 11 April 1877) of Baltimore, represented his father’s firm in the partnership of Harrison, Winans, and Eastwick. See Winans Appendix E and Images 228–229.
  351. Alexandrofski (pronounced “Ahliksahn’druffskee”) refers to the Alexandrofsky Head Mechanical Works, “located on the left bank of the Neva 6.7 miles from the center of St. Petersburg along the road to Schlüsselberg” (see Images 223–225) (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 106). It is here that the locomotives and rolling stock were being made for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. See also Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1846, p. 119.

352. Anna Whistler would have frequently heard the expression “na Morskoi” (pronounced “nuhMarskoi”), meaning “on Morskaia Street,” where “Morskoi” is the feminine prepositional case. Her English usage here of “thro the Morskoi” suggests the Russian expression “po Morskoi” (pronounced “puhMarskoi”), where “Morskoi” is the feminine dative case, identical to the prepositional case. She also rarely detected the rolled “r” in Russian words and therefore omitted it in her spelling of them. Thus, she wrote not “Morskoi,” but “Moskoy.” There were two streets here, parallel to one another, one called Bol’shaia Morskaia ulitsa (Grand Navy Street) (pronounced “Bahlshah’yuh Marskah’yuh oo’leetsuh”), the other Malaia Morskaia ulitsa (Little Navy Street) (pronounced “Mah’luhyuh Marskah’yuh oo’leetsuh”). Bol’shaia Morskaia (see Image 109) was one of the most magnificent and animated streets of St. Petersburg. It started at the arch in the Staff Headquarters building on Palace Square, crossed the Nevskii Prospekt, and went on until it met and crossed Post Office Lane. At that point, it became one with the Moika Embankment. It took its name from the fact that when St. Petersburg was founded, claywalled cottages were built here for naval officers and sailors. It was paved with wood. Here were to be found part of the building containing Main Staff headquarters and the Ministry of Finances, the building of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the home of the Military Governor General, as well as the homes of many members of the nobility. There were also numerous shops, including luxury stores, e.g., for clothing and furniture. Malaia Morskaia was much shorter and much quieter, with less traffic. It had fewer stores and artisans and several hotels. Anna Whistler was referring to Bol’shaia Morskaia (Grech, Ves’ Petersburg 1851, pp. 43-44, 341–342), even though she wrote only “Moskoy.” In another entry, she referred to a shop specifically on Bol’shaia Morskaia (entry of Saturday [April] 26th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I).
353. This is Esther (Smith) Ormerod (bap. 18 November 1777 – 4 July 1863), wife of Richard Ormerod (c. 1775 – 31 December 1861), a brass and iron founder.
354. Anna Whistler’s derogatory comments about the lower classes of Russia imply that the tailor was Russian. Neither edition of Ves’ Peterburg v karmane (1846, p. 126; 1851, p. 453) is helpful in this instance, as they list only recommended foreign tailors on

- Bol'shaia (and Malaia) Morskaia. See Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 1, letter 4, pp. 74–75.
355. This is Emma Maingay (see Image 263). She is mentioned again in the following sentence along with her mother, Eliza (Lamb) Maingay (see Image 259).
356. The young Grand Dukes, the sons of Emperor Nicholas I (see Images 420–423), were Grand Duke Nikolai Nikolaevich (Tsarskoe Selo 27 July / 8 August 1831 – Alupka 13/25 April 1891) and Grand Duke Mikhail Nikolaevich (St. Petersburg 13/25 October 1832 – Cannes 5/18 December 1909). Kuz'min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familia, pp. 227–232, 273–279. See Image 420).
357. This is Ann Ormerod (1802 – 24 September 1847), daughter of Richard and Esther (Smith) Ormerod. Her married name was Haden. See Note 353 above.
358. There is no direct reference in the Whistler papers to indicate who this person might be. Major Whistler was mentor to a number of young men while in Russia. In 1848, a recently graduated young Russian named Hartung came to show himself off to Anna Whistler (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Wednesday November 1st, 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W366). Her remarks suggest that a difficult time was over for him. Even on his deathbed, Major Whistler asked after several men about whom he was concerned (Anna Whistler to [Joseph and Sarah Harrison], Fleetwood. Monday. July 15th. 1849, LC: P-W, box 34). In addition, any man who might have expressed an interest in Deborah would also have distressed him.
359. Thursday was 25 April.
360. “The Gulf of Finland runs from St. Petersburg in a due westerly direction, and it is exactly from that quarter that the heaviest storms always blow. The west wind naturally sweeps the waters up towards the city. If the gulf were broad at its termination ... but, unfortunately, the gulf narrows gradually to a point, and that point is St. Petersburg. When a gale, therefore, blows from the west, the waters of the Gulf are blown into the Neva, and oppose the exit of those that come rolling down from the lake ... The Delta of the Neva is flat and low, and there is scarcely a spot of ground in the capital that lies more than twelve or fourteen feet above the customary level of the sea. A rise of fifteen feet is, therefore, enough to put the whole city under water, and a rise of thirty or forty feet would be enough to drown nearly the whole - population. All that is necessary to bring about such a calamity is that ... a storm from the west should arise just as the ice is breaking up, and that this should happen when the river is at its highest” (Kohl, Russia, p. 21). See the explanation of the flood signals in “St. Petersburg and the Journey There” and Image 107.

361. This is the correct English rendering of the Russian contraction “bushnik” (pronounced “boosh’nyeek”) from the word “budochnik” (pronounced “boo’dushnyeek”) meaning “policeman on guard duty at his sentry box on the street.” “Budka” (pronounced “boot’kuh”) from which the root of “budochnik” is taken, means “sentry box,” “booth.” To the singular of the contracted word is added the English possessive suffix: ’s. Alexander, the footman, had only to step out to the sentry box on the corner by their house.
362. Friday was 26 April.
363. Here it seems Anna Whistler should have written “the thickness it had been guessed at.”
364. This is Emma Maingay (see Image 263), Deborah Whistler’s best friend in St. Petersburg.
365. See Images 101, 102, 105, and 114, showing gondolas.
366. Maxwell, in describing his day, spoke of James’s and Willie’s visits: “Sometimes the lunch is varied by a glass of jelly from M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler or sometimes I order a little caviare etc and make it a dejeuner à la fourchette for my pretty visitors, the boys who have come to say good morning and to know if I walk, out that day, ~~in~~ which case they would like to go with me” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33).
367. Jule is Catherine Julia McNeill (see Note 23 above, Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E, and Image 33). Josephine Mauran (14 September 1825 – 16 February 1887) was the daughter of a wealthy New York entrepreneur, Oroondates Mauran (see Image 47) (J.C. Stockbridge and J.E. Mauran, comps., Memorials of the Mauran Family [Providence, RI: Snow and Farnham, 1893], p. 85). She and Deborah Whistler apparently attended the Candas’ school at 17 Lafayette Place, New York, together. See the Mauran family biography in Appendix E; letters from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell: St. Petersburg, March 26, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 29; St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, no. 35. It has not been possible to locate these letters from Catherine Julia McNeill and Josephine Mauran.

368. Saturday was 27 April.
369. Sarah Adams (New London, CT 29 December 1821 – 1876) was the daughter of Eli Adams (Lincoln, MA 14 March 1770 – New London, CT 18 July 1822) and Sarah Delano (Swift) Adams (Boston 24 February 1788 – 11 May 1839). They were married on 13 December 1810 in Boston, Massachusetts. Both parents were buried in Cedar Grove Cemetery, New London, Connecticut. Sarah Adams' aunt, her mother's sister, Mary Roberdeau (Swift) Whistler, was the first wife of Lt. George Washington Whistler. Sarah Adams was therefore Deborah Delano Whistler's first cousin (IGI; Cynthia Hagar Krusell, Marshfield Hills, MA, to E. Harden, 26 October 2014; Ellery, Memoirs of Gen. J.G. Swift, p. 24 of the Swift Genealogy). See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
370. The shop of Christian Freze (pronounced "Freh'zeh"), where one could buy wool, patterns for embroidering, and artists' paints, was located on Bol'shaia Morskaia Street in the building belonging to the pharmacist Shtraukh (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, p. 130; Kishkin-Zhgierskii, Kommercheskii ukazatel'). This was a German surname anglicized by the English-speaking colony to Frazer.
371. The best fruit shop, Smurov's, was located on the corner of Bol'shaia Morskaia and Gorokhovaia streets (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, p. 129; 1851, p. 44; Broitman and Krasnova, Bol'shaia Morskaia, pp. 96–97; Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 311). See Image 360 of an unspecified fruit shop.
372. Monday was 29 April.
373. In a "sudden fit of economising," Colonel Todd (see Image 278) took "a pretty country house at Sarskoe Celo" for the summer, but moved there in April when it was still cold (letters from John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell: St. Petersburg, Mar. 26, 1844, no. 29; St. Petersburg, April 7, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 31). He lived in the house of Doctor Vedrinskii or Vederinskii at 161 Moskovskaia (Moscow) Street near the church (AVPRI: Fond MID, Kantseliaria, 1844, op. 469, d. 52/Etats-Unis/:Colonel Todd:/ [Fond Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Chancery, 1844, op. 469, d. 52], fol. 52 v; RGIA: Fond 485, op. 3, d. 790. Tsarskoe Selo. 1-aia chast' II kvartal. General'nye plany uchastka po Moskovskoi ul. i fasady doma [sic] na nem,

- prinadlezhavshikh [sic] Vedrinskomu, Gassel' E.M., Tumanovu A.I. Arkh-y Vidov A.F., Gil'debrandt, K.K. 1830<sup>e</sup> - 1870<sup>e</sup> g. g. [Tsarskoe Selo. First district, second ward. General plans for the plot on Moscow Street and for the façade of the house [sic] on that plot that belong [sic] to Vedrinskii, E. M. Gassel, A.I. Tumanov. Architects A.F. Vidov and K.K. Gildebrandt. 1830s - 1870s]. "He carried with him, the Chancellerie of the legation, paper's and book's, and established the office of diplomatic affairs in a place pretty enough in the summer, but at all times out of the way of business, and at this season here, equal to Siberia for dullness and cold winds." His decision surprised many people "for the change, from the gay life he seemed to love in the City to such perfect seclusion in such a country, seem's at least queer" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33).
374. Reverend Thomas Scales Ellerby (18 March 1818 – 11 June 1892) was pastor of the British and American Congregational Church. See Ellerby in Appendix E and Images 125, 256.
375. Revelation 3:11: "Behold I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."
376. Maxwell did not know how to repay the Whistlers. "Yesterday morning my beard was cut off - I washed myself ~~myself~~, dressed etc and after looking in the glass and being satisfied that I looked very interesting and as clear in complexion as the most effeminate dandy would wish to look. I put on my pelisse, gave directions to have my room's ventilated and cleaned during my absence, and with a little assistance went up stairs. Quite an event indeed - I was of course quite a lion. I wished as soon almost as I saw M<sup>rs</sup> W to express my gratitude to her, but ~~I~~ she saw what was coming and begged me not to say one word and moreover insisted that I should be provided for as usual until I had totally regained my strenght [sic]. She says the food I obtained from the Club (I send out for my dinners) she thought badly cooked, the ingredients bad and that until the first of May I must be provided for from her kitchen. I am puzzled nay almost embarrassed how to avoid such minute attention ~~and~~ while I fully enjoy and appreciate it - I assured her that I appreciated her kindness, that her good things were of a kind that reminded me of home and that the breakfast she had sent me that morning was the very best (as it was in taste, niceness etc.) I had eaten in Russia. But that I had every thing necessary to provide a bachelors table and that the Club dinners though frugal and not so nice as her's were good enough for me

- but it was no use, and down come the breakfasts, dinners teas, and various articles in spite of me ... tell me, inform me how I am ever to repay these good people. I owe the Major 4 months rent ... I can pay him but for this comfort, his care, this provision for my happiness, tell me how I am to thank him and his lady?" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, April 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 30). Maxwell had long been in the practice of sending his servant, La Ronne, to the Commercial Club on the corner of the English Embankment and Zamiatin Lane with a "patent dinner preserver," in which La Ronne would bring back meals (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 22). See also Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, p. 138; 1851, pp. 300–301).
377. See Note 253 above. Each Lenten season, Henry Blunt delivered a course of lectures in Chelsea "on the lives of various leading persons in the Old and New Testament." His course on "St. Paul" consisted of two series, delivered in 1832 and 1833 (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. "Blunt, Henry [1794–1843]").
378. Anna Whistler wrote 30th, but changed it to 29th. Tuesday was April 30th. Mr. M in this entry is Maxwell; Kate is Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer, Anna Whistler's sister in Stonington; the Major is Major Trouvellier.
379. A niece of Anna Whistler's had written her about having met Maxwell's grandmother [Ann McDonald Stevenson], at a Mrs. Graham's, and Anna Whistler now wished her mother, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22), to call upon Maxwell's grandmother. "I have given the address. 15 Harrison Street. New York, but as Grandma may be out of town I should like you for my sake to enquire about this lady and make her acquaintance when you go to town" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33; William M. MacBean, "The Year 1778, No. 460 Thomas Stevenson," Biographical Register of Saint Andrew's Society of the State of New York, vol. 1, 1756–1806 [New York: Printed for the Society, 1922], p. 266).
380. For assessments of Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes's character and musical talent, see Mary T. Gellibrand to Uncle Hardy, Okta, near Petersburg, June 6/18th, 1838, MHS: Ropes Papers; Joseph S. Ropes to his grandparents, St. Petersburg, Sept. 19 / Oct. 1, 1840, MHS: Ropes Papers.

381. The reference here is to Major Trouvellier and Colonel P.P. Mel'nikov (see Image 247).
382. Writing to his mother on the same date, 1 May 1844, Maxwell described what his day as a convalescent had been like for the last month. Music was a part of every evening, first instrumental and then vocal: "Then perhaps it is that I take a lesson in Russian by trying to sing a Russian song with Miss D- ... I give you a translation of one of these by an ardent admirer of this young lady. It will give you an idea of the general character of Russian song, which is melancholy always. It is called the sable shade and is addressed as far as I can judge either to a black damsel or black ghost" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33). This is the song "Chornyi tsvet," which Deborah Whistler had sung in Russian on an earlier occasion. See Note 183 above. The English translation Maxwell gives was, in my opinion, made by William Bonamy Maingay (see Image 260), one of Deborah's admirers. Each line of this translation is equivalent to two lines of the original Russian text.

Sable shade, dismal shade, thou'rt to me ever dear
And I vow none beside e'er shall vie with thee here.

Refrain:

Sung after every two lines
None shall e'er me compel, none shall e'er thee expel,
Sable shade from my heart thou shalt never depart.

Men will say but oh why dost thou love such a shade
Tis the lure I'll reply of my own lovely maid.

If my maid, my sweet maid should her lover forget
Still the shade, the dark shade, I will love, love it yet.

That dark shade in my brain, with my maid it shall reign Joined forever with thee my dark spirit shall be.

When my last hour shall come, the dark shade I'll put on
And till lifes light is o'er the dark shade I'll adore.

Maxwell does not say what other songs Deborah Whistler played that evening, but in earlier letters he mentions her ability to sing in several languages (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Dec. 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 26). See Appendix F for a copy of the sheet music for "Chornyi tsvet."

383. Dasha, a Russian affectionate form from the name "Darya," was given to Deborah Whistler. She continued to be known by the name in England when she was Mrs. Francis Seymour Haden.

384. Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, pp. 127, 130.
385. This is the small, door-like pane in a window that could be opened to ventilate the room. The double window installed for winter had such a pane as well.
386. M. La Roche gave German lessons to both Deborah Whistler and John Stevenson Maxwell (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell St. Petersburg, Nov. 1, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 24). When he left the Whistlers' employ cannot be ascertained. When James was left in England in the fall of 1848, the Whistlers considered rehiring M. La Roche, who was a strict taskmaster, to be Willie's "governer" (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg Friday afternoon Sept. 29th 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W362). The Amburger Datenbank contains several entries for a family named Blanché de la Roche, but it is not possible to identify the Whistlers' tutor from the information given.
387. 21 April / 3 May was the name day of Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna.
388. For a description of a major military review, see "St. Petersburg and the Journey There" and Notes 77–81 therein.
389. Straw hats were sold in the shop of Mrs. Vretman, located on Ofiterskaia (Officer) Street in the building belonging to Wagner (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, p. 127).
390. Lady Elizabeth Stuart (14 January 1789 – 23 June 1867) was the wife of Sir Charles Stuart, Baron Stuart de Rothesay (2 January 1779 – 6 November 1845), the British Envoy to St. Petersburg in 1843 and part of 1844. They married on 6 February 1816. She was Lady Elizabeth Margaret, the third daughter of Philip Yorke, the third Earl of Hardwicke (John Debrett, Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage [London, 1819], p. 268; Sir Bernard Burke, A Genealogical and Heraldic Dictionary of the Peerage and Baronetage of the British Empire, 31st ed. [London: Burke's Peerage, 1869], p. 516). Maxwell, who met her in 1842, said: "I met his Lady (who has just arrived here and who intends taking a large house) in the large fashionable store here called the English Magazine. She is one of the plainest looking women I ever saw—and has a streak of red in each cheek just as old English ladies in good health generally have" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Oct. 8/20, 1842, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 3). Lord and Lady Stuart were leaving Russia on 3

- June 1844 (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
391. The day and date of the previous entry, that for Monday [May] 6th [NS], coincide. Starting with the entry for Thursday [May] 29th, the events referred to make it clear that Anna Whistler recorded the wrong day in the next several entries. They should read “Wednesday [May] 29th,” “Thursday [May] 30th,” and “Friday [May] 31st.” On Thursday, 30 May, Major Whistler made a fruitless trip to bring Deborah home from the Maingays, because, as this was their last night in St. Petersburg, they asked that she be allowed to spend it with them. On Friday, 31 May, the Maingays sailed from St. Petersburg for Cronstadt. Friday, 31 May, was also the day the Major and his sons attended the military review with Maxwell, which is confirmed in the latter’s correspondence (John S. Maxwell to Major Whistler, May 27? 28? [1844], N-YHS: Maxwell Papers; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, , N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36). The Whistlers had left St. Petersburg on 14 May, but 29 May marked “just a fortnight” that they had been actually settled in their house.
392. On 10 May, when Maxwell and the Whistlers visited Colonel Charles Stewart Todd (see Image 278) in Tsarskoe Selo, they found him “looking forlorn enough. He was not dressed, and unshaved and unshorn looked like giant Grim. He had been very lonely, having no acquaintances who had yet moved in the vicinity. He soon brushed up however” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 11, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 34).
393. The St. Petersburg terminus of the Tsarskoe Selo Railway was located at “the crossing of the Zagorodnyi Prospekt and the Vvedenskii Canal” (Haywood, Beginnings, p. 147), located in the Moscow District, Fourth Ward (Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, p. 127).
394. The Tsarskoe Selo Railway, built by the Austrian engineer, Franz Anton von Gerstner (1796–1840), and opened for service in November 1837, was the first and at this time the only railway in Russia (see Image 383). The train made two stops: Tsarskoe Selo (21½ versts from St. Petersburg) and Pavlovsk (25 versts from St. Petersburg) (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, p. 544). It had actually been operating since the fall of 1836, but only from Tsarskoe Selo to Pavlovsk, a distance of 5 versts, and the train had at first been drawn by horses because of the failure of the steam engines for it to arrive from England (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 39, 246; Haywood, Beginnings, p. 122). There is a well-known story that the first time Nicholas I rode on the new railway he ordered his carriage placed on a platform car, got into it and rode thus from Tsarskoe Selo to Pavlovsk. Afterwards, he usually rode on the railway in a separate first-class car (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 40).

The regulation for establishing a company of shareholders for building the railway was approved by Nicholas I on 21 March / 2 April 1836. The founders of the shareholding company – namely, the Equerry of the Imperial Court, Count Aleksei Alekseevich Bobrinskii (Major Whistler's landlord; see Image 86); the merchants Benedict Kramer and Johann Plitt; and Franz Anton von Gerstner – put together the capital, amounting to three million rubles. The founders were obliged to agree, in signing the confirmed regulations, that they would take certain precautions for the safety of a technologically innocent public; they would, for example, have bells or some other type of warning signal on the “steam equipages,” and the passengers coming from St. Petersburg would not be allowed to get out of the cars along the route between the gate of the town they were approaching (i.e., “a wooden barrier at the city limits”) (Haywood, Beginnings, p. 99) and the office where their documents would be checked (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 39–40). Because the train whistle frightened the public, it was replaced by music. An organ ordered from abroad especially for this purpose was placed in front of the smokestack of the engine. These organs played various musical pieces to the accompaniment of loud trumpets and drums and a special employee of the railway was assigned to turn the handle of the organ while the train was in motion (Vil'chkovskii, p. 246). The official opening of the railway, with all ministers and the diplomatic corps in attendance, took place on 30 October / 11 November 1837, and Gerstner himself drove the first train to Tsarskoe Selo (Vil'chkovskii, p. 40). It took thirty-five minutes, while the return trip took twenty-seven, “and speeds up to sixty versts an hour were attained” (Haywood, Beginnings, p. 127). “The railway to Pavlovsk was opened ... on May 22 [June 3], 1838” (Haywood, p. 136). In the 1840s, one-way fares were: first-class, 71 kopeks silver (2.50 rubles paper); second-class, 51 k. silver (1.80 r. paper); third-class, 35 k. silver (1.20 r. paper); fourth-class, 20 k. silver (70 k. paper) (R. Haywood West Lafayette, IN, to E. Harden, 27 November 1998). For a detailed and technical description of the building and operation of the Tsarskoe Selo Railway see Haywood, Beginnings, pp. 108–158.

395. Of all the towns in Russia, Tsarskoe Selo at this time was the most well-proportioned. The cleanliness and regularity in the layout of its streets were striking. The private homes were arranged as if according to a single plan and façade, giving the entire town a kind of charming uniformity (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 53).
396. BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fol. 1.
397. As of 1 January 1841 (OS), twenty-five of the thirty-one streets and lanes of Tsarskoe Selo had been macadamized (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 53).
398. The name of the Catherine Palace (see Images 385–387) is misleading in that it in fact refers to Catherine I (see Image 412), consort of Peter the Great (see Image 411), but is often thought to honor the famous Catherine the Great (see Image 414), who had been responsible up until this time for the last major changes to the palace, chiefly to its interiors, and had initiated many other architectural projects within Tsarskoe Selo. Anna Whistler's comments suggest some confusion on her part: "This [palace] built by Catherine like all other of her designs is tasteful, costly & still in perfect repair" is true of Catherine the Great. In a later reference, she shows that she knows it was named for Catherine I, but persists in attributing the gilding, etc., to Catherine I, seeming not to understand that the palace in that reign was only a small stone edifice.

In 1708, Peter the Great gifted to the future Catherine I six farmsteads, including the Sarskaia (A.N. Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki [Pushkin: Palaces and Parks] [Leningrad: Iskusstvo, 1964], p. 7). A small, modest, two-storied stone palace with sixteen rooms was built here between 1717 and 1723 based on plans by the architect, I. Bronshtein (Johann-Fredrich Braunstein). The commencement of a major remodeling of it into a magnificent Baroque palace (called first the Great Tsarskoe Selo Palace) occurred in the middle of the eighteenth century in the reign of Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413), daughter of Peter the Great and Catherine I. The remodeling of Catherine I's stone palace and the construction of two symmetrical wings joined to the central building by galleries was begun in 1741. The work was entrusted to a series of architects, culminating in Bartolomeo Francesco Rastrelli, "who demolished much of [his predecessors'] completed work (particularly the galleries) and added a third story to the main structure, which was extended the full length of the palace” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 238). Catherine the Great, prompted by a combination of taste and of contempt for her aunt’s preference for the Rococo, set about “dispersing or dissolving [its] traces” (Hamilton, Art and Architecture, p. 185).

The Catherine Palace is almost a thousand feet long. “Above the rusticated ground floor, with its arcade of French windows separated by atlantes, the building is marked by white attached columns” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 239), which from 1753 had as their background a bright azure façade, replaced in the 1840s with an insipid and banal greenish color (Aleksandr Benois, Tsarskoe Selo v tsarstvovanie Imperatritsy Elisavety Petrovny [Tsarskoe Selo in the Reign of Empress Elisaveta Petrovna] [St. Petersburg: R. Golike i A. Vilborg, 1910], p. 87). “Despite the symmetry of the facade, its culminating point is not the central structure, but rather the pentacupolar church that anchors the east wing of the palace... The resolution of the Catherine Palace in favour of its end point (a corresponding domed pavilion on the west end was later modified during the reign of Catherine II) is in accord with the horizontal essence of the structure. This principle was reaffirmed in Rastrelli’s plan for the interior ..., whose main entrance was from the west wing. From that point, two parallel enfilades extended the length of the palace without the interruption of a center cluster of rooms. The later central vestibule and grand stairway, built for Catherine II by Charles Cameron (1745-1812) in 1780... , established a midpoint that allows one to proceed to either half of the enfilade” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 239).

399. “The gardens at Zarskoye Selo are certainly the most carefully kept in the world; the trees and flowers are watched and inspected with the most anxious minuteness. An old invalid soldier commands his five or six hundred men as gardeners and overseers. After every falling leaf runs a veteran to pick it up ... Every tiny leaf that falls in pond or canal, is carefully fished out; they dust and trim and polish the trees and paths in the gardens, as they do the looking-glasses and furniture of the saloons; every stone that is kicked aside is laid strait again, and every blade of grass kept in a proper position” (Kohl, Russia, p. 183). “The trunks of the trees alongside the palace were periodically scraped and washed with soap, while the macadamized roads and the paths were kept as smooth as parquet floors. Special persons went about the garden after every rainfall and a peg was stuck into the - ground next to every puddle. Early in the morning the indentations from the puddles were removed with a pick, fine cobblestones and sand were sprinkled into them and then they were watered and the indentations filled up... If someone threw away a piece of orange peel, a boy would run to gather it up into a basket” (Dmitrii S. Likhachev, Poezẓia sadov: k semantike sadovoparkovykh stilei [The Poetry of Gardens: Toward a Semantics of Garden Park Styles] [Leningrad: Nauka, Leningradskoe otdelenie, 1982], p. 291).

400. “The trees were clad in the first brilliant green of spring ... but the growth is almost entirely confined to birch, fir, oak, elm, and lime. The three latter are rather rare” (Bloomfield, Reminiscences, vol. 1, p. 207).
401. “In 1841 the architect Hippolyte Antonovich Monighetti (1819–1878) decorated some of the interiors of the Catherine Palace for Tsarevich Alexander Nikolaevich ... Gradually it was to become his favourite residence. His apartments, which lay on the ground floor of the Zubov Wing, opened on to the private garden, where a great pergola was installed, together with a marble fountain and beds filled with scented flowers ... together the whole family planted the oak trees that still grow on the shores of the great lake” (Ivan Petrovich Sautov, Imperial Palaces in the Vicinity of St. Petersburg. Tsarskoe Selo: Watercolours, Paintings and Engravings from the 18th and 19th Centuries, commentaries by Larissa Valentinovna Bardovskaia [Paris: Alain de Gourcuff Éditeur, 1992], pp. 12–13).
402. The New Palace (see Images 388, 447) was the palace Catherine the Great had ordered built (1792–1796) for her grandson, the future Tsar Alexander I (see Image 418). In 1843, Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) ordered that it be named the Alexander Palace. A description of the Alexander Palace is given in Note 487, NYPL: AWPDP, Part II.
403. Vil’chkovskii describes the difference between the expenditures made and results achieved at Tsarskoe Selo by empresses Elizaveta Petrovna and Catherine the Great. In Elizaveta’s reign, all building was done in haste, everything was richly decorated, but everything was redone several times (Vil’chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 23). Catherine herself likened Elizaveta’s inconsistencies to “Penelope’s labor” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 288; Dmitrii Shvidkovskii, The Empress and the Architect: British Architecture and Gardens at the Court of Catherine the Great [New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996], p. 212). In Catherine’s reign, despite large expenditures, before building was undertaken exact estimates were drawn up and models were even made; no excess luxury was permitted. Catherine personally checked every estimate and paid close attention to the construction work, sometimes purposely coming in from St. Petersburg in the spring to inspect its condition. The external gilded decorations of the palace and pavilions on which Elizaveta's architects spent huge sums lasted only a short time because of the instability of the materials used. Catherine had to make large expenditures just to remove everything that had rapidly become shabby and restore the respectable appearance of the façades. What was built by Catherine, on the other hand, still looks today [in 1910] as it did when just built. In a word, everything that Catherine did in Tsarskoe Selo was executed solidly and broadly, carefully finished and sustained in every detail (Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 206; Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 23).

There is another reason why everything was "still in perfect repair," and why it seemed neat and fresh to Anna Whistler: a part of the palace had been restored less than twenty-five years before the Whistlers visited it. A fire had occurred on 12/24 May 1820, completely destroying the church and twelve rooms adjoining it, damaging and ruining all the furnishings and walls right up to the Picture Gallery. The architect Vasilii Petrovich Stasov (1769–1848) had been ordered to rebuild it all to look as it had before (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 98; Aleksandr Uspenskii, "Imperatorskii Bol'shoi Tsarskosel'skii Dvorets" ["The Imperial Great Palace of Tsarskoe Selo"], Khudozhestvennye sokrovishcha Rossii [Art Treasures of Russia] 12 [1904]: p. 419).

404. The construction of the Church of the Resurrection of the Saviour, designed by Rastrelli, was begun on 8/19 August 1745. It was consecrated on 30 July / 10 August 1756. The interior walls were sky-blue with gilded wooden carving. Rastrelli gave it a flat ceiling instead of the cupola that was usual for a Russian church. On the outside, it had five gilded cupolas. It burned down completely on 12/24 May 1820, and most of the icons perished, but it was restored "according to the old models, from memory" (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 86–87). The new church was consecrated in 1822 (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburgska 1842, p. 60). There was an entrance at the carriage approach to the church where visitors, such as Maxwell's party, could present their tickets for admission to the palace. They would then have gone up the white marble staircase built in 1843 by Stasov. It was called the church staircase because it was situated alongside the vestibule of the church (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 83–84), which they chose not to visit that day. See also V.V. Lemus, L.V. Ėmina, E.S. Gladkova, and G.P. Balog, Muzei i parki Pušbkina [Museums and Parks of Puškin] (Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1980), p. 46. There are no diary entries to indicate that they ever visited the church.

405. Anna Whistler is referring here to the enfilades with their suites of rooms. There were five suites, or “apartments.” Her comments about various rooms, ranging from Alexander I’s bedroom to the Mirror Room in Catherine the Great’s apartments, show that they walked the entire length of the palace that day, entering via the Church Wing, going through the central portion to the Zubov Wing, and back again to exit via the Church Wing. This second floor consisted of some sixty rooms, not all of which they would have had access to (Petrov, Puškin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 48: plan of the second floor, end of the nineteenth century). Maxwell, in his description of their visit to the Catherine Palace, points out some of the same things as Anna Whistler, but cannot help fill out her remarks, as his own are very brief. He felt so indebted to the Whistlers for their care of him when he was sick that the excursion “afforded [him] remarkable pleasure” because it “enabled [him] to show some little attention to Madame and Mademoiselle” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 11, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 34). He later visited Colonel Todd for several days and then wrote a long, idyllic account of Tsarskoe Selo with exquisite vignettes of the beautiful grand duchesses (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35; see also his letter to Major Whistler, Sarskoe Celó, May 20, 1844).
406. Anna Whistler’s lack of punctuation here (no period after “etc”) makes it seem as though she has conflated descriptions of two totally different rooms: the Chinese Salon and the Mirror Room, both in the Fifth Apartments. A small door led from the Chinese Salon into the inner apartments of Catherine the Great, where the Mirror Room was located. The Chinese Salon had four floor-length windows and one of regular size facing the private garden, while two opened onto the square (ploshchad’ – although it is possible that, in describing the interior, Viľchkovskii meant ploshchadka, which means “landing,” not “square”). It was double-lighted. Its walls were covered with original eighteenth-century panels transferred here by the architect, Charles Cameron, from an earlier Chinese room of the palace. The panels, made of wood, were painted black and covered with coromandel lacquer. On them were depicted Chinese houses, inscriptions, and other decorations, all of which were gilded. The panels were in frames of black wood. Around them were fastened very precious ancient Chinese enamels. A large number of vases and dishes of Chinese and Japanese porcelain, Tibetan brass idols, and other things were arranged on semicircular pyramids. From the ceiling, painted in Chinese style, hung four chandeliers made from vases joined with gilded bronze ornament. These vases were made in Europe by Chinese workers. The Mirror Room, Catherine the Great's favorite "working" study, was a small room with two windows facing the private garden and a door opening onto the "Mirror Landing." All of its walls and doors were covered with mirrors divided by narrow colonettes (see Image 387). The ceiling was decorated with frescos in Italian Renaissance style and a glass lantern was suspended from it (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 62; Viĭchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 122, 126; Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki pp. 37–38).

407. Anna Whistler seems to mean a number of rooms with inlaid floors, but the room famous for containing such a floor is the Lyon Room (see Image 386), so named for the brocaded silk covering the walls, which was manufactured in Lyon, France. Like the Mirror Room (see previous Note), the Lyon Room was one of several created in the 1780s by Charles Cameron in place of Rastrelli's fourth and fifth antechambers, which Cameron destroyed. It was also in the Fifth Apartments. It had three floor-length windows facing the square. The walls were covered with yellow silk. Cameron faced the lower parts of the walls with lapis lazuli. The window and door frames were made of massive gilded bronze on a background of lapis. The fireplaces were also trimmed with lapis and decorated with figures of Carrara marble. The parquetry of the floor and the marquetry of the door panels were made from the wood of twelve kinds of foreign trees inlaid with large stylized mother-of-pearl flowers. This type of incrustation was associated in the minds of Cameron's contemporaries with Nero's "Golden House," the interior of which, according to Suetonius, was decorated with gold, precious stones, and mother-of-pearl. The doors from the Lyon Room led into the Chinese Salon described in the previous Note (Viĭchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 121–122; Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, pp. 44, 124; Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 62; Lemus et al., Muzei i parki Pushkina, pp. 38–39, 45).
408. "From c. the 1820s to the 1840s [the surtout was] often called a 'surtout greatcoat'; being an overcoat, S-B or D-B, made like a frock-coat and the forerunner of the TOP FROCK” (Cunnington, Cunnington, and Beard, Dictionary of English Costume, pp. 86, 87, 209, 215–216).

409. I have not been able to determine the location of the suite of apartments in the Catherine Palace furnished for Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (Alexandrine) upon her marriage.
410. The bedroom of Alexander I (see Image 418) in the Old (Catherine) Palace, along with his “parade” and “work” studies, were made into a memorial to him. An undated inventory of the furniture in the bedroom lists a chest of drawers, chair, small table, folding camp bed, and dressing table, as well as the location of the emperor’s belongings in and on these pieces of furniture. Listed as being on the camp bed are a yellow chamois straw-filled mattress; two chamois pillows, one crimson, one green; a linen pillow case; three linen sheets; a calico coverlet; a white piqué cover; and a pair of shoes. Listed as being on his dressing table are a rectangular folding mirror in a mahogany frame, a small box with articles for brushing his teeth, a hairbrush, a tortoise-shell comb, and a silver handbell. Six napkins, among other things, are listed as being in the chest of drawers (RGIA: Fond 487, op. 21, d. 580. Opis’ veshchei, nakhodiashchikhsia v komnatakh na polovine imperatora Aleksandra I i opisi sobstvennykh veshchei Ekateriny II, imperatritsy Elizavety Alekseevny (zheny Aleksandra I) i dr. (bez daty). Vedomost’ veshcham imeiushchimsia v komnatakh na polovine Pokoinogo Gosudaria Imperatora Aleksandra Pavlovicha v Tsarskosel’skom Starom Dvortse, sobstvenno prinadlezhavshim Ego Imperatorskomu Velichestvu [Inventory of things in the rooms of the apartments of Emperor Alexander I and inventories of the personal things of Catherine II, Empress Elizaveta Alekseevna (wife of Alexander I) and others (no date). Register of things in the rooms of the apartments of the late Emperor Alexander Pavlovich in the Old Palace at Tsarskoe Selo personally belonging to His Imperial Majesty], fols. 4v, 5r, 5v, 6r).

Vil’chkovskii describes the bedroom in greater detail. The bedroom of Alexander I has two floor-length windows looking out onto the park. The walls are covered with Chinese silk with watercolor drawings depicting scenes from the life of the Manchus. Rich gilded carving and plaster work frame the wallpaper. Above the alcove, in which stands the modest field bed of the emperor, is the monogram of Catherine II on a magnificent carved gilded arch in the style of Louis XV. The ceiling contains a painting called Allegorical Depiction of the Natural Sciences (Allegoricheskoe izobrazhenie estestvennykh nauk). In the corner is a fireplace also in the style of Louis XV. Between the windows is a floor-length mirror; the furniture is mahogany, Empire style, covered with dark-green Morocco leather. In the chests of drawers are many small toilet articles and personal things of the emperor. By the mirror stand his sword and saber. On the bed is a straw mattress in a chamois cover, hair pillows in the same kind of cover, a cotton coverlet and another of piqué. On the wall are plans of Petersburg and Tsarskoe Selo. Above the doors and the stove hang the pictures Pastoral (Pastoral), Vestal Virgin (Vestal'ka), and Flowers (Tsvey), repaired after the fire of 1820 by Antonelli (1791–1842) (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 93–94).

Until 1781, this suite of “Second” Apartments (Vil'chkovskii, pp. 92–100) constituted the rooms of Catherine the Great, and Alexander I's bedroom seems to have previously been hers (Vil'chkovskii, p. 98).

411. One might have expected this kind of remark from Maxwell, but he points out the same details without being caustic (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). See Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 2, letter 24, pp. 262–263 for a touching appraisal of this room.
412. There was a portrait room and a picture gallery in the Catherine Palace, both located in the Third Apartments (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 100–108). The fine pictures James “wished he could stay to examine... & know who painted them” were those in the picture gallery, and most of them would have been almost impossible for him to see, given their placement and his height as a child of ten. This room occupied the entire width of the palace. As a result of the fire in May 1820, the church, part of the palace adjacent to it, and the Lyceum burned down. The Lyceum was transferred to St. Petersburg in 1843. The ceiling of the Picture Gallery, by Pietro (d. 1770) and Francesco (1729–1793) Gradizzi, was destroyed in order to contain the fire and replaced in 1820 by a new one, based “on the old model.” The work of Academician S. A. Bessonov, the painting depicted The Feast of the Gods on Olympus (Olimp). The pictures in the collection were transferred to new canvasses. The room was decorated with gilt and plaster work in Louis XV style. Three floor-length windows faced onto the park, and three onto the landing (east and west walls). Between the windows were tall mirrors with decorative panels above them containing paintings. A tall mid-18th century stove made of German tiles stood in the middle of the north and south walls, dividing them into two symmetrical parts. Equidistant from each stove were two sets of magnificent double doors with gilded carved figures of caryatids and Minerva. These walls, starting from low wooden panels with gilt carving, were covered to the ceiling, trellis-style, with pictures almost touching each other, separated only by narrow gilt baguettes. There were 130 pictures. One hundred fifteen of them had been bought in 1745 in Prague by the court painter, Georg Groot (1716–1749), “a painter of animals and birds,” by order of Empress Elizaveta Petrovna. The remaining fifteen pictures could have come from works in storage bought by Peter the Great and his agents and through purchase from foreigners in Russia, e.g., from ships’ captains. They are all oil paintings, chiefly on canvas, but also on wooden panels and copper plates. Most are by Dutch and Flemish artists, the rest by German, French, and Italian artists. Most are originals, but some are anonymous copies of works by old masters and others are attributed to their schools. There are themes from antiquity and the Bible, allegories, still lifes, landscapes and seascapes, portraits, battle scenes, architectural views, and genre scenes. Groot’s two lists of the paintings (and objects) he purchased (amounting to 195 pieces) are detailed in their description of some of their subjects. (His lists can be found in Aleksandr Uspenskii, Imperatorskie dvortsy [The Imperial Palaces], 2 vols. [Moscow: Pechatnia A.I. Snegirevoi, 1913], vol. 2, pp. 169–174). In 1755, V. Neelov (1722–1782), an “architect’s assistant,” made an inventory of the Picture Gallery, but it was based on genre, e.g., “16 waist-length male portraits,” and therefore less useful. In the 1760s, Jacob Staehlin (1709–1785), a Swabian scholar working in Russia (1735–1785), whose notes made over a forty-year period constitute an inestimable primary source for the history of the arts in 18th-century Russia, compiled a detailed wall-by-wall inventory of the collection in the Picture Gallery, for the most part giving artists’ names (J. Stählin, Zapiski Iakoba Shtelina ob iziashchnykh iskusstvakh v Rossii [Jacob Stählin’s Notes on the Fine Arts in Russia], ed. and trans. K.M. Malinovskii, 2 vols. [Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1990], vol. 2, pp. 40–44). Some of his attributions to old masters have been refuted. New attributions continue to be proffered up to the present time. The layout of the paintings is said to have remained the same from 1756 to 1941, the fire of 1820 notwithstanding. Vil’chkovskii supplied a numbered wall plan showing the location of each picture based on a room inventory for the Picture Gallery (document now in the Arkhiv gosudarstvennyi Ėrmitazha [Archive of the State Hermitage], St. Petersburg [hereafter, Arkhiv GE]). The publication of his book (1910) evoked criticism of his identification of some of the paintings in the Picture Gallery. He responded to this in his foreword to the second edition (1911), explaining that because a check ordered by the Imperial Hermitage was in progress, he had amended only those things that were not in doubt. The restoration of the Catherine Palace after its destruction by German troops during World War II (111 of the canvasses in the Picture Gallery had been evacuated by the Russians) entailed efforts to determine the original makeup of the collection in the Picture Gallery. The Picture Gallery as it is since 1967 is described and the text accompanied by reproductions of 130 paintings in Vera Lemus and Liudmila Lapina, The Catherine Palace Museum in Pushkin: Picture Hall (Leningrad: Avrora, 1990). One hundred seven of the pictures in the original collection as described by Staehlin are still extant. One is in the Hermitage collection, eleven have perished, and the location of nine is unknown. This means that some of the paintings on the walls of the Picture Gallery today have hung there only a brief time. By comparing Staehlin's inventory with Viľchkovskii's and with the reproductions in Lemus and Lapina's book, we can suggest some of the pictures that might have been in the Picture Gallery in the 1840s (St=Staehlin, V=Viľchkovskii, LL=Lemus and Lapina in the list that follows): Among the works (except where noted, all cited are oil on canvas) by Western European artists of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries are: (1) Knifegrinder, oil on wood, signed in monogram, by David Teniers the Younger (1610–1690) (St 80, V30, LL 67); (2) the signed Battle of Poltava, commissioned by Peter the Great, by Pierre Denis Martin the Younger (1663–1742) (St 57, V 31 or 52, LL 98); (3) also by Martin, the signed Actions Taking Place before the Battle of Poltava (St 78), or The Battle of Poltava (V31 or 52), or Battle at the Village of Lesnaia (LL 97); (4) Still Life from the Hunt with Dead Game Birds (St 14), or Dog Guarding Dead Game Birds (V 96), or Guard (LL 56), by Jan Fyt (1611–1661); (5) also by Fyt, Dead Game (St 44), Still Life with Dead Hare or Dead Hare (V 111), or Still Life with Dead Hare (LL 57); (6) painting by Jean-Marc Nattier the Younger (1685–1766), Sculpture in the Form of a Woman with Attributes of This Art or Allegorical Depiction of Sculpture (St 12, V109), or Allegory of Sculpture (LL 99); (7) the signed and dated (1696) painting by Johannes Glauber (1646–1726) Landscape (St 81 or 83), or Landscape Meeting of Apollo and Daphne (V 25), or Meeting of Apollo and Daphne (LL 17); (8) also by Johannes Glauber, Landscape (St 81 or 83), or Landscape In the Foreground Apollo Running after Daphne (V 23), or Apollo and Daphne (LL 18); (9) the signed and dated (1716) painting by Ottmar Elliger the Younger (1666–1735), Dido on the Pyre (St 61), or Dido Consigning Herself to the Pyre after the Departure of Aeneas (V 46, LL 115); (10) also by Ottmar Elliger, Capture of Cleopatra (St 63), or Aeneas Introducing Himself to Dido (V48), or Dido and Aeneas (LL 114); (11) the signed genre painting by Jan Miense Molenaer (c. 1610–1668) called A Company of Dutch Country Folk (St 69), or A Family Scene (V 37, LL 25); (12) Pieter Rysbrack (1655–1729), signed painting called Landscape with Rysbrack and His Family (St 52, V 19), or Landscape with a Sarcophagus (LL 60); (13) signed and dated (1637) painting by Theodor van Thulden (1606–1669) called Virtue and Vice (St 72), or An Allegory of Ignorance Possessing Wealth and Driving Art and Commerce Away from Itself (V16), or Allegory of Ignorance Possessing Wealth (LL 65); (14) painting by Andrea Celesti (1637-1712?), Judith Cutting off the Head of Holofernes (St 66), or Judith and Holofernes (V 12, LL 84) (bought in Italy 1717); (15) painting by Jacques Blanchard (1600-1638), Jupiter as a Golden Shower over Danaë (St 49), or Jupiter As a Golden Shower Gaining Entrance to the Chamber of Danaë (V 40), or Danaë (LL 101) (bought in Antwerp in 1716); (16) signed painting by Gaspard or Jasper Broers (1682–1716), Dutch Fair (St 22), or Fair (V88 or 116, LL 47 or 48); (17) also by Gaspard or Jasper Broers, Fair with a Crowd (St 36) or Fair (V 88 or 116, LL 48); (18) Jupiter (St 5, V 98), or Jupiter with a Striking Rod in His Hand (LL 111) by Johann Karl Loth (1632–1698). This selection is in no way a rejection of expert commentary on the remaining paintings. It simply represents what is easily demonstrable in the limited space of this note (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 100–108; Uspenskii, Imperatorskie dvortsy, vol. 2, pp. 169–173; Stählin, Zapiski, vol. 2, pp. 7–8, 40–44, 75–76; K.V. Malinovskii, “Opisaniia imperatorskikh zhivopisnykh kollektsii v Peterburge i zagorodnykh dvortsakh, sostavlennye Iakobom Shtelinym” [“Descriptions of the Imperial Art Collections in Petersburg and Its Environs, Compiled by Jakob Shtelin”], Muzei [Museum] 1 (1980): pp. 174, 190–191); Petrov, Pushekin: Dvortsy i parki, pp. 40, 123; Lemus and Lapina, Catherine Palace Museum, numbered plates). Vil'chkovskii's guide was published in English, French, and German editions in 1912 by the Berlin firm of Meisenbach-Riffart (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. VIII, X).

413. The establishing of an Imperial model farm at Tsarskoe Selo (see Images 458–459) had as its impetus an interest in agriculture on the part of Empress Maria Fyodorovna (see Images 415–416), mother of Nicholas I (Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 221). In 1810–

1811, a small farm was built on the border of the Alexander Park, where it was proposed to keep big-horn cattle of the best Western European and Russian breeds and merino sheep (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 20). In 1818–1822, the replacement of the original wooden structures by stone ones designed by Adam Menelaws (1753–1831) in the Gothic Revival style so favored by Nicholas I took place (Petrov, p. 20; Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 394; I. Iakovkin, Opisanie Sela Tsarskogo [Description of Tsarskoe Selo] [St. Petersburg: V tipografii departamenta Narodnogo Prosveshcheniia, 1830], pp. 145ff.). During the summer of 1820, the basic buildings were built in the rough: the cattle yard, dairy, and central pavilion (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 126). In 1822, to this group of structures were added wings for the merino sheep and later a circular three-storied tower fifteen meters high (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 126). The complex of oldest structures consisted of (1) a central two-storied pavilion in English Gothic style made of red brick, (2) two single-storied wings connected to the central pavilion by sections of fences, and (3) in the middle of the yard an extensive stone cowshed, also in Gothic style (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 126). A parcel of field lands from the village of Kuz'mino was added to the farm and the portion of the park adjoining it began to be called the Farm Park (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 20). The mezzanine of the main pavilion had sloping walls painted to look like tents (Benois, p. 221). The farm had an interesting collection of paintings, mostly by Dutch seventeenth-century painters, specialists in depicting animals, but as time passed the best paintings were transferred to the Hermitage in St. Petersburg (Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 221). It is to this model farm that Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, ill with tuberculosis, was brought for the cowshed treatment.

Maxwell, who visited the farm with Colonel Todd, recorded: “We visited also a dairy in the grounds, belonging to the Grand Duke Alexander and filled with all kinds of cattle of the most approved breed. The stalls of the cows were as clean as the floors of a palace, and the cows themselves far gentler than many of the Princesses” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).

414. There were two groups of conservatories in the park grounds. The Big Conservatory, made of stone, was built towards the end of 1753 and consisted of a central hall, glassed-in conservatories, and two pavilions. It was part of the service buildings of the palace ensemble. It was remodelled in 1820–1823, according to the design of the architect V.P. Stasov. After remodelling, it consisted of a complex of four independent two-storied buildings formed into one whole by means of connecting glassed-in colonnades. The colonnades served as hothouses for laurel trees. The baroque decoration of the façades of the Big Conservatory was completely removed, and the building took on the look of late Russian Classicism. For the rest of the nineteenth century, the building underwent repairs but no further remodelling. The head gardeners used to live in the fourth Pavilion: in Catherine the Great's time it was Busch; in Alexander I's Ljamin. Since the reign of Alexander I, the superintendent of Tsarskoe Selo had his residence in the First Pavilion. In Catherine's time, the architect Charles Cameron lived there. Behind the line of big conservatories, the whole area was taken up by hothouses for flowers (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 62–63; Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 140). There was also an extensive section of the Alexander Park to the southwest of the Cross Canal, where there had been conservatories since the 1780s. The buildings of the conservatories, hothouses, and closed cold conservatories for fruit trees were laid out in three rows. In 1819–1828, these conservatories were remodelled and partly built anew by Menelaws. In 1819–1820, he built one for cherry trees. In contrast to the majority of buildings built by him in the Alexander Park, which were in Gothic Revival style, these were in the style of late Classicism. The most interesting conservatory was the one located near the ruins of the Gothic Chapel. Its central pavilion was decorated with eight Doric pilasters, and the ends of the windows were semicircular (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 122).

415. Miss Mary Musgrove, governess, lived at "Avai's on the Fontanka at the Anichkov Bridge" (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 37).
416. "Cross-purposes" is a parlor game in which questions and answers are deliberately mismatched for comic effect.
417. "Catherineoff" is the anglicized name of the palace and park called Ekateringof (Catherine Palace) and pronounced "Yikuhtirin'guff" (see Images 405–406). It was located beyond the Obvodnyi Canal in the Narva District on the shore. The Ekateringof lands stretched as far as Chernaia Rechka, which constituted the boundary between St. Petersburg and Tsarskoe Selo districts. From the Gulf of Finland, the lands extended as far as the Narva (Peterhof) Road. On 1 May (OS), there was always a public celebration here to commemorate Peter the Great's first sea victory over the Swedes in early May 1703 (OS). Especially noteworthy at these festivities was the spectacle of people promenading along the many avenues of Ekateringof in their carriages (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 14; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 213–215). A more extensive description and history of the site is given in Notes 829–834, accompanying the entry for Monday [August] 26th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I. The palace was usually called the palace of Peter I (see Image 405).

418. Maxwell, who also had to move, had thought of going to the boarding house run by the misses Benson, as such places are “well kept ... by clever clean English women,” but gave up the idea because of his intense “dislike of the boarding house system” with its lack of the “exclusiveness necessary and agreeable to [his] station” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Aug. 25, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 19; see Benson in Appendix E. He chose instead to move “for gentility’s sake” into the Hotel de Paris, “a more fashionable, more expensive and far dirtier place,” where he took two rooms, for himself and La Ronne, and was thus “relieved from the tittle tattle, the gossip and obsequious insolence of low, ~~cokney~~ cokney John Bulls, who love of all things to intrude if they can into the mysteries (to them) of a gentlemen’s life, habits and organization” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 11, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 34). See Note 170 above and Benson in Appendix E.

On 14 May, Maxwell “delivered up the keys of [his] establishment to the Major” at two o’clock, “and said goodbye to them all as they left in their carriages for the country” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).

419. They had also been invited to a dinner party at the Ropeses on 1/13 May to celebrate the Gellibrands’ wedding anniversary (see Images 265–266), but as Anna Whistler was too tired after packing and Maxwell too unwell, they “remained at home and talked of a home beyond the Atlantic and beyond the skies” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).
420. Maxwell made his first visit on the day after the Whistlers moved, 15 May, arriving with “1 dozen Chateau Margeaux and 2 bottles of Champagne” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). He did not like the Whistlers' summer house, "a fly box - a nut shell - and though in internal arrangements good enough, ... too small and objectionable in many respects ... like all these things in Russia ill adapted to the climate ... they had the blues. The boys were cheerful enough, and M<sup>rs</sup> W was in her usual good temper and spirits. But the Major was all buttoned up and Miss D all shawled up, and doors were kept shut and fires all lighted to keep out the cold ... To crown the whole the cook became sick and the dinner was not a promising one - and then it was vowed to remain in town another summer if a better house and better servants and other things were not at hand. It was now the wine I brought down for the house warming played a part - ... all hands cheered up. so did the weather ... and by eight ... every thing was illuminated by the setting of the sun" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).

421. Maxwell described one day in that week, Monday, 27 May, on the afternoon of which he went to visit the Whistlers. This is probably the second of the two visits that Anna Whistler said Maxwell had made to them. He was accompanied by his "crony Strokoffsky a Polish nobleman," who had dined with him and had expressed, as on many previous occasions, his wish to be introduced to the Whistlers, having never seen an American lady. Strokoffsky was a state councilor (5th grade) in Russian government service. At the Whistlers, they met not only Emma Maingay, but her elder brother, William Bonamy, with whom Maxwell was not acquainted (see Images 260, 263). Maxwell thought Major Whistler did not like William Bonamy, who was interested in Deborah Whistler, while he himself expressed his usual disdain towards Englishmen of certain classes (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, August 25, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 17; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, no. 35).
422. Anna Whistler is referring to Eliza Maingay. See Maingay in Appendix E and Image 262.
423. Anna Whistler spelled this surname Stockhol, Stockoll, and Stockol. Baron Eduard Andreevich de Stoeckl (1804 – 26 January 1892) was at this time in 1844 junior secretary to the Russian Mission in Washington and apparently on home leave (AVPRI: Fond DIS / i / KhD, op. 464, d. 3127 Stekl'). He had probably met Major Whistler in Washington during the negotiations to hire the latter as consulting engineer for the building of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. See the biographies of the Stoeckl, Howard, Swift, and Ironside families in Appendix E (hereafter, Stoeckl, Howard, Swift, Ironside) and Image 286.

424. Maxwell said: “There ~~is~~ are no gardens attached as private property to the country houses here - The ~~are~~ gardens and grounds are kept in order by the owner, he enjoys the fruits alone, and his tenants enjoy the walks and nothing more. They must buy their fruits vegetables and flowers” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). Maxwell’s comments to the contrary, the Whistlers’ landlord, Mr. Thomas Drury, was very generous to them, as several passages in the diaries, including this one, show.
425. The new curate, who preached on 26 May, Whitsunday, was Rev. George Williams (4 April 1814 – 26 January 1878), divine and topographer, educated at Eton, Cambridge, and Oxford. He received his BA in 1837 at Cambridge and was ordained in that year. From 22 September 1838 until Michaelmas 1840, he held “the perpetual curacies of Great Bricet and Wattisham.” In 1840, he received his M.A. at Cambridge. From 1841 to May 1843, he was with Bishop Alexander in Jerusalem as chaplain to that city. From May 1844 to August 1844, he replaced Rev. Edward Law as chaplain at St. Petersburg and, from September 1844 to June 1845, replaced Rev. R.W. Blackmore at Cronstadt. In “holding these posts he became involved with the desire of bringing together the Greek and Anglican churches.” In 1845, he published The Holy City; Or, Historical and Topographical Notices of Jerusalem; with Some Account of Its Antiquities and of Its Present Condition with Illustrations from Sketches by the Rev. W.F. Witts (London: John W. Parker; Cambridge: T. Stevenson, 1845); a second edition appeared in 1849. In 1846, he published “a collection of ‘Sermons Preached at Jerusalem in 1842 and 1843’.” From 1846–1848, he was dean of arts at Kings College, Cambridge, and from 1848–1850 dean of divinity. He received the BD at Cambridge in 1849. In 1860, he undertook “‘a long and arduous journey in Russia’ ..., with a view to spreading knowledge of the benefits available for foreign communities at English universities.” After posts at St. Columba’s College near Dublin, King’s College, and Cumbrae College, “a tour in the East with the Marquis of Bute and several years in residence at Cambridge, [he] was presented ... [in] 1869 to the important vicarage of Ringwood in Hampshire.” He died suddenly on 26 January 1878. One of his last acts “was to send his signature to the clerical declaration against war with Russia.” He is said to have been “endowed with a noble presence and dignified voice” (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Williams, George [1814–1878]”). Anna Whistler spoke of liking “his fervent manner” in this diary entry, and in another remarked that his “low and solemn tone is so devotional” (entry of Sunday [July] 14th [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I). All of his subsequent preaching seemed to impress her.

426. Lord and Lady Stuart were leaving Russia on 3 June 1844 (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).

427. In April 1844, Rev. Edward Law (see Image 253) requested from the Russia Company a leave of absence for up to three months, adding that he had written to the Bishop of London, asking him to provide a substitute for that time. “Between May 23 and Aug. 5, 1844 (both inclusive) there are 14 Entries by the Rev<sup>d</sup> Geo: Williams. Off: Minister during the absence, in England, of M<sup>r</sup> E. Law, who on that occasion took his Degree of D.D. at the University of Oxford, by the request of the British Factory, who, in the kindest manner, presented him with £100 for the attendant expences thereof” (RGIA: Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 7, no. 16, fol. 18r. A Memoir, regarding the Church Registers of the Chapel of the British Factory, at Mosco and Archangel 1706 to 1732, and at St. Petersburg, from 1723, to the current Year. Compiled and dedicated to the Factory by The Rev<sup>d</sup> Edward Law M.A. 1833. John Kirton, Script, fol. 18r). He received both his Bachelor of Divinity and his Doctor of Divinity degrees on 21 June 1844 (Joseph Welch, comp., The List of the Queen’s Scholars of St. Peter’s College, Westminster, Admitted on that Foundation Since 1663; and of Such as Have Been Thence Elected to Christ Church, Oxford, and Trinity College, Cambridge, from the Foundation by Queen Elizabeth, 1561, to the Present Time, new ed., with numerous additions by An Old King’s Scholar (London: G. W. Ginger, 1852), p. 468).

John Kirton, clerk of the English Church in St. Petersburg, died on 2 September 1852 (OS), age sixty-six, and was buried on 5 September 1852 (OS) in the Smolensk Cemetery (PREC STP for 1852, p. 434, no. 6306).

428. Colossians 2:5: “For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ.”

429. Whitsunday, or Pentecost, is the seventh Sunday after Easter and celebrates the “feast of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles on the 50th day after Easter” (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. “Whitsunday”). See Image 380 for an icon of this feast day.
430. “Muslin” is “a thin cotton, white, dyed, or printed.” “Book muslin” is a “thin white muslin used for ladies’ dresses” (Webster’s Revised Unabridged Dictionary (1913), s.v. “muslin,” “book muslin”). “Gauze” is a “very thin, transparent fabric of silk, linen or cotton” (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “gauze”).
431. See Note 577 below concerning the Reports of the Religious Tract Society for 1843–1849.
432. Psalm 49:20: “Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish.” Psalm 49 is considered a “meditation on the transience of life and wealth” (Herbert G. May and Bruce M. Metzger, eds., New Oxford Annotated Bible with the Apocrypha [New York: Oxford University Press, 1977], pp. 692–693; hereafter, New Oxford Annotated Bible).
433. May 30 was a Thursday. Persons mentioned in this entry who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Catherine Julia McNeill, Anna Whistler’s niece (Jule); Eliza (Lamb) Maingay, Anna Whistler’s close friend, now moving permanently to England (Mrs. Maingay); the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst); and Anna Whistler’s mother, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (my own dear mother, this loved parent, my mothers visit).
434. Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22), in her winter visits to East Florida, was teacher and chaplain to the Negroes on her son’s plantation (see Images 58–60) and to his mulatto wife, Elizabeth (Coffee) McNeill (c. 1828 – 23 August 1898) and their children. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
435. May 31 was a Friday.
436. The Field of Mars (Marsovo pole), first called the Tsarina’s Meadow (Tsaritsyn lug), was a vast, superbly planned area for military parades, reviews, and exercises. Every spring, it was the site of the emperor’s inspection of the troops of the Guard Corps before they set out for camp. The Field of Mars stretched along the entire length of the Summer Garden on the Swan Canal side. From the south, it was intersected diagonally by the Moika River (opposite the garden of the Mikhailovskii Palace). It was bounded from the west by a group of houses that in olden times was called Beautiful or Red Street. To the north, the field extended to the service buildings of the Marble Palace (home of Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich), alongside which is Suvorov Square, with a view of the Neva. Further along, it extended to the magnificent building of the Austrian Legation (formerly the house of Prince Saltykov) and the residence of Prince Oldenburg (formerly the house of I.I. Betskii). When the capital was first planned, the Field of Mars was considered part of the Summer Garden. Later, it was turned into a meadow, called the Tsarina's Meadow. From 1740–1742, it was a garden. A monument to Prince Suvorov-Italiiskii was at first erected at the opposite end of the field, near the Moika. At the other end of the square rose Rumiantsev's obelisk, later transferred to the First Cadet Corps. The monument to Suvorov was later placed in an area that was freed up between Prince Saltykov's house and the service buildings of the Marble Palace, when Prince Saltykov's garden was destroyed. After the rebuilding of these service buildings (from 1845 through 1850), no permanent new structures appeared on the Field of Mars for the entire second half of the nineteenth century (Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 346–347; V.S. Shvarts, Arkhitekturnyi ansambl' Marsova polia [The Architectural Ensemble of the Field of Mars] [Leningrad: Iskusstvo, 1989], pp. 135–136, 140; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 72–73). A famous panoramic painting of the Field of Mars is A Parade in the Tsarina's Meadow on 6 October 1831 (Parad na Tsaritsynom lugu 6 oktiabria 1831 goda) by Grigorii Grigorievich Chernetsov (1802–1865) (Shvarts, Arkhitekturnyi ansambl', pp. 127–130).

On 27 or 28 May 1844 (the date as written is not clear), Maxwell wrote to Major Whistler, informing him that he had “this moment received through the Aide de-camp of General Muller, the enclosed billet d'entrée to the residence of General Muller, which is directly opposite the marble palace of the Grand Duke Michel and overlooking the ground of parade. The review is on the 18 and 19 old style [30 and 31 NS], that is on Thursday and Friday next of this week; the first for infantry, the second for cavalry. The number of the lookout is 17 and the Company limited to 4 persons” (John S. Maxwell to Major Whistler, May 27? 28? [1844], N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). Maxwell suggested that the Major and the ladies decide who would go, but could not, with his limited Russian, understand whether the invitation said boys under twelve would be admitted (John S. Maxwell to Major Whistler, May 27? 28? [1844]). For an extensive description of the Guards review in 1847 see BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 23–31.

437. Nicholas I went to England in June 1844 “to explore the possibilities for improving Russia’s relations with Britain, and, most of all, to discuss the problem ever-present in his mind: the future of the Ottoman Empire” (Lincoln, Nicholas I, pp. 220, 222). Reluctant at first to have him visit, “Queen Victoria agreed to receive [him] in late May or early June” (Lincoln, pp. 220–221). “Nicholas accepted the invitation in early April” and left St. Petersburg on 12 May, arriving “at Woolwich on 1 June (NS)” (Lincoln, p. 221). He “remained in England until 9 June (NS)” (Lincoln, p. 222). No formal agreement had been made between the two powers, and the “visit and his miscalculation of the extent to which the British were willing to commit themselves to giving formal assurances about the future actually laid the basis for future conflicts” (Lincoln, p. 223). See “Europe’s Gendarme Emerges,” in Lincoln, pp. 196–231, for a discussion of the Eastern Question; pages 220–223 deal specifically with Nicholas’ visit to England in 1844. “Grand Duke Michel” is Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich, brother of Emperor Nicholas I.
438. On 19/31 May, Maxwell returned from seeing Todd in Tsarskoe Selo and found Major Whistler and Count Strokoffsky waiting in his rooms. “The Major informed me that Mrs W. expected company at her house that day, that Miss W. had gone to bid farewell to her companion who went to England in the steamer, and that they therefore could not use the ticket ... He proposed however that I should go with him and the boys to see the parade—after which he wished I would go down with Colonel Todd to the country to dine” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
439. The steamer for England would be departing Cronstadt on Saturday (John S. Maxwell to Major Whistler, Sarskoe Celu, May 20, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). The pictures referred to in this entry were of Emma, Frederick, and Emily Maingay. See Maingay in Appendix E and Images 263–264. It has not been possible to locate the message from Eliza (Lamb) Maingay (see Image 259). Anna Whistler was not to open it until Friday, 7 June 1844.
440. “The day was a fine one and there were 58.000 men in the field. The Grand Duke Michel in the absence of the Emperor commanded the troops looked and manoeuvred exceedingly well ... The artillery, the flying artillery, with cannon, baggage and wagons, bridges and boats passed over the ground with prodigious speed and were followed by cavalry, ten thousand in force on beautiful horses, at full ~~speed~~ gallop and this without breaking a rank or deviating an inch from a certain and well defined line of march. It was an extraordinary and brilliant display of the power of Russia ~~in~~ on her peace establishment . . . At three we left” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).

441. Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna (see Images 420, 424) became commander-in-chief of the Horse Guards as of 22 August / 3 September 1831 (S. Panchulidzev, comp., Istoriia Kavaleriarskogo Ee Velichestva Gosudaryni Imperatritsy Marii Fyodorovny polka [History of the Cavalier Guards 1724–1799–1899. On the Occasion of the One Hundredth Jubilee of Her Majesty Empress Mariia Fyodorovna’s Cavalier Guard Regiment], 4 vols. [St. Petersburg: Èkspeditsiia zagotovleniia gosudarstvennykh bumag, 1912], vol. 4, p. 290). They were a knightly guard and had their beginnings in the company of bodyguards formed by Peter the Great for the coronation of Catherine I in 1724 (see Image 401). The type chosen for the Horse Guard was blonde; if possible, blue-eyed; handsome; tall. Their parade uniforms were white, the smooth-fitting trousers of kid. They wore golden chest and back armor resembling knightly armor. Their casques were silver-colored and crowned with the two-headed eagle (see Images 370, 423). They rode bay horses (Vilimbakhov, Faibisovich, and Letin, Khrabrye dela vasbi, pp. 27, 33, 43, 58; B.I. Antonov, Imperatorskaia gvardiia v Sanktpeterburge [The Imperial Guard in St. Petersburg] [St. Petersburg: GLAGOL, 2001], pp. 50–56).
442. The Ambassador was Charles Stewart Todd (see Image 278). “I saw his Excellency among the staff, bouncing about on his dancing steed and laughed inwardly at the idea that the militia was represented there” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
443. Maxwell went back to the hotel to wait for Todd. They went to Todd’s rooms, where the latter took off “his regimentals.” By then, “it was too late to start for the Majors to be on time for dinner.” They therefore dined in town and then set out. They “arrived at six, found several gentlemen there and dinner just served” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36). Neither Anna Whistler nor Maxwell identified the gentlemen.
444. Monday was 3 June.

445. Anna Whistler must have intended to write “now.”
446. Reverend Law (see Image 253) was to leave for England on the day of this diary entry, Monday, 3 June. “M<sup>r</sup>. Law went to Cronstadt yesterday [1 June] and goes away with his daughter [Caroline] in the steamer in which Lord Stuart and lady will leave to-morrow” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
447. Trinity Sunday is the first Sunday after Pentecost (or Whitsunday). It celebrates the doctrine that “the one God exists in three Persons and one substance, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit” (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. “trinity, doctrine of the”). The Athanasian Creed “expounds the doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation, adding a list of the most important events in the Lord’s life; it includes anathemas against those who do not believe its affirmations” (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. “Athanasian Creed”). “The Christian doctrine of the Incarnation affirms that the eternal Son of God took human flesh from His human mother and that the historical Christ is at once fully God and fully man. It asserts an abiding union in Christ’s Person of Godhead and manhood and assigns the beginnings of this union to a definite and known date in human history” (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. “Incarnation”). The “new Curate” was Rev. George Williams.
448. Jude 20–21: “<sup>20</sup> But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, <sup>21</sup> Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.”
449. See also John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36.
450. Anna Whistler spells this name in a variety of ways: Hadenscoff, Hadenskoug, Hadenskoug. Carl Robert Hedenschoug (6 February 1813 – 2 December 1861) was a Swedish draftsman working for Major Whistler. See his biography in Appendix E.
451. On Tuesday, 4 June, Major Whistler had gone to the Department of Railways, which was located on the corner of Sadovaia Street and Ekateringof Prospekt, in the building belonging to Adam (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1846, p. 17). He was going to a meeting of the Temporary Technical Commission, of which he was a member. For a list of the other members, see Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, pp. 40–41, 54, 55.

452. Egor Karlovich (Georg Eduard) von Lode (25 August 1786 [OS] – Narva 10 December 1844 [OS]), collegiate councilor (6th grade), was director of Imperial educational institutions in Saratov Province. He had a house on Vasilievskii Island, Vasilevskaia District, First Ward, on the Fifth Line, between the Grand Neva Embankment and Academy Lane. It faced a side of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts and was numbered house No. 1 in Nistrem’s 1844 guide to St. Petersburg residents (Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, p. 204. Only ten districts are included. Petersburg, Vyborg, and Okhta districts were excluded because they lacked the new house numbers instituted in 1836). In November 1838, it was numbered No. 45; in August 1850, No. 45/88. See A.A. Polovtsov, ed. Russkii biograficheskii slovar’ [Russian Biographical Dictionary], 25 vols. (St. Petersburg: Imperatorskoe Russkoe Istoricheskoe Obshchestvo, 1896–1918; New York: Kraus Reprint, 1962), vol. 10 (citations are from the 1962 edition).
453. “It is a usual characteristic of the Russian style of building – a characteristic which pointedly indicates the national quality of variety, – that in all houses, even in those occupied by the inferior classes of citizens, the principal, most agreeable, and important apartment is appropriated to the purposes of a drawing room. So long as this is spacious and handsome, the Russian attaches little importance to the degree of comfort or to the habitable condition of the inferior apartments in which he passes his life” (Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 45).
454. “Dom” (pronounced “dawm”) means “house” or “home” in Russian. Maxwell had been told by Anna Whistler that there would always be a room in their summer home for him (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 1, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 33) and on his first visit had been shown the “little room all ready for me almost” but as it was “the only spare room they have ... I could not think of remaining, at least, that night”. He promised, however, to come and stay a while before leaving Russia (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). On 17 May, the Major dined with Maxwell at Todd’s lodgings in Tsarskoe Selo and “insist[ed] upon my spending a week with him before I leave” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844). Beginning 4 June, Maxwell spent three full days with the Whistlers (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS, Maxwell Papers, no. 36).

455. "I have noticed that they have no fences to divide the different lots A man owns an Estate, there are perhaps a dozen homes on it, these are all ... used as a walk by any of the tenants which makes it much pleasanter, than when one has his walk circumscribed by a stone wall, or a high fence" (entry for Monday, 24th July [1848], PEM: Fettyplace Journal).
456. "We had prayers morning and evening, which I attended. ~~the M<sup>rs</sup>~~ W. reading the bible and prayers herself" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
457. The words "his Ellen" would seem to refer to William Hooper Ropes's wife, Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, rather than to his daughter, Ellen Gellibrand Ropes.
458. "I never saw such a disagreeable place. It seems that this road is one of the most frequented in Russia and as the summers are very warm and dry, the clouds of dust were really overpowering and could be felt upon the tongue even in the house every time a mouth was open" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).
459. For example, Edward Cattley (1816–1895), Russia merchant, and Clemence Elizabeth (Camp) Cattley (1816–1884) (married 1843) had a country house "about 15 versts half way to Peterhof ... He is consul and has princes dining at his table sometimes" ("Echoes from Old St. Petersburg," part of Stephen Thomas Cattley [1835–1903] diary 1850 [edited by Edith Mary Smith, in the possession of Rev. H. Hansen, copied by Gerald N. Coveney], MS 1406, Leeds Russian Archive Special Collections [LRA], Brotherton Library, University of Leeds, Yorkshire). The entry is dated July 1850.
460. Ann Elizabeth Main (1820 – 27 July / 8 August 1874) (PREC STP, no. 296, p. 1037) was married to Matthew Anderson (c. 1798 – 5/17 November 1877) (PREC STP, no. 421, p. 1092) on 13/25 July 1838 in the English Church (PREC STP for 1838, p. 237). She was called "the beautiful Mrs. Anderson." According to Pyliaev, an estate on the Peterhof Road belonging to a Mr. Anderson seems to have been formed from parts of the estates of Count Vorontsov and Vorontsov's neighbor, Count Panin, court servitors in the time of Catherine the Great. Part of Panin's estate became the property of the counts Sheremetiev and was called "Ulianka." Legend has it that the name came from an inn belonging to a Finnish woman named Uliana. Mr. Anderson's dacha was said to occupy the spot where that inn had stood. Both the original Vorontsov and Panin estates were near the estate located on the eleventh verst that Shcherbatov sold to the government and that was turned into the insane asylum of All That Mourn (Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 134–142). More recent scholarship says the dacha belonged to Vorontsov, and that it was rented out up until the 1840s, when an Englishman named John (Ivan Matveevich) Anderson bought it (S.B. Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga Istoriko-arkhitekturnyi putevoditel' [The Peterhof Road: A Historical and Architectural Guide] [St. Petersburg: Evropeiskii dom, 2002], p. 136). The Matthew Andersons probably spent summers in his house, which was considered “exceptional in its model orderliness and in being equipped with all amenities” (Gorbatenko, p. 136).

461. It has not been possible to identify the dacha the Maingays had occupied at an earlier time, but as William Bonamy Maingay later called his home in Tunbridge Wells “Strelna,” it is possible the dacha was in the Strel’na area. See Maingay in Appendix E.
462. The Trinity-Sergius Monastery (or Hermitage) by-the-Sea (Troitse-Sergieva primorskaiia pustyn') (see Image 397), a male monastery of the first class, is located at the fifteenth/nineteenth verst of the Peterhof Road, on the right side of the road, near Strel’na (see Images 398–399). In 1731, at the death of her sister, Catherine, Empress Anna Ioannovna gave this sister’s farmstead as a gift to her own personal confessor, Varlaam, archimandrite of the Trinity-Sergius Monastery near Moscow, who was then living in St. Petersburg. Varlaam transferred from the home of Anna Ioannovna’s deceased mother in St. Petersburg a wooden church, which he placed near the stone house on the property. In 1734, Varlaam founded here the New-Trinity-Sergius Monastery. On 12 May 1735 (OS), he consecrated the church in the name of St. Sergius. Varlaam died in 1737 and was buried at the monastery, which continued to be under the jurisdiction of the Trinity-Sergius Monastery in Moscow. In 1752, construction of six new stone buildings was begun. In this period, two churches were erected: in 1758, a church for the archimandrite cells, named for St. Sergius of Radonezh, the Miracleworker; in 1760, the cathedral, named for the Holy Trinity. In 1764, the Monastery was transferred to the jurisdiction of the St. Petersburg eparchy and classified as a monastery of the second class. It was elevated to the status of a monastery of the first class in 1836. As described in 1839, the Monastery had the appearance of a rectangular castle, surrounded on the outside, from the east, west, and north sides, by ponds and walks, and on the south side by two well-cultivated parterres, which bordered upon the Peterhof Road. Between the parterres lay the entry road to the monastery. There were four church edifices in the monastery: (1) the Cathedral of the Lifegiving Trinity; (2) the Church of James the Apostle and Brother of God; (3) the Church of St. Sergius of Radonezh, the Miracleworker; (4) the Church of Valerian the Martyr. Trinity Cathedral and the Church of St. Sergius of Radonezh will be discussed further in notes about Anna Whistler's visits to them. Trinity Cathedral has a three-storied belltower on its west side. The exterior of the cathedral and belltower is decorated with Corinthian columns and pilastres and sculpted figures. The cathedral contains the miracleworking icon of St. Sergius and is therefore a place of pilgrimage in summer. The Church of James the Apostle is located in a stone wing at the entrance to the monastery on the right side, facing the Peterhof Road. It was consecrated on 22 August 1820 (OS). On the northern side of the monastery, in a line with the cells and refectory, is the Church of St. Sergius. It has five cupolas and is an example of the Orthodox basilica. It was consecrated on 18 July 1822. The Church of Valerian the Martyr is located in the home for invalids on the west side of the monastery. It was erected during 1805–1809 over the remains of Count Valerian Aleksandrovich Zubov (1771–1804), the conqueror of Derbent, who died of wounds received in battle, by his brothers and consecrated on 21 June 1809 (OS). Underneath the church is a burial grotto for members of the Zubov family. The home for invalids was established by the Zubov family at their own expense to care for thirty males of various callings, mainly wounded soldiers. There are up to forty monks in the monastery. The square within the monastery, except for the orchards and the paths, is paved with natural stone. On this square, at the north and east sides of Trinity Cathedral, is a burial ground, where illustrious persons, including foreigners and non-Orthodox believers, are buried. Many of the magnificent and elegant tomb monuments here are considered works of art.

The following feast days are celebrated in the monastery: (1) in the Trinity Cathedral, Holy Trinity Day (Pentecost) (29 May / 10 June); the Feast of the apostles Peter and Paul (29 June / 11 July); Feast of the Beheading of John, the honest, praiseworthy Forerunner and Prophet of the Lord (29 August / 10 September); (2) in the Church of St. James the Apostle, the Feast of James the Apostle and Brother of God (23 October / 4 November); (3) in the Church of St. Sergius, the Feast of St. Sergius (5/17 July); the Feast of St. Sergius (25 October / 7 November); (4) in the Church of Valerian the Martyr, the Feast of that St. Valerian who was martyred around the year 230 (22 November / 4 December).

A full religious procession (with cross and banners) around the monastery takes place on 5/17 July (Ivan Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1839, pt. 1, pp. 152–157). Grech, the compiler of Ves' Peterburg 1851, seems to have depended on Pushkarev's description but made some mistakes when condensing the material (p. 491). See also Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 180–204; Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga, pp. 190–195; P.N. Stolpianskii, Petergofskaiia pershppektiva Istoricheskii ocherk [Peterhof Perspective A Historical Sketch] (St. Petersburg: Sankt-Piter-Burkh, 1923), pp. 33–35; Pushkarev, Nikolaenskii Peterburg, pp. 120–123; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 1, pp. 53–64.

463. All dates in this biography are Old Style. The Equerry to Grand Duchess Elena Pavlovna (1807–1873), wife of Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (1798–1849), brother of Nicholas I, was Count Aleksandr Nikolaevich Tolstoi (21 September 1793 – 23 July 1866). He was educated in St. Petersburg in the private school of the Jesuit priest, Father Gruber. Despite receiving a Catholic education, he remained devoted to Russian Orthodoxy and personally paid for the construction of fifteen Orthodox churches. He began his military service as sub-ensign (portupeipraporsbchik) in the Astrakhan Grenadier Regiment on 24 February 1814. In 1815, he was transferred to the quartermaster section of His Imperial Majesty's (Alexander I) Suite, and on 30 August promoted to ensign (praporsbchik). In January 1817, he was transferred to the Guards staff. In 1819, he was transferred to the Horse Guard Regiment, where, on 11 March, he was appointed adjutant to Prince A.S. Menshikov (1787–1864). He was at the Congress in Leibach with Prince Menshikov, and from here was sent with dispatches to the ambassador in Constantinople, Baron G.A. Stroganov. Then for a time, he served as adjutant to Adjutant-General Prince Volkonskii. On 2 August 1822, he was appointed an aide-de-camp to Alexander I, but on 23 January 1827 (reign of Nicholas I) was relieved of military duties because of ill health, with the title of “kamerherr,” appointed to the Court. In February of 1827, he was appointed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and sent to serve with the Russian ambassador in Paris. Five years later, he transferred to the Ministry of Internal Affairs and for some three years was charged with special assignments in the office of the governor-general of Finland. On 12 December 1834, he was made a member of the committee for Russian horsebreeding. In 1836, he was promoted to actual state councillor (4th grade), and in 1838 appointed equerry to the Imperial Court. On his return from abroad in 1840, on which trip he had accompanied Grand Duchess Elena Pavlovna, he was appointed to serve as equerry to her. During his continuing court service, Tolstoi held the post of marshal of the Imperial Court and Winter Palace (oberhofmarshal) and carried out many special Imperial assignments. When the emancipation of the serfs took place, he gifted to his peasants the payment of twenty percent of their manumission fee. In the autumn of 1865, Tolstoi went to Nice for the cure because of ill health, but died there on 23 July 1866. His body was brought back to St. Petersburg and buried in the family vault of the Lazarus Church of the Alexander Nevsky Monastery. Tolstoi was married to Anna Nikolaevna Khilkova and was without issue (Polovtsov, Russkii biograficheski slovar', vol. 21, pp. 32–33).

464. “The country at this season even in Russia is delightful - The mosquitoes and other insects however are very annoying and Miss Whistler [sic] was so bitten one night by the gallinippers as to have her face swelled and her eyes almost closed” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
465. Maxwell’s mother was Agnes (Stevenson) Maxwell (5 January 1796 – 21 April 1866). See Maxwell in Appendix E and Image 54.
466. Maxwell wrote home of Anna Whistler’s response to his father’s letter: “I read to M<sup>rs</sup> W. that part of Fathers letter speaking of your and his gratitude for their attention to me etc - M<sup>rs</sup> W. desires to be remembered to you and hopes to see and know you well one of these days” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36). See Maxwell in Appendix E and Image 55.
467. On 25 May 1844, Maxwell received a letter from a man named Stoltenburg, whom he had met on 5 July 1843, while travelling in Scandinavia. This letter is not among Maxwell’s papers at N-YHS; however, in a letter dated 15 July 1843, from Maxwell to his mother, there is an extensive passage about the meeting with Stoltenburg:

... valet who was ahead stopped at a pretty cottage surrounded [sic] with rose trees and flowers to light his pipe. The gentleman residing there hearing from him of his stranger employers and that one of them was an American, hastened out and was at the gate when we drove up. He advanced towards us and insisted upon our going in, and as an inducement told me in excellent English that he had travelled in America twenty years since, that he loved my country and wanted to talk about it. Resistance was in vain and in we went. ... here were maps of the United States, pictures of the Presidents, collections of American insects and some American plants. Why did you not come here yesterday ... You would have seen the flag of the United States and that of Old Norway flying side by side. as they do every 4th of July in many parts of this country. You may imagine how happy I felt at all this ... we talked a great deal of America and Norway. M<sup>r</sup> Stoltenburg, thinking that Norway had the advantage of us in having a President who was not chosen by the people. He meant the King of Sweden ... From his manner, feeling and energy. from his mode of life and careless independence I was lead to think of Burn's [Robert Burns (1759–1796)], M<sup>r</sup> Stoltenberg's little domain consisted of 15 acres only. but most charmingly situated ... It is called in honor of the lady [Mrs. Stoltenberg] Marion-lyst or Mary's joy. After a detention of 4 hours passed most delightfully, after an invitation to remain for the night, after an injunction to visit Norway in her glory; in the winter, after promising to send him some hickory nuts to plant, and after many adieu's and hand-shakings. we departed ... I know nothing of this kind of hospitality in our country. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Hamburg, July 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 16)

“After [Oslo] was destroyed by fire in 1624, Christian IV of Denmark-Norway built a new town farther west ... and called it Christiania” (Encyclopedia Britannica Online, s.v. “Oslo,” accessed November 15, 2020, <https://www.britannica.com/place/Oslo>). It has not been possible to identify Mr. Stoltenberg. “The cottage ‘Marienlyst’, likely identified with the small farm ‘Marienlyst’, was at that time still situated outside the borders of Kristiania in the municipality of Aker. Marienlyst was a part of the greater farm, Nedre Blindern” (Torkel R. Bråthen, Regional State Archives of Oslo, to E. Harden, 22 December 2010). A search “in the municipal censuses from Aker of 1842 and 1843,” which are “not

- completely preserved,” did not contain information about Marienlyst (Robert Kalleberg and Unn Hovdhanger, Oslo Kommune, to E. Harden, 14 March 2011).
468. All the topics Anna Whistler mentions in this sentence are taken up in Maxwell’s abovementioned letter of 15 July 1843, to his mother (N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 16).
469. “Sweden is filled with beggars and barons, who meet you at every turn, but not a beggar did I see in Norway and the last noble permitted to enjoy a title while he lives is now so old that a few months will terminate his life and with it the existence of the aristocracy” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Hamburg, July 15, 1843, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 16).
470. Friday was 7 June 1844.
471. William Miller (25 March 1809 – 10 October 1887) was a Scottish merchant and honorary British vice-consul in St. Petersburg.
472. Timothy Abraham Curtis (30 January 1786 – 13 May 1857) was the second son of Sir William Curtis BT (1752–1829), who had been lord mayor of London in 1795–1796. Sir William, along with his brother, had amassed great wealth through the ship’s biscuit business they had inherited from their father. Timothy Abraham Curtis’s path, in contrast, was one of bankruptcy. He was a director of the Bank of England from 1820 to 1841, including the period 1834–1837 as deputy governor and 1837–1839 as governor. He ceased to be a director in 1841, when he disqualified himself through the sale of his holding of Bank Stock (capital stock of the Bank of England). His bankruptcy gave great pleasure to the Stock Exchange, because during his governorship brokers had been barred from continuing to use the Bank’s premises as a market to conduct their business. He was in Russia as partner in the firm of Bury, Curtis and Kennedy of Liverpool, which had difficulties in adhering to its contract with the Russian government to supply cast iron immovable arches for the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. He died intestate and a bankrupt. His widow and children refused to apply for a grant of letters of administration to his estate. A receiver was therefore appointed by the court under the Bankruptcy Act in force at the time and a grant of letters of administration for Curtis’s estate was issued to that receiver. The document cites Curtis as a flax spinner late of Grandholm Works near Aberdeen in North Britain. He died at Woodstock in the County of Oxford. His effects were under £20 (W. Marsten Acres, The Bank of England from Within 1694–1900, 2 vols. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1931], vol.

- 2, pp. 481–483; John Francis, Chronicles and Characters of the Stock Exchange [London: Willoughby, 1849], pp. 294–295; Dictionary of National Biography (1971), s.v. “Curtis, Timothy”; Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, pp. 89, 364; Burke's Peerage, 1869, p. 294). I wish to thank D.A.H. Byatt of the Archive Section, Corporate Services Department, Bank of England, London, for his help in untangling Anna Whistler’s statement and Clive Dyal, Record Keeper at Principal Registry of the Family Division, for his help in interpreting the letters of administration for Curtis. For Curtis’s family, see Note 474 below.
473. Anna Whistler should have written “latter.” Maxwell gives the correct information: “Last evening [June 7] several gentlemen were out there and among them was a most interesting man by the name of Curtis, for many years Governor of the bank of England” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8th in letter dated June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
474. Timothy Abraham Curtis married on 25 April 1809 Margaret Harriett Green (bap. 11 August 1788 – 8 June 1847). Their daughters were Harriet Anne (c. 1812 – 3 November 1883), Emma Charlotte (Curtis) Bevan (c. 1813 – 22 July 1881), Sophia (c. 1815 – 22 March 1902), Elizabeth Ann (bap. 23 August 1821), Frances Moncton (bap. 12 May 1824 – 10 August 1850), and Annette de la Touraine (Curtis) Raitt (c. 1829 – 5 April 1900).
475. “Every night about 10 o’clock I heard a beating of sticks upon something, which from the sound I imagined to be a wooden fence. Upon enquiry I ascertained that this beating was kept up all night by the watchman to frighten away the thieves and to give them notice that a watch was kept upon the premises. I went to see the spot where this nightly ceremony was performed and there I saw a board nailed ~~across~~ upon two posts placed upright, upon which the watchman played with two sticks as upon a drum. It is usual to have this done it seems upon every estate and it struck me as a very queer thing indeed” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
476. “Saturday June 8th I have just returned from a visit of three days to the country house of Major Whistler. I passed a very agreeable time there, and what with running about with the boys etc. I have improved in health to a remarkable degree” (John S. Maxwell to

- Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
477. In the 31 May entry of the long letter to his mother, begun on 17 May 1844, Maxwell, who had intended to leave Russia permanently, wrote that he had “been induced to change [his] plans” because Todd was “in great anxiety respecting his position” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35). Maxwell was leaving only for the summer, going to Germany, and returning “in the fall or sooner . . . if Colonel Todd remains here, it will be for the winter and . . . if I can then obtain leave to absent myself well and good, if I cannot I shall in all probability resign and go South, for I have no idea of trying the winter again. But in the present state of affairs all I can do, with any safety is to make the most of my time and proceed on the 15 of June, two weeks from tomorrow to Berlin - and thence where time and circumstance may direct my steps” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35).
478. “When I said Farewell to the Whistlers to-day, I did so thinking perhaps that I would not see them again before my departure . . . Consequently as you may imagine I took leave of them with some feelings of regret. I think however I may go out again for a few hours next week” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
479. It has not been possible to ascertain whose dacha this was, located about a verst beyond where the Whistlers lived.
480. Anna Whistler meant “could not but be amused.”
481. It has seemed that Eugenia Maria Reay, who married Benjamin Norman (12/23 November 1797 – 1836 or 1837) in St. Petersburg on 28 November / 10 December 1822 (PREC STP, no. 3234), is the Mrs. Norman intended here. We can ascertain Benjamin Norman’s death year from the baptism entry for his daughter, Mary, given as 30 July [/ 11 August] 1837. In this entry, he is called the late Benjamin Norman, which means he had died within the previous 9–10 months. The widowed Mrs. Norman was described in 1845 as a dissenter living at the Dissenting Chapel (British and American Chapel) and engaged in the millinery trade (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 42). She may have been living there earlier, which would account for why her daughter Emily was buried from the house of the pastor, John Croumbie

Brown, in 1840. Mrs. Norman was very ill in 1842, according to Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, who reported that Mrs. Norman's little daughter was staying with the Gellibrands until her mother was better. The little daughter would have been Mary. (The letter, although dated only "August 17/29 from the Peterhoff Road," had to have been written in 1842 because in it Mrs. Gellibrand speaks to her father of two events that took place in 1842: (1) the strife between Archibald Mirrielees and her brother, Joseph Samuel Ropes, that led to the severing of ties with William Ropes and Company by the former; (2) the birth of the Ellerbys' daughter, Lucy).

A thorough investigation of sources in England about the Norman family in Russia shows that there is no clue to where the family came from in Britain that might have led to further information about births and deaths missing from registers and Foreign Office correspondence and seeming therefore not to have taken place in Russia. For example, there is no burial entry for the above Benjamin Norman in any record of the two British churches in St. Petersburg, so he may have died away from this city.

Benjamin and Eugenia (Reay) Norman had four known children: William Joseph (c. 1824 – 22 July [/ 3 August] 1882), Emily (c. 1833 – St. Petersburg 11 June [/ 23 June] 1840), Caroline Steen (St. Petersburg 3 December [/ 15 December] 1834 – St. Petersburg 2 June [/ 14 June] 1838) and Mary (b. St. Petersburg 15 July [/ 27 July] 1837). It is quite likely that the Elizabeth Norman who married Karl Ferdinand Hensell in St. Petersburg in 1855 and the Benjamin Norman who married Ellen Margaret Brown in St. Petersburg in 1859 are further children of Benjamin and Eugenia (Reay) Norman born between 1823 and 1832. A witness at both weddings was William J. Norman, who may have been brother to these two Normans. He himself married in St. Petersburg in 1853 (his wife was Jessie Bartels). Elizabeth and Benjamin were not baptized in a British church in St. Petersburg and neither were William Joseph and Emily. It could be that these four children were all baptized in a non-conformist church in Britain, but a search for them in the IGI and in a central index to non-conformist baptisms has proven fruitless. The evidence suggests that Benjamin and Eugenia (Reay) Norman left St. Petersburg fairly soon after their marriage in 1822 and that they returned before the end of 1834.

The first 437 baptisms (1840–1872) and the first 513 burials (1840–1886) of the British and American Congregational Church in St. Petersburg are unknown, because the church transcripts (registers) are missing. This omission almost certainly accounts for some gaps in the biographical information about the Normans. For example, it probably explains why the death and burial of Eugenia (Reay) Norman cannot be known and why the baptisms of some of her grandchildren are not known. Moreover, as her son, William Joseph, and probable children, Elizabeth and Benjamin, were not married until the 1850s, it does not seem possible that she could have been a grandmother at this time.

As a result, the Cadets who visited Mrs. Norman, their grandmother, cannot be identified, any more than can “the little Normans,” except possibly for Mary, Eugenia (Reay) Norman’s daughter, but we do not know her date of death.

The deceased Benjamin Norman had several siblings, including William (b. 10 May 1792 [OS]), Sarah (b. 10 November [OS] 1795) and Christiana (b. 27 August [OS] 1805). A wife of William could be a grandmother with cadet-aged children, but there is no record of his marriage because, after the registration of his birth, William disappeared from the records, along with his siblings.

For information about the British and American Congregational Church on Novo-Isaakievskaja Street in St. Petersburg, see Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sanket-Peterburga, vol. 3, p. 269.

482. Sunday was 9 June 1844.
483. “1840’s. (F.) A small mantle, deep at the back, with long scarf ends in front” (Cunnington, Cunnington, and Beard, Dictionary of English Costume, p. 132).
484. “Poplin” is “plain-woven fabric with a fine horizontal rib, produced by weaving with a warp thread finer than the weft ... originally made of silk and worsted” (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “poplin”).
485. In Luke 16:31, a rich man, who has died, seeing the dead beggar Lazarus in Abraham’s bosom and himself in torment, wishes to warn his living brothers of the torment awaiting them if they do not repent, but is told by Abraham: “If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead.”
486. This is the mortally ill Mary Gent Hirst, whose brother, Thomas Nelson Hirst, ran a private school in St. Petersburg.

487. Exodus 20:8–11: “<sup>8</sup> Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. <sup>9</sup> Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work: <sup>10</sup> But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: <sup>11</sup> For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it.”
488. Eugenia (Reay) Norman may have had one young daughter at this time: Mary Norman, born 15/27 July 1837 and baptized on 30 July / 11 August 1837 by William Glen (Transcripts of Non-Conformist Church Registers, 1818–1840, RG4/4605, NAUS). See Note 481 above.
489. The 42nd Psalm begins: “As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.” The 40th chapter of Isaiah begins: “Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God.”
490. This is William Miller (25 March 1809 – 10 October 1887), a Scottish merchant and honorary British vice-consul in St. Petersburg. For further information about him, see the biography of Deborah Delano (Whistler) Haden in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s.”
491. Francis Baird (28 February / 12 March 1802 – 13/25 March 1864; see Image 275) (PREC STP, nos. 1907, 7614), son of Charles Baird (1766–1843; see Image 274), had been educated at Edinburgh University and had joined his father’s business when seventeen. On his father’s death, he had inherited most of his fortune and had become sole proprietor of the metalworks. At this time, the firm was involved in the construction of St. Isaac’s Cathedral and the building of the Annunciation Bridge (see Images 119; 140–142) (John R. Bowles, “From the Banks of the Neva to the Shores of Lake Baikal: Some Enterprising Scots in Russia,” in The Caledonian Phalanx: Scots in Russia [Edinburgh: National Library of Scotland, 1987], pp. 69–75).
492. “Lake Ladoga lies between the government of St. Petersburg on the south, Olonetz on the east, and Viborg on the north and west. Its greatest length, from north to south, is one hundred and thirty miles; its average breadth is about seventy-five miles; and its area, six thousand three hundred square miles. It is the largest lake in Europe, and receives no fewer than sixty streams . . . It discharges

- itself at its southwestern extremity, by the Neva, which falls into the Baltic. It contains numerous islands, many of which are inhabited, and its shores are much indented, generally low, and send out so many shelving rocks into the water, as to make the navigation very dangerous” (Sears, Description of the Russian Empire, p. 37). Timothy Abraham Curtis was actively attempting to organize a trip to Lake Ladoga (see Image 404).
493. Maxwell had “secured a ticket and passage for the steamer of Saturday next [15 June]” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of Tuesday morning June 11 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36). On Friday, 14 June, he added a new entry to letter no. 36: “Yesterday morning I went out to Major Whistler and remained until this morning. I bid them all good bye, hoping to see them again ere I left forever. The Major came to town with me and will see me off to-morrow in the boat bound for Stettin” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 14 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).
494. William Bonamy Maingay (14 October 1819 – 26 August 1902) was the eldest child of William and Eliza (Lamb) Maingay. Starting in 1844, with the departure of his family permanently from Russia, he remained as the representative of his father. See Maingay in Appendix E and Image 260.
495. It has not been possible to locate this letter from Emma Maingay to Deborah Delano Whistler (Dasha).
496. It has not been possible to identify this estate.
497. John Stevenson Maxwell’s father, Hugh Maxwell (15 June 1787 – 31 March 1873), a lawyer, owned a country estate called Roslyn on the Hudson River at Nyack, New York. See Maxwell in Appendix E and Image 55.
498. A kopek was a brass coin, spelled “kopeika” and pronounced “kahpey’kuh.” It equaled one-hundredth of a ruble; a half-kopek was a brass coin, spelled “denezhka” and pronounced “dey’nyeezhkuh” (Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 53).
499. Anna Whistler uses a plural subject and verb here because she was thinking of Sophia Krehmer and Mrs. Nicol Baird’s daughter, Sophia, who also were on the steamer (John S. Maxwell to Major G.W. Whistler, Berlin, June 20, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). See Notes 81 and 82 above.

500. See Note 82 above. Maxwell wrote to Major Whistler: “On Sunday [16 June] the Captain pointed out the person of M<sup>rs</sup> Baird and I had the honor to present to that lady the letter of introduction from M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler” (John S. Maxwell to Major G.W. Whistler, Berlin, June 20, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers).
501. The reason for their departure from Russia was that the “daughter is in delicate health and the object of the mother now is to promote her strength by a visit for a few years to the mineral baths and waters of Germany” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Berlin, June 23, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 37). This daughter is Sophia, who had received an inheritance from her grandfather, Charles Baird (see Note 81 above).
502. See Note 81 above. Maxwell wrote to Major Whistler: “I found M<sup>rs</sup> B a most agreeable lady, and I think her eyes remarkably fine. The daughter is certainly tall and Miss Kramer very intelligent. All these ladies spoke in the highest terms of their delightful intercourse with your family and regret that any thing whatever should oblige them to part with such society - Need I say that this confirmed my good opinion of these ladies” (John S. Maxwell to Major G.W. Whistler, Berlin, June 20, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). He “secured rooms for M<sup>rs</sup> Baird and party in Berlin at the British Hotel, where he was also staying, and they went to art galleries and the theater together (John S. Maxwell to Major G.W. Whistler, Berlin, June 20, 1844). In the letter to his mother from Berlin, Mrs. Baird becomes “the black-eyed widow,” and he is much more playful in his remarks about her (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Berlin, June 23, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 37). At the end of June they parted company, Mrs. Baird going to Marienbad and Maxwell to Leipzig (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Toplitz, June 28, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 38).
503. Galatians 3:28: “There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus our Lord.”
504. For Anderson, see Note 460 above.
505. This is Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes. The Ropeses were staying with the Gellibrands, who were the Whistlers’ neighbors on the Peterhof Road.
506. Emma Woodbridge Palmer (24 November 1835 – 28 July 1912) was the daughter of Dr. George Edwin Palmer (see Image 36) of

- Stonington, Connecticut, and his first wife, Emma (Woodbridge) Palmer (28 February 1802 – 16 February 1839). She was Anna Whistler's step-niece. Her letter was enclosed with one from Catherine Julia McNeill (see Image 33) to Deborah Whistler (see Images 17–19, 21).
507. This is Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22), who would be returning to Stonington, Connecticut, after spending the winter with her son, Charles Johnston McNeill, in Florida.
  508. Mary Brennan must have gone on a visit somewhere. She appears in the entry for Wed. morning 23rd April (actually 24). She is not mentioned again until this entry of Tuesday, 25 June, when Anna Whistler records having received a letter from her perhaps a week before. She is mentioned as again being with the Whistlers on July 6 (entry for Wed [August] 7th [1844]. NYPL: AWPD, Part I).
  509. This is Katherine Prince (13 April 1820 – 19 November 1906), daughter of Susan (Travers) and John Dynely Prince of Lowell, Massachusetts.
  510. The feast of St. Barnabas the Apostle is celebrated on 11 June, which in 1844 was a Tuesday. Mr. Williams's epistle text was based on a quotation about Barnabas from Acts 11:24: "For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith: and much people was added unto the Lord." Barnabas, not one of the Twelve Apostles, was closely associated with the newly converted Paul (Robert Brownrigg, Who's Who in the New Testament, vol. 2 of Who's Who in the Bible [New York: Bonanza Books, 1980], pp. 39–40). Anna Whistler's entry was made on Tuesday, 25 June. By "last Sunday" she seems to mean 23 June, as she did not go to church on 16 June, and her attendance on 9 June is taken up in the entry of Monday 10 June.
  511. This is the mortally ill Mary Gent Hirst. See Hirst in Appendix E.
  512. Matthew 25:40: "And the King shall answer and say unto them, Verily I say unto you, Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."
  513. Mary Gent Hirst's only sister was Elizabeth (23 June 1800 – before June 1844). Her parents were William (bap. 14 October 1767 – 6 April 1822) and Ann (Nelson) Hirst (d. before June 1844) (SoG). See Hirst in Appendix E.
  514. Thomas Nelson Hirst (12 November 1794 – 22 May / 3 June 1863) ran a private school for boys in St. Petersburg in his home. See Hirst in Appendix E.

515. It has not been possible to obtain any information about Elona (pronounced “yeelaw’nuh”). This is an endearing form, along with many others, from the given name Elena (pronounced “yeeleh’nuh”) (N.A. Petrovskii, Slovar’ russkikh lichnykh imen [Dictionary of Russian Personal Names] [Moscow: Sovetskaia èntsiklopediia, 1966], pp. 108, 285).
516. The purpose of the Gospel Plan of Salvation is “to re-enthroned in the heart of man that principle, which reigned there before the fall in full supremacy, and in which his highest glory and happiness consisted – the love of God” for man (L. Bonnet, The Family of Bethany; or Meditations on the Eleventh Chapter of the Gospel According to St. John, translated “from the French, by the Translator of The Exile from Eden, etc. [William Hare],” introduction by Rev. Hugh White, 10th ed. [London: James Nisbet, 1844], p. 1).
517. Major Whistler left for Moscow on Thursday, 27 June 1844.
518. A “prog-canister” (or “prog-basket”) is a case or box for holding “prog,” which is colloquial term for “provisions for a journey or excursion,” or slang for food generally (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “prog”).
519. Anna Whistler’s cookbook contains three recipes for “plumb pudding,” one baked and two boiled (MacDonald, Whistler’s Mother’s Cook Book, pp. 78–81). All contain varying quantities of crumbs, milk, eggs, sugar, brandy, and spices, making the first “light-textured” and “not over-sweet”; the second “fairly rich, with a good fruity flavor”; and the third “fairly rich” and “semi-sweet.” All contain “fresh beef suet.” The presence of milk, eggs, sugar (bullock’s blood was used in the refining process), and animal fat caused Russians to refuse the plum pudding as a gift during Lent (Bowles, “Enterprising Scots in Russia,” p. 70).
520. This is Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel’nikov, Major Whistler’s colleague in charge of the Northern Administration of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway. See Mel’nikov in Appendix E and Image 247.
521. It has not been possible to locate this letter from Emma Maingay, which was delivered by her brother, William Bonamy Maingay (see Images 260, 263).
522. The phrase “lord of the creation” can be found in “The History of Tom” in The History of Jack and His Eleven Brothers: Displaying the Various Adventures They Encountered in Their Travels (London: T. Hughes, 1823), p. 63; first published in 1815 by J. Kendrew

- (London). Tom finds a wounded and dying blackbird and starts “to reflect on the wanton cruelty of man — man that proudly calls himself the lord of the creation.” Anna Whistler probably meant they felt the sheer physical power of being male.
523. The Gellibrands’ party had taken place on Wednesday, 26 June 1844.
524. The reference is to David Hume (Edinburgh 26 April 1711 – Edinburgh 25 August 1776), Scottish philosopher and historian; irreligious skeptic (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. “Hume, David [1711–1776]”).
525. The reference is to François-Marie Arouet de Voltaire (Paris 1694 – Paris 30 May 1778), French writer, historian and philosopher, atheist (Encyclopedia Britannica Online, s.v. “Voltaire,” accessed 5 October 2021, <https://www.britannica.com/biography/Voltaire>).
526. This is Dr. James Ronaldson Handyside (29 July 1798 – 11/23 December 1872), physician (PREC STP, no. 1220, p. 1000). The Gellibrands and Ropeses were his patients. Dr. Handyside’s flabby response seems to be an attempt to be placatory, while Mr. Williams, who “gave no quarter” in his sermons, remains immovable in his belief that success crowns the sincere effort that is accompanied by prayer and study of scripture.
527. Anna Whistler meant “Elijah.” See Note 425 above and the Dictionary of National Biography for further details of the biography of Rev. George Williams.
528. For the story of Elijah’s and Ahab’s sacrifices at Mount Carmel to determine whether the Lord or Baal be God, see 1 Kings 18.
529. The book on Syria does not seem to have been published. Anna Whistler may have meant the book on Jerusalem, which appeared in 1845. See Williams’s biography in Note 425, NYPL: AWP, Part I.
530. The city of Tula (pronounced “Too’luh”) was famous for its metalwork.
531. Friday was 28 June 1844.
532. Anna Whistler wrote to Katherine Prince and Catherine Julia McNeill (see Image 33), but not to Catherine (McNeill) Palmer and Maria (Cammann) McNeill, her sister and sister-in-law.

533. This is Joseph Samuel Ropes (6 February 1818 – 14 March 1903), brother of William Hooper Ropes. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Hall, Prince in Appendix E.
534. There were several roads to the village of Krasnoe Selo (pronounced “Kras’nuhyuh Sillaw”) (see Image 407). The name means “Beautiful, or, Red, Village.” The Krasnoe Selo Road to which Anna Whistler refers was a turnoff on the eleventh verst of the great Peterhof Road. Krasnoe Selo is located on an elevated spot formed by the Duderhof hills. At first glance, it resembles a district town rather than a village. It has a stone church named for the Holy Trinity and established during the reign of Catherine the Great, who had a summer palace built here. The palace on the Duderhof heights built by Nicholas I and resembling a large peasant hut is particularly remarkable. The peasants of Krasnoe Selo cultivate orchards on the slopes, which constitutes their main commercial endeavor. The Imperial Guard has encamped in Krasnoe Selo in summer since 1824. Their camp is usually set up on the slope of a hill opposite the village. At the foot of the hill is a rather extensive lake, while from the other side it is surrounded by brush and forest. The camp presents a charming picture. The cavalry usually sets itself up in the village, while the infantry camps in tents, which take up the entire space. The soldiers’ tents are set up in one line in three rows, at a certain distance. Behind and separated somewhat from them are the non-commissioned officers’ tents; then separated from them the staff officers’ tents; then the tent of the regimental commander, which is always in the midst of the regiment. The tents of the brigade commanders are in the midst of the brigade. Beyond them is the tent of the division general. Behind the tent of the regimental commander are placed the tents of his adjutants and, somewhat further off, tents for the chancery and musicians. In every regiment, in front of the battalions, at a distance of several sazhen, are the tents for the guards. All this gives Krasnoe Selo an unusual appearance and attracts the attention of the visitor (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, pp. 189-191; Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, pp. 192, 204, 312–313; Pylaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 430–431); see also BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journals, pt. 1, fols. 92–93. The Whistler party did not travel all the way to Krasnoe Selo; they simply took a ride along part of the road leading there.
535. Anna Whistler is referring to Count Mikhail Dmitrievich Buturlin (1807–1876; see Image 305). The surname is pronounced

- “Bootoor’lin.” In his autobiographical notes, Buturlin described his “wild living” (M.D. Buturlin, “Zapiski grafa M.D. Buturlina” [“Notes by Count M.D. Buturlin”], Russkii arkiv [Russian Archive] 5–8 (1897), p. 46) and revealed that Pushkin had told him that he was the prototype for Eugene Onegin.
536. Anna Whistler is referring to Count Sergei Grigorievich Stroganov (1794–1882), father of the young Count Stroganov the Whistlers had met on the lighter from Cronstadt in 1843. It has not been possible to establish the exact location of the Stroganov estate said to have been won from Buturlin. See Stroganov, Vasil’chikov, Kushelev in Appendix E.
537. The Cathedral of St. Isaac of Dalmatia (see Images 119–124) was in the process of being built on the square between Isaac Bridge and Blue Bridge (Sinii most), so called because of its color in olden times, when it was made of wood. Its construction was initiated by Catherine the Great in 1768 in memory of the birthday (30 May [OS]) of Peter the Great. The architect was Antonio Rinal’di (1709–1794). The work, marked by frequent interruptions, was completed “for the time being” in brick by order of Paul I (see Image 417) in 1800 and given a temporary roof with a cupola. The foundation of the cathedral, which was built by the architect Auguste Monferrand (1786–1858), was laid on 26 June (OS) 1818. “When the cathedral is completed it will number among the most magnificent and richest religious edifices in the world. All of its inside walls will be robed in Russian and foreign marble. The capitals and bases of the columns are bronze covered with gold leaf. The cupolas, surrounded by granite columns, are embellished with bronze sculptures. These five cupolas will be covered with gilded bronze leaves. Gigantic granite pillars support its porticos with their elegant bas reliefs. The interior is being decorated by the most important Russian artists. Divine service is at present being conducted in a temporary church in the Main Admiralty building” (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, pp. 494, 551; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 136–139). It was completed in 1858 (Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 1, pp. 105–109).
538. The reference here is to the gilded spire of the Church in the Peter and Paul Fortress (see Image 130). See the entry for Monday 27th of July [1846], NYPL: AWP, Part II, and accompanying Note 453 for a description of the church.

539. Mr. Joseph is Joseph Samuel Ropes. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
540. This is Carl Hedenschoug, Major Whistler's Swedish draftsman. See his biography in Appendix E.
541. Saturday was 29 June 1844.
542. Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1846, which has an extensive section about stores, does not list a grocer on Galernaia Street.
543. This is Margaret Gordon Hirst (c. 1809 – 22 March / 3 April 1891), whose husband, Thomas Nelson Hirst (12 November 1794 – 22 May / 3 June 1863) ran a private school in St. Petersburg. See Hirst in Appendix E.
544. This is Mary Gent Hirst (bap. 22 March 1797 – 23 July / 4 August 1844), sister-in-law to Margaret Gordon Hirst. See previous Note and Hirst in Appendix E.
545. This is Rev. George Williams (4 April 1814 – 26 January 1878), who was replacing Rev. Dr. Law at the English Church for the summer. See Note 425 above and the Dictionary of National Biography for his biography.
546. "The normal working season for earthworks was June 1 to December 1", although there were variations depending upon weather conditions and the number of workers available (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age 1842-1855, p. 194).
547. The Russian word for "country house" is spelled "dacha" and pronounced "dah'chuh."
548. Joseph Samuel Ropes and William Hooper Ropes's cousin from Boston was possibly Franklin Henry Hooper (bap. 7 July 1822 – 10 October 1847). He was issued passport number 1902 on 26 March 1844 (NAUS: Passports, M1371, roll 2, p. 16). See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
549. George Henry Prince (16 October 1821 – 25 April 1900) was first cousin to William Hooper Ropes and Joseph Samuel Ropes and, like them, employed by William Ropes and Company. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
550. He could not have been William Spurr Mirrielees (b. 1828/29, bap. By Mr. Knill 24 January 1829, d. January 1895), son of Archibald Mirrielees (7 September 1797 – 11 February 1877) and his first wife, Sarah Newbould (Spurr) Mirrielees (bap. Sheffield Cathedral 5 December 1805 – late 1835), who, it is almost certain, "was with his father in England throughout June & July 1844"

(Harvey Pitcher, Cromer, Norfolk, to E. Harden, 3 October 1994). On 18 June 1844, Jane Muir, who married Archibald Mirrielees in London on 21 July 1844, writes: “Mr M’s son Will<sup>m</sup> is 15 years old. Rather a nice boy. To be left at home to go through a college course” (Harvey Pitcher). Pitcher suggests instead that the likely remaining choice is one of Archibald Mirrielees’s nephews: possibly William or John, his brother James’s sons; or possibly William Phillip, his brother William’s son. All three boys are known to have been in Russia (Harvey Pitcher). For more detailed information on the Mirrielees family, see Harvey Pitcher’s Russian and English editions of the history of the Muir and Mirrielees department store: Muir i Meriliz Shotlandtsy v Rossii [Muir and Mirrielees: Scotsmen in Russia] (Moscow: Moskovskii rabochii, 1993) and Muir and Mirrielees: The Scottish Partnership That Became a Household Name in Russia, (Cromer, UK: Swallow House Books, 1994); see also Images 268–269.

551. The Mr. Ropes referred to here seems to be William Hooper Ropes. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
552. Sir William Allan (4 October 1782 – 22 February 1850; see Image 320), Scottish portrait and history painter and President of the Scottish Royal Academy, visited the Whistlers on Saturday, 29 June 1844. The above death date is given on Allan’s testament, which is at the Scottish Record Office (SRO) (SC 70/4/9) in Edinburgh. He was brought to the Whistler dacha by William Miller, honorary British vice-consul in St. Petersburg. For Miller, see the biography of Deborah Delano (Whistler) Haden in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s.”
553. See Note 462 above. By “chapel,” Anna Whistler means the Cathedral of the Lifegiving Trinity, in which the miracle-working icon of St. Sergius is displayed. The name of the saint is spelled “Sergei” and pronounced “Seergay’.” Anna Whistler rendered it as “Seergay” and “Sairgay.”
554. A “Scotch bun,” also called a “black bun,” is a “spiced plum cake with pastry crust, traditionally eaten in Scotland at Hogmanay (New Year’s Eve)” (D.A. Bender, A Dictionary of Food and Nutrition, 3rd ed. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2009], s.v. “Scotch bun”).
555. Anna Whistler was referring to 1829–1830, when she wrote to Mr. Gamble: “my memories of that my Fatherland are of a bright summer spent with friends near Edinburg in my youth without a cloud! their cottage was at Wardie nigh New Haven, I spent a week at Stirling with friends there, & went to Dumfirmlin too” (Anna Whistler to my very dear friend, [London] Sunday, June 12, 1864, GUL: Whistler Collection, W519).

Wardie was a “suburb of Edinburgh, ly[ing] between Inverleith and Granton, 2 miles ... north of the city centre (David Munro and Bruce Gittings, Royal Scottish Geographical Society, Scotland: An Encyclopedia of Places and Landscapes [Glasgow: Collins, 2006], p. 475). Newhaven, “a district of northern Edinburgh ... was founded in 1500 by James IV as a royal dockyard ... photographers David Hill (1802–1870) and Robert Adamson (1821–1848) made a unique record of the Newhaven fisherfolk in 1843, one of the first uses of photography in the field of social history” (Munro and Gittings, p. 356).

“Stirling[, which] became an important settlement because it is the lowest crossing place over the River Forth [was] a wool producing area, and even small ships could utilize the port from the Forth.” The Industrial Revolution largely by-passed it, but “the traditional wool weaving industry continued.” It also had a “carpet weaving industry.” By 1821, its population was about seven thousand. In 1829, when Anna Whistler visited Scotland, there was no railroad, but “in 1840 Stirling was linked up to the Caledonian rail network, [running] through southern Scotland” (“City of Stirling,” Crann Tara [website], accessed June 4, 2020 <https://cranntara.scot/tourst.htm>).

“Dunfermline was a burgh town in western Fife ... situated 4 miles ... northwest of the Forth Road and Rail bridges ... The town’s economic fortunes were revived during the 18th and 19th centuries with the development of the textile industry, producing linen, cotton, woollen and damask goods” (Munro and Gittings, Scotland, p. 374).

556. The Russian word for “peasant” is spelled “muzhik” and pronounced “moozhik’.” For the plural, Anna Whistler added the English plural suffix -s.
557. This painting, considered lost, has an interesting history. Sometime on or before 17/29 August 1844, Allan wrote a note to Count Aleksei Fyodorovich Orlov (1786–1861; see Image 312), in which he must have mentioned that Emperor Nicholas I, while Grand Duke, had, on a visit to an exhibition of Allan’s works in Edinburgh in 1817, spoken at length with him and “expressed his wish that if ever Allan re-visited Russia, he would wait on him” (“Visit of the Russian Prince Nicholas to Edinburgh,” The Scots Magazine 79 (1817): p. 74), for Orlov responded: “He remembers you perfectly, Sir, and several works that he owes to your talent and that are to be found up to now in the Anichkov Palace” (Comte Orloff, Strelna, le 17 Aout [OS] 1844, Ms. 6294, fol. 121r, National Library of Scotland [NLS], Edinburgh). Allan clearly also spoke of his picture, which he wished to show the emperor, for Orlov further responded, “He would view your picture with pleasure, if you would bring it with you next Sunday to Peterhof at 10 am.” The proposal was being made by the emperor on the understanding that transporting the painting to Peterhof would not harm it.

On Sunday, 20 August / 1 September 1844, “at the conclusion of the liturgy His Majesty went to the Great Palace and received the report of the Minister of the Court, Prince Petr Mikhailovich Volkonskii (1776–1852), after which the latter presented Mr. Allan and his picture in the picture room” (RGIA: Fond 516, op. 28/1618, d. 153, 1844. Zhurnal Vysochaishego Dvora, po polovine Gosudaria Imperatora Nikolaia Pavlovicha [Journal of the Imperial Court for the Apartments of His Majesty Emperor Nikolai Pavlovich for 1844], fols. 434 r and v; this document is also known as Kamer-fur’erskii zhurnal [Chamberlain’s Journal] and denoted hereafter as RGIA: Kamer-fur’erskii zhurnal).

One assumes that the picture Allan had with him was the partially completed painting of Peter the Great Teaching His Subjects the Art of Shipbuilding. The painting was finished in 1845 in London and exhibited at the Royal Academy that same year. A reviewer said of it “the visitor is mocked full-face by . . . a piece characterless, feeble and unworthy of a place of distinction” (“Fine Arts: Royal Academy,” The Atheneum (May 10, 1845): p. 466). The picture was then sent to St. Petersburg, and in his letter to Prince Volkonskii Allan requested the sum of £250 for it (Elizaveta Renne, “British Artists in Russia in the First Half of the Nineteenth Century,” in British Art Treasures from Russian Imperial Collections in the Hermitage, ed. B. Allen and L. Dukelskaya [New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1996], p. 110). E. Renne is curator of British and Scandinavian Painting at the Hermitage.

Already in January 1846, however, when asked by the Chancellory of the Ministry of the Palace of the whereabouts of the picture, Frants Ivanovich Labenskii (1770–1849), the curator of the Hermitage, replied that “nothing is known to him of where it is now” (Renne, “British Artists,” p. 110). Continuing lack of knowledge of its location is reconfirmed in Renne’s article (Renne, p. 110).

The question has also been raised as to whether the picture ever arrived in St. Petersburg. Through their correspondence in 1971 with Larissa Dukelskaia of the Hermitage, David and Francina Irwin received information that it was “exhibited at the Royal Academy” and then “shipped to St. Petersburg, but there are no documents concerning its arrival, nor any trace of it having been hung in the Winter Palace” (David Irwin and Francina Irwin, Scottish Painters at Home and Abroad 1700-1900 [London: Faber and Faber, 1975], pp. 274, 436n85). There is, however, a document concerning its arrival, although the title of the picture is not mentioned. The document is a letter to Allan from Charles Moberly, the Russia Company’s agent at St. Petersburg, dated 26 March 1846 (C. Moberly to Sir William Allan, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1846, NLS: Ms 6294, fols. 131r and v). Moberly had received a letter from Allan, obviously about payment for the picture. He had held on to the letter because the emperor was away and expected back soon, and, when Count Orlov returned, sent it to him. Moberly wrote: “The picture was in his Majesty’s cabinet, upon the Count’s asking if any return had been sent, the E. said that he did not know what you had written to Prince Volkonsky, for whom there was a letter waiting his return” (C. Moberly to Sir William Allan, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1846, NLS: Ms 6294, fol. 131r). A friend of Moberly’s who saw Count Orlov every day had written to Moberly: “He has informed me that the Emperor would make sure to tell him that he should give his department an order to make payment to Sir Allan of the price of his picture” (C. Moberly to Sir William Allan, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1846, NLS: Ms 6294, fol. 131r). Moberly expected that Allan would be hearing about payment from the Russian Mission in London soon (C. Moberly to Sir William Allan, St. Petersburg, March 26, 1846, NLS: Ms 6294, fol. 131v). To date, it has not been possible to find a copy of a note about payment among documents from the Russian Mission in London at the Public Record Office. Count A.F. Orlov succeeded to the post of head of the Corps of Gendarmes and of the Third Section (Security Police) on the death of Benkendorf later in 1844.

558. See the biography of James Whistler in “The Whistlers as They Were in the 1840s.”
559. A “phaeton” is a “light, four-wheeled, open carriage, usually drawn by a pair of horses, and with one or two seats facing forward” (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “phaeton”).

560. Mr. Williams's text on Sunday, 30 June 1844, was Romans 15:2: "Let every one of us please his neighbor for his good to edification."
561. On Sunday, 16 June 1844, Mr. Williams's text had been Galatians 1:10: "For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ."
562. A "calash" is a "light carriage with low wheels, having a removable folding hood or top" (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. "calash").
563. The date of the launch (4 July) must have been only tentative. See Note 603 below.
564. Timothy Abraham Curtis, also referred to in this entry as Mr. C., came to the Whistler dacha for tea on Monday, 1 July 1844.
565. Corroborating Timothy Abraham Curtis, Maxwell wrote on 5 June:

The departure of the Empress has been postponed by a very melancholy occurrence. The young and beautiful Grand Duchess Alexandra, whose betrothal and marriage I described in my letters last winter has gone into a sudden decline and her life is now despaired of. She was ~~only~~ on the occasion of her marriage, remarkable both for health and beauty, and her loss will affect the spirits of the Imperial family very much. It is even rumored that the Emperor has been sent for and thus will be ended all the projects of foreign travel for a long while. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 5 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36)

Nicholas I had departed St. Petersburg for England on 12/24 May 1844. Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna had been examined by Dr. Martin von Mandt, the emperor's personal physician, on 15/27 May 1844, with a diagnosis of tuberculosis. The emperor had gone from England to Holland to visit his sister, Grand Duchess Anna Pavlovna (1795–1865), consort of King Willem II (1792–1849). He arrived at The Hague on 10 June, where Mandt was waiting to inform him of the serious nature of his youngest daughter's illness. The emperor left The Hague the following day for home (Oluf Lundt Bang, Lins Minder [Memories of Life], ed. Vilhelm Maar [Copenhagen: Nyt Nordisk Forlag Arnold Busck, 1929], p. 245). I wish to thank Hanne Quillévére of Victoria, British Columbia, for translating passages in Bang's autobiography pertinent to the illness and death of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna.

566. Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (see Images 434, 444, 451) suspected that her husband was inclined to seek amusement among his social inferiors. She had been planning to foster his moral and spiritual development by reading Plutarch with him in the hope that the example of noble-minded husbands would help him (Son innosti, p. 160). Oluf Lundt Bang (1788–1877; see Image 485), the Danish physician who was brought in at the request of the Prince of Hesse-Kassel (see Image 435) to, hopefully, cure Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, but who corroborated Mandt's diagnosis, recorded the young couple's predicament: The governess, Miss Higginbotham, "asked me one day if I couldn't see to it that the Prince not spend the whole day reading novels aloud to his consort. I spoke to the Grand Duchess about this, and she confessed that it would be better if he had some diversions. This led to a conversation about husbands who have nothing to do, and she asked me to speak to the Emperor about it. The Emperor answered that the Grand Duchess would have to decide this together with her husband, who himself would like some freedom, but didn't dare take it because of public (in Russia?) opinion. He could scarcely go riding for an hour or so before he was blamed for having left his sick wife" (Bang, Levs Minder, p. 303).
567. This was the wedding of Joseph Senior Kirk and Charlotte Elizabeth Petersen, who "were married by banns at their residence Tsarscocelo, and in the presence of His Excellency Col. Todd, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Court of Russia, on this the twenty second day O.S. of June and the fourth day of July N.S., in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and forty four by me, Thomas Scales Ellerby, Minister of the British & American Chapel" (Returns of Marriages (with an Index). British and American Congregational Church at St. Petersburg. 1844-1886, RG 33/145, PRO). Joseph Senior Kirk was the Principal Manager at the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works.

The invitation to the Whistlers is not extant. The extant invitation to Andrew M. Eastwick reads as follows:

Mr. and Mrs. Petersen respectfully solicit the company of Mr. A.M. Eastwick at the marriage of their daughter Charlotte Elizabeth to Mr. Joseph S. Kirk, Engineer, at 7 o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday the 22 of June at Tsarskoe Selo, at the residence of His Excellency Colonel Todd, American Ambassador – and on Sunday the 25th at 7 o'clock in the afternoon, at their own residence – W.O. 7th Line No. 61 in the house of Babkoff. St. Petersburg the 16th of June 1844. (Invitation to A.M. Eastwick to the Kirk–Petersen Wedding, Eastwick Letters)

The dates given are Old Style. The New Style dates were Thursday, 4 July, and Sunday, 7 July. “W.O.” means Vasilievskii Island. Anna Whistler and the children did not attend, because Major Whistler was away.

Andrew Eastwick and his son, Edward (see Images 233, 235), attended. Andrew Eastwick described the wedding in a letter to his wife, Lydia Ann (see Image 234):

At four o'clock ... we took droshkies and proceeded to town where we took the railroad cars for Tsarskoye Selo where we arrived about 6½ o'clock. The bride and groom with their attendants had taken an earlier train and were at the minister's ready to receive us. Upon entering the house we were cordially welcomed by our worthy minister, Colonel Todd, and handed into a room where the wedding party assembled. We were introduced to company and after the usual compliments and salutations the ladies again became seated and the gentlemen all remained standing conversing with one another passing the compliments of the day. The ladies were all richly dressed, plain and nothing gaudy. In a few minutes it was whispered that the parson was in the adjoining room, when the servants entered and arranged for armchairs on one side of the room when the bridesmaid and groomman handed the conspicuous two to their seats and took the chairs on each side. All was quiet and for a few minutes we stood gazing in the face of the beautiful bride and admiring the neatness of the bridegroom, when the door of the adjoining apartment opened and the gentleman with the black robe entered with a solemn step and advanced to a table in the middle of the room. The company all rose and the interesting two with their attendants advanced to the table and the ceremony gone through with and all was pronounced okay!

The groom then saluted his bride and salutations of all their families followed; we all then advanced and took the bride's hand and wished her much joy but none of the gentlemen saluted her with a kiss. I thought this was not altogether right, for I felt as though I would like to have a smack at her. I accordingly walked quietly over to where she was seated and gave her one of the slickest kisses that she had had and told her that it was the fashion of our country for all hands to kiss the bride but I guessed the rest of the gentlemen were too bashful. She smiled and put up her pretty little lips and such a smack you never heard.

The wine was now brought in and we all drank the health of the bride and groom in German style, by touching our glasses together before drinking. Shortly after we got through with this, supper was announced and we proceeded to the dining room where we found a table beautifully set off. Everything was of the best, but all cold. We did not set down to the table. We stood around and were beautifully helped. Our glasses were all filled with good old Madasa [sic: Madeira] when we nodded and drank to each other. We had not, however, got fairly going; they were all entirely too quiet. The servants, however, soon brought in the champagne and I proposed a toast which livened them up considerably. Then another and another followed until we got on a pretty high horse and you may depend upon it; we celebrated both the wedding and the Fourth of July. The Emperor's and the President's health and the health of Mr. Eastwick and his family were drank with three cheers.

We kept it going until near eleven o'clock when we had to get ready for the last train of cars. We found we had not much time to spare but would have to be moving sharply or we should be left. Droshkies were ordered to the door where every man seemed to look out for himself. The bride and groom were the last or rather among the last to get into a carriage and the consequence was that they were too late. The train was just leaving as they reached the depot ... I was fortunate enough to be on time. The party that was left, when they found that there was no help for them quietly drove back to Colonel Todd's and kept it up nearly all night. I, however, was very glad that I got off or I should have been used up. Everything went off in fine style and all were highly gratified. (Andrew Eastwick to Lydia Eastwick, St. Petersburg, entry for July 5th, 1844, in letter of July 3rd, 1844, Eastwick Letters)

Maxwell was then out of the country, but was told about the wedding on his return. His comments contained the usual barb aimed at Colonel Todd: “The Colonel has a good heart, is very kind and hospitable, and even condescended to have the wedding of the young Mechanic who had difficulty about his marriage in the spring, celebrated at his house in Sarskoe Celo, on the 4 July, and under the auspices of the Embassy. The Champaigne flowed and the company I am told had a great deal of fun, enjoying at one and the same time, the hospitality and ridiculous conduct of his Excellency—” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).

568. It has not been possible to locate this note, which Anna Whistler received on Tuesday, July 2, 1844, and recorded on Thursday, July 4, 1844.
569. Anna Whistler omitted the word “other” here.
570. William Hickling Prescott (Salem, MA 4 May 1796 – 28 January 1859) graduated from Harvard in 1814. He had lost the sight of his left eye in an accident there and was forced to give up reading law because his right eye began to fail. After visiting his grandfather in the Azores, he returned home in 1817 and became a writer, a vocation his wealth enabled him to pursue despite his disability, because he could hire readers and research assistants. His first article appeared in 1821 in the North American Review. From 1829 to 1836, he worked on the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella the Catholic, which was published in 1838 and received praise from historians worldwide. His History of the Conquest of Mexico was published in 1843, followed by the History of the Conquest of Peru in 1847. The History of the Reign of Philip II (1855–58) was unfinished when Prescott died. “Prescott was more interested in action than in theory. He delighted in thrilling narrative and vivid descriptions; unlike other great historians, he expounded no philosophy of history. He wrote primarily for the reader’s enjoyment, without ever thinking of himself as a serious historian” (Max J. Hertzberg, The Reader’s Encyclopedia of American Literature [New York: Crowell, 1962], pp. 918–919). These qualities are what made Anna Whistler say that History of the Conquest of Mexico was “quite like romance.”
571. The Gellibrands and Ropeses took tea with the Whistlers on Tuesday, 2 July 1844.
572. This is Maxwell’s letter of 20 June 1844, in which he speaks of Mrs. Baird (the young widow), Wheaton, Nessel’rode, Rives, Ledyard, Hamilton, Fay, George Jones, and his tours of Berlin and Potsdam, and inquires about a Russian damsel of his acquaintance (John S. Maxwell to Major Whistler, Berlin, 20 June 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers).

573. It has not been possible to locate this letter, which Maxwell tells his mother, Agnes (Stevenson) Maxwell (see Image 54), he will “enclose ... to Major Whistler ... for his lady” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Berlin, June 23, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 37).
574. It has not been possible to identify the old German Baron in the interior.
575. The future (1814) Russian Bible Society (RBS) was inaugurated as the St. Petersburg Bible Society on 11/23 January 1813, its establishment having been approved by Alexander I in December 1812 (Judith Cohen Zacek, “The Russian Bible Society and the Russian Orthodox Church,” Church History 35, no. 4 (1966): p. 414). Its initial mandate “to spread the Bible only among the non-Orthodox inhabitants of the Empire” (Zacek, p. 414) was extended to include supplying Bibles to Russians as well (Zacek, p. 415). Eventually, “through the Holy Synod the [Orthodox] Church actively began to participate in the work of the Society” (Zacek, p. 415). In 1816, the RBS undertook “the first translation of the Holy Scriptures into modern Russian” (Zacek, p. 416). “The complete New Testament in modern Russian was ... published ... in 1821” (Zacek, p. 417), accompanied by the Church Slavonic text, which, however, could be understood by only a small portion of the population (p. 416). In 1822–1823 “a modern Russian New Testament without the parallel Slavonic text” appeared (Zacek, p. 417), making the edition less cumbersome in size and less heavy (thus easier for soldiers to carry with them) and cheaper (Zacek, pp. 417, 418). Within a short time, the RBS extended over all of Russia, becoming “an interdenominational union of all Christian faiths” and embracing all social classes (Zacek, p. 418).

But it “had encountered ... opposition from its very establishment” (p. 426) from individual Russians and from the Russian Orthodox Church. Eventually this opposition became political as well as ecclesiastical, and, although Alexander I refused for a long time to abolish the RBS, in 1824 he removed Prince Alexander Golitsyn as Minister of Ecclesiastical Affairs and Public Instruction and abolished the Ministry itself, an act that placed “the affairs of the Orthodox Church once again under the separate administration of an autonomous Holy Synod” (Zacek, p. 431). Golitsyn, who had been President of the RBS since its establishment as the St. Petersburg Bible Society, resigned his post and was replaced by Metropolitan Serafim (Zacek, p. 432). The Orthodox clergy alone now had the right to engage in missionary activity and “to distribute the Scriptures which had been translated and published by the R.B.S.” (Zacek, p. 433). The Church also “called for an end to the translation of the Scriptures into modern Russian” (Zacek, p. 434). Alexander I refused (Zacek, p. 434). The RBS was identified by its enemies as being affiliated “with the now-suppressed Masons and English Methodists,” and it was said that “[the] principle of publishing Scriptures without note or comment” left the individual “to interpret Scriptures on his own,” “making him fall into heresy or indifference” (Zacek, p. 434). Arguments against the freedom to interpret the Scriptures were extended to the pernicious effect this had on the peasants, who had become disrespectful and even opposed to the Church (Zacek, p. 434). Alexander I continued to refuse to abolish the RBS (Zacek, p. 435). He died in November 1825, and his successor, Nicholas I, was not “interested in the fate of the R.B.S., whose operations by this time had all but ceased” (Zacek, p. 435). When the same arguments against the RBS were made to him, he acted and in April 1826 “commanded ... [the] President of the Russian Bible Society to suspend all operations both of the central and local societies” (Zacek, p. 436). In 1831, the emperor sanctioned the establishment of “a new Protestant Bible Society in St. Petersburg,” whose “activities were strictly limited to the Protestant population” (Zacek, p. 436). Throughout his reign, “the higher Church administration continued to oppose the further translation of Scriptures into modern Russian” (Zacek, p. 436). Such a translation was not made until the reign of his son, Alexander II (Zacek, p. 436). This information about the Bible Society in Russia must have been related to Anna Whistler by her friends now active in the distribution of religious tracts: Mary and William Clarke Gellibrand, Joseph Samuel Ropes, Mary and Thomas Ellerby (see Note 577 below). See also George Browne, The History of the British and Foreign Bible Society, From Its Institution in 1804, to the Close of Its Jubilee in 1854, 2 vols. (London: [British and Foreign Bible Society], 1859). For a biography of Prince Aleksandr Nikolaevich Golitsyn, see E.P. Karnovich, Zamechatel'nye i zagadochnye lichnosti XVIII i XIX stoletii s 13-iu graviurami [Remarkable and Enigmatic Personages of the 18th and 19th Centuries, with 13 Engravings], 2nd ed. (St. Petersburg : A.S. Suvorin, 1893, pp. 397–463).

576. It has not been possible to find any information about the Gellibrands' servant, Alexa, who could be a man or a woman. Aleksa, Aleksia, and Leksa are endearing forms for both Aleksandr and Aleksandra, as well as for Aleksei (Petrovskii, Slovar' russkikh lichnykh imen, pp. 44, 45). See Note 577 for confirmation that this servant had to be a man.
577. The Annual Reports of the Religious Tract Society for 1843–1849 (hereafter, Annual Report) parallel many of Anna Whistler's statements. Her information must have come from Religious Tract Society members such as William Clarke Gellibrand, Joseph Samuel Ropes, and Rev. Thomas Scales Ellerby, some of whom sent communications to London that were quoted in the Annual Reports. For example, the 44th report (Annual Report for 1843) states that the “nobility are taking an interest in the religious welfare of their peasantry, and give to them many of the works which have been published” (p. 75). Pilgrims in the possession of tracts said they could “obtain a night's lodging and food for a tract” (p. 75). Without tracts, they had “to pay ... three times as much in money” (p. 75). Peasants who were literate read the tracts aloud to groups of other peasants in their villages (Annual Report for 1849, p. 77). Superior officers of sailors were “happy of the favourable change” in those of their men who “read the Scriptures, and other good books” (p. 78–79). Sometimes a group seeking tracts was so large that it “was impossible to go among them, for they would have thrown a man down”; therefore, the distributors tossed tracts to them from the windows of a house (p. 78). A similar episode with soldiers in the diaries threatened to call a halt to further distribution. Anna Whistler and her sons also pitched their tracts at some idle young men from a distance. The Annual Report for 1844 contains an interesting account of enquiries for tracts made by soldiers going home on furlough or being discharged from the army, “so that the word of God [was] now being borne up and down in some hundred knapsacks, to the nearest as well as to the farthest governments” (pp. 79–81).
578. Anna Whistler is referring to Wednesday, 3 July 1844, when she and Debo were reading aloud Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico (see Note 570 above).
579. It is in the hundred of Blackheath that Woolwich is located and that Wellesley House, the home of the Maingay family, was to be found (Pigot and Co.'s Royal, National and Commercial Directory and Topography of the Counties of Kent, Surrey and Sussex [London: Pigot, 1840], s.v. “Woolwich with the villages of Charlton, Plumstead, Shooter's Hill and neighbourhoods" [hereafter, Pigot's Directory of Kent and the year].

580. This is probably Henrietta Maria Law (St. Petersburg 25 October / 6 November 1822 – 18 November 1892), who later married Francis Anderson. There are two entries for their marriage in the OPRS. Before marriage, Henrietta was a resident of the parish of South Leith (a northern suburb of Edinburgh) and Francis was a resident of the parish of St. George, Edinburgh. On 17 October 1848, they married at St. John's Episcopal Chapel, Edinburgh, and the record of this appears in the OPRS for South Leith. On 24 October 1848, they were again married by the same man, E.B. Ramsay, presumably in the church of St. George, and this entry appears in the OPRS for Edinburgh. E.B. Ramsay was the minister of St. John's Episcopal Chapel, Edinburgh, from 1830 to 1872.
581. Anna Whistler seems to be assigning a telling name to the Andersons' poor cousin, as it has not been possible to find a character in English literature named Becky Dugude on whom it can be based.
582. This is "a dangerous modification of what, in England, is called the swinging-board, and which consists in balancing a long board across a round and stout cylinder of wood or a tree, when two persons, generally young women, ... place themselves one at each end, and by certain movements raise each other alternately, but so quickly, and so effectually, that either party is by turns thrown upwards some feet from the board, and comes down upon part of it with so much increased impetus and weight, that the elevation of each person is thereby considerably augmented with a corresponding increase of risk of mutually breaking their necks" (Granville, St. Petersburg, vol. 2, p. 397). Anna Whistler proposed that Deborah Delano Whistler describe the "gee joggle" (see Image 355) when she wrote to her first cousin, Catherine Julia McNeill (see Image 33), in Stonington.
583. James was influenced by his father's Swedish draftsman, Hedenschoug, to read the biography of Charles XII (1682–1718), King of Sweden, who lost the Seven Years War to Peter the Great and died in battle. It became part of his program of reading in English to his mother in order not to forget his native language. I assume he was reading an English translation of Voltaire's Histoire de Charles XII (1731). English translations had been made by, among others, Tobias Smollett (1721–1771) (Tobias Smollett, trans., The History of Charles the Twelfth, King of Sweden; and Peter the - Great, Emperor of Russia*, by Voltaire [London: Walker and Edwards, 1817]).

584. Transport Engineer Lt. Colonel Thomas Drury Jr. (21 September [OS] 1801 – 8 August [OS] 1893) was the son of Susannah (Walker) Drury and Thomas Drury Sr. (RGIA: Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 1. Register British Factory Chapel St. Petersburg [1763–1812], no. 1883; PREC STP, no. 920).
585. “Scharchinka” is Anna Whistler’s pronunciation of the diminutive and endearing form for Aleksandr, spelled “Sashenka” and pronounced “Sah’shinkuh”; “Vaascha” is her pronunciation of the diminutive and endearing form for Vasilii (William), spelled “Vasya” and pronounced “Vah’syuh.” Alexander, about five years old, and William, about six years old, were the sons of Transport Engineer Lt. Colonel Thomas Drury Jr. and Caroline (Bajinsky) Drury (PREC STP, no. 5910; RGIA: Fond 207, op. 14, d. 42. Formulirnyi spisok o sluzhbe i dostoinstve Korpusa Inzhenerov P. S. Podpolkovnika Drury za 1841 g. [Service and merit record of Transport Engineer Lt. Colonel Drury for 1841]).
586. John Randolph of Roanoke’ (Prince George County, VA 2 June 1773 –Philadelphia, PA 24 May 1833; see Image 282), “who was the U.S. Minister here under Jackson, who was eccentric—the Russians thought insane. thus writes home his impressions of St. Petersburg in summer... ‘Never have I seen so many, and such severe cases of summer disease ... I have written thus far, interrupted every ~~five~~ quarter of a minute, by innumerable flies, gigantic as the Empire they inhabit, which attack the face in all its vulnerable points—nose, mouth, ears, and eyes under cover of spectacles. This is the land of Pharaoh and his plagues. It is Egypt in all but fertility. The extremes of human misery and splendor here meet” (BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 1, fols. 8, 9).
587. This is Vil’gel’m Ivanovich Truveller (Frederick William Trewheeler) and his second wife, Maria Vladimirovna (Kozliakinova, or Kozlianova) Truveller (Trewheeler). See Notes 124 and 192 above.
588. The reference is to Charlotte Adams (Sanford) Barnes (c. 1807 – 12 December 1875), wife (married in 1832) of James Barnes (4 May 1807 – 12 February 1869), USMA Class of 1829, chief engineer and superintendent of the Western (Massachusetts) Railroad, 1842–1848 (George W. Cullum, Biographical Register of the Officers and Graduates of the United States Military Academy at West Point, New York, from its Establishment, March 16, 1802, to the Army

Re-Organization of 1866–67, 2 vols. [New York: D. Van Nostrand, 1868], vol. 1, p. 423; Springfield Daily Republican, December 13, 1875, p. 6 and February 13, 1869, p. 8; New York Herald, February 13, 1869, p. 32). The Barnes family lived in Springfield, Massachusetts, where the Whistlers had lived from 1838 to 1842. In his autobiography, the Barneses' son, John Sanford Barnes, says that Deborah (Whistler) Haden "kept up a correspondence with [his] mother" until the latter's death (John Sanford Barnes, The Egotistigraphy of a Rolling Stone, that Gathered Moss, Herein Scraped off for the Information and Amusement of His Family, "privately published, edition limited to this one copy, New York, January 1, 1910," p. 7, N-YHS). The whereabouts of these letters are unknown to me.

589. The Whistlers attended vespers at the Cathedral of the Lifegiving Trinity in the monastery, as Anna Whistler records seeing "a beautiful Altar peice ... a painting of the Trinity." The painting was executed by Karl Pavlovich Briullov (1799–1852; see Image 173) in 1840. The five-domed Trinity Cathedral, built by Rastrelli, was begun in 1756 and completed in 1760. The cathedral chapels were consecrated in 1761, the main church in 1763. The right chapel was consecrated in honor of the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and the left in honor of St. Zaccharias and St. Elizabeth. In 1840, after the renovation of the entire cathedral, the left chapel, which had been closed for several years, was consecrated anew, this time as the Chapel of the Beheading of St. John the Baptist. The monastery's most important sacred object was kept in Trinity Cathedral in summer: the icon of St. Sergius of Radonezh, the Miracleworker. As a result, a large number of ardent pilgrims of all ages and classes would come almost every day in this season from St. Petersburg in veneration of the icon. According to legend, the icon was painted on the saint's coffin board and brought here by the monastery's founder from the Trinity-Sergius Monastery near Moscow. There is a cross on the icon with a piece of the holy relic of St. Sergius, given to the monastery by A.N. Muraviev (1792–1863), a famous traveler to holy places. The Cathedral was small – four and a half sazhen long and wide – and held only 600 people. Religious services were held in it only in summer, as it had no stoves (Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 197–198; Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1994, p. 170; Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1839, pt. 1, p. 154; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 1, pp. 54–55).

The Briullov painting was still in the church around 1889 (the date of publication of Pyliaev's book cited above). E. Atsarkina, who says in her 1963 monograph on Briullov that the painting is mentioned in Somov's list and in the annual report of the Academy of Fine Arts for 1839–1840 by A.N. Mokritskii and V.V. Stasov, gives its location as “unknown” (Atsarkina, Briullov, p. 356).

The icon-covered screen referred to is the iconostasis, which separates the nave from the sanctuary. The “gilded doors of the screen” are the Royal Doors, which “are constructed of two panels located at the center of the iconostasis, and connect the nave with the sanctuary. They are called ‘royal’ because it is believed that... Christ ... is carried through them in the form of the eucharist. The symbolic meaning of the gates, and of all the images upon them, is closely associated with the perception of the sanctuary as an image of the spiritual world. This symbolism is apparent during the liturgy. The opening of the Royal Doors signifies the opening of the Heavenly Kingdom for believers. The closing of the doors reminds them of the eviction from the Garden of Eden after the Fall” (Roderick Grierson, ed., Gates of Mystery: The Art of Holy Russia [Milan: Intercultura, 1993], p. 96). Only the officiating clergy may enter the sanctuary, where the liturgy is performed. The Annunciation is always depicted on the Royal Doors (the Archangel Gabriel on the left door, Mary on the right door), because it “is understood as the beginning of the Incarnation” (p. 96). Mary's acceptance “of the news of her miraculous conception” is interpreted as being “a penance for the Fall of humanity” (p. 96). She is “the new Eve,” who “redeems the Fall of the first Eve and begins our return to union with God” (p. 96). Also depicted on these Royal Doors are the four Evangelists: Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, “who brought the news of the life of Christ” (p. 98).

The “unknown tongue” of the service is Old Church Slavonic.

“Of the monks and their singing it has been said that the monks are really aristocratically pleasing to the eye and sing very well, and that the simplicity of their singing is so exquisite that it ceases to be simplicity and gives a sense of refinement” (Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn' Peterburga, p. 46).

590. Krasnyi Kabachok (little red tavern or little beautiful tavern) (pronounced “Krahs'nee kuhbahchawk’), one of the legendary spots on the Peterhof Road, its fame sung by Pushkin and Lermontov, is located at the eleventh verst, at the Krasnoe Selo Road turnoff (see Image 407). The tavern has existed since the time of Peter the Great and has long been famous for its waffles.

In winter, ice hills are constructed and enthusiasts of out-of-town excursions meet here. It was probably the first such place to cultivate gypsy choirs. On 26 December 1713 (OS), Peter the Great met Prince Romodanovskii here, and during the night of 28/29 June 1762 (OS), Catherine the Great, now head of the guards, who had just sworn allegiance to her, rested here on her way to Peterhof. Casanova (1725–1798) revelled here in 1765. A ukase of 16 November 1706 (OS) announced that “perpetual hereditary ownership” of Krasnyi Kabachok was granted to an interpreter named Semyon Ivanov for his many services to the state, with the condition that it could not be sold or mortgaged. On 3 December 1748 (OS), Empress Elizabeth issued a further ukase concerning this privilege. The head of the police, General Vasiliï Saltykov, had forced the children of the deceased Semyon Ivanov to sell him the tavern (1733), but a family member appealed to Empress Elizabeth, who ordered that the deed of sale be destroyed and the tavern be given to this family member with the right to sell it to whomever she wished. Krasnyi Kabachok then changed hands frequently, even being purchased in the 1780s by the Duchess of Kingston. In 1840, it was offered for rental as an inn, after being refurbished. In that decade, its fame began to decline. Its then illustrious proprietor was Louisa Grafemus Kessenikh (Cologne 1786 – St. Petersburg 30 October / 11 November 1852; buried in Volkov Lutheran Cemetery; see Image 408). The following advertisement placed by her in the newspaper Severnaia pchela (The Northern Bee) in 1846 reveals some of her amazing career: “The owner of the oldest of Russian out-of-town taverns, the woman-warrior Madame Kessenikh, who fought in the Prussian ranks (1813 and 1814) in the uniform of an Uhlan for the independence of Europe and received a decoration for it, invites you to the Krasnyi Kabachok. She settled in Russia a long time ago to be with her military comrades and serves the guests of the Krasnyi Kabachok in her winter quarters with excellent Russian bliny and German waffles. Foreigners fear Russian bliny as they would bullets, but for Madame Kessenikh bliny are blank cartridges and she regrets that she cannot introduce our national food to the Prussian forces. You simply must come visit the heroine of the famous war that replaced bivouac fires with the peaceful fire of the hearth. At Krasnyi Kabachok you will also find ice hills.” At the end of the 1850s, Krasnyi Kabachok burned down, and its name passed to another nearby inn (Grech, Ves’ Peterburg 1851, pp. 313–314; Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe 1889, pp. 126–129; Stolpianskii, Petergovskaia pershpektivna, pp. 21–22, 66–67; Gorbatenko, Petergofskaia doroga, pp. 117–120; Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn' Peterburga, pp. 86, 88, 89).

Kessenikh, who held dance classes in Petersburg at the German Society at Izmailov Bridge, arranged them at Krasny Kabachok as well. Dance classes were dance gatherings with an entrance fee for anyone belonging to the “noble class,” even if only seeming to belong by their dress (Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn' Peterburga, pp. 86, 89). Further details of her biography may be found in T.L. Piletskaia, “Luiza Kessenikh-zhenshchina-ulan” [“Luiza Kessenikh: Female Uhlan”], Noyi chasovoi [The New Sentry] 3, no. 2 (1995): pp. 210–217; and Vladimir Kessenikh, “Khoziaka ‘Krasnogo kabachka’” [“The Innkeeper of ‘The Little Red Tavern’”], S.-Peterburgskaia panorama [Panorama of St. Petersburg] 8 (1992): pp. 34–35.

591. Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich (9/21 September 1827 – 13/25 January 1892; see Images 420, 436) was sixteen. The two “little” sons of Nicholas I were Grand Duke Nikolai Nikolaevich (27 July / 8 August 1831 – 13/25 April 1891), who was twelve, and Grand Duke Mikhail Nikolaevich (13/25 October 1832 – 5/17 December 1909), who was eleven (see Image 420) (V. Durasov, comp., Rodoslovnaia kniga Vserossiiskogo dvorianstva [The Genealogical Book of All-Russian Nobility] [St. Petersburg (“City of St. Peter”): R. Golike i A. Vil’borg, 1906], vol. 1, p. 20). Their presence “in the ranks” is confirmed in the following court journal entry: “23 June [5 July] At 5 o’clock His Majesty, the Heir Apparent, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (see Images 420–423, 425, 439) and Prince Alexander of Hesse rode out on horseback to the St. Petersburg exit to meet the Cadets of various military educational institutions, who had crossed through [the grounds of] the dacha ‘Alexandria’ to their Peterhof camp. With the Cadets were Grand Dukes Nikolai Nikolaevich and Mikhail Nikolaevich (see Image 420).

His Majesty and Their Highnesses, after accompanying the Cadets to the camp, went to Tsarskoe Selo” (RGIA: Kamerfur’erskii zhurnal).

For an enchanting description of the youngest cadets, see Richard Southwell Bourke, St. Petersburg and Moscow: A Visit to the Court of the Czar, 2 vols. (London: Henry Colburn, 1846), vol. 2, pp. 3–7.

592. Camp exercises for the students of military educational institutions had been suspended just before the War of 1812; they were reinstated in 1828. From then on, every year for six weeks, the students lived in tents set up between the upper garden and the English garden at Peterhof. The village of Novaia, which had been located on this spot, was removed to a spot beyond Peterhof, in the direction of His Majesty's personal dacha, and the area that had until then been arable land was in 1832 turned into a military field. The grand dukes endured the same hardships as the other students. When the summer field exercises, maneuvers, and Imperial inspection were over, the students had to storm the Samson cascades in the presence of the Imperial family. This they did at a signal from the emperor. Drenched and knocked off their feet by the water, they made their way to the upper landing, where those first to reach it were rewarded by the empress with small prizes made of semi-precious stones (A. Geïrot, Opisanie Petergofa [A Description of Peterhof] [St. Petersburg: Imperatorskaia Akademiia Nauk, 1868], pp. 48–50; Stolpianskiï, Petergofskaia pershpektivna, pp. 63–64, 70).

593. See Note 583 above about James's reading aloud in English to his mother in order not to lose his fluency in his native language.
594. Maxwell's letter is the one from Berlin, 20 June 1844, mentioned in Note 572, NYPL: AWP, Part I. It was being taken to Major Whistler by Major Trouvellier (see Notes 124 and 192 above).
595. Maxwell devoted much space to discussing the travails of Joseph S. Kirk, the "young American ... who has lately come out to Russia, and who is employed in the steam engine factory of our new colony at Alexandroffsky, [who] took it into his head to fall head over heels in love with a young Russian damsel. He proposed to her in real go ahead style, was of course accepted, and being a man of energy took immediate measures to bring about the consummation of his wishes" (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36). There also had to be a Lutheran ceremony. Kirk discovered from the priests, however, that the wedding could not take place until he provided such documents as a baptismal certificate. Colonel Todd, Maxwell, and Abraham Gibson, the Consul, thereupon conferred to see how the difficulties could be resolved without what looked to be a six-month delay. Maxwell drolly describes how each based his remarks on his own individual romantic experiences. Nor was the effect of a possible bribe overlooked (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of June 8 in letter of June 2, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 36).

Andrew Eastwick's invitation to the wedding shows that the problem was resolved: the Lutheran ceremony took place three days after the ceremony at Colonel Todd's residence, which had been declared American territory. Eastwick's letter to his wife also justifies Anna Whistler's misgivings that the wedding might become a drunken revel, which she deemed disrespectful to any bride (entry of July 5 in letter of Andrew Eastwick to Lydia Eastwick dated St. Petersburg, July 3rd, 1844 and invitation to A.M. Eastwick to the Kirk–Petersen wedding, Eastwick Letters).

596. On 24 June / 6 July, the feast of the Birth of John, the honest, praiseworthy Prophet, Forerunner and Baptizer of the Lord, is celebrated (Mesiatsoslov i Obschii sbitat Rossiiskoi imperii na 1842 g. Chast' pervaiia [Calendar and Complete Staff of the Russian Empire for 1842: Part I] [St. Petersburg: Imperatorskaia Akademiia Nauk]). The service takes place in the church of St. Sergius and there is a procession around the monastery.
597. Isaiah 45:22: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth: for I am God, and there is none else."
598. See, for example, Exodus 16.
599. A small monastery burial ground evidently existed from the time the monastery was founded. In the reign of Catherine the Great, persons from distinguished and aristocratic families began to be buried here. The cemetery became the resting place of families such as Ol'denburg, Apraksin, Stroganov, Potemkin, Sheremetev, Zubov, Engel'gardt, Naryshkin, Opochinin, Golenishchev-Kutuzov, Razumovskii, Frederiks, and Stenbok-Fermor. Many of the grave monuments were considered works of art. In the nineteenth century, the cemetery became one of the most beautiful in Europe. Apparently, a list of some monuments from this destroyed cemetery may be found in the archive of the State Museum of City Sculpture in St. Petersburg. The museum itself contains salvaged cemetery monuments, but many thousands perished during the Soviet period (A.V. Kobak, "Unichtozhennye kladbishcha" ["Destroyed Cemeteries"], in Istoricheskie kladbishcha Peterburga Spravochnik-putevoditel' [Historical Cemeteries of Petersburg, A Handbook and Guide] [St. Petersburg: Chernyshev, 1993], pp. 552–555, 562). Anna Whistler would have been affected by the monument, because she had lost "two little boys" to death. I inquired personally in July 2003 of Iurii Piriutko, a specialist on the city's cemeteries and one of the authors of the aforementioned book, about the monument to the two children, but he could not identify it.

600. Anna Whistler would have written this Sunday entry on Monday, 8 July, and then a separate entry for Monday, 8 July, a practice she sometimes engaged in. Mr. G referred to in this entry is William Clarke Gellibrand; Mr. R is William Hooper Ropes; Mrs. Ropes is Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes; sister Alicia is Alicia Caroline Margaret McNeill. The little Normans cannot be identified.

The Ropeses still lived on Galernaia Street, and it is from here that everyone went to greet Aunt Alicia.

601. The Mermaid arrived from London in 7 ½ days on 25 June / 7 July (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 144, Wednesday, June 28 [July 10 NS], 1844).
602. This is the Russian word for “clerk,” spelled “artel’shchik” and pronounced “artel’shchik.”

The function of the artelshchik is described as follows: “It will easily be imagined that the straightforward English merchant, equally accustomed and compelled to trust his dependents in the various responsibilities of a counting-house, found but a slippery colleague in the merry, lazy, thieving Russian; at the same time the wages of the English to their inferiors being as much higher as their treatment was more humane, it became the interest of both parties to reform an evil which gave the one a bad servant, and deprived the other of a good master. A company, or artell, . . . has, therefore, been formed which pledges itself for the honesty of its members, or makes good the deficiencies which a dishonest member may occasion. The privileges and certainty of good employment are the inducement to enter, and there is not an English merchant house in Petersburg who does not employ one or more of these Artellschiks” (Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 1, letter 4, pp. 74–75).

603. See Note 563 above. There was no launch on Sunday, 7 July 1844, either. It finally took place on Saturday, 19/31 August. The Andrei, 84 guns, was launched in the New Admiralty (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 196, Sunday, 27 August [September 8 NS], 1844, p. 883). See BUHG: Colin Ingersoll Journal, pt. 2, fols. 6–8, for the detailed description of a similar launch in August 1847.
604. Daniel 6:16: “Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee.” Anna Whistler’s sentence is incomplete.

605. The members of the Harrison family who arrived were Sarah (Poulterer) Harrison (see Note 274 above); Annie Harrison, born in Philadelphia, 13/25 December 1839; and William Henry Harrison, born in Philadelphia, 11/23 December 1837 (PREC STP, no. 5558, p. 329). See Harrison in Appendix E and Image 227.
606. Mrs. Ropes in this entry for Monday [July] 8th [1844] is Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes. The book referred to is History of the Conquest of Mexico (Philadelphia: David McKay, 1843) by William Hickling Prescott. See Note 570 above.
607. Persons mentioned in the entry for Tuesday [July] 9th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (my sister, Aunt Alicia); Sarah and Joseph Harrison Jr. and their children, Annie and Henry (the Harrisons); Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst); Ann Elizabeth (Main) Anderson (beautiful Mrs. Anderson); William Clarke and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (the Gellibrands); Mary Brennan (Mary); Charles Donald Whistler (that little one); and John Winstanley (Uncle Winstanley).
608. “A la palette de Raphael” was an art supplies store on Bol’shaia Morskaia Street (F.I. Bulgakov, I.K. Aivazovskii i ego proizvedeniia (60 let kbudozhestvennoi slavy) [I.K. Aivazovskii and His Works (Sixty Years of Fame as an Artist)] [St. Petersburg: A.S. Suvorin, 1901], p. 45). See also Anna Whistler to James Whistler, St. Petersburg, 4 December NS 1848, GUL: Whistler Collection, W370.
609. The correct expression, which means “to the dacha,” is spelled “na dachu” and pronounced “nuhdah’choo.”
610. At the Gellibrands’, they met Thomas Scales Ellerby (18 March 1810 – 11 June 1892) and his wife, Mary (Bealey) Ellerby (c. 1810 – 18 August 1885). See Ellerby in Appendix E and Images 256–257.
611. Miss McMasters’s first name is not given in the diaries nor in the BRBC STP 1845. The latter document lists her simply as “at Mr. Charles Wood’s, governess” (f. 39). Judging from the list of sponsors at the receiving of Charles John Wood into the Church on 14/26 July 1845, she is probably Anne Caroline McMaster (PREC STP for 1845, p. 326). This seems to be corroborated by the fact that the Woods later named a daughter Anna Caroline (29 August / 10 September 1847 – 22 May / 3 June 1850). The - child died at the age of two years and nine months and was buried in the Smolensk Cemetery (PREC STP, no. 6068, p. 401).

612. Helen (19 October 1835 – 27 February 1919), Catherine Elizabeth (20 January 1837 – 30 October 1920) and William Nicholson (20 August 1838 – 27 July 1919), born in England, were the children of the Wood family in St. Petersburg in 1844. Their mother, Lydia (Procter) Wood (see Image 272), was expecting another child shortly. Charles John was born on 29 September / 11 October 1844, the first child of the Woods to be born in Russia (PREC STP for 1844, p. 315). I wish to thank Rev. Eric Wood of Bruton, Somerset, great-grandson of Charles John Wood, for providing me with the birth and death dates of all the Wood children. See Wood in Appendix E.
613. Although it has been “established” that James was born on 10 July (his father’s announcement when he was born), Anna Whistler continued to give 11 July as the day he was born. She received on 5 November 1877, from Kate (Prince) Livermore, a book of daily readings called Day Unto Day (Margaret L. Bennett, comp., Day Unto Day [Boston: American Unitarian Association, 1873], GUL: Whistler Collection, W174). On the days corresponding to birthdays and deaths of loved ones, she commented on the person. The reference to James’s birthday and the comment are written next to the date “July 11”: “James Abbott MacNeill Whistler’s birthday, my first born son.” Moreover, James’s poem to his mother, while dated 10 July 1844, was presented to her on the 11th.
614. This is Carl Hedenschoug, Major Whistler’s draftsman. See his biography in Appendix E.
615. James’s note to his father reads: “My Dear Father You will remember better than I do when I was born on the 4th July 1832. Aunt Alicia was with us then in Lowell and she has come here again to have some fun on my 10 Birthday. This afternoon I am to have a party of little friends, and I am so glad you have come home in good time. I have drawn a head of a Russian priest for you. John and Tom Drury have come out here to spend their vacation and I like them very much. Now my dear father as I have told you all that I can think of, I must say Goodbye. James” (James Whistler to George Washington Whistler, [Peterhof Road, 11 July 1844], GUL: Whistler Collection, W652). MacDonald says the whereabouts of the drawing of the head of a Russian priest are unknown and dates James’s note “1842,” probably on the basis of its incorrect statement about James's birth (MacDonald, Catalogue Raisonné, p. 1)

John Thomas Drury (b. 2/14 August 1833) and Thomas Anthony Drury (b. 6/18 May 1836), mentioned in James's note, were the sons of William Drury (11/22 April 1800 – 30 January / 11 February 1864) and Elizabeth (P'Anson) Drury (26 May / 7 June 1800 – 22 May / 3 June 1869) (married St. Petersburg 6/18 August 1827) (PREC STP for 1833, pp. 176 and for 1836, no. 4246, p. 209). See Notes 731 and 738 below; see also Bryan P'Anson, The History of the P'Anson Family (London: Henry Good and Son for The Genealogical Society, 1915), pp. 43–44. GUL: Whistler Collection H1 is, I believe, the paper band that was around James's note to Deborah.

616. James copied for his mother a poem by the Irish poet, Thomas Moore (28 May 1779 – 26 February 1852), entitled “To My Mother Written in a Pocket Book, 1822” (A.D. Godley, ed., The Poetical Works of Thomas Moore [Oxford: Oxford University Press; London: Humphrey Milford, 1929], p. 535). Moore was the author of such well-known works as Lalla Rookh (1816), “The Harp That Once Through Tara's Halls,” and “Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms.” His devotion to his mother was noted by the Dictionary of National Biography (s.v. “Moore, Thomas [1779–1852]”) as “one of the most amiable features of his character.”
617. This was James's first letter to his mother. Her comments about it in the diary indicate that for her “filial love” was a “holy feeling,” and she prayed that it might “never desert him.” She responded with a note in which she alluded to the duty of a child and mother to one another: “Peterhoff road. July 11th. 1844. My own darling James. You know not how those lines to your Mother touched her heart this morning! So full of the holy sentiment of a child's affection and duty to her who ten years ago folded him with joy in a maternal embrace, dutiful and gentle” (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Peterhoff Road, 11 July 1844, GUL: Whistler Collection, W351). On the envelope she wrote: “For my dear James on his tenth birthday. his Mother has nothing more to enclose than her Love, and may the expression of his be exhibited in his life.” How intense and constant were her feelings on the subject is underscored by the fact that on 10 February 1878, when James was 43 years old and still leading a life she disapproved of, she returned his letter to him, after writing him a response of a kind that no one would like to receive, on the letter he had sent her almost thirty-four years before. It begins: “So may it be my precious Jamie! altho during the 34 years since you copied the verses, you have as often, let flatterers & the love of Jamie usurp my place in your affections” (Anna Whistler to James Whistler, Hastings, 10 February 1878, GUL: Whistler Collection, W350).

In Day Unto Day, under the entry for 11 July, she marked with an “X” a text by S.A. Brooke that she clearly thought appropriate to James’s life: “How magnificent a thing might life become, could we but turn away from all temptations to do our own will, and say to the tempters, were they even father or mother, — say, in the strength of Christ, “I cannot: wist ye not that I must be about my Father’s business?”<sup>3</sup> ... So perfect was the unison of his will to God’s that his feeling was not, I must, or even, I ought, but, “I delight to do thy will”; “My meat and my drink are to do my Father’s will.”<sup>4</sup> — S.A. Brooke.” [³Luke ii.49. ⁴John iv.34]” (Bennett, Day Unto Day).

618. Deborah Whistler Haden to James Whistler, no date, no place, written in French, GUL: Whistler Collection, H1, is a response to a note from James that she describes as “Your note ... a nice remembrance of this anniversary of your birth.” I believe it should be identified as [Peterhof Road July 11, 1844]. It has not been possible to locate the note from Aunt Alicia.
619. The birthday being celebrated at Mr. Drury’s may have been that of William Leighton Drury, his grandson, who was born on 1/13 July 1832 (PREC STP, no. 4106, p. 161). Although the family of William Leighton Drury did not come to live in the empty house on Mr. Drury’s estate until early August, several of the grandchildren were there at the time of James’s birthday.
620. 29 June / 11 July was the Feast of the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul. All places of business and all schools were closed (Mesiatsoslov na 1842 g.). See Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 16.
621. Persons mentioned in the entry for Friday [July] 12th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Joseph Harrison Jr. of the firm of Harrison, Winans and Eastwick (Mr. Harrison); Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, wife of William Hooper Ropes (Mrs. Ropes); and Anne Caroline McMaster, the Wood children’s governess (Miss McMaster).
622. Persons mentioned in the entry for Sat [July] 13th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: the beggar child, Andrea, and his mother (little Andrea and his mother); Anna Whistler’s half-

- sister Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (my sister Alice, Aunt Alicia); Joseph Samuel Ropes, William Hooper Ropes's brother (Mr. Joseph Ropes); and William Bonamy Maingay and his sister, Emma Maingay, Debo's best friend, now living in England (Mr. W Maingay, Emma).
623. A building belonging to Vorontsov was located on Malaia Morskaia Street No. 13, in the First Admiralty District, Second Ward, and his shop, selling ready-to-wear clothing, was probably here (Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar', p. 37).
624. By "organist" Anna Whistler meant "organ grinder." Street musicians played on St. Petersburg streets on a variety of instruments, but the largest contingent consisted of organ grinders (Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn' Peterburga, p. 90).
625. The Russian word for "laundress" is spelled "prachka" and pronounced "prah'chkuh."
626. The Russian word for "it's all right," "it's nothing," "never mind," is spelled "nichevo" and pronounced "nyeecheevaw'."
627. The cousins of Joseph Samuel Ropes were probably George Henry Prince and possibly Franklin Henry Hooper. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
628. Franklin Henry Hooper was an orphan and also had no living brothers and sisters (Charles Henry Pope and Thomas Hooper, comps., Hooper Genealogy [Boston: Charles H. Pope, 1908], pp. 148–149). I doubt that he is the right Hooper cousin; however, he is the only Hooper whose name appears in the passport applications recorded in 1844 before June (NAUS: Passports, M1371, roll 2, p. 16, passport no. 1902). Perhaps Anna Whistler made a mistake when she said "his brother" had worked for Whistler in Springfield.
629. It has not been possible to locate the note from the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst.
630. Starting about 1830, 1/13 July, the birthday of Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna (see Images 420, 424), was celebrated at Peterhof (see Images 400, 402) as a public holiday (before then it had been celebrated on Elagin Island; see Image 409). When 10 p.m. struck, three rockets were set off as the signal for the illumination to begin, and in an instant, as if by magic, the somber masses of trees were sprinkled with diamonds. Thousands of fires in various charming shapes sparkle everywhere, reflected in the waters and turning them to gold, and in the centre of an enormous blazing star brightly burns the monogram of the August heroine of the festivities. Wherever you turn your gaze there are bewitching and marvelous pictures. Looking from below up at the palace, you see mountains of fiery water plunging into an abyss. On one side the pond of Marly Palace, decorated along its edge with flaming ribbons and festoons, draws your attention; on the other side the open sea sprinkled with Russian vessels, their yardarms covered with interwoven fiery garlands. The tall column of water from the Samson fountain turns into a burning column and sparks scatter in the shapes of diamonds, rubies, and sapphires. Fiery peristyles hang over the canal. Further away majestically towers a colossal shield, shining like the sun, and proudly bearing in its center the name “Aleksandra” in fiery diamonds. Orchestras from the Guards regiments play in various locales of the gardens without cease, one replacing another, and the sounds of the music fusing with the noise of the water increase the enchantment. The Imperial family, accompanied by courtiers and foreign emissaries, moves about in wagons amidst the tightly packed crowd of merry-makers. The public carouses all night, leaving the garden only at dawn (Bur’ianov, Progulka s det’mi, vol. 3, pp. 21–38. Pushkarev’s description of these festivities is extracted from Bur’ianov’s extremely detailed description: Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, pp. 173–174). For further information about the festivities of this day, see Richard Wortman, Scenarios of Power: Myth & Ceremony in Russian Monarchy, 2 vols. (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1995–2000), vol. 1, pp. 328–331.

631. One of the means considered beneficial in folk medicine to treat pulmonary tuberculosis was the use of animal remedies. “In the case of sheep or cows the inhalation of their breath was regarded as beneficial so that the patient was made to sleep among a flock of sheep, in a byre ... or butcher’s shop” (J.D. Rolleston, “The Folklore of Pulmonary Tuberculosis,” Tubercule 22 (1941): p. 57). There were “those who regarded the exhalations of cow houses as a sure remedy; no less a scientist than Joseph Priestly attributed the cure of his daughter to those fumes” (René Dubos and Jean Dubos, The White Plague: Tuberculosis, Man, and Society [New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1987], p. 136). “This practice apparently persisted through much of the nineteenth century. In La peau de chagrin, Balzac speaks of a Swiss consumptive who cured himself by breathing in, extremely slowly, the ‘thick air of a cowhouse’” (Dubos and Dubos, p. 256). Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna was placed in the

- cowshed on the Imperial model farm in Tsarskoe Selo overnight, but could not endure the treatment. She was then placed in the small lodge, one of the three buildings making up the farm (see Images 458–459). See also Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 220; Bang, Livs Minder, p. 248.
632. As Anna Whistler did not write in her diary on Sunday, this entry was most likely written on Monday, 15 July. The “little Normans” in this entry cannot be identified.
633. Matthew 26:13: “Verily I say unto you, wheresoever this gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also be this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her.” The tenor of Rev. George Williams’s sermon on charity was based on the story of the woman who anointed Christ’s head with all of a precious ointment she had, causing an outcry from his disciples, who felt it could have been sold for a large sum to help the poor. Christ answered that she had wrought a good work upon him, because she had done it for his burial; thus Mr. Williams’s exhortation to his congregation to relieve not only the material but the spiritual needs of others.
634. Persons mentioned in the entry for Wed [July] 17th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Anna Whistler’s half-sister Alicia Caroline Margaret McNeill (my sister, Aunt Alicia); Colonel Ivan Frantsevich Bouttatz, Major Whistler’s colleague and a family friend (Col Bouttatz, the Col); the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst); the American envoy to Russia, Colonel Charles Stewart Todd (Col Todd); Timothy Abraham Curtis, a merchant of the Liverpool firm of Bury, Curtis and Kennedy (old Mr. Curtis, Mr. C); Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (dear daughter the Grand Duchess, blooming bride); Emperor Nicholas I (the great man); Prince Friedrich of Hesse-Kassel, husband of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (Prince of Hesse Castle); and William Miller, a merchant and suitor of Deborah Delano Whistler (Mr Miller).
635. “On his arrival in St. Petersburg, the stranger receives a carte de séjour, or permission of residence, in exchange for which he delivers up his passport, which is deposited in the archives of the Alien Office until his departure” (see Image 150) (Jerrmann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 75).
636. Count Aleksandr Khristoforovich Benkendorf (Benckendorff) (1783 – 23 September / 5 October 1844; see Image 308) was “Head of the Third Department of His Imperial Majesty’s Own Chancery (Chief Director after 1839) and Chief of Gendarmes from 1826 to 1844.” In March 1841, when Nicholas I appointed a committee to study a project for a St. Petersburg–Moscow railway, he chose Benckendorff to head it. In January/February 1842, Benckendorff was made chairman of the Construction Commission, which was to direct and supervise the construction of the approved railway (the Commission was abolished later in the year, when the Department of Railways was created). Benckendorff’s home (No. 15) was located on the Fontanka River between Chain (Tsepnoi) Bridge and Semionov Bridge, in the Second Ward of the Liteinaia District. As one walked along the Fontanka from his house towards the Grand Neva, the Summer Garden was visible on the other side of the Fontanka (P.S. Squire, The Third Department: The Establishment and Practices of the Political Police in the Russia of Nicholas I [New Haven, CT: Cambridge University Press, 1968], pp. 106–131; Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, pp. 12, 15–16, 17–18, 40; Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, p. 5. Nistrem’s address guide was dedicated to Benckendorff). Elizabeth Rigby executed a portrait of him and his wife.

637. The Summer Palace (see Image 148) stands on a plot adjoining Laundry (Prachechnyi) Bridge and is preserved as a relic of olden days. It contains several memorable things: the large clock said to have been bought by Peter the Great in Holland; the full-length portrait of Peter the Great in a cuirass and Danish uniform; various furniture purported to have been made by Peter the Great or used by him and by his daughter, Empress Elizaveta Petrovna. Built in 1711, the Summer Palace was intended as a summer residence and therefore an extensive garden was laid out around it (the present-day Summer Garden; see Image 149), in which popular festivities took place on Sundays. In 1725, a separate building with a salon for the festivities taking place in celebration of the marriage of Tsarevna Anna Petrovna (Peter’s daughter) to the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein was added to the Summer Palace. In 1731, this addition was destroyed and replaced with a wooden house in which Empress Anna Ioannovna lived, and later the Duke Biron (he was arrested here in the final days of his regency). In the reign of Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413), the Summer Palace was restored to its original state, as it had been in the time of Peter the Great, and remains so to this day. In winter, the palace is closed; visitors are admitted only in spring and summer.

The Summer Garden occupies the entire area between the Grand Neva, the Fontanka, the Moika and Swan (Lebiazhi) Canal. The Swan Canal separates it from the Tsarina's Meadow, also called the Field of Mars. The Summer Garden is about 250 sazhen long and about 100 sazhen wide. At first, it occupied the area of the present-day Garden, and all of the Tsarina's Meadow, which at that time was also planted with trees in the form of a park. The garden then also included land set aside for the Mikhail, or Engineers (Mikhailovskii, or Inzhenernyi), Castle, and for the garden that now belongs to the Mikhail Palace (the Upper Summer Garden). The first plans proposed building the Summer Garden according to the rules of French horticulture of the time, with a grotto, covered avenues, and fountains and cascades, for which a water conduit from the Ligovskii Canal was built. These plans show the following structures: the Summer Palace, near Laundry Bridge; a grotto, in which in summer there is now a confectioner's shop; a post house that was located on the spot where the Marble Palace stands and that was taken down in 1738; and the salon in which festivities took place (that is mentioned above in the information on the Summer Palace). This project was carried out. The garden had, in addition, a collection of rare birds and animals. It was decorated with lead statues depicting figures from Aesop's fables and a large number of marble statues and busts from Italy. In the reign of Catherine the Great, the Summer Garden was embellished with new structures, such as fountains, cascades, statues, ponds, artificial hills, grottos, temples, and Chinese and Egyptian gazebos, but it suffered during the storm and flood that raged on 10 September (OS) 1777. The Garden was knocked down, and many trees were broken. They were raised and propped up. The iron clips holding the branches to the trunks were still visible in 1838, when Bur'ianov's book appeared. The fountains destroyed by the storm had not been restored by that date. Particular attention must be drawn to the magnificent iron fence with granite posts, begun in 1778 and completed in 1784, which extends in front of the Garden on the Neva River side. It was built by the architect Iurii Matveevich Fel'ten (1730–1801), who was director of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. Its granite columns were cut from whole pieces, are two sazhen high with a diameter of three feet, and are placed on the same kind of pedestals six cubic feet thick. The fence has three gates decorated with gilded depictions of baskets of flowers, etc. The elegant design, quality of the materials, fine columns decorated at their summits with vases and urns, the bright gilt of the darts and rings all make the fence unique. In recent times, the furthest-lying avenues of the Garden have been turned into paved roads for horseback riding and phaeton driving. An elegant urn of Elfdahl porphyry, the gift of the King of Sweden, was placed in 1839 on the side where the Engineers Castle stands. From the very start, the Summer Garden was intended for the public and remains so today. Fashion draws the largest crowds here from Thomas Week (Fomina nedelia) to Whit Monday (Dukhov den). On the latter holiday, there is a big celebration that in days gone by included the choosing of brides, especially by the merchant class. After that, the Summer Garden becomes the domain of people who spend the summer in the city and have no other place where they can enjoy the shade of trees. They can take advantage of the coffee house in the garden, the owner of which often hires musicians for Sunday performances. One may also enjoy the mineral waters in the Summer Garden instead of having to go to the main establishment in Novaia Derevnia, while outside the Summer Garden on the Neva in a charming two-storied moored house one may take the cure by means of steam and cold baths (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, pp. 262–266; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 221–222, 334–335; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 662–663; Agapkina, Èntsiklopedicheskii slovar' A–Ia Slavianskaia mifologiia, pp. 381–383).

638. On 5/17 July, the Feast of St. Sergius, there is a service in the Church of St. Sergius the Miracleworker and a religious procession around the monastery.
639. It has not been possible to ascertain who the “old admiral” is. If English, he may have been Admiral Aleksei Samuilovich Greig (6 September 1775 [OS] – 18/30 January 1845; see Image 297) or Admiral Alexander Ogilvy (c. 1765 – 26 March / 7 April 1847 (PREC STP for 1847, p. 349; 25 March is given in BRBC STP 1845, fol. 43).
640. “5 July [17 July]. 2:15 P.M. His Majesty arrived at the Alexandria Dacha from Tsarskoe Selo, having left there at twelve o'clock and having stopped in on route at the St. Sergius Monastery during the service for St. Sergius” (RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, fol. 355v).
641. The same entry for 5 July [17 July] in the Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal (see previous Note) also describes Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna's condition of the previous day: “she spent yesterday pleasantly. Her cough was extremely moderate and expectation was easy. There were no chills or fever and only toward evening was there any agitation. Her Highness exhibited an appetite in taking breakfast and dinner. Sitting by the window for several hours, she hardly coughed. She had a pleasant nap of three-quarters of an hour. Her sleep during the night was poor and interrupted by expectoration. Towards morning she rested more easy.”

642. The reference is to Charles Collins Parker (3 August 1823 – 28 December 1848), MD, University of Pennsylvania, 1846. He was companion to Colonel Sylvanus Thayer (see Note 645 below) during the latter’s trip through Europe. See the biographies of Colonel Sylvannus Thayer and Charles Collins Parker in Appendix E (hereafter, Thayer and Parker) and Images 318–319.
643. This is Abby Hortense (Chew) Swift (1822 – 10 April 1898), who, on 15 September 1842, married McRee Swift (15 April 1819 – 5 April 1896), son of General Joseph Gardner Swift. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
644. Thomas John Chew (28 January 1777 – 21 July 1846) and Abby Hortense (Hallam) Chew (13 September 1791 – 21 March 1874), married in September 1812, were the parents of Abby Hortense (Chew) Swift. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
645. This is Colonel Sylvanus Thayer (9 June 1785 – 7 September 1872), USMA Class of 1808; military engineer; superintendent USMA (1817–1833), while George Washington Whistler was a cadet there. Maxwell later wrote: “His old preceptor at West Point Colonel Thayer, was out here this summer and was I understand highly delighted with the golden opinion entertained by all for his former pupil” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, October 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 45). Thayer and Parker were probably staying at the misses Benson’s boarding house (H. Memminger, Seraing near Liège, June 5, 1844, Sylvanus Thayer Papers, USMA Library [hereafter, USMAL: Thayer Papers], vol. 7). See Benson, and Thayer and Parker, in Appendix E, as well as Images 318–319.
646. Col B is Colonel Ivan Frantsevich Bouttatz, Major Whistler’s colleague and friend in the Department of Transport and Public Buildings. In 1842, he traveled to America to accompany Major Whistler to Russia.
647. Persons mentioned in the entry for Friday [July] 19th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Colonel Sylvanus Thayer (Col Thayer); Charles Collins Parker, medical student traveling with Thayer (Mr. Parker); William Clarke Gellibrand, English

- merchant (Mr. Gellibrand); William Hooper Ropes, merchant (Ropes); Timothy Abraham Curtis, member of the Liverpool firm of Bury, Curtis and Kennedy (Mr. Curtis); and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes (the ladies).
648. In the days when sugar was not yet known in Russia, wine, beer, and vodka were sweetened only with honey; therefore, a great variety of drinks in Old Russia went by the name of “mead.” The following recipe is for cranberry mead: one kg. of honey, 2 liters of water, one liter of cranberry juice, 5 gr. of spices, 100 gr. of yeast. Pour the water into the honey; boil, removing the foam. Pour into a large bottle (or tub), add the cranberry juice and spices (cinnamon and cloves), and the yeast and allow to ferment for two days. Then close up the bottle, keep in a cold place for about three weeks, pour into bottles and cork up (Mikhailov, Pravoslavnaia kukhnia, p. 195).
649. This was probably Alexander Thal (St. Petersburg 5/17 November 1802 – St. Petersburg 8/20 January 1886), who was the consul general for Hanover in St. Petersburg from 1842–1860. However, James Thal (St. Petersburg 22 January / 3 February 1801 – St. Petersburg 11/23 August 1866), who had been vice consul for Hanover in St. Petersburg from 1835–1841 and was consul in Moscow from 1842–1844, is a possibility (Dr. Annette von Boetticher, Niedersächsisches Hauptstaatsarchiv, Hanover, Germany, to E. Harden, 23 August 1994; Amburger Datenbank, IDs 80404, 80424).
650. Persons mentioned in the entry for Sat [July] 20th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Thomas Nelson Hirst, who ran a private school in St. Petersburg (Mr. Hirsts gate); his terminally ill sister, Mary Gent Hirst (my invalid friend, my poor suffering friend); and her Russian servant (her good Elona).
651. Persons mentioned in the entry for Monday [July] 22nd who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law’s summer replacement in the English Church (Mr Williams); Anna Whistler’s half-sister Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (Aunt Alicia); the little Normans, who cannot be identified; and Alexander and William, the sons of Colonel Thomas Drury, and possibly William Leighton, the son of William Drury (the Druries).
652. The work being read aloud appears to be the anonymously published work by David Hume, A True Account of the Behaviour and Conduct of Archibald Stewart, Esq; Late Lord Provost of Edinburgh,

- in a Letter to a Friend* (London: M. Cooper, 1748). It has been pointed out that although Hume's job as tutor to the Marquess of Annandale had "the unanticipated advantage of keeping Hume out of Scotland during the Jacobite uprising of 1745," his absence "did not prevent him from later writing, with every appearance of authority, a defence of the conduct of the lord provost of Edinburgh during the rebellion" (Dictionary of National Biography, s.v. "Hume, David [1711–1776]"). I wish also to thank James L. Mitchell, curator of Rare Collections at the NLS, for his help with the identification of this work.
653. There are three notes from Willie Whistler at GUL: one undated, to his aunt, Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill; one dated "Juillet 9 1845 Petersbourg" to "Mon cher frère," his brother James; and one to his father (GUL: Whistler Collection, W969).
  654. Persons mentioned in the entry for Wed [July] 24th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (sister, my sister); Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst, the dear Invalid); Thomas Nelson Hirst, her brother (to Mr. Hirsts); and Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church (Mr. Williams).
  655. They had taken a third-story apartment in the house of Ritter, at No. 237 English Embankment, opposite the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. In Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar', the house is numbered 13 on the English Embankment and 26 on the Galernaia Street side (pp. 3, 39).
  656. The Russian word for "oarsman" is spelled "pirosvozchii" and pronounced "pirossvaw'shchee."
  657. The name of the five-kopek coin is derived from the word for "five" and was spelled "piatak" or "piatachok" (Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 53).
  658. The Whistlers' family doctor, Dr. James Rogers, also attended Mary Gent Hirst.
  659. The reference here is to Rev. James Slade (2 May 1783 – 15 May 1860), divine and author. The work referred to here is Twenty-one Prayers Composed from the Psalms, for the Sick and Afflicted. It was first published in 1828. Each of the twenty-one Psalms included there is accompanied by a prayer based on it. This section is followed by other forms of prayer for the sick that are partly adopted from "well known devotional writers" and partly original. The final section consists of occasional prayers, e.g., for the dying, for those in violent pain, for those of advanced age (James Slade, Twenty-

One Prayers Composed from the Psalms, for the Sick and Afflicted, 4th ed., [London: J.G. & F. Rivington, 1839]).

Educated first by his father, Slade then attended Emmanuel College, Cambridge, graduating in 1804, and was ordained a priest in 1807. He was vicar in a number of places until his post as vicar of Bolton, which he held for almost forty years, and in which he became widely known. He was “[i]n advance of his time on many questions,” especially concerning “church reform and education.” He devoted much attention “to the education of the working classes ... The Bolton parish church Sunday schools became famous under his care ... In 1846 he founded the Church of England Educational Institution for boys and girls of the middle class and for evening students ... He was also the founder of the Poor Protection Society.”

His other published works included Annotations on the Epistles (1816), Lessons for Sunday Schools, Selected from the Scriptures (1823), An Explanation of the Psalms As Read in the Liturgy of the Church (1832), Plain Remarks on the Four Gospels (1818), A Letter on Church Reform to the Bishop of London (1830), Plain Parochial Sermons, 7 vols. (1835–1847), and A System of Family Prayer (1837) (Dictionary of National Biography).

660. This is Baron Eduard Andreevich de Stoeckl, junior secretary to the Russian Mission in Washington. See the biographies of Stoeckl, Howard, Swift, Ironside in Appendix E and Image 286.
661. This is Engineer General Jean-Antoine Maurice Destrem (July 1787 – 10/22 November 1855), called Moris Gugonovich by the Russians. He was director of the Department of Planning and Estimates of GUPSiPZ. His cultural accomplishments prompted Anna Whistler to describe him in this entry as “very intellectual.” See his biography in Appendix E and Image 246.
662. See Note 52 above. Jean Robert and Cecilia (Flour or Flourer) Poizat, who had been on the Acadia in 1843 with the Whistler family, had three children at this time. The new baby is never called by name in APS: Scaliger, nor does she appear in the 1850 Census for West Chester, Pennsylvania, when the family was living there. She is most certainly Amata Poissat, legitimate daughter of Johannes, born in France, who died of brain fever on 27 April 1850 at age six in West Chester, Pennsylvania (Death Register of Holy Trinity Church, 1810–1828 and 1849–1871, PAHRC). Mary, who seems older than Charles, had been in Philadelphia “last summer.” Because the date of this diary entry is 24 July 1844, it suggests that “last summer” means 1843. Mary, too, does not appear in the 1850 Census mentioned above. Charles's age at this time is not known, but he is listed in the 1850 Census as nine years old. He appears in the Philadelphia directories for many years until 1882. It has not been possible to locate this letter. See Poizat in Appendix E and Image 78.

663. Persons mentioned in the entry for August 1st Thursday who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and his wife, Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (Mr. G, the Gellibrands); Elona, the servant of the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst (poor Elona); Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst); Sophia (Gordon) Hirst, Mary Gent Hirst's sister-in-law (her Sister); Thomas Nelson Hirst, Mary Gent Hirst's brother (her brother); Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church (our Pastor Mr. Williams, Mr. W, our young Clergyman, our young pastor); Anna Whistler's half-sister, Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (Aunt Alicia); Rev. Dr. Edward Law, chaplain of the English Church, on leave in England (Mr. Laws practise); and Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel'nikov, head of the Northern Administration of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway (Col Melnikoff).
664. The superior to whom Major Whistler was immediately responsible was Count Pyotr Andreevich Kleinmikhel' (30 November [OS] 1793 – 3 February [OS] 1869), head of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings, appointed to the post in August 1842, shortly after Whistler's arrival in Russia. See his biography in Appendix E and Image 243.
665. Little is known of Sophia Morgan (Greenock, Scotland 1808 – Merchiston, Edinburgh 13 April 1872). She was the daughter of Francis and Isabella Margery (Carmichael) Morgan. She first met Alicia McNeill in Russia in the summer of 1844, and they became close friends. Sophia Morgan was married on 30 October 1856 in Edinburgh Parish, Edinburgh, Midlothian, to John Rodger (Greenock, Scotland bap. 4 September 1796 – 26 March 1868) (IGI for Midlothian; OPRS for Renfrewshire; Will of John Rodger, Ref. SC70/1/159 1868, Edinburgh Sheriff Court). Her husband was a banker. Their house was called Fairbank. Alicia McNeill (see Image 39), who died suddenly in Linlithgow in 1863, was buried from Sophia (Morgan) Rodger's house (William Charnley to "Madam", Preston 23rd October 1863, GUL: Whistler Collection, C76; Anna Whistler to Mr. Gamble, London, 10–11 February 1864, GUL: Whistler Collection, W516; The - Scotsman*, Tuesday, Sept. 22, 1863; London Evening Standard, April 16, 1872).

666. Dorothea Halliday (bap. 2 January 1810 – Steyning, Sussex 20 February 1880) married Francis Baird (28 February / 12 March 1802 – 13/25 March 1864; see Image 275) on 1/13 October 1828 (PREC STP, nos. 3756, 7614).
667. Miss Morgan lived in town with old Mrs. Baird, at the home of Francis and Dorothea (Halliday) Baird in the house they owned on Miasnaia Street, near the Baird works, in the Fourth Admiralty District, Third Ward (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 170, Tuesday, July 29 / August 10, 1847; Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar', vol. 1, pp. 22, 81). Francis and Dorothea Baird also had a dacha on the Peterhof Road, the location of which it has not been possible to determine.
668. Anne Elizabeth Main and Matthew Anderson were married on 13/25 July 1838 (PREC STP for 1838, p. 237). Their anniversary had been celebrated on the previous Thursday.
669. It has not been possible to locate this note from Eliza (Lamb) Maingay that her husband, William Maingay, brought to Russia, and her son, William Bonamy Maingay, delivered (see Images 258–260).
670. It has not been possible to locate these letters of Emma Maingay (see Image 265), also delivered by William Bonamy Maingay, her brother.
671. Anne Elizabeth (Main) and Matthew Anderson had one son at this time, Henry Main, born 13/25 August 1840 (RGIA: Fond 1689, op. 1, d. 3 Register British Factory Chapel St. Petersburg [January 1831 – December 1846]; PREC STP for 1840, p. 266). Therefore, the Anderson boys referred to here would have included the sons of other members of the Anderson family, most likely of Frances (Simpson) and John Anderson (who owned the house), who had a son twenty years old and five sons thirteen years of age and under; and possibly of Sarah (Phillips) and Robert Anderson, who had two sons, seven and five years of age.
672. The term “Circassian beauty” refers to an exoticized image of women from Circassia, in the North Caucasus. The reputation of Circassian women as extraordinarily beautiful and spirited, while still respectful and obedient, rendered them attractive commodities in the Turkish slave trade. This “historical image of idealized feminine aesthetics” also pervaded artistic, literary, and popular culture from “its initial appearance in the novels and theatrical plays of the seventeenth century” (Setenay Nil Doğan, “From National Humiliation to Difference: The Image of the Circassian Beauty in the Discourses of Circassian Diaspora Nationalists,” New Perspectives on Turkey, 42 (2010): pp. 77, 82). In the 1800s, “this identification of the Circassian and Caucasian as the most perfect representatives of whiteness had taken hold of the public imagination” (Gregory Fried, “A Freakish Whiteness: The Circassian Lady and the Caucasian Fantasy,” Mirror of Race [2013], online journal), and the term was used extensively to market beauty products in American and Europe. In 1843, “Circassian Hair Dye, for changing light, red, or grey hair to a beautiful brown or black,” was sold in Baltimore for one dollar a bottle (“Circassian Hair Dye,” Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division, LC-DIG-pga-08523, advertisement flyer). While Anna Whistler would have ignored the association of Circassian beauty with concubines, she probably was aware of the beauty products and would have known the term from literary allusions. Known as the beautiful Mrs. Anderson, Anna Whistler’s acquaintance, Anne Elizabeth (Main) Anderson, had dark eyes, presumably dark hair, a sweetness of manner, and sang affectingly, the attributes of a Circassian maid.

673. Astrakhan’ is a city on the Volga River delta near the Caspian Sea.
674. Sunday was 28 July 1844.
675. Dr. James Rogers attended James Whistler and Mary Gent Hirst on Monday, 29 July 1844.
676. Tuesday was 30 July 1844.
677. Mr. Hirst’s house was No. 31 Fifth Line (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 25; Nistrem, Adres-Kalendar’, p. 204).
678. Wednesday was 31 July 1844.
679. The Book of Psalms of the Old Testament consists of 150 psalms, 73 of which are indicated to be “of David.” They are “Hebrew sacred songs and poems,” the themes of which “concern ... praise to the Lord, ... personal joy and sorrow, national redemption, festivals and historical events” (Joan Comay, Who’s Who in the Old Testament Together with the Apocrypha, vol. 1 of Who’s Who in the Bible, 2 vols. [New York: Bonanza Books, 1980], p. 101).
680. An examination of the Russia Company Minute Books for several years on either side of 1844 shows no mention of a new organ for the English Church at St. Petersburg. There is correspondence about a new organ for the English Church at Moscow that arrived there in early 1841. The Russia Company did not want to spend more than £100 for the Moscow organ. Perhaps the organ for St. Petersburg was bought by the congregation there directly, thus bypassing the Russia Company. Anna Whistler's figure of £1000 seems rather high (entry for August 1st Thursday [1844], NYPL: AWPDP, Part I; Russia Company Court Minute Book 1834–1844, CLC/B/195/Ms 11741/012; Russia Company Court Minute Book 1844–1869, CLC/B/195/Ms 11741/013).

681. Johann Promberger (Vienna 15 September 1810 – Vienna 1890) was the organist of the English Church in St. Petersburg. One source says that he held this position in 1841; another source says he came to Russia in 1843. He also taught the piano in St. Petersburg for more than forty years, concertized, was a composer, and constructed the musical instrument called the “melodion.” In the 1840s and 1850s, he was music critic for the St. Petersburgische Zeitung, writing under the pseudonym of “—mb—.” An excellent performer on both the organ and piano, he was limited as an organist by being able to play the organ only within the confines of a church. A.N. Serov relates how in a concert in 1869, Promberger had to play works for the organ by Frescobaldi, Rameau, and D. Scarlatti on the harmonium because of the lack of an organ in the concert hall. Together with G. Ernst, he was the first performer in Russia of Beethoven's “Kreutzer Sonata” (11 March 1847) (L. Roizman, Organ v istorii russkoi muzykal'noi kul'tury [The Organ in the History of Russian Musical Culture] [Moscow: Muzyka, 1979], p. 246; Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn' Peterburga, p. 159; G.B. Bernandt and I.M. Iampol'skii, Kto pisal o muzyke [Who Wrote about Music], 4 vols. [Moscow: Soviet Composer Publishing House, 1974], vol. 2, p. 308; I.F. Petrovskaia, Muzykal'noe obrazovanie i muzykal'nye obshchestvennye organizatsii v Peterburge 1801-1917 Èntsiiklopediia [Music Education and Social Music Organizations in Petersburg 1801-1917. An Encyclopedia] [St. Petersburg: Petrovskii fond, 1999], pp. 15, 115, 298). Some of Promberger's writings in German are listed in Who Wrote about Music.
682. Horatio P. Southgate was born in Portland, Maine, on 5 July 1812. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1832, then attended Andover Theological Seminary. “He applied for orders” in the Episcopal Church in 1834 and was confirmed in October of that year. In July 1835, “he was ordained deacon in Trinity Church, Boston ... and soon afterwards was appointed by the Foreign Committee of the Board of Missions to make an investigation of the State of Mohammedanism in Turkey and Persia." "On ... returning to the United States he was ordained bishop in St. Paul's Chapel, New York City, on October 3, 1839." "He was appointed missionary to Constantinople in 1840, and served for four years in that capacity, during which time he made a tour through Mesopotamia. The Episcopal Church having resolved henceforth to send bishops into the foreign missionary field, [he] was consecrated bishop for dominions and dependencies of the sultan of Turkey in St. Peter's Church, Philadelphia ... 26 October 1844." In 1845, he returned to Constantinople until 1849. On returning to the United States, "he offered his resignation, which was accepted by the house of bishops in October 1850." "He received the degree of S.T.D. from Columbia [University] in 1845 and ... from Trinity [College] in 1846." "He was elected bishop of California in 1850 and of Ha[i]ti in 1870, but declined." "In 1851 he went to Portland, Maine, and organized St. Luke's Parish." In 1852, "he accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Boston, which he held until the close of 1858." "In the autumn of 1859 he became rector of Zion Church, New York City, ... resigning in September 1872," because of failing health. He then retired to Ravenswood, New York. He died on 12 April 1894 in Astoria, Long Island. He married in January 1839 Elizabeth Browne, who died in August 1850 and with whom he had six children. His second marriage, in December 1864, was to Sarah Elizabeth Hutchinson, with whom he had seven children and who survived him. His chief publications are: Narrative of a Tour through Armenia, Kurdistan, Persia and Mesopotamia, 2 vols. (New York, 1840); Narrative of a Visit to the Syrian (Jacobite) Church of Mesopotamia (1844); A Treatise on the Antiquity, Doctrine, Ministry, and Worship of the Anglican Church, in Greek (Constantinople, 1849); Practical Directions for the Observance of Lent (New York, 1850); The War: Its Origin and Its Consequences (London: James Madden, 1855); Parochial Sermons (1859); and The Cross Above the Crescent: A Romance of Constantinople (Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1877). All quotations are from Appleton's Cyclopaedia, s.v. "Southgate, Horatio." Other sources consulted are: N. Cleaveland and A.S. Packard, History of Bowdoin College with Biographical Sketches of Its Graduates from 1806 to 1879, Inclusive (Boston: James Ripley Osgood, 1882), pp. 436–437; General Catalogue of Bowdoin College and the Medical School of Maine A Biographical Record of Alumni and Officers 1794–1950, sesquicentennial ed. (Brunswick, ME: Bowdoin College, 1950), p. 65; New York Times, April 13, 1894; Obituary Record of the Graduates of Bowdoin College and the Medical School of Maine for the Year Ending 1 June 1894, 2nd series, no. 5. (Brunswick, ME: Bowdoin College, [1894], pp. 187–188.

683. Reverend John Henry Hill (11 September 1791 – 1 July 1882) was born in New York City. He graduated from Columbia University at 16 and became a businessman. On 26 April 1821, he married Frances Maria Mulligan (see following Note). After twenty years in the business world, he entered the Protestant Episcopal Seminary in Alexandria, Virginia, and was ordained a priest in Norfolk in 1831. When in that same year his church established a foreign mission in Greece after the expulsion of the Turks, he volunteered for service and went with his wife to Athens, where they opened the first schools for boys and girls in the new Greek kingdom. The following year, the Greek government undertook the education of boys, and the Hills took upon themselves the education of girls and the training of teachers. In addition to operating a paying school called “Mrs. Hill’s Private Boarding and Day School for Children of the Higher Classes,” they also ran “The American School” in the Agora for the poor, free of charge. The quality of female education offered by the Hills caused their school to become a model for other schools in Greece, especially because they did not attempt to proselytize. Rather, “Dr. Hill never tried to disturb the religious beliefs of the Greek girls he taught, but took care most conscientiously to establish them, providing that they be taught the orthodox catechism by a worthy Greek cleric or theologian,” because he “saw that what Greece needed was simply education, and that the proselytism which aims at drawing away Greeks from their national faith, could only injure Greece, disturbing the bases of the religion of the nation ... He revered the Eastern Church, as ancient, preserving the Christian traditions of the first ages, and fitted, if anything was lacking to her, in due time, when education of her clergy and laity was more advanced, to set things in order for herself.” Mr. Hill was also for thirty years the chaplain of the British Legation. He constantly refused offers of decorations from the Greek government, but in 1881, on the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of “The Girls’ School,” King George I sent him an official letter of thanks. In 1877, he became blind but continued his work with his wife’s help. His funeral was a public manifestation of sorrow, and he was accorded the honors given a grand commander (Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. “Hill, John Henry”; Journal of the Proceedings of the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Diocese of Virginia...Nineteenth...of May, 1831 [Richmond, 1831], pp. 12; The Churchman, July 15, Aug. 5, 12, 26, 1882; The Church Eclectic, Oct. 1882, pp. 627–9; New York Times, July 9, 1882; New-York Evening Post, April 27, 1821). Letters of Rev. Hill are in the collection of the Archives of the Episcopal Church in the United States in Austin, TX (Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society: Greece, Crete, and Constantinople Records, 1828–1909, RG67-4 through 8).

John Stevenson Maxwell, in his travels after leaving Russia permanently, visited Athens (December 1844). Here, he attended church on Christmas Day and was invited to Christmas dinner by Mr. Hill, who asked him whether he “was connected with M. Hugh Maxwell ... an old [school] friend of his in New York,” because the resemblance was so strong (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Trieste, entry of Dec. 26 in letter of Dec. 16, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, letter no. 49).

684. Frances Maria Mulligan (10 July 1799 – Athens, Greece 5 August 1884), daughter of Attorney John W. Mulligan (13 April 1774 – New York 17 January 1862) of New York City and Elizabeth (Winter) Mulligan (Louisville, KY 1777 – 18 January 1840) married John Henry Hill on 26 April 1821 (Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. “Hill, John Henry”; New-York Evening Post, April 27, 1821). The paying school she and her husband ran in Athens was called “Mrs. Hill’s Private Boarding and Day School for Children of the Higher Classes.” Frances (Mulligan) Hill had “the superintendence of the internal arrangements of the school,” and she “and the young ladies her helpers from America,” including her sister, Frederica Mulligan, were described as “indefatigable in their labors” ([Simeon H. Calhoun, American Bible Society (ABS) agent for Greece], “Calhoun’s Trip to Greece,” ABS Historical Essay #15, Part III (American Bible Society Archives, n.d.), p. D-12; Walter Barrett, The Old Merchants of New York City, 2nd series [New York: Greenwood, 1968], p. 279, first published in 1863 by Carleton [New York]; Don S. Armentrout and Robert Boak Slocum, eds., An Episcopalian Dictionary of the Church; A User-Friendly Reference for Episcopalians [New York: Church Publishing, 2000]). Frances (Mulligan) Hill took on a greater task in the school’s operation when her husband went blind five years before his death, and she continued to run the school until her own death (Dictionary of American Biography, s.v. “Hill, John Henry”). Over one hundred letters written by Frances (Mulligan) Hill are held by the Archives of the Episcopal Church in the United States in Austin, Texas (Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society: Greece, Crete and Constantinople Records, 1828–1909, RG67-3).

Maxwell called Mrs. Hill “a most excellent and universally beloved woman.” It turned out that she was a schoolmate of his Aunt Maria, and said she knew his mother. He reported that Mrs. Hill was brought up at Sing Sing, New York (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Trieste, entry of December 26 in letter of December 16, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, letter no. 49).

685. “They are very highly respected, and have done much for Greece, having educated many hundred young people, and this winter a young lady from their school was made lady of honour to the Queen, and is now the most admired of all at Court for her beauty and accomplishment” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Trieste, entry of Dec. 26 in letter of Dec. 16, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, letter no. 49).
686. This is Dr. James Ronaldson Handyside (29 July 1798 – 11/23 December 1872), physician to the Gellibrands and Ropeses.
687. Reverend William Henry Newman (1783 – Flatbush 10 January 1852) was ordained a deacon on 3 July 1835 by Bishop Alexander V. Griswold (1766–1843), bishop of the Eastern Diocese of the Episcopal Church in the United States. It has not been possible to ascertain when Rev. Newman was ordained to the priesthood. In 1838, he was minister at St. John’s Church, Cuyahoga Falls, Stow, Ohio; in 1839–1840, at Trinity Church, Newark, Ohio; in 1841, at Wakefield, Rhode Island (Wayne H. Kempton, Archivist–Historiographer of the Episcopal Diocese of New York, to E. Harden, 12 November 2010).

From 1841–1844, he was Rector of Christ’s Church in Westerly, Rhode Island, not far from Stonington, Connecticut. The latter did not have an Episcopal church, and the one in Westerly had not been long established. In 1833, the Rev. Erastus De Wolf preached at Westerly but “no church ... was embodied.” In 1834, the Rev. John A. Clark “was instrumental in organizing” it. “It dates from November 24, 1834. The first pastor ... was Rev. James Pratt.” In 1835, Christ’s Church was built, and in 1836 the parsonage. “[Rev.] Pratt officiated till December 26, 1839” and was succeeded by Rev. Newman (Frederic Denison, Westerly (Rhode Island) and Its Witnesses, for Two Hundred and Fifty Years 1626–1876 [Providence, RI: J.A. & R.A. Reid, 1878], p. 198). When the Whistlers lived in Stonington in the 1830s, they used to travel by hand car to attend services in Westerly (“The early years and boyhood of James MacNeill Whistler,” by Miss Emma W. Palmer, GUL: Whistler Collection, P44).

On 12 May 1844, Rev. Newman became rector of St. Pauls Church, Flatbush, Kings County, New York. On 27 November 1850, he became rector of the Church of the Messiah in Brooklyn, New York. He died in Flatbush on 10 January 1852 at the age of 69. His funeral took place on Wednesday, 14 January 1852, at St. Paul’s Church. He was last listed in the Episcopal Church Annual in New York in 1852 (Wayne Kempton, Archivist–Historiographer of the Episcopal Diocese of New York, 12 November 2010; New York Times, January 15, 1852; The Evening Post (New York), January 13, 1852; New York Observer and Chronicle, February 5, 1852; Brooklyn Eagle, January 12, 1852; Inventory of the Church Archives of New York City, Protestant Episcopal Church, Diocese of Long Island, vol. 2, Brooklyn and Queens [New York: The New York City Historical Records Survey, September 1940], p. 24; enclosure from Mariam Touba, N-YHS, to E. Harden, 23 March 2011). I wish to thank Melanie Delva, Archivist at the Vancouver School of Theology at the University of British Columbia, for initiating the North American search that resulted in this biography of Rev. William H. Newman.

688. Mr. Williams read from “The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Ephesians.” “The theme of this brief letter is God’s eternal purpose in establishing and completing the universal Church of Jesus Christ ... In developing such luminous figures of the church as the body of Christ ..., the building or temple of God ..., and the bride of Christ ..., the author suggests the glorious privilege and destiny of believers as well as their duties” (New Oxford Annotated Bible, p. 1417). Its famous image is that of “putting on the whole armor of God” in order to be able to resist evil.
689. State Councilor Aleksandr Petrovich Mel’nikov (c. 1798 – 10/22 May 1873), referred to also as Mr. M. in the entry for August 1st Thursday, was entrusted to administer the construction section in the Second Department and the section of the Imperial Carriage Establishment in the Office of the Imperial Stables (RGIA: Fond 472, op. 32 (323/1125), d. 925. Formuliarnyi spisok A.P. Mel’nikova Mart 1847g. [Service record of A.P. Mel’nikov March 1847], and Fond 472, op. 257/1273), d. 56. O naznachanii pensii vdove byvshego Sovetnika Pridvornoj Konniushennoj Kontory, Deistvitel’nogo Statskogo Sovetnika Mel’nikova, ne razdel’no s det’mi, po osoboim Monarshei milosti.

- 27 Iun'ia 1873g. ... 10 Augusta 1873g. [Concerning the granting of a pension to the widow of former Councilor of the Office of the Imperial Stables, Actual State Councilor Mel'nikov, indivisibly with her children by special Imperial favor. June 27, 1873 ... August 10, 1873]). See Mel'nikov in Appendix E.
690. Aleksandr Petrovich Mel'nikov was married to Nadezhda Filippova, which is how a spouse's name (first and patronymic) was recorded in a service record (see previous Note for service record file number). According to the memoirs of Baron Andrei Ivanovich Del'vig (1813–1887), a transport engineer, her name was Nadezhda Filippovna Victorova (Baron A.I. Del'vig, Moi vospominaniia [My Memoirs], 4 vols. [Moscow: Moskovskii Publichnyi i Rumiantsovskii muzei, 1912–1913], vol. 1, p. 40). She is referred to as Madame M in the entry for August 1st Thursday. Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel'nikov was a bachelor. See Mel'nikov in Appendix E and Image 247.
691. Persons mentioned in the entry for Friday Aug 2nd who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst, this dear lady, the sufferer, dear invalid, a saint); Mary Gent Hirst's sister-in-law, Margaret (Gordon) Hirst (Mrs. Hirst, this Sister); Anna Whistler's half-sister, Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (my sister, Your Sister, my Sister, sister in Christ Jesus); Mary Gent Hirst's servant, Elona (good Elonas arms); and Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church (Mr Williams visits).
692. Hebrews 12:6: "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."
693. Many years later, when she was 68 years old, Anna Whistler spoke similar words about her husband: "I often have thought that my husband went to Russia for a greater work than the St. Petersburg & Moscow Railway building, his graceful & intellectual qualities and firm religious principles made his example win many to prefer domestic culture, to frivolity or dissipation, we honored & hallowed the Lords Day" (Anna Whistler to Mr. James H. Gamble, Chelsea, November 5 and 22, 1872, GUL: Whistler Collection, W546).
694. 1 Corinthians 13:12: "For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." This quotation is used by Anna Whistler to deal with the idea of the reunion of glorified spirits, so important to her.

695. Matthew 25:12: “But he answered and said, Verily I say unto you, I know you not.” This quotation is taken from the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. The foolish virgins are excluded from the wedding, because they had to go buy oil for their lamps and thus were not present to welcome Christ like the other members of the bridal party. Anna Whistler believed that not making Jesus “the object of our supreme attachment” in life meant not being prepared to enter heaven at death.
696. Persons mentioned in the entry for Monday [August] 5th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Thomas Nelson Hirst and Sophia (Gordon) Hirst, brother and sister-in-law of Mary Gent Hirst (Mr. and Mrs. Hirst); the terminally ill Mary Gent Hirst’s servant (poor Elona); Thomas Scales Ellerby, pastor of the British and American Congregational Church (Mr. Ellerby); Mary (Bealey) Ellerby (his sick wife); Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law’s summer replacement in the English Church (Mr. Williams); and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, wife of William Hooper Ropes (Mrs. Ropes).
697. Abraham Priest Gibson (10 July 1791 – 30 November 1852) was the American consul general in St. Petersburg (1819–1850). See his biography in Appendix E (hereafter, Gibson) and Image 279.
698. Revel was seized from Charles XII of Sweden in 1710 by Peter the Great, who founded a naval port there. It “is situated on a small bay on the south side of the Gulf of Finland, two hundred miles west-southwest of St. Petersburg” (Sears, Description of the Russian Empire, p. 60).
699. I Kings 19:18: “Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and every mouth which hath not kissed him.”
700. Mary Gent Hirst, age 47 years, died on 23 July /4 August 1844, and was to be buried on 27 July /8 August 1844 (PREC STP for 1844, p. 312).
701. This is Sarah (Lake) Hodgson (Llandeilo, Carmarthenshire, Wales c. 1806 – London 2 January 1875). She was the wife of John Hodgson (Newcastle upon Tyne 1 January 1790 – Margate, Kent 24 September 1855), member of a leading family in Newcastle upon Tyne and of the firm of Thomson, Bonar and Co., London and St. Petersburg. They were married by license on 14 January 1833 at the church of St. Mary Newington, Surrey, South London. They had seven surviving children: Mary Ann (St. Pancras, London 4 December 1829 – St. Pancras, London c.

- 1901), John Evan (Camberwell, Surrey 1 March 1831 – 1895), Hannah (St. Petersburg 23 February / 7 March 1835 – after 1891 Census), Sarah (St. Petersburg 11/23 July 1839 – 14 February 1919), Thomas Lawrence (13/25 December 1840 – buried 15 May 1922), Fanny (St. Petersburg 8/20 June 1842 – 1916), Jane Maria (St. Petersburg 1/13 July 1845 – 25 July 1924). Mary Ann married in London on 16 July 1851 Sir Thomas Miles Riddell (3rd Baronet of Strontian and Ardnamunchan, MP). John Evan, artist and historical painter, married Helen [?], 26 years old (1861 Census for St. Marylebone, London, 5 Hill Road), born c. 1835 in Riga, Russia. The remaining five siblings were unmarried (Newcastle Guardian and Tyne Mercury, September 28, 1855; 1851–1911 censuses, IGI; Pall Mall Gazette, January 6, 1875; National Probate Calendar [UK], 1919). Anna Whistler garbled the surname twice, calling Mrs. Hodgson Hodges and Hodson.
702. Elizabeth Charlotte Hodgson, aged 7 months and 3 days, died on 23 July / 4 August 1844, and was buried on 26 July / 7 August 1844 (PREC STP for 1844, p. 312). She was born on 20 December 1843 / 1 January 1844 and baptized on 3/15 February 1844 (IGI).
703. William Hooper Ropes's ship Czarina had as a passenger Martha Reed Ropes (13 June 1826 – 21 August 1888), his youngest sister, who had been detained in Cronstadt (list of marriages and issue, HUBL: Ropes Papers). She had been to St. Petersburg on various occasions, beginning in 1834, but lived with William and Mary Anne (Codman) Ropes, her father and his second wife, and their children, whose home was now in Boston. Having failed to resolve his sister's predicament, William Hooper Ropes was now turning to Colonel Charles Sterwart Todd, the American envoy, for help. See Ropes, Gellibrand, Prince, Hall in Appendix E.
704. Persons mentioned in the entry for Wed [August] 7th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, wife of William Hooper Ropes (Mrs. Ropes); her sister-in-law, Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (Mrs Gellibrand); William Bonamy Maingay, brother of Deborah Whistler's close friend in England (Mr. Wm. Maingay); Kirk Boott Whistler and Charles Donald Whistler, Anna Whistler's deceased little sons (my Kirkies, little Charlies); Catherine Julia McNeill, first cousin to Deborah Whistler (Jule); Maria (Cammann) McNeill, Anna Whistler's sister-in-law (dear Maria); and Henry Cammann McNeill, Anna Whistler's deceased nephew (dear Henry).

705. Susannah (Walker) Drury, wife of Thomas Drury Sr., had died, aged 78 years, on 24 February / 8 March 1842, and was buried on 2/14 March 1842 (PREC STP for 1842, p. 283). Thomas Drury, widower, and Mary Little (bap. 26 July 1797 – 21 November / 3 December 1868), spinster, were married on 28 October / 9 November 1843 (RGIA: Fond 1689, Register of the Chapel of the British Factory St. Petersburg January 1831 – December 1864, op. 1, d. 3, no. 5341). The landlady was therefore a recent second wife.
706. One of the Russian words for “Thank you” is spelled “Blagodarstvuyte” (pronounced “Bluhgahdar’stvooyti”). The gardener was using the shortened form of this word, spelled “Bladaste” and pronounced “Blahdah’sti.”
707. This is the Russian word for “dear mama” or “mommy,” spelled “mamen’ka” and pronounced “mah’minkuh.”
708. It has not been possible to ascertain who this friend was.
709. The letter from Mary in America received by Anna Whistler on 7 August 1844 cannot have been from Mary Brennan, who was then at the dacha. The girls referred to here are the daughters of Maria (Cammann) and William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31): Mary Isabella (see Image 32) and Eliza. This identification seems confirmed by the fact that the family of William Gibbs McNeill, except for Mary, is reported in the girls’ letters to be off to West Point. It has not been possible to locate these letters.
710. The initials JDP bring to mind the brother of Kate Prince, John Dynely Prince Jr. (bap. Hayfield, Derby, England 6 June 1814 – Pawtucket, RI 9 March 1862), who married Mary Travers (1822 – 26 May 1874) on 29 July 1844 in Trenton, New Jersey. They had a son, also John Dynely Prince (b. New Jersey 27 May 1845; bap. Lowell, MA 5 July 1845; d. New York 20 November 1883) (M1372: Passport Applications 1795–1905, roll 181, passport no. 19164; Boston Transcript, November 21, 1883; IGI).
711. Persons mentioned in the entry for Thursday [August] 8th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: the deceased Mary Gent Hirst (Miss Hirst, dear Mistress); Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law’s summer replacement in the English Church (Mr Williams); Elona, servant to Mary Gent Hirst (poor Elona); Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler’s half-sister (My Sister); William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant (Mr Gellibrands carriage); Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, sister of the newly arrived Martha Reed Ropes (Mrs. Gellibrands Sister);

Colonel Charles Stewart Todd (the Cols representations); Martha Reed Ropes (young countrywoman, Miss Martha Ropes); and William Hooper Ropes, brother of Martha Reed Ropes (Mr. Ropes).

712. Mary Gent Hirst's age in the register is correctly given as 47 years (PREC STP for 1844, p. 312). Anna Whistler, however, says the figures "her age 37" were on the coffin in silver characters.
713. The English are for the most part buried in the Smolensk Lutheran, or Evangelical, Cemetery, which is called Smolensko Cemetery (from the Russian adjective "Smolenskoe") in the Parish Register of the English Church at St. Petersburg. On the basis of the recommendation made by the Commission for Building in St. Petersburg, in 1738 a new decree was issued by the Synod concerning "places where burials should take place." In this decree, the future Smolensk Cemetery (Orthodox) near Black River (Chernaia rechka) on Vasilievskii Island is mentioned for the first time. The ukase of 1756 brought into existence two of the most famous burial grounds of Old Petersburg, which still exist today, in the twenty-first century: the Smolensk and Volkov cemeteries. As regards the Smolensk Cemetery, the ukase of 1756 simply confirmed the already-established tradition of burial in the northwestern section of Vasilievskii Island near Chernaia rechka, between Lines 18 and 23. The wooden church here of the Smolensk Icon of the Mother of God was consecrated in the autumn of 1760. The cemetery was surrounded with a fence, and a trench for drying out the marshy site was dug from the western side. Chernaia rechka was also renamed after the Smolensk Church and called the Smolenka River. The dilapidated wooden church was rebuilt in 1772 and consecrated as the Church of St. Michael the Archangel. In 1786–1788, on the site of two almshouses built in 1762, the Smolensk Temple (kbtram), a stone edifice, was built. Although the Smolensk Cemetery suffered greatly during the catastrophic floods of 1777 and 1824, it continued to remain one of the important and famous cemeteries of St. Petersburg. Starting in the 1820s, pilgrimages began to be made here to the grave of Blessed Kseniia of Petersburg (canonized in 1988). Primarily inhabitants of Vasilievskii Island were buried in this cemetery, but frequently funeral processions made their way here from other parts of the city, too. Traditionally the intelligensia was buried here: university professors, academicians, artists, actors, writers. On the right bank of the Smolenka River, in the southern part of Golodai Island, there was from 1747 a cemetery for foreign inhabitants of St. Petersburg belonging to various faiths, of which Protestants made up the largest group. A significant number of the foreigners lived on Vasilievskii Island. The founding and history of the Smolensk Lutheran Cemetery is closely connected with the oldest Lutheran Church in St. Petersburg, that of St. Catherine. The cemetery was registered with this church, subordinated to its church council and intended above all for the non-Orthodox inhabitants of Vasilievskii Island. Since German Lutherans predominated among St. Petersburg's foreign inhabitants, in the eighteenth century foreign cemeteries were most often called Lutheran or German, although Catholics (who until the mid-nineteenth century had no burial ground of their own), Anglican, Reformed, and other denominations were also buried here. This particular Lutheran cemetery acquired the name Smolensk Lutheran, or Evangelical, Cemetery after the Church of the Smolensk Icon of the Mother of God was built (1760) in the neighboring Orthodox cemetery. In 1791, an Armenian Cemetery was also established nearby (Kobak, Istoricheskie kladbishcha Peterburga, pp. 22, 24, 25, 286, 288, 290, 309; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 292–293; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 3, pp. 183–188). When Anna Whistler says their horses could not take them to the island where the Smolensk Lutheran Cemetery was located, she may have had in mind the distance, as they had to traverse Vasilievskii Island and then cross onto Golodai Island, and the fact that the road to the cemetery could be muddy.

714. There is some confusion here. William Ropes's sister, Martha Reed Ropes (13 June 1826 – 21 August 1888), is meant, and she was supposed to be on the Czarina, but documents show that Colonel Todd asked that Miss Sarah Louisa Ropes (19 July 1819 – 5 October 1910), arrived on the Corea, be permitted to land and permission was received (Records of Foreign Service Posts. Diplomatic Posts. USSR. Vol. 165. Miscellaneous Sent. Todd. 1841-1846. Major General Dubel't to Colonel Todd, 26 July 1844, RG84: Reel 35/14, NAUS). Major General Leontii Vasilievich Dubel't (1792–1862; see Image 311) was chief of staff of the Corps of Gendarmes and director of the Third Department (Security Police) of His Majesty's Own Chancery from 1839 under "Benckendorff [see Image 308] until the latter died" on 23 September / 5 October "1844 and to Benckendorff's successor Orlov (see Image 312) until both retired in 1856" (Squire, Third Department, p. 142). For further information on Dubel't see Squire, pp. 142–166.

715. Anna Whistler meant “Strel’na.” When one is going in the direction of Peterhof, Strel’na is next after the Trinity-Sergius Monastery and is located on the seventeenth verst of the Peterhof Road. An elevated spot on the shore was chosen by Peter the Great as a suitable place for quickly crossing the Gulf of Finland to Cronstadt. First a wooden palace was built here; then, in the teens of the eighteenth century, the construction of a stone staging palace, the closest of the Imperial palaces to St. Petersburg, was begun. The palace (see Images 398–399), its main façade facing the sea, stands on the crest of this elevation, which descends to the Lower Park in a series of three terraces. The proximity to the sea, the features of the natural relief of the shore, and the rich water resources of the area suggested great possibilities for the creation of a park with a system of canals and fountains. A system of horizontal and vertical canals and one circular canal, in the center of which stands a small island, emerges into the Gulf of Finland and also approaches the palace, making it possible to arrive at the palace by boat. A series of architects worked on the palace: Jean-Baptiste Leblond (1679–1719), N. Michetti (1675–1759), M.G. Zemtsov (1688–1743), T.N. Usov (1700–1728), A.N. Voronikhin (1759–1814), and L. Rusca (1758–1822). In 1722, Peter, who had lost interest in Strel’na, gave it and the unfinished palace to his daughter, Grand Duchess Anna Petrovna (1708–1728), as an engagement present. In the reign (1730–1740) of Anna Ioannovna (1693–1740), the palace burned down. Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (1709–1761; reigned 1740–1761; see Image 413) ordered it rebuilt according to plans by Rastrelli, but the Seven Years War interfered with its completion. It remained unfinished and in a state of neglect until 1797, when Paul I (see Image 417) gave Strel’na to his son, Grand Duke Konstantin Pavlovich (1779–1831), who set about having the palace restored and the park built. In the summer of 1800, he moved there, living first in the wooden palace and then in the west wing of the stone palace. In December 1803 /January 1804, the entire palace burned down again and, in 1804, was once more rebuilt. After this, the palace did not undergo changes for close to half a century. Strel’na was Konstantin Pavlovich’s favorite place in summer. After his death, it passed to his nephew, Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich (1827–1892; see Image 436). In 1847, a new cycle of construction was begun (by A.I. Shtakenshneider [see Image 194] and others) that greatly changed the ensemble of buildings and grounds. The wooden palace was still standing when the Whistlers were in Russia (V. Ia. Kurbatov, Progulki po okrestnostiam Leningrada: Strel'na i Oranienbaum [Walks in the Environs of Leningrad: Strel'na and Oranienbaum]. [Leningrad: Izdanie Leningradskogo Gubernskogo Soveta Professional'nykh Soizov 1925], pp. 16–29; Stolpianskii, Petergofskaia pershpektivna, pp. 35–46, 69; Pyliaev, Zabytoe prashloe 1889, pp. 205–226). Anna Whistler does not record any visit to the two palaces, but does seem to have visited the grounds of the Orlov or the L'vov estates, which were also in Strel'na (Gorbatenko, Petergofskaia doroga, pp. 210–212; Iu.A. Duzhnikov, Po Izhorskoii vozvysbennosti [Along the Izhora Heights] [Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1972], p. 39).

716. The third sister was either Elizabeth Hannah Ropes (14 May 1825 – 25 November 1921; see Image 267), or the word was used to mean their sister-in-law, Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes.
717. That she was Martha Ropes is corroborated as well by Maxwell, who had been abroad and did not meet her until 16 October 1844. His account of her arrival in St. Petersburg is, unlike Anna Whistler's, humorous:

Yesterday I dined at M<sup>r</sup> Gillebrands and met there among others, a Miss Ropes from Boston a sister of M<sup>rs</sup> Gillebrand. She is quite young, about 17 and one of the merriest Boston girls you ever saw. Her passport was out of rule and upon her arrival the poor little damsel was detained at Cronstadt by the police, gaurded [sic] by a sentinel and though she was a [sic] liberty to march about town in Cronstadt, she was always attended by an escort, 'armed and equipped as the law directs' - The fun of it was she took it all in good humour and while her relatives here were in a state of consternation, Miss Martha was playing heroine and with her gaurd [sic] of honour, visited the governor and the great folk of the harbour. It was only after a note from the Chief of the Police to the Governor had been obtained that her ladyship was relieved from her warlike attendants and permitted to come to town. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of October 17 in letter of Oct. 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 45)

See also Maxwell, Czar, pp. 59–60.

718. Sarah Dwight Bliss (3 June 1826 – 8 September 1896) was the daughter of the Whistlers' friends in Springfield, Massachusetts, George (16 November 1798 – 19 April 1873) and Mary Shephard (Dwight) Bliss (24 February 1801 – 12 February 1870).

719. Persons mentioned in the entry for Saturday [August] 10th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: William Maingay (Mr. Maingay); William Bonamy Maingay (his son); and Thomas Drury Sr. (my landlord).
720. On 10 August 1844, Martha (Kingsley) McNeill (see Image 22) turned sixty-nine years old.
721. Henry Cammann McNeill's funeral had taken place on 10 August 1840. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
722. Persons mentioned in the entry for Sunday [August] 11th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: the deceased Mary Gent Hirst (dear Miss Hirst, that blessed Saint); the deceased Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (Grand Duchess Alexandrine); and the Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church (Mr Williams). Although dated Sunday [August] 11th, this entry is acknowledged as having been written on Monday, 12 August in the entry for that day.
723. This is Charlotte Leon (20 April 1764 – 24 January / 5 February 1847), pensioner. See her biography in Appendix E (hereafter, Leon).
724. Anna Whistler mentions factual and anecdotal details of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna's death, funeral, and burial in a number of diary entries (see also Images 444–460). What she relates depends on what she has been told by others, as she could not understand well or read Russian. In the notes for each of her entries, I have given the information from entries in the Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal corresponding to those same dates. Although sometimes the same details are not given in the diary entries and in the Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal on the same day, by the time of the last note concerning these events, the reader will have all the details from the Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal that can corroborate, correct, or enlarge upon Anna Whistler's diary entries. The material is being presented in this way in the interest of consecutive narrative and sustained emotional impact. Comments on the unsuitable behavior of Prince Friedrich of Hesse will, of course, not be found in the Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, but the emotional impact of its dry official entries is surprisingly moving.

The Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna died in her mother's study in the New (Alexander) Palace in Tsarskoe Selo. A separate Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal was kept for the period from the day of her death through the day of her burial and the departure of her husband from Russia (RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal. Zhurnal. O konchine i pogrebenii v Bozhe pochivaiushchei Velikoi Kniagini Aleksandry Nikolaevny. S 29<sup>go</sup> Iulia po 5e chis: Avgusta 1844<sup>go</sup> goda [Journal concerning the decease and burial of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, reposing in God. From the 29th of July through the 5th of August [OS] 1844] [hereafter, RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny).

29 [OS July/NS 10 August] Saturday. At 8 o'clock in the morning Her Highness Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna partook of the Holy Mysteries of Christ brought from the field church by Archbishop Bazhanov. Present at this ceremony in the Study of Her Majesty, where Her Highness had been staying during her illness, were their Imperial Majesties and Prince Friedrich of Hesse, Her Highness's spouse. — while at this time Their Highnesses the Heir to the Throne and His Spouse, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich, Grand Duchess Maria Nikolaevna, Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, the Grand Duchess and Princess of Mecklenburg, the Duke of Leuchtenburg, Prince Alexander of Hesse and Christian of Holstein were in Her Majesty's dining room.

At 9:15 in the morning Her Imperial Highness Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna was delivered of a child in this same Study of Her Majesty and the Almighty favored to bestow upon their Imperial Majesties a grandson, and upon Her Imperial Highness and Her Spouse a Son, to whom a prayer was read by Archbishop Bazhanov and the name Wilhelm given. [The word "Prematurely" is written in the margin by this paragraph.]

Soon after this the newborn baby was christened according to the rites of the Lutheran faith by Pastor Avenarius of the Lutheran Church in Tsarskoe Selo, which ceremony took place in the dining room located next to the Study.

The Sponsors were Their Imperial Majesties, the Landgraf of Hesse and His Spouse the Princess Louisa and Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein-Zondersburg-Glucksburg.

At 10:45 the newborn infant Prince Wilhelm passed away in this same room.

At 4:20 in the afternoon ... in the abovementioned Study Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna departed this burdensome life for eternal bliss in the Presence of Their Imperial Majesties and Their Imperial Highnesses the Heir to the Throne and His Spouse, Grand Dukes Konstantin Nikolaevich and Mikhail Pavlovich, Grand Duchess Maria Nikolaevna, Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna, the Grand Duchess and Princess of Mecklenburg, the Duke of Leuchtenberg, Prince Peter Oldenburg, Friedrich the Spouse of Her Highness, Alexander of Hesse and Christian of Holstein.

Present at the dinner table of Her Majesty in the dressing room were Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna and the Grand Duchess and Princess of Mecklenburg.

His Majesty declined to hold a dinner table.

At half past seven in the evening a requiem mass was performed over the body of the deceased Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna by Archbishop Bazhanov in the presence of Their Majesties and Their Highnesses and certain persons comprising the Imperial Suite.

Then commenced the reading of the Holy Gospel in turn by archbishops and archdeacons of the Court near the body of Her Highness.

30 [OS July/NS 11 August]. Sunday

... At two o'clock in the afternoon, the body of the infant Prince Wilhelm was placed in a lead coffin by the Ladies of the Chamber of Her Highness the deceased Grand Duchess. The coffin was sealed in the presence of the Marshal of the Court Count Shuvalov and Major General Prince Suvorov, who were on duty, and it was then placed in a wooden coffin covered with gold brocaded cloth and silver tulle, after which it was carried by Count Shuvalov and Prince Suvorov into the room where the deceased Grand Duchess was lying and was placed on a table prepared for it. (RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, fols. 372r through 376r)

Archbishop Vasilii Borisovich Bazhanov (1800–1883) was the Imperial Confessor. The Pastor of the Lutheran Church in Tsarskoe Selo from 1823 or 1824 to 1850 was Peter Gustav Avenarius (Wuoles, Ingermanland 31 January 1794 – Wuoles, Ingermanland 15 May 1854) (Erik Amburger, Die Pastoren der evangelischen Kirchen Russlands vom Ende des 16. Jahrhunderts bis 1937. Ein biographisches Lexikon [Pastors of the Protestant Churches of Russia from the End of the 16th Century to 1937: A Biographical Dictionary]

- [Lüneburg, Germany: Institut Nordostdeutsches Kulturwerk–Martin-Luther-Verlag, 1998], pp. 97, 251).
725. “This World is All a Fleeting Show” is a poem by Thomas Moore (Thomas Moore, Irish Melodies and Sacred Songs [New York and Boston: C.S. Francis, 1854], pp. 147–148). “This world is but a fleeting show” is also a line in Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, but this seems unlikely as Anna Whistler’s source.
726. This was the Hodgson family. See Notes 701 and 702 above.
727. Richard Miller (27 July 1818 – 12 January 1890) was the invalid brother of William Miller, merchant and honorary British vice-consul in St. Petersburg.
728. 1 Kings 21:20: “And Ahab said to Elijah, Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? And he answered, I have found thee: because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord.”
729. 1 Corinthians 2:9: “But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him.”
730. This work seems to have been written anonymously. Subsequent works by this author are announced by the publisher only as having been written by “the author of Scriptural Instruction for the Least and the Lowest.” This suggests that the author may have been a woman.
731. William Leighton Drury and John Thomas Drury were the grandsons of the Whistlers’ landlord, Thomas Drury Sr. William Leighton was born on 1/13 July 1832 (PREC STP for 1832, p. 161), John Thomas on 2/14 August 1833 (PREC STP for 1833, p. 176). See Note 738 below.
732. Alice Handyside, daughter of Dr. James Ronaldson and Sophia (Fock) Handyside, was born on 3/15 December 1836 (PREC STP for 1836, p. 219).
733. Mary Handyside, daughter of Dr. James Ronaldson and Sophia (Fock) Handyside, was born on 27 April /9 May 1839 (PREC STP for 1839, p. 253). She died, age 13 years and 3 months, on 23 July /4August 1852 (PREC STP for 1852, p. 433). Mary and Alice were motherless.
734. The Whistlers’ family physician was Dr. James Rogers (1810 – 11 July 1890), physician to the British Legation. See his biography in Appendix E.

735. “31. [OS July/NS 12 August] Monday. From two o’clock in the morning until 6 o’clock in the morning Her Highness was embalmed by Doctor Ru. With him were the Imperial Doctor, Dr. Markus, and the swaddling nurse of the deceased Grand Duchess.

At ten o’clock in the morning a requiem mass was performed over the body of the Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, reposing in God, in the presence of Their Majesties and Their Highnesses, by Archbishop Bazhanov and the Archdeacon and singers, and after this the body of Her Highness was placed by the Ladies of the Chamber in a coffin covered with gold brocaded cloth and silver tulle with four tassels of the same kind in the corners.

After this began the ceremonial removal of the body of Her deceased Highness from the Study of Her Majesty to the field Church through the private garden onto the terrace and thence into the oval hall and then by way of the rooms leading toward the field Church ... the body of the deceased infant Wilhelm remained in the Study. With it was the Adjutant of Prince Friedrich of Hesse, Lindholm. After the liturgy the public was admitted for its farewell ... into the corner Study of Her Highness, where the Pastor of the Lutheran Church, Avenarius, gave a speech over the body of the deceased infant.

After this the coffin with the body of the infant Prince was carried through a dark corridor to the Emperor’s entranceway.

... After bringing the coffin with the body to the abovementioned entrance, the pastor got into a waiting parade Carriage drawn by 6 horses harnessed in tandem and received the coffin with the body handed to him by persons of the Court, and then it was accompanied by the abovementioned persons of the Court in various equipages, except for the Emperor, and was driven to the Lutheran Church in Tsarskoe Selo.

On arrival at the Church the coffin with the body was taken from the Carriage by the persons of the Court accompanying it and brought into the Church, where it was placed on a catafalque covered with mourning cloth. At this time a brief speech was made by Pastor Avenarius, after which the persons of the Court, having kissed the coffin, returned to the New Palace and thence to their places of abode” (RGIA: Kamer-fur’erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, fols. 378r – 381v).

736. Empress Elizaveta Alekseevna (Louisa-Maria-Augusta, Princess of Baden) (Karlsruhe 13/24 January 1779 – Belev, Tula Province 4/16 May 1826; see Image 419) had died eighteen years before.

There had, however, been other royal deaths since then, e.g., that of Dowager Empress Maria Fyodorovna (Sofia-Dorothea-Augusta-Luisa, Princess of Württemberg) (Stettin 14/25 October 1759 – St. Petersburg 24 October /5 November 1828; see Images 415–416) and of Grand Duke Konstantin Pavlovich (Tsarskoe Selo 27 April /8 May 1779 – Vitebsk 15/27 June 1831) (Kuz'min, Rossiiskaia imperatorskaia familiia, pp. 147–149, 177–182, 210–214).

737. Persons mentioned in the entry for Tuesday [August] 13th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Colonel Charles Stewart Todd, the American envoy (the Col); and Thomas Drury Sr. (Our landlord).
738. William Drury (10/22 April 1800 – 30 January/11 February 1864) (PREC STP, no. 1809; no. 7600, p. 774) was the eldest son of Susannah (Walker) and Thomas Drury Sr. He was married to Elizabeth P'Anson (b. after 22 October 1793) on 6/18 August 1827 (PREC STP, no. 3664). They had ten children: Jesse Ann, b. 22 February / 6 March 1828 (PREC STP for 1828, page reference missing); Elizabeth Sophia, b. 1829 (p. 133); William Leighton, b. 1/13 July 1832 (p. 161); John Thomas, b. 2/14 August 1833 (p. 176); Edward Alfred, b. 1834 (p. 192); Thomas Anthony, b. 1836 (p. 209); Frederick Henry, b. 1838 (p. 235); Anthony James, b. 1839 (p. 258); George Galt, b. 1841 (p. 277); Albert Charles, b. 1844 (p. 313). Elizabeth (P'Anson) Drury was the daughter of Henry P'Anson (bap. 11 April 1773) and Elizabeth (Woolloton) P'Anson (married 22 October 1793). She was the niece by marriage of Sir James Leighton (b. c. 1770 – Greenford, Middlesex 7 March 1843), court physician to Alexander I and for a time in the 1820s to Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna. It has not been possible to ascertain the name of the French governess.
739. “1 [OS August/NS 13 August] Tuesday. ... At six o'clock in the afternoon the coffin with the body of the deceased Grand Duchess was covered with a lid when Their Majesties were not present, but before that, after dining, Their Majesties spent some time by the body of Her deceased Highness ...
 ... The coffin with the body was lifted from the catafalque and carried through the concert hall and the Corridor between the rooms of the Grand Dukes to Their entrance ... After being brought to the abovementioned entrance, the coffin with the body was placed in a waiting landau drawn by 8 horses harnessed in tandem; two personal servants also got in to support the Coffin ... on the back of the landau stood two Court footmen ...

At 7:35 in the evening the melancholy procession started from the entrance for St. Petersburg and the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul ...

At 9:30 in the evening the body of the deceased infant Prince Wilhelm was taken from the Lutheran Church in Tsarskoe Selo by the Adjutant of Prince Friedrich of Hesse, Lindholm, and brought in a Court Carriage to the Lutheran Church of [St.] Anne ... Toward 10 o'clock in the evening those who were on duty arrived at the Fortress of Sts. Peter and Paul at the summoning of the Department of Ceremonial Affairs ... in mourning ... and assembled in the house of the Commandant of the Fortress ... After the arrival of the melancholy cortege from Tsarskoe Selo at the Peter and Paul Fortress everyone passed into the Cathedral ... At 10:30 Her Majesty arrived at St. Petersburg from Tsarskoe Selo via railway ... and went by carriage to the Elagin Palace ... At 1:30 in the morning His Majesty and Prince Friedrich of Hesse arrived at the Elagin Palace by open carriage from the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul" (RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevy, fols. 383r – 391v).

740. Persons mentioned in the entry for Wed [August] 14th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler's half-sister (my Sister); Colonel Ivan Frantsevich Bouttatz, Major Whistler's colleague and Whistler family friend (Col Bouttatz, Col B); and Mr. Eduard de Stoeckl, junior secretary of the Russian Legation in Washington (Mr. Stoeckl).
741. It has not been possible to locate this letter. Thomas Woodcock Winstanley (9 February 1805 – 19 July 1844) was the nephew of John Winstanley. See Winstanley ... Cragg in Appendix E.
742. Robert Smith (c. 1782 – 27 November 1863) was a cotton manufacturer living at Chaddock Hall in the township of Tyldesley in the Parish of Leigh. He was the brother of Esther (Smith) Ormerod, wife of Richard Ormerod, and, therefore, was uncle to Ann Ormerod, who in early 1847 married Rev. John Clarke Haden, uncle of Francis Seymour Haden. Anna Whistler had made Robert Smith's acquaintance on her first visit to England in 1829–1831 and met him again in the summer of 1847.
743. "The St. Petersburg Military Governor General, honored to receive at two o'clock in the morning today a handwritten Imperial rescript of gratitude, hastens to communicate it to the inhabitants of the Capital.

Aleksandr Aleksandrovich!

After accompanying the body of My deceased Daughter to its final dwelling place the first requirement of My heart is to entrust you with announcing to the inhabitants of the Capital how deeply and utterly We all are touched by the general sympathy shown to Us, both during the prolonged terminal illness of Our Dearest deceased Daughter, and at Her death, and finally this very night. Such manifestations of general feeling are not new to Me; until now they have been displayed on days of joyous events; but when it has pleased God to try Us with a most severe blow, what can be more comforting to Our parental hearts, when bowing before His Will, than to see so strikingly, so tenderly that Our grief is a general grief, the grief of the entire family of the people entrusted to Me by God. We thank you like a father for your filial love. In this love is Our solace, and for Me the strength to continue on My difficult way.

May these mutual feelings be a pledge, in the days ahead as well, of the good fortune of Russia.

We remain ever favorably disposed toward you

Nicholas

Elagin Island

2 August 1844 [14 August NS]

after 1 in the morning”

(RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, p. 371a recto). This is a printed sheet.

The military governor general of St. Petersburg in 1844 was Adjutant General and General of Infantry Aleksandr Aleksandrovich Kavelin (see Image 314) (V.A. Frish and I.P. Vysotskii, S.-Peterburgskaia stolichnaia politsiia i gradolnachal'stvo. Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk [St. Petersburg Capital City Police and City Administration: A Brief Historical Essay] [St. Petersburg: Golike i Vil'borg, 1903], facing pp. 136, 152; Iakov Dlugolenskii, Voenno-grazhdanskaia i politseiskaia vlast' Sankt-peterburga 1703–1917 [The Military-Civil and Police Forces of St. Petersburg, 1703–1917] [St. Petersburg: Neva, 2001], pp. 118–122).

English geologist Sir Roderick Impey Murchison (1792–1871; knighted 1846; see Image 192), who was received by Nicholas I not long after the funeral of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, so that he could present a copy of his work on Russia, reported in his journal that the emperor described that night to him as follows:

On then asking after the health of the Empress, his countenance all at once changed, and taking my hand, which he warmly pressed, “Yes,” said he, “we have also had a terrible trial, but I have indeed had a test of the affection of my people which has touched my heart. As regards the death of my dear daughter” (and here the tears burst from his manly eyes), “I wished to have her buried at night, without any pomp whatsoever, accompanied by a single battalion and some followers. What was then my astonishment to see the whole population from Tsarskoe Selo to the citadel (twenty versts) forming such a dense column that my horse could hardly walk through it. The sight of this multitude on their knees praying for us, and sharing in the deep silence the anguish of my soul, truly touched my heart. Then I felt what it was to possess the love of one’s people.” (Archibald Geikie, Life of Sir Roderick I. Murchison, 2 vols. (London: John Murray, 1875), vol. 2, pp. 35–36)

744. Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (see Images 434, 444, 451) became so thin that her wedding ring kept falling off her finger, so her father gave her a very small one that stayed on. He had the pavilion she asked him for built. He helped carry her down into the garden, where she wanted to go, but she could not remain there. When she died, he tried to assuage his grief by exhibiting an unusual amount of energy rather than crying. He tried to avoid all the funeral solemnities. He did not like black or tears. He did not return to Tsarskoe Selo again and set about to change the shrubs below her room and the balcony and everything that reminded them of her illness (Son iunosti, pp. 165, 166).
745. The first five classes of Court servitors were required to don mourning for three months, starting from the day on which Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna died (RGIA: Kamerfur’erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, fol. 377v).
746. “In the midst of life we are in death: of whom may we seek for succour, but of thee, O Lord, who for our sins are justly displeased? Yet, O Lord God most holy, O Lord most mighty, O holy and most merciful Saviour, deliver us not into the bitter pains of eternal death” (Book of Common Prayer ... in the United States, p. 265; Oxford Book of Common Prayer, p. 97). This is one of the “seven texts ... collectively known as ‘funeral sentences’ and ‘as a burial service’”; see “The Order for the Burial of the Dead” in the Book of Common Prayer ... in the United States (pp. 262–266) and the Oxford Book of Common Prayer (p. 97).

747. Olga Nikolaevna (see Images 420, 432) records the following in her memoirs: Aleksandra Nikolaevna “reported having dreamt one night of dying and said ‘My God, can it be that I won’t be able to carry the baby for the full nine months?’ adding, ‘God’s will be done’” (Son iunosti, pp. 163–166).
748. Sophia Higginbotham (23 July /3 August 1797 – 1/13 July 1854), daughter of John and Amelia Higginbotham (PREC STP for 1854, p. 159), was governess to Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna. When Aleksandra Nikolaevna first fell ill, she expressed the wish to see her “Miss.” Miss Higginbotham, whom she called “Miss Higg,” came to her “dear child” and remained with her to the end (Son iunosti, pp. 163, 165). Sir Roderick Impey Murchison (see Image 192) wrote in his journal:

The Emperor was near his dear child when she made her last sign to him to approach her, when kissing her and putting his ear to her expiring voice, she said, “Papa, never forget the person to whom I owe everything.” This allusion was to Miss Higginbotham, the governess of this excellent and beautiful young princess, and no nobler trait of her character could she have left behind her. (Geikie, Life of Murchison, vol. 2, p. 36)

Miss Higginbotham was also held in great esteem by Nicholas I (Bang, Livs Minder, p. 301), which may be one of the reasons why Dr. Martin Wilhelm von Mandt, his personal physician, disliked her (Bang, p. 247). It was Mandt who correctly diagnosed that Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna had tuberculosis instead of whooping cough, the diagnosis of the emperor’s previous personal physician, Dr. Georg Rauch (1780–1864), who was hard of hearing and therefore unable to use the stethoscope. She had been treated chiefly with baths, being kept in cold temperatures, and other forms of hardening on the initiative of Miss Higginbotham (Bang, p. 244). There were many clashes between Mandt and Miss Higginbotham. Dr. Oluf Lundt Bang (see Image 485), the Danish physician who was requested by Prince Friedrich of Hesse-Kassel, husband of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, to come to St. Petersburg and treat her, confirmed Mandt’s diagnosis. He felt that Denmark would suffer a great loss in the death of Aleksandra Nikolaevna, who was known throughout the entire country for her goodness (Bang, p. 303). He also attributed the fact that she was equally cultured both emotionally and spiritually (“on the heart’s as well as on the spirit’s side”) to the influence of Miss Higginbotham (Bang, p. 303). Miss Higginbotham visited Bang in Copenhagen later that year. The newspaper noted on 8 October 1844 that she had arrived on 6 October and had stayed at the Hotel d’Angleterre (Bang, p. 303). Presumably she came on the French steamship Amsterdam, which docked in Copenhagen en route from St. Petersburg to Le Havre, and she may have journeyed on to England on the English steamship Mermaid, which left Copenhagen for London on Wednesday, 9 October (Bang, p. 303). Her name ceases to appear in the Mesiatsoslov as of 1845. On 2/14 September 1851, she and John Wilson, widower, were married by banns, according to the Rites of the Church of England by Rev. Dr. Edward Law (PREC STP, no. 6186, p. 416). Sophia (Higginbotham) Wilson died at the age of 56 years and eleven months on 1/13 July 1854 and was buried in the Smolensk Cemetery on 5/17 July 1854 (PREC STP, no. 6526, p. 473). See also O. Iu. Solodiankina, Inostrannye guvernantki v Rossii (vtoraiia polovina XVIII – pervaiia polovina XIX vekov) [Foreign Governesses in Russia: Second Half of the 18th – First Half of the 19th Century] [Moscow: Akademiia, 2007], pp. 345–347, 447; Martin Mandt, Ein deutscher Arzt am Hofe Kaiser Nikolaus I. von Russland. Lebenserinnerungen von Professor Martin Mandt [A German Physician in the Court of Emperor Nicholas I of Russia: The Memoirs of Professor Martin Mandt], ed. Veronika Lühe, intro. Theodor Schiemann (Munich and Leipzig: Duncker and Humblot, 1917), pp. 241–350.

749. Another anecdotal source of the story of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna’s death says: “Toward evening the Grand Duchess began to grow weak. With great difficulty she turned her head towards her parents, husband and her adored governess M-me Sophie Higgenbotten [sic] and said, barely audibly, ‘Goodbye, goodbye, it’s time for me to go to sleep’. With difficulty she then turned onto her other side and fell asleep forever” (V.P. Marin, “Iz dnevnika babushki. 1842–1846 g.g.” [“From My Grandmother’s Diary. 1842–1846”], Nasha starina [Our Old Days and Ways] 6, no. 42 [1915]: pp. 528–529). Mandt, who was also present at the death, says she said loudly and clearly: “goodbye, goodbye” or else “good night” (Mandt, Ein deutscher Arzt, p. 350). She is also said to have asked her governess to put a portrait of Nicholas I into her coffin (Solodianskina, Inostrannyie guvernantki v Rossii, p. 347).

750. “2. [OS August/NS 14 August]. Wednesday. At 7 o’clock in the morning the public was permitted to enter the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul and all kissed the hand of Her Highness ... At 9 o’clock Metropolitan Antonii arrived at the Cathedral ... performed a funeral service and the Divine liturgy. At the conclusion of the liturgy admittance of the public was halted. At twelve o’clock Their Majesties and Their Highnesses arrived at the Cathedral ... heard a funeral service ... At the conclusion of the funeral service the persons of the Court kissed the coffin and then the tombs of the emperors: Pavel Petrovich, Aleksandr Pavlovich and of the Empresses Maria Fyodorovna and Elizaveta Alekseevna and departed for the places of their abode, after which the public was admitted... His Imperial Majesty appointed August 4 [August 16 NS] as the day for burial of the body of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna” (RGIA: Kamer-fur’erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, fols. 394v–399r). Grigorii Antonovich Rafal’skii (1789–1848) was the Metropolitan of Novgorod, St. Petersburg, Estonia, and Finland from 1843 to 1848 (Slovo pri pogrebenii pervenstvuushchego chlena Sviatshego Sinoda, Vysokopreosviashchennogo Antonia, Mitropolita Novgorodskogo, Sanktpeterburgskogo, Estlandskogo i Finskogo, i raznykh ordenov Kavaleria, proiznesennoe Preosviashchennym Innokentiem, Arkebiepiskopom Khersonskim i Tavricheskim, v Aleksandronerskoï Lavre, 1848 goda noiabria 19 dnia [The Sermon at the Interment of the Highest-Ranking Member of the Most Holy Synod, His Eminence Antonii, Metropolitan of Novgorod, St. Petersburg, Estonia and Finland and Cavalier of Various Orders, by His Eminence Innokentii, Archbishop of Kherson and Taurida, in the Alexander Nevskii Monastery on the 19th Day of November in the Year 1848] [St. Petersburg: in the Synodal Printing House, 1848], Boris Yeltsin Presidential Library, accessed 6 August 2021, <https://www.prilib.ru/en/node/445945>; “Clerics of Novgorod and St. Petersburg,” Saint Petersburg Encyclopaedia, accessed 6 August 2021, <http://www.encyspb.ru/object/2804009411?lc=en>).
751. Persons mentioned in the entry for Thursday [August] 15th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: William Hooper Ropes (Mr. Ropes); Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler’s half-sister (Aunt Alicia); Dorothea (Halliday) Baird (Mrs. F. Baird, Mrs. Baird, Mrs. B); Mary Elizabeth (Mosley) Law, wife of Rev. Dr. Edward Law, chaplain of the English Church (Mrs. Law);

- three of their four daughters in Russia, probably their unmarried daughters Henrietta Maria Law, Emily Mosley Law, and Isabella Sarah Law, the fourth, Caroline, having gone to England with her father (her three daughters); and Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church (Mr. Williams, our young Pastor, our Rev<sup>d</sup> friend).
752. It has not been possible to determine the location of the dacha of Francis and Dorothea (Halliday) Baird. It is not mentioned in Pyliaev, Zabytoe proshloe; Lovell, Summerfolke; or Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga.
753. John Halliday (c. 1765 – 6/18 September 1854) died aged 88 years and 8 months (PREC STP, no. 6549).
754. Sarah (Weddell) Halliday (24 May 1783 – 11/23 April 1846) died aged 63 years (PREC STP, no. 5594). She married John Halliday on 29 June 1810 in Edinburgh (Carlisle Journal, July 7, 1804).
755. “A la russe ... meant that each dish in a course was brought in one after another,” as opposed to “a la français,” where “all the dishes forming part of a course were laid out on the table at the same time. Europeans complained about [the former] because ... ‘No meat, vegetables, etc. appear on the table so you know nothing of what is to come’” (Anne Odom, Russian Imperial Porcelain at Hillwood [Washington, DC: Hillwood Museum and Gardens, 1999], p. 27).
756. In 1831–1833, the newly married George and Anna Whistler lived in Paterson, New Jersey. The Mrs. Dickerson mentioned here is therefore probably Sydney Maria (Stotesbury) Dickerson (Hibernia, NJ 27 December 1788 – Paterson, NJ 17 June 1853), daughter of John Dickerson of New York, captain of a Pennsylvania Regiment in the Continental Army. She was the wife of the Honorable Philemon Dickerson (Succasunna, NJ 26 June 1788 - Paterson, NJ 10 December 1862). After receiving his education in Philadelphia, Philemon Dickerson settled in Paterson, New Jersey, where he practiced law and entered politics. He served in the State Assembly in 1821–1822, was New Jersey representative in the 24th Congress, twelfth governor of New Jersey in 1836–1837, and then served again in Congress in 1839–1841. Appointed a district court judge by President Martin Van Buren, he served in this post from 1841 until his death. Dickerson “also served as a city official in Paterson,” and “was instrumental in procuring its city charter in 1851.” The Dickersons were married on 13 April 1816, in Trinity Church

Parish in New York. They had four children (IGI; Wesley L. Baker, Dickerson & Dickinson Descendants of Philemon Dickerson of Southold, Long Island, N.Y.: also Long Island Descendants of Captain John Dickinson of Oyster Bay [Chicago: Adams, 1978], pp. 417–419; Paul A. Stellhorn and Michael J. Birkner, The Governors of New Jersey 1664–1974: Biographical Essays, [Trenton, NJ: New Jersey Historical Commission, 1982], pp. 108–110).

757. The “Patriot” of Montrose arrived in Cronstadt on 30 July / 11 August 1844, a Sunday. Peter Roy, master, died on Wednesday, 2/14 August, the day after coming to St. Petersburg, and was buried on Saturday, 5/17 August 1844, by George Williams, officiating minister (PREC STP, no. 5421, p. 313). He was baptized on 7 April 1808 in Queensferry, West Lothian, Scotland, the son of Peter and Jean (Sutherland) Roy. He served for some years on the ship Albion prior to joining the Patriot, on which he made two trips as master before his death. One was on 1 April 1844 to Pernau, reporting at Hull on 8 July 1844. The second trip was from Hull to St. Petersburg on 15 July 1844. The Patriot, under a new master from among the crew, reported at Dundee on 21 September 1844 (Agreements and Crew Lists: Series I, Muster Rolls and Agreements 1747–1860, BT 98/404, PRO).

The OPRS gives the following details of the marriage of Peter Roy on 14 January 1844 at Montrose, Scotland: “Mr. Peter Roy Shipmaster, Shore and Miss Catherine Morris, Market Street were proclaimed in order to marriage and no objections offered.” His widow was Catherine Millar Morris (b. Dundee, Angus, Scotland 25 January 1810; bap. Dundee, Angus, Scotland 28 January 1810), daughter of Robert Morris and Mary (Crichton) Morris.

758. Four brothers of Dorothea (Halliday) Baird are listed in the IGI and the OPRS: James Rogerson Halliday (bap. 14/28 February 1812 – 15/27 February 1856), John Halliday (bap. 14 June 1816 – 1863), William Halliday (bap. 18 January 1818) and Matthew Thomas Halliday (bap. 13 April 1822 or 1823 – 1872). Dorothea and James were baptized in Scotland (Lasswade, Midlothian); their siblings (including two other sisters) in St. Petersburg (IGI; Amburger Datenbank, ID 84226).
759. It has not been possible to locate this letter written to Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley (see Image 40) and John Winstanley in Preston.
760. The Gillebrands are William Clarke and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (see Images 265–267). The Ropes are William Hooper and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes.

761. “3. [OS August/NS 15 August] Thursday ... The lid was placed on the coffin in preparation for the burial ... While the body of Her Highness was in the cathedral the lid was always placed on the coffin in the presence of Their Majesties. The coffin was open only at the final farewell ... When Their Majesties were not there and when the public was saying farewell it was open ...

4. [OS August/NS 16 August] Friday. Day of the burial of Her Highness Aleksandra Nikolaevna ... the Coffin was lifted from the catafalque ... it was carried to the place of burial prepared on the left side in front of Grand Duchesses Anna Mikhailovna and Aleksandra Mikhailovna ... the coffin was lowered into the grave on a cloth, and then Metropolitan Antonii sprinkled it with Holy water and consigned it to the earth. After this the Metropolitan gave earth to His Majesty and to the Heir to the Throne. They threw it onto the coffin with a little shovel, and after Them Their Highnesses and Their Serene Highnesses did the same and bowing to the coffin departed for the place of their abode ... Her Majesty... heard a funeral service in the Elagin Palace Church but did not attend the burial.

After the burial and before the departure for Peterhof, the members of the State Council made their goodbyes in the dining room of Elagin Place to Prince Friedrich of Hesse upon returning from the Fortress of Sts. Peter and Paul. At 12:45 [p.m.] Their Majesties and Their Highnesses departed on the steamship “Nevka” for Peterhof and on route dinner was served for 17 persons. On arriving at the harbor they drove to the dacha Alexandria ... At 8:15 Their Majesties and Their Highnesses rode to the harbor to see off Prince Friedrich of Hesse ... and Prince Christian of Holstein, who were leaving for their homeland on the steamship “Kamchatka,” to which the Heir to the Throne and Prince Alexander of Hesse accompanied Their Serene Highnesses. Adjutant ... Lindholm, having taken the body of the deceased Prince Wilhelm ... from the Lutheran Church of St. Anne, left St. Petersburg on the commercial steamship “Amsterdam” for his homeland” (RGIA: Kamer-fur'erskii zhurnal, O konchine ... Aleksandry Nikolaevny, fols. 402v–409v). The coffin with the baby’s body was taken to the family seat at Rumpenheim and interred in the burial vault in the castle park (Andreas Dobler et al., Die mitgift einer Zarentochter: Meisterwerke russischer Kunst des Historismus aus dem Besitz der Hessischen Hausstiftung Museum Schloss Fasenerie [The Dowry of a Daughter of the Czar: Masterpieces of Russian Art of Historic Importance in the Possession of the House of Hesse]

Foundation Museum Schloss Fasanerie] (Eurasburg, Germany: Minerva, 1997), pp. 120, 121, plate 26b).

In 1897–1908, a new mausoleum for members of the Imperial family was added to the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul. The coffin with the remains of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna was transferred there on 23 September /6 October 1911 and reinterred on 28 September /11 October 1911 (Iu.V. Trubinov, Velikokniazheskaia usypal'nitsa [The Mausoleum of the Grand Dukes and Duchesses] [St. Petersburg: Chernoe i beloe RN, 1997], p. 150; V.B. Gendrikov, Velikokniazheskaia usypal'nitsa v Petropavlovskoi kreposti [The Mausoleum of the Grand Dukes and Duchesses in the Peter and Paul Fortress], Arsis Publishers, 1993 (museum brochure); revisit by me to the mausoleum in July 2003.

762. Prince Friedrich of Hesse-Kassel (see Image 445) donated a sum of money equal to the value of the precious objects in the dowry of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna (see Images 434, 444, 451) for an institution to be set up in his name and hers, to be called The Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna Institution Established by Prince Friedrich of Hesse. It was decided that the most appropriate institution would be a hospital for women with incurable chronic diseases who would not be accepted by the regular city hospitals. Ten of the fifty beds were to be set aside for pregnant women with a “serious illness.” The Aleksandra Women’s Hospital (see Image 460), located on Nadezhdin Street, was completed toward the end of 1847 and opened on 29 July / 10 August 1848, the third anniversary of her death. The architect was Aleksandr Pavlovich Briullov (1798–1877) (Sanktpeterburgskie vedomosti 176, Friday, August 4 [August 16 NS], 1844, p. 791; N.I. Kuskov and A.N. Lapotnikov, comps., Kratkii istoricheskii ocherk 50-tiletnego sushchestvovaniia Aleksandrinskoi zhenskoi bol'nitsy, uchrezhdennoi v pamiat' v Bozhe Pochivaishchei Velikoi Kniagini Aleksandry Nikolaevny [A Brief Historical Sketch of the First Fifty Years of the Aleksandra Women’s Hospital Established in Memory of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna, Who Reposes in God], ed. E.V. Pavlov [St. Petersburg. V. Kirshbaum, 1899], pp. 1–9; Antonov and Kobak, Sviatyni Sankt-Peterburga, vol. 2, pp. 219–220).
763. “The Prince of Hesse, who has left, ... is represented to have acted in the most shameful manner. He was drunk every day and night since his marriage, associated with grooms and horse jockies, and behaved in the most wicked and outrageous way imaginable. He took off with him every scrap of the trousseau of the bride amounting to near one million of dollars and left the jewels only upon receiving a handsome gift in gold –” (John S.

- Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
764. Proverbs 22:1: “A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold.”
765. Anna Whistler’s two visits were to be to Mrs. Roy and Mrs. Margaret (Gordon) Hirst, sister-in-law of the recently deceased Mary Gent Hirst. Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill wished to visit Sophia Morgan (1808–1872), who was staying with “old Mrs. Baird.”
766. As Anna Whistler says the hotel was in the Galernaia, it must be Mrs. Wilson’s boarding house. The misses Benson’s boarding house on the English Embankment was sometimes referred to as “the home of the American Sea Captains” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43). See Benson in Appendix E.
767. Psalm 23:4: “Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.”
768. It has not been possible to ascertain who this other captain from Montrose was. Catharine (Morris) Roy was one of five daughters and two sons of Robert and Mary (Crichton) Morris, all of whom were born in Dundee, Scotland. Her four sisters were Jean (b. 8 June 1797), Isabell (b. 9 December 1799), Janet (b. 27 May 1803), and Caroline (b. 4 March 1814); her brothers were Robert Jr. (b. 18 February 1802) and David Rutherford (b. 22 March 1812).
769. Hymn 188, “Few Are Thy Days,” is based on Job 14: 1, 2, 5, 6. The first stanza is: “Few are thy days, and full of wo, / O man, of woman born; / Thy doom is written, Dust thou art, / To dust thou shalt return” (Hymns Suited to the Feasts and Fasts of the Church and Other Occasions of Worship [Philadelphia: Protestant Episcopal Female Prayer-Book Society of Pennsylvania, 1839], pp. 218–219).
770. Peter Roy’s brothers were: George (bap. 2 March 1806) and David (bap. 5 August 1819). Like him, they were baptized in Queensferry, West Lothian, Scotland (IGI).
771. Psalm 23 of The Book of Psalms begins “The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.”
772. The nine crew members of the Patriot, seven of whom were from Montrose, are listed in Agreements and Crew Lists: Series I, Muster Rolls and Agreements 1747–1860, BT 98/404, PRO.

773. This reference is to Arthur Austin, Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life: A Selection from the Papers of the Late Arthur Austin (Edinburgh: William Blackwood; London: T. Caddell, 1822). Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life is a series of short tales that reveal “the humble under-plots that are carrying on in the great Drama of Life” (Austin, p. 83). The characters are wise, upstanding people, both rich and poor, of uncommon righteousness. In its tone, strong providential message, and humble acceptance, Mrs. Roy’s personal history, narrated to Anna Whistler and Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, resembles these stories.
774. The Russian word for “it’s all right,” “it’s nothing,” “never mind,” is spelled “nichevo” and pronounced “nyeecheevaw’.”
775. The Russian words for “it’s not necessary” are spelled “ne nado” and pronounced “nyeenah’duh.”
776. The Russian word for the copper ten-kopeck coin is spelled “grivennik” (Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 53) and pronounced “gree’veennyek.”
777. See Appendix G for an example of a landowner’s permission for a female serf to live and work in St. Petersburg in 1854.
778. Mary Brennan had been away for part of the summer, but Anna Whistler does not say where she was. The diary entry indicates that her trunk contained things from Stonington, Connecticut, that had been stored in it when they left for Russia in 1843.
779. Anna Whistler was writing on Monday, 19 August 1844 about Sunday, 18 August.
Persons mentioned in this entry for Sunday [August] 18th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, wife of William Hooper Ropes, merchant (Mrs. Ropes); Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law’s summer replacement in the English Church (Mr Williams); Susan (Poulterer) and Joseph S. Harrison Jr., and possibly their children, Annie and Henry, who lived at Alexandrofsky (The Harrisons); William Leighton Drury and John Thomas Drury, the grandsons of Thomas Drury Sr. (the newcomers, the little Drurys); the unidentified little Norman children; Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler’s half-sister (Aunt Alicia); and Mary Brennan, the Whistlers’ servant (Marys trunk).
780. 2 Kings 5:12: “Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned and went away in a rage.” This is the story in which Elisha tells Naaman how his leprosy may be cured, but Naaman at first questions the means.

781. Reverend George Williams was also replacing Rev. Thomas S. Ellerby (see Image 256) at Alexandrofsky. The latter had gone to Revel with his sick wife, Mary (Beasley) Ellerby.
782. Persons mentioned in the entry for Monday [August] 19th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Thomas Drury Sr., the Whistlers' dacha landlord, whose bathhouse Anna Whistler used (Drury's bath house); Susan (Poulterer) and Joseph S. Harrison Jr., and their children, Annie and Henry, who lived at Alexandrofsky (the Harrisons, Mr H, Annie Harrison); Fyodor, the Whistlers' dvornik (Fedor); Kirk Boott Whistler, who died at the age of four in 1842 (Kirkie); Thomas DeKay Winans, partner in the firm of Harrison, Winans and Eastwick, who also lived at Alexandrofsky (Mr Winans); and Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler's half-sister (My Sister).
783. In 1825–1826, on the former site of some brick works on the seventh verst from St. Petersburg, on the Schlüsselburg Road, the Russian government built the Aleksandrovskaia State Iron Works. The works replaced a factory that had been founded at another spot by Charles Gascoigne and closed in 1824 as a result of damage caused by the extraordinary flood of that year. The Aleksandrofsky State Iron Works produced both steam engines and other types of metal objects, such as iron iconostases with gold and silver trim; busts, portraits and statues; parts (columns, railings) used in constructing buildings, and small objects. The State Iron Works was leased in 1844 to Harrison, Winans and Eastwick for building the engines and rolling stock of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway and became called the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works of the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway (see Images 223–225) (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 214; Haywood, The Beginnings, p. 51; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, p. 12; F.V. Dombrovskii, Polnyi putevoditel' po Peterburgu i vsem ego okrestnostiam [Complete Guide to Petersburg and All Its Environs] [St. Petersburg, 1896], pp. 304–315; Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga, pp. 47–48). Along the Schlüsselburg Road (which begins at the Nevskii Gate), there were many other factories as well: approaching the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works one passed, e.g., the Imperial Glass Factory (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, pp. 205–208) and Binar's [sic] Silk Factory and his glove factory (Bur'ianov, pp. 209–211); beyond the Aleksandrofsky Head Mechanical Works were the Imperial Porcelain Factory (Bur'ianov, pp. 216–223) and the Aleksandrovskaia Manufactory (see Image 242), which produced cotton and linen cloth and goods and playing cards (Bur'ianov, pp. 223–234). Bur'ianov's guide praised highly the dwellings of the workers at these factories. For a description of the Alexandrovskaia Manufactory, see the entry for Saturday [May] 10th [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II, and accompanying Note 138.

784. For a description of the Eastwick home, in a building in which they lived on the first floor and the Harrisons on the second, see Joseph Harrison, Jr. to Stephen Poulterer [his father-in-law], Alexandroffsky, February 27, 1849, HSP: Harrison Letterbook No. 1; Andrew Eastwick to Lydia Eastwick, Alexandroffsky Cast Iron Foundry near St. Petersburg, June 2, 1844, and Edward Eastwick to Lydia Eastwick, Alexandroffsky, July 19, 1844, Eastwick Letters; John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, May 17, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 35; Eastwick in Appendix E; and Images 239–240.
785. The reference is to John Sanford Barnes (12 May 1836 – 23 November 1911), son of Charlotte Adams (Sanford) Barnes (c. 1801 – 12 December 1875) and Major General James Barnes (4 May 1807 – 12 February 1869), USMA Class of 1829, chief engineer and superintendent of the Western (Massachusetts) Railroad, 1842–1848. They were the Whistlers' friends in Springfield, Massachusetts.
786. Nicholas I did not visit the works until 4/16 March 1847 (entry for Wednesday March 23rd [1847], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II).
787. The number of Americans employed at Alexandroffsky Head Mechanical Works was small, as was the number of Englishmen. All of them, "except four English workmen," were in supervisory positions. In addition to Joseph Senior Kirk, the principal manager, "[t]hree Americans and five Englishmen were principal or assistant foremen in the Locomotive or Truck Departments" (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, p. 259, 260).

According to Joseph Harrison Jr., when Nicholas I visited the Alexandroffsky Head Mechanical Works in March 1847, the principal English foremen in the Locomotive Department were J.D. Thompson and J. Jones, while S. Orange was an assistant foreman. In the Boiler Department, the English foremen were Ashworth and Pullan. In the foundries, the principal English foreman was Langfield. The principal American foreman in the Locomotive Department was S. Harrison, while the principal American foremen in the Truck Department were R. Wright and J. Howard (Joseph Harrison, Jr., The Iron Worker and King Solomon, 2nd ed. [Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1869]: appendix, p. 71).

The Americans may have seemed to Anna Whistler to be content, but although “some ... were good workers ... Many ... demanded very high salaries and would not remain because they could not adjust to life in Russia, finding it boring and alien. Harrison felt that all they wanted was the greatest amount of money in the shortest amount of time.” The Englishmen “came increasingly to be preferred,” because their salary demands were more modest (Haywood, Russia Enters the Railway Age, pp. 260–261).

788. Shakespeare did not coin the expression “all’s well that ends well,” which was first a proverb. “The earliest version known in print is in the 13th century English prose poem The Proverb of Hendyng.” “John Heywood was probably the first to put the proverb into the form we now use ... in A dialogue conteinyng the number in effect of all the prouerbs in the English tongue, 1546.” “Shakespeare was well acquainted with Heywood’s work and wrote All’s Well That Ends Well in 1601” (“The Meaning and Origin of the Expression: All’s Well that Ends Well,” The Phrase Finder website).
789. Joseph Senior Kirk had therefore known George William Whistler sometime in the period 1834–1837, when the latter was twelve to fifteen years old. Major Whistler was at the time superintendent of the machine shops of the Proprietors of Locks and Canals of Lowell, Massachusetts. Mr. Kirk’s wife was Charlotte (Petersen) Kirk.
790. Timothy Abraham Curtis, of the Liverpool firm of Bury, Curtis and Kennedy, was leaving on Saturday, 24 August 1844 for England.
791. Their guest was William Robertson (2 April 1819 – 17 February 1890), USMA Class of 1840. See the biography of the Robertson family in Appendix E.
792. Mr. Robertson left Russia on Saturday, 17 August 1844.
793. “Sarschinka” is Anna Whistler’s pronunciation of the diminutive and endearing form for Aleksandr, spelled “Sashenka” (pronounced “Sah’shinkuh”); “Vaascha” is her pronunciation of the diminutive and endearing form for Vasilii (William), spelled “Vasya” (pronounced “Vah’syuh”). Alexander, about five years old, and William, about six years old, were the grandsons of Thomas Drury Sr., the Whistlers' dacha landlord.

794. Hedenschoug was born in February, so he seems not to have told the Whistlers the truth. He came from a well-to-do family in Stockholm, which he appears to have told them about. He elicited great sympathy from the Whistlers for a long time, perhaps also hiding his alcoholism. See his biography in Appendix E.
795. Because he had become so attached to Hedenschoug, James adhered to the latter's preference for Charles XII over Peter the Great. The most famous biographies of both monarchs were written by Voltaire, but James was reading aloud to Anna Whistler in English as part of a program to retain his fluency in his native language. Among the possible English translations he could have read is Smollett's.
796. Persons mentioned in the entry for Wednesday [August] 21st who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: the recently arrived Martha Reed Ropes, sister of William Hooper Ropes and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (Martha Ropes); and William Miller, a merchant and honorary vice-consul in St. Petersburg, and his invalid brother, Richard (the Mr Millers).
797. Peterhof (see Images 400–403) is the main Imperial estate on the southern littoral of the Gulf of Finland, the culminating point, as it were, of the entire system of the Peterhof Road. The brilliant era of Peterhof belongs to the reign of Nicholas I (see Images 420–423), whose permanent summer residence it became starting in 1832. New parks were added to already existing ones, thus enclosing the town in a green ring. The town was enlarged considerably and extensive new regions came into being, populated with private homes and dachas in classic, Swiss, Gothic and other styles, that were immersed in gardens. Peasant fields and the roads in the southern part of the area were given an orderly appearance and villages built anew (Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga, pp. 234, 260). Anna Whistler's selective description of Peterhof in this diary entry shows that they entered the main gates and walked through the Upper Garden at the back (south façade) of the Great Peterhof Palace. The palace is built with its front (north façade) at the edge of a natural terrace on the boundary of the Upper and Lower Gardens. This terrace towers almost sixteen meters above the Lower Garden. They then descended to the Lower Garden, with its grotto and fountains below the front of the palace, and went to the eastern part of this garden where they visited the bath house with its pool and Monplezir (Mon Plaisir) Palace on the Gulf of Finland. The gardens were filled with beautiful objects in the form of fountains, statues, bas reliefs, urns, cascades, and the Tsarina's pavilion on an island in a pond. Anna Whistler did not record that they also visited the Hermitage (or, Other Monplezir), but other evidence in the diaries supports this.

798. As one approached Peterhof, one would pass on the Peterhof Road the estates of Znamenka, Mikhailovka, the Private Dacha and Sergievka, all belonging to members of the Imperial family.

Znamenka was located between the Peterhof Road and the Gulf of Finland, more easterly than Alexandria. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, this territory belonged to A.D. Menshikov. After passing through the hands of several magnates, it was acquired in 1755 by Field Marshal General A.G. Razumovskii. It was then that it began to take on the features of a wealthy summer residence. In the 1790s, it passed from Razumovskii to Senator I.V. Miatlev and belonged to this family until 1835. Nicholas I bought it from the Miatlevs' impoverished heirs for a million rubles and presented it to his wife, just as he had Alexandria. It belonged to her at the time of the Whistlers' stay in Russia.

Mikhailovka bordered on Znamenka on the west side. Here there were several estates, including one called "Favorite" belonging to Menshikov, which was preserved until the 1760s. In the 1830s, the three estates located here became the property of the Imperial family. It was decided to build a summer dacha here for the youngest son of Nicholas I, Grand Duke Mikhail Nikolaevich, whence the name of the estate.

The Private Dacha is located three kilometers to the west of the Upper Garden of Peterhof. After 1727, and up until 1730, this was a seaside grange with a two-storied stone house belonging to Prince Aleksei Dolgorukii. In 1733–1736, it belonged to the famous publicist and orator, Archbishop Feofan Prokopovich. In 1741, it was presented to the future Empress Elizaveta Petrovna, and in her reign a large wooden palace was built here. This palace was dismantled in 1798–1801. In 1843, the Private Dacha was presented by Nicholas I to Grand Duke Aleksander Nikolaevich, the future Alexander II.

On its west side, the Private Dacha borders on Sergievka, named for one of the magnates who owned it. At the beginning of the eighteenth century, it belonged to one of Peter the Great's courtiers, A.I. Rumiantsev, from whom it passed to his son, Field Marshal P.A. Rumiantsev-Zadunaiskii. In 1822, the Rumiantsevs sold the grange to the Naryshkins. The Naryshkin dacha was acquired by order of Nicholas I for his daughter, Grand Duchess Maria Nikolaevna, on the occasion of her marriage to the Duke of Leuchtenberg, and came to be called the Leuchtenberg estate. From 1839 to 1842, the architect, A.I. Shtakenshneider (see Image 194), built a palace here resembling an Italian country villa, and in 1845–1846, a small chapel (A.G. Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, parki, fontany [Petrodvorets: Palace–Museums, Parks, and Fountains] [Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1988], pp. 186–191; N.I. Nikulina, Prigorody Leningrada Arkhitekturnyi putevoditel' [The Environs of Leningrad: An Architectural Guide] [Leningrad: Stroiizdat, Leningradskoe otdelenie, 1982], pp. 67–68, 75–79. See also Gorbatenko, Petergofskaiia doroga, pp. 219–282).

799. The main entrance to the Upper Garden from the Peterhof Road consists of monumental gates in the form of two ten-meter-high stone pylons. Starting at these pylons, the Upper Garden is enclosed on three sides by a massive wall of stone pillars with reliefs of lion masks alternating with wooden spears. The wall has six gates. The pylons are decorated with paired Corinthian columns. The columns support a wide, detached (raskrepovannyi) cornice and volute-shaped pedestals for sculptures. The massiveness of the pylons emphasizes the lightness of the tracery of the forged gates attached to them, which are simple and severe in style. Through the gates may be seen the terrace of the Upper Garden, a fifteen-hectare area in front of the south façade of the Great Peterhof Palace. These main gates were built in 1754 (N.I. Arkhipov and A.G. Raskin, Petrodvorets [Peterhof] [Leningrad and Moscow: Iskusstvo, 1961], pp. 153, 156. See also Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, p. 28; Nikulina, Prigorody Leningrad, p. 14).
800. Anna Whistler is referring to the Great Peterhof Palace (see Image 400). The construction of a modest stone palace on the hill, was started in 1714 by order of Peter the Great (see Image 411), under the supervision of the architect, Johann Braunstein. Ultimately, it became the centre section of the entire Great Peterhof Palace. In July 1746, Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413) requested the architect, Francesco Bartolomeo Rastrelli, to build side wings of stone onto this main structure. Rastrelli submitted a general plan for the entire palace, in which the right wing connected with the palace church and the left wing with “the building under the coat of arms.” Rastrelli’s plan also proposed remodeling the center section of the palace so that the entire façade would have a uniform look. The remodeling was completed in 1754. Peter's monogram remained in the center section, while Elizaveta Petrovna's was placed on the wings.

The enlargement of the palace ultimately resulted in clearly defined structural masses on either side of a central structural mass and alternating in a certain rhythm. The central three-storied part of the palace is marked by an elegant high-figured roof crowned with a gilded vase with garlands of flowers and winged geniuses. This section is flanked on either side by symmetrical three-storied sections, each with a somewhat less high tent-style roof. Connected with the central part are the two basic and largest three-storied wings, which face onto the Upper Garden. In sharp contrast, next come the glassed-in arcades of single-storied galleries with balustrades. These culminate in the two-storied church building and the "building under the coat-of-arms." The church has five gilded cupolas. The "building under the coat-of-arms" has a roof in the form of a four-sided cupola of white iron with gold decorations. A three-sided, three-headed Imperial eagle weathervane, two-and-a-half feet high and weighing 16 poods, was placed on the summit of this cupola in 1751 (a pood is the equivalent of 16.38 kilograms), but whichever way it turned, it seemed double-headed. The palace is 134 sazhen long and 8 sazhen wide. The exterior was painted yellow with white trim.

The first and third floors were for the retinue, the second contained luxurious rooms where at times members of foreign Imperial families were housed (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 86–88; Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, p. 5. For a different account, see N.G. Sharubin, Ocherki Petergofa i ego okrestnostei [Sketches of Peterhof and Its Environs] [St. Petersburg: s.n., 1868], pp. 6–7). A description of the rooms and of many of the pictures to be found in them, including the famous Rotari (1707–1762) portrait gallery, was published by Geirot (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 88–93; see also Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, p. 63.) It does not seem, however, that the Whistlers ever saw the interior of the palace. In both diary entries about a visit to Peterhof (1844 and 1846), the family of Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (see Images 425–428) was in residence, which precluded visits by tourists. Nor do extant Whistler family letters contain references to any visits by them to this palace.

The last large-scale changes to the Great Peterhof Palace were being made while the Whistlers were in Russia and were concluded after their departure. In 1845–1850, according to Shtakenshneider's plans and under his direction, a third floor was being added above the eastern (garden) façade. The apartments of Grand Duchess Olga Nikolaevna (see Image 432), who was married in July 1846 to the Crown Prince of Württemberg (see Image 433), were being remodeled (I.M. Gurevich, V.V. Znamenov, and E.G. Miasoedova, Bol'shoi Petergofskii dvorets [The Great Peterhof Palace] [Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1979], p. 27; Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 93).

801. The water actually came from other sources. In 1868, Geirot explained the system. The water for the Peterhof fountains comes to Peterhof by means of two water-supply systems: an old one and a new one. The old has as its source the springs located in the villages of Elagino, Zaborod'e, Gladino, and Khabino. The new starts from the pond at the village of Levolovo; in the pond are combined the springs of the villages of Vil'puzi and Lapino. All of these villages are at a distance of approximately twenty to twenty-six versts from the Great Peterhof Palace. Halfway along the route, the two water-supply systems unite and from there on the water flows partly through a natural bed and partly through a man-made canal. At the village of Nizino (six versts from the Great Peterhof Palace) is the so-called Shinkarka sluice, by means of which in autumn and winter excess water is drawn off from Peterhof by the Strel'na River, and at that time, only the amount of water needed for replenishing the Peterhof ponds flows into them. The inhabitants of the town constantly use the water from these ponds for their own needs. In the summer, all the water from the Shinkarka sluice flows, first as a small river and then as an open canal, into the Tserkovnyi and Bab'egonskii ponds. At the latter pond, the water divides: one part of it goes to the Samson basin, which is the main reservoir of water for the fountains of the upper garden as well as for the Samson fountain and the Great Grotto. This basin is 300 sazhen long, 15 sazhen wide, and up to 3 sazhen deep. The other part of the water is directed from the Bab'egonskii pond into the ponds of the English garden and the ravine, and flows as well into the main water reservoir of the Peterhof Lapidary Works, i.e., the large reserve pond. Both systems supply water at the rate of 4,536 cubic feet per minute, or 75.6 cubic feet per second. When all the fountains are playing, the amount of water used per second amounts to 108.52 cubic feet (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 124–125; T.B. Dubiako, Russkie reguliarnye sady i parki [Russian Formal Gardens and Parks] [Leningrad: Gosudarstvennoe izdatel'stvo literatury po stroitel'stvu arkhitekture i stroitel'nym materialam, 1963], pp. 144–146; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, pp. 159–164, 197). It is almost a commonplace among Russian authors of books on Peterhof to express their pride in the fact that the Peterhof fountains could play more frequently and longer than those at Versailles.

802. Anna Whistler is referring to the Great Cascade of the Great Grotto below the Great Peterhof Palace (see Image 400). Along the sides of the grotto are two cascades in the shape of gigantic staircases, each consisting of seven steps. These steps are decorated with sixteen gilded copies of ancient statues; vases, some purely decorative and others from which fountains gush; and twenty-four bas-reliefs. The entire grotto complex contains forty-one statues and twenty-nine bas-reliefs. Its chief effect comes from all the fountains playing at the same time. For a layout of the Great Cascade, see N.V. Vernova, Peterhof Bol'shoi Kaskad [Peterhof: The Great Cascade] (St. Petersburg: Gos. muzei-zapovednik Peterhof-EGO, 1996), pp. 31, 103.
803. The Samson fountain (see Image 400) is located on the main compositional axis of the Lower and Upper Gardens. It stands in a basin in front of the Great Cascade. From the basin a canal leads down to the Gulf of Finland.

There is evidence to suggest that the Samson fountain was erected after 1725, that is, after the death of Peter the Great (see Image 411), and that either Catherine I (see Image 412) had it put up no later than 1727 (the year of her death) or that it was put up in the reign of Anna Ioannovna, since no works were carried out in the reign of her predecessor, Peter II (1727–1730). There is also evidence that it was already in place in 1735 (Geirot, Opisanie Peterhofa, pp. 18–19, 71).

This largest fountain at Peterhof consists of the colossal nude figure of Samson, three meters high, standing on a pedestal made to look like a cliff, and tearing apart the jaws of a lion. The beast is standing on its hind paws with the claws of its front paws sunk into Samson's left thigh. Out of the vanquished lion's mouth shoots a seventy-foot-high jet of water, three inches in diameter, its spume spilling over the statue and pedestal. The jet had previously been one hundred feet high because the main Samson reservoir had been higher than the present one, but it is said that Empress Elizaveta Petrovna ordered the jet reduced because of the dampness caused in the palace by the spray in windy weather (Sharubin, Ocherki Peterhofa, p. 15). Eight dolphins splash at Samson's feet, and the half-figures of four lions, representing the four corners of the earth, look out of four semicircular niches in the granite pedestal. Streams of water flow from their mouths. The victory of Samson over the lion is an allegory of the victory

- of the Russians over the Swedes, of Peter the Great over Charles XII at the Battle of Poltava on 27 June (OS) 1709, the feast day of St. Samson. Young James Whistler was interested in Peter the Great and Charles XII through Hedenschoug, his father's draftsman, but we do not know whether he was aware of the symbolism of Samson and the lion in its Russian context. He was most likely excited by the height of the Samson figure and of the jet of water. This gilded bronze group, the work of M.I. Kozlovskii (1753–1802), was installed in 1802 (Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, pp. 69–71). It replaced the original Samson group, made of gilded lead, executed by the sculptor, K. Rastrelli, in the 1730s (Sharubin, Ocherki Petergofa, p. 15; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 71; Vernova, Petergof Bol'shoi Kaskad, pp. 17–18).
804. Nymphs, tritons, and frogs on the rim of the basin shoot crisscrossing jets of water, while behind them, in front of the Great Grotto, jets flying from the mouth of a serpent coiled around the right hand of two facing gladiators interweave (see Image 400) (Kurbatov, Petergof, pp. 40–41, 56–57). This is probably “the fencing of some of the gilded figures with water” that diverted James.
805. The bath house was an indoor pool in a building with an open roof, built in the reign of Catherine the Great (see Image 414). Built first in the eastern part of the Menagerie Pond, it was rebuilt in 1774–1776 according to plans by Fel'ten, this time over the entire pond. The fountain in the pond thus came to be located in the center of the pool (Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 111), which was 50 sazhen long and 15 sazhen wide (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 80). The fountain was remodeled into a system where its freely pulsing jet was encased in a metal cylinder crowned by three interconnected gilded discs with over one hundred eighty small tubes along their edges. The discs and tubes were turned by a water wheel. When the fountain played, long sparkling jets of water like rays of sunlight flew from the discs, giving the ensemble the name “Sun” fountain. Around the fountain were four dolphins spurting jets of water from their mouths (Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvoret, pp. 111–112). Geirot, in 1868, said the pool had retained its original appearance, despite having been repaired several times (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 80). He described it as “an elongated rectangular structure, which is decoratively painted on the outside so that this enormous structure in the middle of the garden will not seem heavy and will harmonize with its surroundings as much as possible” (Geirot,

- p. 80). It was also painted decoratively on the inside (Kurbatov, Peterhof, p. 80; E. Ducamp, ed., The Summer Palaces of the Romanovs: Treasures from Tsarskoye Selo, trans. Barbara Mellor, ill. Marc Walter (London: Thames and Hudson, 2012), p. 145; Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 42). As one entered there were several alcoves for changing.
806. The building Anna Whistler is referring to is Monplezir (Mon Plaisir), located in the eastern part of the Lower Garden (see Image 402). The name Monplezir also applies to the complex of auxiliary structures associated with this palace. Monplezir was the first palace Peter the Great (see Image 411) ordered to be built in the eventual Peterhof complex (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 8). To save time on his frequent visits to the fortifications on Kotlin Island, he usually travelled via the south shore of the Gulf of Finland. At the spot most convenient for crossing to Kotlin Island, a small landing had been constructed and nearby two buildings for stopovers. It was on the shore not far from these two buildings that he ordered the small brick staging palace, some say in Dutch style, to be built (Geirot, pp. 7–8; Kurbatov, Peterhof, p. 47). Its construction was begun in 1714 and completed in 1724 (Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, pp. 94, 99). It consisted of a square central building with a spacious tiered mansard roof crowned with a large carved vase. A gallery was attached to the east and west sides of this building. At the end of each gallery was a small pavilion, also with a tent roof and with a smaller vase (G.N. Goldovskii and V.V. Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir v nizhnem parke Petrodvortsia [The Palace of Monplezir in the Lower Garden of Petrodvorets], 2nd ed. [Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1981], pp. 4, 11; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 99; Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, p. 129). The central building consisted of a large main hall with three rooms each on the east and west sides (Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, p. 6). With its view of the Gulf of Finland, it became the favorite summer residence of Peter the Great (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 27; Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, pp. 10–11; Sharubin, Ocherki Petergofa, p. 19). When he came to Peterhof, he would usually sleep at Monplezir (Sharubin, p. 19; Kurbatov, Peterhof, p. 55). The sea air, he said, cured him better than any medicine; the architecture reminded him of his days spent in Holland (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 27; Sharubin, Ocherki Petergofa, p. 8). At the end of the first quarter of the eighteenth century, service wings were built. These elongated, adjoining single-story buildings were connected to the palace by small stone arches. They contained a dining room, pantries, rooms for the retinue, and the bathroom and bath of Peter the Great (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 75; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 99). Further off to the east were a bathhouse and kitchens, built in 1726 by order of Catherine I (Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, p. 10). These outlying buildings were subjected to many more changes than the palace itself. An especially large number of the changes were made in the reign of their daughter, Empress Elizaveta Petrovna. In 1748, she had Francesco Bartolomeo Rastrelli remodel the modest kitchens into an Assembly Hall, its walls decorated with tapestries woven at the Imperial tapestry works founded by her father (Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, p. 12). This is just one kind of change made by the daughters of Peter the Great to which Anna Whistler is alluding. Catherine the Great had the wooden terrace in front of Monplezir replaced by a marble one and the wooden balustrade along the shore replaced by one of pudozh stone (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 40, 76). Monplezir underwent major repairs several times: after the flood of 1770; in 1802, after a severe storm that had occurred in November 1801; and, for the third time, in 1825, after the famous flood of 7/19 November 1824; but it was never remodeled and changed. It was left looking as it had in the reign of Peter the Great and became a relic of his life (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 76–77; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 99).

The central part of Monplezir consists of a large main hall with a tent-shaped ceiling decorated with paintings of the four elements and with stucco moldings of allegorical figures depicting the four seasons. Apollo and four characters of the Commedia dell'Arte are depicted in the painted plafond. The walls are panelled with dark oak, and the floor is of black and white checkered marble (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 77; Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, p. 36; V.N. Gusarov, N.V. Vernova, and V.V. Znamenov, Peterhof v akvareliakh Aleksandra Bennu [Peterhof in the Watercolours of Alexander Benois] [St. Petersburg: Art of Russia, 1996], p. 42). The north side of the hall faces the terrace and the sea, the south side the garden. There are three rooms each on the east and west sides of the hall. On the east side in Peter's time were the Chinese (or Japanese) room, the kitchen, and the pantry. Nicholas I ordered that the pantry, a small room with windows looking out upon the seashore, be called the bedroom of Peter the Great. It already bore this designation when the Whistlers visited Monplezir and retained it until World War II. Here, the bed, bed linen, dressing gown, slippers, and nightcap of Peter the Great were carefully preserved (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 77; Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvoret's Monplezir, pp. 49, 53, 58–60). The kitchen had blue and white Dutch tiles on its walls, a stone-tiled floor, a huge stove with trivets, and dishes and cooking utensils from Peter's time (Goldovskii and Znamenov, pp. 44–49). The Chinese (or Japanese) cabinet was lined with black lacquered panels, to which were attached little gilded wooden shelves holding Chinese (or Japanese) porcelain (Goldovskii and Znamenov, pp. 28–36; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 93; M. Izmailov, Monplezir, Marly i Ėrmitazh (dvoret's i pavil'ony Petra I) [Monplezir, Marly and the Hermitage: The Palace and Pavilions of Peter I], 3rd ed. [Moscow, Leningrad: Gos.izd-vo izobrazitel'nykh iskusstv, 1933], pp. 28–30; “Dvoret's ‘Monplezir’” [“Monplezir’ Palace”], Khudozhestvennye sokrovishcha Rossii 7–8 (1902): p. 206). On the west side of the hall in Peter's time were the secretary's room for his duty officer, the bedroom, and the Sea study, so called because of its view. When the Whistlers viewed these rooms, and up until World War II, the bedroom was called the study and the Sea study was called the reception room (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 77; Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvoret's Monplezir, pp. 53, 56–58; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 92). The pavilions, galleries, Chinese (or Japanese) room, and secretary's room were located on a single axis and made up the enfilade of public or reception rooms (Arkhipov and Raskin, p. 92). The walls of almost all the rooms and of the galleries and pavilions were covered with Dutch and Flemish paintings bought at auction in Holland personally by Peter the Great and through his agents (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, pp. 13, 27, 78; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, p. 96; Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvoret's Monplezir, pp. 20–28, 41–43, 70–87 and passim). This was the first picture gallery of its time in Russia (see following Note). The ceilings of almost all of these rooms were decorated, like that of the main hall, with an allegorical scene and sculpted plaster. On the south side of Monplezir, between the wings, was a beautiful shady garden containing some oaks and cedars planted by Peter the Great himself (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 78). It is divided by two avenues in the shape of a cross into four parterre squares. In the center of the garden is the “Sheaf” fountain, called the “Crown” fountain in the period when the Whistlers were visiting. In each of the parterre squares there is a flowerbed with a symmetrical design. The “Crown” fountain emerges from a pedestal of limestone tufa. Its central vertical jet shoots to a height of twenty feet, and it has around it two rows of sloping fountains, one higher than the other. The water from the fountain falls into a circular basin and pours out of it from five marble spillways, and then into pipes, which empty into the sea. In the center of each square of the garden is a “Bell” fountain, each of which is a copy and is decorated with a bronze figure, representing Apollino, Jacopo Sansovino’s (1486–1570) Bacchus and Canova’s (1757–1822) Psyche and Faun with Baby Goat, all of which were cast in 1817. From the mushroom-shaped tops of the pedestals on which these four statues stand, water flows forming a glass-like cloche around the pedestal (Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, pp. 105, 108). The garden contains hidden “trick” fountains, some located in benches, that suddenly and unexpectedly turn on, wetting the unwary visitor (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 78; Arkhipov and Raskin, Petrodvorets, pp. 112–114). The side of the house facing the garden had windows down to the floor and struck some viewers as resembling a conservatory rather than a dwelling (Izmailov, Monplezir, p. 10). The side facing the sea was more interesting: red brick walls with white seams between the bricks; windows with shutters; the high, tiered roof. The terrace here was also of brick, with a stone balustrade, the landing beyond the balustrade covered in marble tiles (Izmailov, pp. 10–12, 13). The view from the terrace was of the city, the sea, Cronstadt, and the northern shore of the Gulf: “to the right, when the weather is clear, glitter the spire of the Peter and Paul Fortress and the dome of St. Isaac’s Cathedral, and on the opposite wooded Vyborg shore, in the dark oak foliage, can be seen the white country palace built by Peter I and called by him ‘The Oaks’ . . . ; to the left menacing Cronstadt with its forest of masts towers above the sea; the view of the water and the ceaseless lapping of the waves complete the feeling of enchantment” (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 76).

Monplezir, with its view of the sea, shady garden, and flower-covered parterre with magnificent fountains, was one of the favorite and most frequented spots at Peterhof. Emperor Nicholas I, out of respect for the memory of his great ancestor, would, when at Peterhof, go every morning at eight from his residence, Alexandria, to visit Monplezir, from where he would then walk to the Great Peterhof Palace to his day’s work in the study of Peter the Great (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 79; Izmailov, Monplezir, pp. 43–44; Son iunosti, p. 26). A particularly charming commentary on Monplezir is to be found in Kurbatov, Peterhof, pp. 46–55.

807. Monplezir housed the first major picture gallery in Russia and one of the first collections in Russia of the works of Western European artists, predominantly seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Dutch and Flemish.

Up until 1980, the identification of the “fine pictures” at Monplezir that Anna Whistler mentions would have been almost impossible. An inventory of the collection had been made in 1728, three years after Peter the Great’s death, but it was for the most part vague in that it did not give the artists’ names or subjects of most of the pictures, which then numbered two hundred and four (Stählin, Zapiski, vol. 2, pp. 5–6). This was rectified somewhat by the inventory of 1746–1747, in which seventeen of the pictures now in the museum were identified (Stählin, p. 6). In 1980, however, some other very important eighteenth-century inventories were published. An article appeared entitled “Opisaniia imperatorskikh zhivopisnykh kollektzii v Peterburge i zagorodnykh dvortsakh, sostavlyennye Iakobom Shtelinym” [“Descriptions of the Imperial Picture Collections in Petersburg and in the Outlying Palaces, Compiled by Jacob Stählin”], Muzei 1 (1980): pp. 173–193, written by the art historian K.M. Malinovskii. (The article was extracted from Malinovskii’s forthcoming two-volume work on Stählin – Zapiski Iakoba Shtelina ob izyashchnykh iskusstvakh v Rossii [Jacob Stählin’s Notes on the Fine Arts in Russia], noted above – which appeared in 1990. Stählin’s notes are translated by Malinovskii from German, and the volumes are equipped with an introductory essay and commentary.) Malinovskii published the detailed inventories of the art collections of the Imperial palaces of St. Petersburg and its environs compiled in the eighteenth century over a period of forty years by Jacob Stählin (Memmingen, Schwabia 9 May 1709 – St. Petersburg 25 June [OS] 1785) (Stählin, Zapiski, vol. 1, pp. 7, 22), who came to Russia at the age of twenty six, with a university education, experience as a poet–translator, and a knowledge of ancient and modern languages, music, allegory, numismatics, and fine arts, to be a professor at the Academy of Sciences. His work in the arts began when he was put in charge of the Engraving Department of the Academy of Sciences in 1738. At this time, he made his first descriptions of Imperial art collections, including Monplezir. In 1742, he left his work at the Academy of Sciences and became tutor to the Heir to the Throne. For forty years, he designed the firework displays and illuminations for the Imperial Court, one of the original purposes for which he had been invited to Russia. His closeness to the court opened the doors for him to

St. Petersburg high society, resulting in his amazing knowledgeability about the private collections of St. Petersburg and the decor of these homes. His famous published work was Podlinnye anekdoty o Petre Velikom [True Anecdotes about Peter the Great] (Leipzig, 1785). He lived in Russia for fifty years, dividing his activities among the academic, art, and court worlds. His notes about the fine arts in Russia are considered the first experiment at creating a history of Russian art. They include information on painting, sculpture, architecture, engraving, mosaics, tapestries, fireworks and illuminations, the art of medal-making, theater, music, ballet and dance art, as well as the history of picture collecting in Russia and the description of all the important Imperial and many private art collections.

The inventories for the picture collections of Monplezir, the Hermitage, and Marly at Peterhof were compiled in 1738–1739 by Stählin and the Swiss artist George Gsell (1675–1740), who had been a broker of pictures in Amsterdam when Peter the Great (see Image 411) was buying them, and had come to Russia at his invitation (Stählin, Zapiski, vol. 2, pp. 5, 11). The collection of Monplezir in their inventory at that point numbered one hundred and eighty pictures (Stählin, p. 6). In most instances, partly because of Gsell's previously acquired expertise, Stählin not only gives the name of the artist but also precisely identifies the subject, and in describing the picture stresses details that make it possible to recognize the picture even today (Stählin, pp. 5, 11). The Monplezir inventory, almost exhaustive in its completeness, increased the number of identifiable pictures in Monplezir to seventy three, while work accomplished by the late 1980s in searching for the pictures catalogued by Stählin made it possible then to view more than half of the original Monplezir collection (Stählin, p. 6). Of this original collection, ten pictures are now in the collection of the palace-museums and parks of Petrodvoretz (the Russian translation equivalent of "Peterhof" used since 1944), three are displayed at the Great Peterhof Palace, one is in Marly, and nineteen are in the Hermitage (Stählin, pp. 6, 61–71). Stählin's inventory was also used extensively in preparing a new catalogue (1st ed., 1976), of the one hundred forty-seven pictures in Monplezir in the 1970s (Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvoretz Monplezir, pp. 70–87).

We cannot say that in 1844 the Whistlers saw at Monplezir all the paintings Stählin described in 1738–1739. In August 1745, Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413) had ordered Lucas Pfandzelt (1716–1788) to remove some pictures from Monplezir to Petersburg (Stählin, Zapiski, vol. 2, pp. 61, 62). Other pictures, which were considered impossible to repair, had been placed in storage in 1747 (Stählin, p. 63). According to the inventory of 1797, compiled by order of Paul I (see Image 417) for all the Imperial palaces, there were then one hundred seventy-three pictures in Monplezir (Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, p. 23). The flood of 1824 caused great damage to the picture gallery of Monplezir: thirty-five pictures were badly damaged and suffered as well from a poor job of restoration (Goldovskii and Znamenov, p. 23). My registered letter of inquiry addressed to Goldovskii and Znamenov concerning further inventories of Monplezir up through 1844 went unanswered. A positive note, however, is that of the thirty pictures transferred from Monplezir to the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, most were not transferred until 1882 (Goldovskii and Znamenov, p. 69). Some of Stählin's attributions and subjects have been shown to be incorrect, but this does not change what the Whistlers saw, only what they thought it was, if they were told at all. By comparing Stählin's inventory with the paintings still at Monplezir in the 1970s, we can get an idea of some of what they might have seen (in the following list, S = Stählin, Zapiski, and G/Z = Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir): Adam Silo (1674–1760): Ships on a Roadstead (G/Z, p. 81, no. 96) and City Roadstead (S: pp. 17, 18, 65, nos. 54, 57; G/Z: p. 82, no. 106); Willem van de Velde the Younger (1633–1707): Ships on a Calm Roadstead (S: pp. 28, 30, 69, no. 136; G/Z: p. 73, no. 24); Andries van der Horn (1600–1679): Boat Landing (View of a Canal in Saardam) (S: pp. 26, 27, 69, no. 128; G/Z: p. 73, no. 27); Jan van Huchtenburg (1647–1733): Horse Fair in Italy with Roman Ruins or Horse Fair (S: pp. 27, 68, no. 123; G/Z: p. 74, no. 35); in the manner of Roelant Savery (c. 1576–1639), but attributed today to Jan van Kessel (1626 – c. 1679): Orpheus with Many Animals or Orpheus Taming the Animals (S: pp. 25, 68, no. 123; G/Z: p. 75, no. 39); Adriaen van Salm (1660–1720): two marine paintings, one called Amsterdam Roadstead (S: pp. 22, 23, 67, no. 93 or 94; G/Z: p. 77, no. 60); Gillis de Winter (1656–1720): Dutch Town or Landscape with Country Church (S: pp. 18, 21, 67, no. 86; G/Z: p. 77, no. 55); Pieter Casteels III (1684–1749): Vase of Flowers (S: pp. 19, 65, no. 60; G/Z: p. 82, no. 101); Abraham Storck (c. 1635 – c. 1710): City Wharf or Seaport with a Church on the Shore (S: pp. 18, 20, 66, no. 71; G/Z: p. 82, no. 104); Rombout van Troyen (c. 1605–1656): 2 paintings: The Destruction of Sodom or Lot Fleeing from Sodom and Aeneas Fleeing from Troy (attributed today to Daniel van Heil (1604–1662) (S: pp. 15, 63, nos. 26, 27; G/Z: p. 85, nos. 130, 131); Jan van Balen (1611–1654): Pallas Athena and the Muses or The Nine Muses on Parnassus (S: pp. 30, 31, 70, no. 165; G/Z: p. 85, no. 132); Richard Brakenburg (1650–1702): Christ and His Pupils at Emmaus or Supper at Emmaus (S: pp. 23, 67, no. 95; G/Z: p. 79, no. 70); Karel Breydel (1678–1733): 2 battle scenes: Cavalry Battle and End of the Battle (S: pp. 17, 65, nos. 58, 59; G/Z: p. 82, nos. 98, 99); Adriaen van der Werff (1659–1722): Vertumnus and Pomona (S: pp. 13, 62, no. 17; G/Z: p. 87, no. 146). Outstanding works by several famous painters listed by Stählin were transferred to the Hermitage in 1882. They include Jan Steen (1626–1679): Young Man Who Has Gotten a Servant Girl Pregnant (known today as The Marriage Contract) (S: pp. 27, 30, 69, no. 133); Joos de Momper (1564–1635): Hermitage with Hermits (S: pp. 31, 70, no. 169); Rembrandt Harmensz van Rijn (1606–1669): The Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau (known today as David and Jonathan) (S: pp. 21, 22, 66–67, no. 85).

Stählin's inventories are in the archives of the Academy of Sciences in the Manuscript Division of the Russian National Library in St. Petersburg.

808. Throughout this passage, Anna Whistler seems to be discussing a visit solely to Monplezir (see Image 402), and therefore seems to refer to paintings in it executed by Peter the Great himself. Fettyplace's journal, however, makes it clear that it was the Hermitage at Peterhof (see Image 403) that was "adorned with ... many rough specimens of Paintings by the great monarch" (entry of Sunday 30th July 1848, PEM: Fettyplace Journal; Fettyplace visited Peterhof on Friday, 28 July 1848). This means that Anna Whistler and the boys visited the Hermitage as well as Monplezir. This building was intended to complement Monplezir, as its earliest name – the Small, or other Monplezir – implies. Its construction was begun in the summer of 1721, and the decoration of the interiors finished after Peter the Great's death. After some changes made to it in the 1740s and 1750s, which included covering the walls of the upper salon on the second floor with paintings hung in trellis fashion and replacing a lifting chair by a staircase at the end of the eighteenth century, no major changes were made to the Hermitage for the next two hundred years (Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 422). This would have been its appearance when the Whistlers saw it.

809. Goldovskii and Znamenov, Dvorets Monplezir, pp. 58, 60; Raskin, Petrodvorets Dvortsy-muzei, p. 135; Kurbatov, Petergof, p. 49.
810. In the secretary's room of Monplezir there was a panel of Carrara marble carved in high relief, depicting allegorically the glory of the reign of Peter the Great (Geirot, Opisanie Petergofa, p. 77; "Dvorets 'Monplezir,'" p. 191). Peter is depicted as a hero full of majesty, dressed in Roman armor, presenting an olive branch to a Russia worshipping on its knees before him. All around are the figures of abundance, trade, and the arts and sciences. The relief was executed by the German sculptor Johann Georg Österreich, in the reign of Catherine the Great, who liked to demonstrate her obeisance before the genius of Peter the Great and her own role as the continuer of his legacy (Izmailov, Monplezir, pp. 17–18). But Anna Whistler records that she saw an ivory carving of Catherine I and Peter the Great. According to a catalogue published in 1966, an exhibit in that year in the Gallery of Peter the Great in the Hermitage in St. Petersburg included a rectangular ivory panel with a relief depicting the coronation of Catherine I (see Image 401). At the left, Peter the Great, standing under a baldachine, places the crown on the head of Catherine I, who stands at the right. Above is the inscription "1724 Crowned in Moscow" (V.N. Vasiliev, Pamiatniki russkoi kul'tury pervoi chetverti XVIII veka v sobranii Gosudarstvennogo ordena Lenina Ermitazha Katalog [Monuments of Russian Culture from the First Quarter of the Eighteenth Century in the Collection of the State Order of Lenin Hermitage Catalogue] [Leningrad and Moscow: Sovetskii khudozhnik, 1966], p. 189). It sounds as if this is the panel Anna Whistler saw, but perhaps in another building at Peterhof. Objects connected with Peter the Great were also found in Marly Palace.
811. Persons mentioned in the entry for Thursday [August] 22nd who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: William Hooper Ropes, merchant, and his wife, Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes (Mr. and Mrs. Ropes); John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary of the American Legation in St. Petersburg from July 1842 until November 1844 (Mr. Maxwell); and William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, his wife (the Gellibrands).
812. It has not been possible to locate the letter from Emma Elizabeth Maingay (see Image 263), Deborah Whistler's lifelong friend, who had recently left Russia permanently with her family to live in England.
813. Maxwell wrote to Major Whistler from Hamburg on 15 August 1844, informing him that he had received his letter from Tchoodvoo (Chudovo [pronounced “Choo’duhvuh”]), where Colonel Pavel Petrovich Mel’nikov (see Image 247) lived, dated 16/28 June. He told the Major of places he had been to and some of the people he had met. His hair had grown back in. He asked: “And how much of my present enjoyment of life do I owe to you? How am I indebted to you for kindness beyond all estimate during a long period of illness, and who can estimate the value of the many happy hours I have passed in sweet familiar intercourse with you in the strange land of Russia. When I forget you my dear Major, may my right hand forget her cunning, and I hope with (what in Bulwers novels is always printed in Capitals and ornamented with startling notes of admiration) Time!! and Experience!! to prove worthy your friendship and regard.” He urged the Major to visit Germany before returning home: “Visit your relatives ~~at~~ in Nassau, . . . let Miss Whistler hear the German opera in its magnificence and the boys the pure brogue of the Fatherland.” He had met with a young Count “attached to the person of Prince Menchikoff, who complimented you and who had seen us often together in our walks about town.” And in closing he asked the Major “to present [his] very respectful compliments to M<sup>ES</sup> and Miss Whistler, to request the boys to sharpen the fish hooks and prepare for poetry” (John S. Maxwell to George W. Whistler, Hamburg, August 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers). Major Whistler’s letter to Maxwell is not among the Maxwell Papers.

Maxwell is urging a trip to Germany because the Cammann and Rodewald families, who were connected by marriage with the family of Anna Whistler’s brother, William Gibbs McNeill, both had German origins. See Whistler . . . Fairfax in Appendix E and Images 31–33, 41.

814. Reverend Dr. Edward Law (see Image 253) had a maternal aunt, Cecilia Markham (9 February 1783 – 30 March 1865), who married, on 6 December 1808, the Rev. Robert Philip Goodenough (19 October 1775 – 20 April 1826). They had eleven children, of which seven survived childhood. Although Rev. Dr. Law was in England in the summer of 1844, it is possible that the Miss Goodenough in St. Petersburg was one of his first cousins: Cecilia (8 October 1810 – 1869), Frederica (4 December 1811 – 1875), Laura (13 April 1813 – 1862), or Louisa (24 September 1821 – 1887) (Sir Clements Markham, Markham Memorials, 2 vols. [London: Spottiswoode, 1913], vol. 2, pp. 50, 51–52; IGI).

815. Of the two hymns mentioned, it has not been possible to find “Thy Will Be Done.” In the case of the second hymn, it has not been possible to find the exact words: “Thou meet’st me where’er I go.” Hymn 150 (opening lines: “What secret place, what distant star, / Is like, dread Lord to thine abode?”), by Thomas H. Gill in The Service of Song for Baptist Churches contains in the second verse the lines: “Vain searchers! But we need not mourn; / We need not stretch our weary wings; / Thou meetest us, where’er we turn; / Thou beamest, Lord, from all bright things” (Samuel Lunt Caldwell, The Service of Song for Baptist Churches [New York: Sheldon, 1876], pp. 105–106, in the section called “God – His Attributes”).
816. Matthew 12:36: “But I say unto you, That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give account thereof in the day of judgment.”
817. Miss Morgan is Sophia Morgan (1808 – 13 April 1872), daughter of Francis and Isabella (Carmichael) Morgan, who married John Rodger, a banker, and from whose home in Linlithgow Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill was buried in 1863. See Note 665 above.
818. Mrs. Baird is Dorothea (Halliday) Baird.
819. The “old lady” is Sophia (Morgan) Baird (1771 – 10/22 February 1856), widow of Charles Baird, called “old” to distinguish her from other Baird women.
820. Edward John Morgan (1812 – 14 May 1876) was “for some time ... the senior partner” in the firm of Egerton Hubbard and Company in St. Petersburg (W.E. Hubbard, “Our Grandmother’s Family – the Morgans,” in Some Account of the Hubbard Family from Family Records, Recollections and Traditions [Sevenoaks, UK: Printed by Joseph Salmon for private circulation, 1917], no pagination; see also The Pall Mall Gazette, May 15, 1876). He is also referred to in this entry as Mr. M. See the biography of the Morgan and Parland families in Appendix E (hereafter, Morgan and Parland).
821. In the southern United States, “simlin” refers to a species of summer squash having a scalloped edge (Andrew F. Smith, ed., Oxford Encyclopedia of Food and Drink in America (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004), s.v. “squash”).
822. Catherine Allan (d. 30 November 1855) was the eldest daughter of Sir William Allan’s brother, John. She married in Edinburgh, on 22 June 1851, Herbert Cautley Blackburn (Roisin A. Kennedy,

The Subject Paintings of Sir William Allan (1782–1850), 2 vols. [MLitt thesis, University of Edinburgh, 1993], vol. 1, p. 208n96; Roisin Kennedy, Dublin, to E. Harden, 16 March 1994; Monumental Inscriptions Pre 1855, Dean Cemetery, no. 2111; IGI).

823. Persons mentioned in the entry for Monday [August] 26th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Rev. George Williams, Rev. Dr. Edward Law's summer replacement in the English Church, who was preaching his last sermon there (Mr Williams); Mary Elizabeth (Mosley) Law, wife of the incumbent chaplain of the English Church (Mrs. Law); Anna Whistler's half-sister, Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill (my Sister); Lydia (Proctor) Wood, wife of the English cotton-spinning factory manager, Charles Wood (Mrs Woods, Mrs Wood); and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, wife of the English merchant Willam Clarke Gellibrand (Mrs Gellibrands party, Mrs Gellibrands wing).
824. Miss Forester, a governess (BRBC STP 1845, fol. 19), also called "Miss F" in the entry for Monday [August] 26th, was probably Constantia / Constance Forrester (St. Petersburg 1796 – St. Petersburg 10/22 November 1878). She was the daughter of Francis Forrester, widower, who married Mary Barts, spinster, in St. Petersburg on 31 August /11 September 1791. They had three other daughters: Catherine Margaret (b. 1793), Elizabeth (b. 1794), and Maria (b. 1801). Catherine Margaret married William Atkinson in St. Petersburg on 24 April /6 May 1829. Neither Elizabeth nor Maria seems to have married in Russia, and only Constantia/Constance died there with their maiden surname. Thus, because she seems to have made a life in Russia, she may be the Miss Forrester of Anna Whistler's diaries.
825. 2 Corinthians 3:9: "For if the ministration of condemnation be glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness exceed in glory."
826. Henrietta Sarah (Markham) Law (30 May 1764 – 15 August 1844) was Rev. Dr. Edward Law's mother (Sir Clements Markham, "The Printed Pedigree of the Markham Family of Morland," Markham Memorials, vol. 2, pp. 51, 52).
827. See Note 824 above. Whichever one of the misses Forrester is the Miss Forrester of Anna Whistler's diaries, she could have male and female cousins with a variety of surnames, if one or both of her parents had siblings; moreover, the child aged four in 1844 could have been born outside Russia. However, a search was made for children baptised in St. Petersburg who were born around 25 August 1840 (the date being discussed in the diary entry of 26 August 1844), the date of the celebration of their birth (i.e., not necessarily their birthday). A very good candidate for the child whose birthday was being celebrated on the 25th is Henry Main Anderson, the son of Matthew Anderson and Anne Elizabeth (Main) Anderson, who was born on 13/25 August 1840. Matthew Anderson and Anne Elizabeth Main were married on 13/25 July 1838. Henry Main appears to be their first child. They also had a daughter named Minna, who was born on 2/14 November 1842 and died 9/21 April 1843. Matthew Anderson (and therefore his wife, through marriage) would seem to be a cousin of Miss Forrester, because a Matthew Anderson, the son of Matthew Anderson and Anna (Barts) Anderson, was born on 9/20 July 1798 in St. Petersburg. Matthew Anderson Sr. and Anna Barts had married in 1786. As Barts is an uncommon surname, there is strong evidence that Anna (Barts) Anderson and Mary (Barts) Forrester were sisters, because the ages at death given in their burial entries indicate that they were born in around 1762 and 1760–1761 respectively. Thus, if Matthew Anderson, the father of Henry Main Anderson, was indeed the same person as the Matthew Anderson born in 1798, he could well be a first cousin of the misses Forrester (b. 1794, 1796, and 1801), and his wife would be called a cousin to them as well. The idea that there is a connection between the Andersons and the Forresters is further supported by the fact that one of the witnesses at the marriage of Francis Forrester to Mary Barts in 1791 was a Matthew Anderson. Also, three of the witnesses at the marriage of Catherine Margaret Forrester to William Atkinson in 1829 were M. Anderson, Frances Anderson, and John Anderson.

828. On the fourth birthday of his son, Wilberforce (Turvey, Bedfordshire 20 August 1807 – Turvey, Bedfordshire 16 January 1825), Rev. Legh Richmond (see Image 189) wrote him a letter in the form of a poem, consisting of nine quatrains, in which the final four words of each quatrain are “just four years old.” It begins: “It was early this morn as I waked from my rest, / An unusual emotion sprang up in my breast: / The occasion of this, do you wish to be told? / ’Tis my little boy’s birthday – he’s just four years old.” The poem is quoted in full in Domestic Portraiture as an illustration of the method employed by Richmond in the early religious education of his children (Domestic Portraiture, pp. 162, 178, 180–181; Grimshawe, Memoir of Richmond, p. 536).
829. Ekateringof (see Images 405–406), named for Catherine I, wife of Peter the Great (see Images 411–412), consists of a park with an ancient wooden palace, avenues for carriages, a music hall, gazebos, a children's playground, and eating places. Although the park was named for her, the palace itself was nevertheless unusually called the Peter I Palace (see Image 405). On the seashore there is a pavilion (the farm), which serves as the summer dacha of the military governor general of St. Petersburg. The park is open to the public in spring and summer. On 1/13 May and on Trinity Day, there is always a public celebration here. Ekateringof was established by Peter the Great (see Image 411) together with its wooden palace, which was built in the spring of 1711, to commemorate his first sea victory over the Swedes in May 1703. He presented it to his wife as a summer residence. After his death, it fell into neglect. In 1745, Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413) expanded the palace, but most of the new additions were destroyed, and the palace was mostly restored to its original appearance. In 1796, Ekateringof was made part of the city and included in the then newly established Fourth Admiralty District. In 1800, Emperor Paul I (see Image 417) entrusted Ekateringof to Count von der Pahlen (1745–1826), at that time governor general of St. Petersburg. In 1804, it was transferred, with all appurtenances, to the jurisdiction of Count A.S. Stroganoff (1733–1811). These measures did not help, and the palace became dilapidated, the woods were fenced in, and – because the site of the garden was marshy – swamps formed, making Ekateringof impassable in bad weather. In 1823, Count M.A. Miloradovich (1771–1825), then military governor general, submitted and received Alexander I's approval of plans for the restoration of Ekateringof. Work was begun in June 1823, and concluded in November of the same year. The most beautiful structures, the music hall and some of the pavilions, were the work of the architect, Auguste Monferrand (1786–1858), who designed the version of St. Isaac's Cathedral being built at this time (see Image 119). In a single summer, a canal was dug, roads and paths laid, the palace rebuilt, the swamps filled in, the ponds cleared, little bridges erected, more than a thousand trees planted, and a children's playground created. Gutuev Island, which lies opposite, was cleared, and the fishermen's houses on it were elevated architecturally to resemble rural buildings in the environs of Rome. Ekateringof became once again a palace to which the inhabitants of Kolomna and the Semyonov and Izmailov regiments come, generally by water, to take Sunday excursions. There are many dachas here, distinctive among them that of V.G. Zhukov (1796–1881; see Image 323). The workers from his tobacco factory camp in the Ekateringof fields at haying time, accompanying their work with the singing for which they are famed. Moreover, villages that become populated with summer people abut on Ekateringof. On Sundays in summer, regimental music plays. Ekateringof is one of those places where smoking is permitted, although it lies within the bounds of the city. Its upkeep is maintained by the city (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1839, pt. 1, pp. 312–317; Pushkarev, Putevoditel', pp. 312–317, 464; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 234, 664–666; Grech, Ves' Peterburg 1851, pp. 213–215; Konechnyi, Progulki, p. 311; N.I. Batorevich, Ekateringof Istorii dvortsovo-parkovogo ansambliia [Ekateringof: A History of the Palace-Park Ensemble] [St. Petersburg: Iskusstvo, 2006], pp. 106–125, 151–165, 175, 241). The artist, Karl Gampel'n (between 1796–1808 – after 1880), captured the 1/13 May public holiday in an engraving (aquatint) executed in 1825–1826 called Ekateringof Celebration (Ekateringofskoe gul'ianie) (see Image 406). Ten meters long and nine-and-a-half centimeters high, it depicts the celebration of 1824, after the park's restoration. Anna Whistler was not attracted by the first of May spectacle, but when Lydia (Procter) Wood (see Image 272) had a pied-à-terre at Ekateringof in summer for making daily trips there with her children, Anna Whistler came at least once to visit her with James and Willie. She received the invitation on Friday, 23 August 1844.

Vasilii Grigorievich Zhukov (1796–1881; see Image 323), a tobacco manufacturer, produced a cheap pipe tobacco in his St. Petersburg and Moscow factories from the 1820s to the 1850s. One of the most prestigious awards of the Imperial Russian Geographical Society, the Zhukov Award, was named for him as one of their biggest philanthropists. His choir of workers, directed by him, was famous for its singing (Nikolai Leskov, The Enchanted Wanderer and Other Stories, trans. and ed. Richard Pervear and Larissa Volokhonsky [London: Vintage Books, 2013], 354, 568; Leo Tolstoy, Childhood, Boyhood, Youth, ed. and trans. Judson Rosengrant [London: Penguin Classics, 2012], pp. 253, 407; Batorevich, Ekateringof, pp. 152, 156, 175; “History,” on the Russian Geographical Society website).

830. Over the canal leading to the palace is a charming and light little iron bridge. At the entrance to the bridge there are gates from both sides shaped like three arches. Along the sides of the canal is an embankment separating off two clear ponds. In the middle of the ponds, out of respect for antiquity, trees planted in Peter the Great's time or before his time have been preserved. All along the palace there is a gallery which descends to the canal from both sides. The ponds are shaded by spreading birches. From the other side of the palace, a long avenue for pedestrians stretches through the entire grove. The Peter I Palace is a two-story building of simple architecture, but nonetheless quite spacious. Near it is a gallery from which the curious can see the arrangement and decor of the rooms on the lower floor. The palace has been restored to its former appearance. Its side walls are the same as they were in Peter's time. The restoration was unusually difficult to effect. From the windows of the palace, ships can be seen sailing by, one after another, like the continuous series of scenes in a panorama. The palace is more spacious now than it was in Peter's time. The section starting at the hearth room with the two-story hall was added on by Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413). The two stories contain twenty-one rooms. On the lower floor, the decor is much as it originally was: the cupboards, chairs, and all the objects are very plain and correspond to the simple life led by Peter the Great (see Image 411). Upstairs, where no decorations remained, the rooms are decorated quite luxuriously. The palace contains many precious mementos of Peter the Great, some made by him, others gifted by him and donated by the descendants of recipients to decorate the restored palace. In every room there is an icon; the icon of the Vladimir Mother of God in front of Peter's bedroom is the same one that was here when he was alive. The palace also contains a library of Russian books relating to the history of Peter the Great. On the upper floor there are rooms filled with Chinese objects. Other rooms on this floor are decorated magnificently with furniture and hangings that once embellished the chambers of empresses Catherine I (see Image 412) and Elizaveta Petrovna (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, pp. 153–167; Batorevich, Ekateringof, pp. 126–131).

Bozherianov, explaining that a part of Peter the Great's possessions and curiosities of his era were transferred from the Ekateringof Palace to the Petrine Gallery of the Imperial Hermitage in the early 1850s, says that a description of all the things in the Ekateringof Palace may be found in Pushkarev's guide (I.N. Bozherianov, "Ekateringof," Russkaia starina 41 (March 1884): p. 629). As one of Pushkarev's guides was published in 1843, it would therefore seem possible to identify everything to which Anna Whistler refers. Actually, however, Pushkarev's description is limited to those things he thinks may be of particular interest to the visitor (Pushkarev, Putevoditel', pp. 313–317). Far more detail about the contents of the Ekateringof Palace rooms can be found in Bur'ianov's guide for children, which, while charming and patriotic, is also very knowledgeable (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, pp.153–167). His descriptions are too extensive to be reproduced in their entirety here. They, too, do not cover all the objects Anna Whistler selects for mention.

831. Assuming that “attempts at the arts and sciences” includes objects made by Peter the Great, only two such attempts are cited by Bur'ianov and Pushkarev. In a splendidly decorated corner room on the upper floor of the palace there is a wooden snuffbox under a glass cloche, with the inscription “From His Majesty, made by his own hand, presented to Lieutenant Joseph Botom [sic] of the Navy” engraved on a little brass strip. Peter made the snuffbox with a non-removable lid, the upper half of which slides open (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 157; Pushkarev, 1839, pt. 1, pp. 314–315; Pushkarev, Putevoditel', pp. 314–31; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 236; Batorevich, Ekateringof, p. 128). In Peter's bedroom on the first floor there is a plain old pine bed devoid of decoration that is avowed by oldtimers to be his own handiwork (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 155; Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1839, pt. 1, pp. 313–314; Pushkarev, Putevoditel', pp. 313–314; Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, p. 235).
832. There is some reference to Chinese embroidery in the Ekateringof Palace in the following Note, but Anna Whistler's comment in the diary text does not make clear what kind of embroidery she means.
833. There were several rooms with Chinese objects on the upper floor of the palace. At the top of the stairs, one sees a model of a Chinese galley, Chinese lanterns, and two human-sized stuffed dolls, representing subjects of the emperor, made of silk and attached to lacquered boards. On the walls were views of amusement parks with kiosks and sailing boats. In a nearby room were Chinese lacquered screens with gilt on black, with a picturesque depiction of the ceremonial departure of the Chinese emperor in his chariot, accompanied by his suite. In the same room were Chinese cupboards, chests of drawers, and bureaus with many drawers, some of them secret; these objects were as remarkable in their inner structure as in their outer appearance. Of two large pictures, one made on satin depicts flowers and birds with extraordinary liveliness, while the other, made on wood, with ivory figures pasted on and colored, represents a view of Chinese buildings in the countryside, the hunt, and a public celebration. The decor of these rooms reaches its high point in several chairs of unusual shape, the lacquered chamois pillows of which are supported on gilded monster heads. A curtain in Chinese taste covers the door. There are also straw blinds, two fans and, finally, ten elongated satin pictures embroidered with silk and depicting multi-colored parrots and luxuriant roses, songbirds on bushes in fields, etc. One cannot help but be astonished at the freshness of the flowers, the brightness of the colors, the brilliant play of colors in the silk, and the liveliness in imitating nature. To the side is another small Chinese study. Here, there are remarkable tables with landscapes on black with gilt and marble screens with charming depictions of a Chinese wedding. The arrival of the bridegroom, the emergence of the bride-to-be from her father's house, etc. are represented on the ten panels of the screen in small pictures, below which at the bottom are fruits and flowers. In addition to the extraordinary artistry of their finish, the screens give a curious picture of Chinese customs. All these objects were probably brought from Peking during the lifetime of Peter the Great by Captain of the Life Guards Lev Izmailov, whom he sent as minister plenipotentiary to the emperor of China. Izmailov left St. Petersburg with ten thousand rubles for the purchase of various articles in Peking. One can also presume that some of the pieces of furniture were gifts in exchange for those sent to the Chinese emperor by Peter the Great. There is no specific mention, however, of a Chinese cabinet with ivory inlay (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, pp. 160-163. Pushkarev mentions only a few objects and gives no detail (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1839, pt. 1, p. 312; Pushkarev, Putevoditel', p. 315; Batorevich mentions a large number of objects [Ekateringof, pp. 132-137]).

834. Bur'ianov and Pushkarev describe some of the upper-story rooms as magnificently decorated. In one, they say, the walls were covered with white velvet with bouquets of flowers depicted on it. In other rooms, Bur'ianov says, the furniture was covered with tiger velvet, satin and damask (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 164), but Pushkarev says these materials covered the walls (Pushkarev, Putevoditel', p. 316). Anna Whistler probably meant tapestries, however. In yet another room, Bur'ianov says, the walls were decorated with tapestries by Russian artists, except for one of flowers and fruits by a foreign artist so realistic that birds could be deceived by it (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 164). Pushkarev mentions Bathsheba Bathing (Kupainshebaia Virsaviia), also called Bathsheba at the Fountain (Virsaviia u fontana), woven in

- 1727, and Dogs in a Slaughterhouse (Sobaki v boine), woven in 1755, as noteworthy (Pushkarev, Putevoditel', p. 316). Neither tapestry is from Peter's lifetime. For all the preceding information about Ekateringof, see also Pushkarev, Nikolaevskii Peterburg, pp. 234–238, 664–666; Batorevich, Ekateringof, pp. 126–140). Batorevich deals with the tapestries on pp. 131–132.
835. An Imperial order in 1840 permitted the introduction of dachas within the non-Imperial part of Ekateringof, and the lands there started to be leased for that purpose (Batorevich, Ekateringof, p. 166). Mrs. Wood was renting one room in someone's "summer house."
836. The Athanasian Creed is a "profession of faith which has been widely used in Western Christendom. It expounds the doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation, adding a list of the most important events in the Lord's life; it includes "anathemas against those who do not believe its affirmations" (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. "Athanasian Creed").
837. Reverend Capel Molyneux was born on 2 December 1804 at Loseley mansion, Surrey, England. He was the eldest son of Ella (Young) Molyneux and John Molyneux of Gravel Hill, Salop. He entered Christ College, Cambridge University, Michaelmas 1822 and was Scholar in 1823, BA in 1826. He was "sometime in the Army." He was ordained deacon (Worcester) in 1828 and priest (Hereford) in 1829. He was canon of Trinity Church, Woolwich, 1842–1850; canon of the Lock Hospital, Harrow Road, London, 1850–1860; vicar of St. Paul's, Onslow Square, 1860–1872 (resigned). He married, firstly, Maria Carpenter, daughter of Admiral Carpenter, in June 1831. They had five surviving children: Maria Jane (d. 10 January 1916); Caroline (d. 15 March 1927); Eliza (d. 20 March 1920); Ella (d. 15 August 1915); and Julia (d. 2 January 1927). He married, secondly, in 1870, Eugenia Grace, widow of Lt.-Col. Alexander Murray. He died on 27 December 1877, age 73, at Cannes. He was the author of Baptismal Regeneration Opposed Both by the Word of God and the Standards of the Church of England (London: R.B. Seeley and W. Burnside, 1842); as well as Israel's Fortune; The World to Come; Gethsemane, lectures delivered in Lent (1854); and Broken Bread, Short Comments for Family Use (1855). His portrait may be found in Christian Cabinet Illustrated Almanack (London: Office of the Christian Cabinet, 1860), pp. 30–31 and in Illustrated News of the World (1862) (Frederic Boase, Modern English Biography, 4 vols.

[London: Cass, 1892], vol. 2, p. 918; Alumni Cantabrigienses, vol. 4, p. 436; Crockford's Clerical Directory for 1890, p. 436).

838. “Regeneration” refers to the “the spiritual rebirth which, according to traditional theology, is effected in the soul by Baptism” (Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. “regeneration”). The title of Rev. Molyneux’s book on baptismal regeneration suggests that he felt it to be “opposed both by the word of god and the standards of the Church of England.” See his biography in the previous Note.
839. Matthew 3:15: “And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.”
840. Tuesday [August] 27th was the third birthday of Charles Donald Whistler (Charlie), who had died on board the John Bull on the way from London to St. Petersburg in September 1843. Anna Whistler devoted this entry to her immediate family’s dead children. They included Kirk Boott Whistler, who had died at the age of four, in 1842, and whom she does not mention by name. She referred to the two of them as “both my darlings.” She also recalled Joseph Swift Whistler (Joe), who had died on 1 January 1840, at the age of fifteen. She mentions as well George William Whistler (George) (see Images 12–13), who was not well and had been with her and the rest of the family in the happy days on the Acadia from Boston to Liverpool. On that first leg of the journey to St. Petersburg, Charles Donald Whistler had celebrated his second birthday.
841. Anna Whistler omitted the word “eyes.”
842. In this entry for Wed [August] 28th, Anna Whistler describes the activities of Tuesday 27 August. Despite her grief, she had allowed herself to be persuaded by Deborah Whistler to accept Colonel Todd’s invitation to Tsarskoe Selo.

Persons mentioned in this entry who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Charles Stewart Todd, American envoy (Col. Todd); Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler’s half-sister (Aunt Alicia, Aunt A); Pyotr, the coachman (Coacher, Péotre); Andrea, the beggar child (Andrea); Kirk Boott Whistler, who had died in 1842 (Kirkie); Eliza (Lamb) Maingay, mother of Emma Maingay, Deborah Whistler’s closest friend in St. Petersburg (Mrs. Maingay); Eliza Maingay, daughter of Eliza (Lamb) Maingay (Eliza Maingay); and Colonel Todd’s servant (Miller).

843. All verst markers are made of wood, except for those on the route from the capitol to Tsarskoe Selo and Peterhof: here they are made of stone (see Image 395). At each verst there is a beautiful obelisk-shaped pillar of natural granite with a number on it. On the road to Peterhof, one passes 26 such markers (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 2). As late as 1991, a stone verst marker could still be found in the southwest corner of the Upper Garden at Peterhof with the number "29," indicating its distance from the post office in St. Petersburg. In the nineteenth century, when the distance indicated by the verst markers began to be calculated from the city limits, the number "29" was changed to "26" (S.B. Gorbatenko, "Novye stranitsy rannei istorii Petergofa" ["New Pages in the Early History of Peterhof"], in Nevskii Arkhiv Istoriko-kraevedcheskii sbornik [Nevskii Archive: A Historical-Local History Collection] [Moscow and St. Petersburg: Atheneum Feniks, 1993], p. 155n6). See also D.A. Kiuchariants, Antonio Rinal'di (St. Petersburg: Stroiizdat SPb, 1994), pp. 117, 158, 159.
844. See the detail of the gable end of a log cottage in Image 355, showing the "jumping board."
845. On 15/27 August, the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin is celebrated by the Orthodox Church (Mesiatsoslov na 1842 g.; Fedosiuk, Chto neponiatno u klassikov, p. 17; Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, s.v. "Assumption of the BVM"). See Image 382 of an icon celebrating this feast day.
846. "The road [to Moscow] was really excellent, and we observed in various places several handsome wells, built of granite, and ornamented with sphinxes, in the antique style" (William Rae Wilson, Travels in Russia, 2 vols. [London: Longman, Rees, Orme, Brown, and Green, 1828] vol. 2, p. 1). It has not been possible to find an image of either the classic stone fountain or the classic stone well referred to in this entry.
847. In 1792, at the end of Catherine the Great's reign, Giacomo Quarenghi (1744–1817) began the construction for her favorite grandson of a great palace, called the New (Alexander) Palace (see Images 388, 447). It was located in the northeast end of the New Garden and "to the east of the main entrance to the Catherine Palace," its "main façade overlooking a pond" (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 102; Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 210; Hamilton, Art and Architecture, p. 201; Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 299). It was essentially completed in May of 1796, the year of Catherine's death. On 12 June (OS) 1796, Grand Duke Alexander Pavlovich (the future Alexander I; see Image

418) moved in (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 210). When he became emperor five years later, he moved to the Catherine Palace (see Image 385), which he preferred. Nicholas I (see Images 420–423), however, preferred the New (Alexander) Palace. He would move to Tsarskoe Selo in early spring and stay until the end of May, when the troops went to camp near Peterhof for maneuvers. When maneuvers were over, the Court would return to Tsarskoe Selo and then move back to St. Petersburg about 24 November (Viľchkovskii, p. 211). In 1800, the palace was stuccoed and “the architectural detail was delineated in white against a yellow background” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 301). In contrast to the Catherine Palace, the exterior of the New (Alexander) Palace is marked by a simplicity and severity of style (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 211). There are “no window surrounds and only a drip line separating the first and second floors” (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 301). The building consists of a main façade with two perpendicular wings. Two perpendicular pavilions extend from along the main façade. A “double Corinthian colonnade” of snow-white stone unites the two pavilions and “create[s] an enclosed entrance court” (Brumfield, pp. 299, 301). The building has a dentilated cornice “surmounted by a balustrade” (Brumfield, p. 301). The colonnade also carries the entire entablature of the Corinthian order and the balustrade, which are continued above the entire building. The proportions of the colonnade are faultless. It is particularly fine when looked at from up close, from the inner courtyard. The free-standing columns are perceived then against the background of the sky and the landscape of the park. The entrances into the building are situated along the sides of the colonnade in the gable ends of the pavilions. This compositional feature marked a departure from the accent on the central axis of the building traditional to the architecture of Classicism. The palace did not have a main entrance marked by a portico and pediment, and therefore also did not have a sharply defined main façade (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 102). On the park façade at the rear there is a “projecting central pavilion with [a] dome” (Hamilton, Art and Architecture, p. 201). This feature, too, did not accent the central axis of the building. The palace does not dominate the park ensemble, but is part of it and unites harmoniously with the landscape, in this respect differing essentially from the Catherine Palace (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 102). While the interior of the palace underwent significant changes in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the external appearance did not for more than one hundred fifty years (Petrov, pp. 102, 103). In 1817, lilac bushes were planted in front of the palace and colonnade. They spread, eventually partially hiding the palace from view (Petrov, p. 103), as can be seen in Image 388. In front of the colonnade, between the wings, there was until 1847 an open macadamized area (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 211). In 1838, two cast-iron statues, each of a youth playing an ancient Russian game, were placed in front of the colonnade. The models for them were sculptures executed by pupils of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts and shown at the annual Academy exhibition in 1836: a youth playing “knucklebones” (babki) by N.S. Pimenov (1812–1864) and another playing “nail into the ring” (svaika) by A.V. Loganovskii (1810–1855) (for illustrations of these games, see Images 356–357) (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 102; Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 211). Although not intended for installation in front of the palace, they are said to combine successfully with the Classical colonnade (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 103). In 1843, the first electromagnetic telegraph in Russia was set up in the study of Nicholas I in the New (Alexander) Palace, connecting with the study of the director of the Main Administration of Transport and Public Buildings, Count Pyotr Andreevich Kleinmikhel’ (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 211). Except for their 1846 visit to the newly built oratory in this palace, Anna Whistler does not record visiting any other part of it.

For a description of “babki” see the entry for Tuesday 13th May [1845], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II, and accompanying Note 149. “Svaika ... consists in pitching an iron bolt, the head of which weighs sometimes a great many pounds, within the circle of an iron ring, previously fixed flat on the ground... The bolt is whirled around in the air, being held by the point for that purpose; and when it strikes the earth, such is the force with which it penetrates the ring, that it requires the united power of two men to uproot it once more. When the player misses the centre of the ring, he passes the bolt to the next player, and pays a forfeit” (Granville, St. Petersburg, vol. 2, p. 397).

848. The pseudo-Gothic Armory (Arsenal) (see Image 391) stands in the Alexander Park on the spot once occupied by a Baroque pavilion called Mon Bijou that had been designed by S.I. Chevakiniskii (1713–1770s); it was redesigned by Rastrelli for Empress Elizaveta Petrovna (see Image 413) and built between 1747 and 1754. Mon Bijou consisted of a central octagonal two-tiered brick structure with a cupola and with four single-storied adjoining rooms extended from it on intersecting diagonals (Viľchkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 195; Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 241). It was considered a gem of Russian Baroque architecture. Adam Menelaws (1753–1831), remodeling it as a dwelling for Alexander I (see Image 418), modeled it on a pavilion at Shrubs Hill, a Gothic castle in England. The work was begun by him in 1819. After his death, supervision of the construction was given to Alexander A. Ton (1794–1881). The work was concluded in 1834. In the remodeling, four hexagonal, three-tiered towers were fused into one whole with the central two-storied mass that remained from Mon Bijou, each tower being joined to it by one of its six sides. The tower walls are finished off with cornices and crenelated parapets. Each of the towers is crowned with a Gothic turret. Wide window openings were cut through the walls of the central mass. The whitewashed plaster platbands and arches above the windows stand out against the brick walls, which were left unplastered as in medieval English castles (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 111; Pamiatniki arkhitektury prigorodov Leningrada, p. 120). The windows had transoms with insets of Gothic designs. Many of the windows contained panes of old German and Swiss glass depicting Biblical stories, German and Swiss sixteenth- and seventeenth-century subjects, and armor and weapons of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (F. Gille, ed., Tsarskosel'skii muzei s sobraniiem oruzh'ia, prinadlezhashchego Gosudariu Imperatoru [The Tsarskoe Selo Museum and the Collection of Arms Belonging to His Majesty the Emperor] [St. Petersburg: A. Bauman, 1860], pp. 26, 40, 62, 70–71; Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 218; Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 111). The remodeled building became a museum housing a rich collection of ancient arms and armor (see Image 392) that Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) had started in 1811, when a young Grand Duke. The collection, housed since 1817 in the Anichkov Palace in St. Petersburg (see Images 133–134), had been transferred to the Alexander Palace when he became emperor. The subsequent expansion of the collection led to the decision to house it in the pseudo-Gothic building, which, on the basis of an order issued by Nicholas I in 1834, was to be called the Armory (L. Tarasiuk, Starinnoe ognestrel'noe oruzhie v sobranii Ėrmitazha. Evropa i severnaia Amerika [Old Russian Firearms in the Collection of the Hermitage: Europe and North America] [Leningrad: Iskusstvo, Leningradskoe otdelenie, 1971], pp. 8, 9).

The names of some of the rooms differed over the years. In 1842, Pushkarev's guide noted on the first floor the Generals' Room, picture room, library, Indian Room, and Her Majesty's cloakroom and bedroom, and on the second floor the dining room, Russian or Slavonic Room, Polish Room, and Turkish Room (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, pp. 74–76). A plan of the Armory published in the 1860 catalogue describes the lower floor as consisting of a vestibule, large hall, study, empress's room, library and Russian Room, firearms room, Albanian Room and main [stone] staircase. On the upper floor were located the Hall of Knights, the Indo-Muslim Room, the Turkish Room, the Indo-Persian Room and [iron] staircase (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, plan facing title page). Prior to this, the Indo-Muslim Room had been the Russian Room (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 147a, 266). The Albanian Room did not carry this name when the Whistlers visited the Armory. It was set up after the death, in 1849, of Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich, who willed his collection of arms to his nephew, the Heir to the Throne, Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 86–87). The empress's room was another name for the bedroom (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. vi, ix). The dining room was the Hall of Knights (identified by descriptions of the coats-of-arms of the Russian provinces on its walls) (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, p. 131; Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 75). The blinds in the Armory were red (Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. xxxiii). Instead of the proposed marble floors, Nicholas I chose wooden parquet floors (Benois, p. xxxii). Objects were displayed in cases and cupboards in the rooms and towers as well as on the winding staircases and on the slender iron columns supporting the staircases. Groups of objects were picturesquely hung on the walls as units (trofei). The items exhibited were labelled (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 91–130). In 1836, rules for visitors were approved. The public was allowed entrance on Wednesdays and Sundays from ten to six, in winter until two. Distinguished guests with tickets could visit every day. A guest book was kept for recording the names of acceptable visitors and keeping out undesirables. (I checked the Hermitage Archives in July 2003 and was told that these guest books are not in their collection.) When the Court was in residence at Tsarskoe Selo, admittance to the Armory was by special order. Special officers were attached to the Armory (Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. xxxiii). They were non-commissioned Guards veterans (Vi'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 197). There were guides (entry for Wed [August] 28th [1844], NYPL: AWPD, Part I) and guidebooks (Bur'ianov, Progulka s del'mi, vol. 3, p. 119). See also Rigby, Baltic Letters, vol. 2, letter 26, pp. 264–266.

In 1840, Charles Seyger (Russian initials: K.I.), librarian to Nicholas I, died. His replacement was Florian Gille (1801–1864), who filled the two posts of head of the palace libraries and of the Division of Antiquities at the Hermitage. He was director of the Armory for some twenty-five years. During his tenure, the collection grew from three thousand to five thousand objects (Tarasiuk, Starinnoe ognestrel'noe oruzhie, p. 9). In 1886, now numbering over seven thousand objects, it was transferred to the Hermitage (Tarasiuk, p. 11). It is possible, however, to have a good idea of some of the objects Anna Whistler's party saw at the Armory through publications that appeared long before the transfer. In 1840, the first catalogue of the collection in the Russian language, prepared by K.I. Seyger, was published: Katalog redkogo, starinnogo i vostochnogo oruzh'ia, kbraniashchegosia v sobstvennom Ego Imperatorskogo Velichestva Arsenale v Tsarskom-Selo [Catalogue of Rare, Ancient and Eastern Arms in His Imperial Majesty's Own Armory in Tsarskoe Selo], 2 vols. (St. Petersburg: Eduard Prats, 1840). It was actually an inventory of 2747 items, grouped according to twenty categories, such as “armor,” “shields,” etc. (F. Gille, comp., Tsarskosel'skii muzei s sobraniiem oruzh'ia, prinadlezhashego Gosudariu Imperatoru [The Tsarskoe Selo Museum and the Collection of Arms Belonging to His Majesty the Emperor] [St. Petersburg: A. Bauman, 1860], pp. vii–viii; N. Kondakov, comp., Imperatorskii Ėrmitazh Ukazatel' otdeleniia srednikh vekov i epokhi Vozrozhdeniia [Imperial Hermitage: Guide to the Division of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance] [St. Petersburg: Imperial Hermitage, 1891], p. 9). In 1835, a serial edition of lithographs of outstanding objects in the Armory was begun. These lithographs were based on watercolor drawings executed by A.P. Rockstuhl (1798–1877) and others. It was completed and published in 1853 in French with the title Musée du Tsarskoé-Sélo ou collection d'armes de Sa Majesté L'Empereur de toutes les Russies. Ouvrage composé de 180 planches lithographées par Asselineau d'après les dessins originaux de A. Rockstuhl, avec une Introduction historique par Flor. Gille (St. Petersburg, 1835–1853). This edition was continued and published in 1869 by the librarian of Alexander II, E. Kaemmerer (Kondakov, Imperatorskii Ėrmitazh Ukazatel', p. 9). It contained explanatory texts in Russian and French and a historical introduction on medieval arms, and appeared under the title Tsarskosel'skii arsenal ili Sobranie oruzh'ia prinadlezhashego Ego Velichestvu Gosudariu Imperatoru Aleksandru

Nikolaevichu. Po risunkam Gg. Professora A.N. Rokstbulia i N.A. Bogdanova s poiasnitel'nyim tekstom sostavlennym Deist. St. Sov. E. Kemmererom zavedyvaishchim Sobstvennymi Ego Velichestva Bibliotekami i Arsenalami [The Armory at Tsarskoe Selo or the Collection of Arms and Armor Belonging to His Imperial Majesty Aleksandr Nikolaevich. Based on Drawings by Messrs. Professor A.N. Rokstubl and N.A. Bogdanov, with an Explanatory Text by Actual Councilor of State E. Kaemmerer, Director of His Majesty's Libraries and Armories; the title is then repeated in French], edition of Messrs. A.A. Il'in and N.K. Flige, printed with His Majesty's permission (St. Petersburg: Obshchestvennaia Pol'za, 1869) (Kondakov, Imperatorskii Èrmitazh Ukazatel', pp. 9–10). In 1860, two editions, Russian and French, of a detailed room-by-room catalogue with an introduction by Gille appeared. They were called Tsarskosel'skii muzei s sobraniiem oruzh'ia, prinallezhashego Gosudariu Imperatoru [The Tsarskoe Selo Museum and the Collection of Arms Belonging to His Majesty the Emperor] (St. Petersburg: A. Bauman, 1860) and Notice sur le Musée de Tsarskoé-Sélo renfermant la collection d'armes de Sa Majesté L'Empereur (St. Petersburg, 1860) (Kondakov, Imperatorskii Èrmitazh Ukazatel', p. 10). In 1891, Senior Curator N. Kondakov's catalogue to the arms and armor collection in the Hermitage – Imperatorskii Èrmitazh Ukazatel' otdeleniia srednikh vekov i èpokhi Vozrozhdeniia [Imperial Hermitage Guide to the Division of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance] – was published. These publications have been helpful in ascertaining and describing some of the objects that were of particular interest to the Whistlers.

Rokstul's given names were Aloisius Gustav. The Russians called him Aloizii Petrovich. His initials therefore appear sometimes as A.G. and sometimes as A.P. Why the initials A.N. appear in the abovementioned publications is not known to me.

849. The Armory had in its collection suits of German, Italian, French, Swiss, Austrian, Spanish, Hungarian, Polish, Czech, Indo-Muslim, and Persian armor. The specific reference in the diaries is to two elegant suits of Maximilian armor of German workmanship from the beginning of the sixteenth century that were worn by Nicholas I (see Images 420) and Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (see Image 420) during the medieval “carousel” which took place in Tsarskoe Selo on 23 May /4 June 1842 to celebrate the silver wedding anniversary of Nicholas I and Empress Aleksandra Fyodorovna. The “carousel” set out from the Armory and proceeded to the esplanade of the Alexander Palace, where a tournament was held. Sixteen cavaliers and sixteen ladies participated. The ladies were in medieval dress, the cavaliers in sixteenth-century armor from the Armory. The armor worn by Nicholas I and Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich was taken from the empress's room (bedroom) of the Armory. The young grand dukes were dressed as pages (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, pp. 196–197; Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. ix, 66–67, 107, 109, 133, 134–136; Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 218). For further details and differing numbers see Wortman, Scenarios of Power, vol. 1, p. 340. Plate 1 of Kaemmerer, Tsarskosel'skii arsenal, illustrates the suit of armor worn by Nicholas I, Plate 5 that worn by his son. Both plates are accompanied by texts in Russian and French. A portrait of the Imperial family during the 1842 carousel was committed to canvas by Horace Vernet (1789–1863) in 1843 (see Image 420). Aleksandra Fyodorovna dominates the painting, seated on a white horse in the center. To her right is Nicholas I, and beyond him and further in the background Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich and the Duke of Leuchtenberg, her son-in-law. Behind her to her left are the grand duchesses Olga Nikolaevna and Aleksandra Nikolaevna and Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich. To her left in the foreground stand the little grand dukes, Nikolai Nikolaevich and Mikhail Nikolaevich (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. ix–x; Wortman, Scenarios of Power, vol. 1, p. 340). An excellent discussion of the symbolism of such carousels may be found in Wortman, Scenarios of Power, vol. 1, p. 340.

850. It has not been possible to identify this gun in any of the books cited in Note 848, NYPL: AWPDP, Part I, as they list many guns with very long barrels. According to the curator of the Hermitage Armory, Dr. Iurii Miller, it is difficult to identify this gun without a more detailed description of it (Iu. Miller, St. Petersburg, to E. Harden, 19 October 2001).
851. “There is precise information that these stuffed horses were bought in St. Petersburg in the 1830s” (Iu. Miller, St. Petersburg, to E. Harden, 19 October 2001).
852. See Image 393. The 1840 catalogue describes the saddle simply as covered with silver plates (bliashki) (Seyger, Katalog redkogo oruzh'ia, vol. 2, p. 157). It is described in the 1860 catalogue as made of silver with convex chasing (vybuklaia chekanka) (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, p. 137). The plate illustrating the saddle does not help clarify either statement (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, vol. 4, p. 263, plate 30). The pommel had the elegant form of what was thought to be a curving swan's neck (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei,

p. 137). In both catalogues, it is recorded that the saddle had belonged to Tipoo Sahib (1751–1799), the last Nabob of Mysore (Seyger, Katalog redkogo oruzh'ia, vol. 2, p. 157; Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. viii, 137). Neither catalogue records his armor or horse. The 1840 catalogue explains that the other saddle parts grouped with Tipoo Sahib's saddle do not belong to it (Seyger, Katalog redkogo oruzh'ia, vol. 2, pp. 157–158). The 1860 catalogue describes some armor placed near Tipoo Sahib's saddle, but says it is not his (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 136–137). His sword was located elsewhere in the Armory and is described in the 1860 catalogue (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 220–221). Later scholarship has established that the saddle was acquired for the Arsenal in 1836 in Paris from the collector F. Civilotti, as belonging to Tipoo Sahib (Iu. Miller, “Sedlo i sablia Tippu-Saiba” [“A Saddle and Sword Belonging to Tipoo Sahib”], Soobshcheniia Gosudarstvennogo Ermitazha [Reports of the State Hermitage Museum] 10 [1956]: pp. 45–46). It has been suggested that the bird's head is that of the mythological bird Garuda, which appears frequently in Indian art (Miller, “Sedlo i sablia Tippu-Saiba,” p. 46). The seat of the saddle is covered in red satin with a white design (Miller, “Sedlo i sablia Tippu-Saiba,” p. 46).

853. Dr. Miller made an inquiry of the Department of Antiquities at the Hermitage. It has in its collection ancient Greek and Roman weaponry and some helmets from the Crimea, where archaeological excavations were carried on from the beginning of the nineteenth century, but no helmet from Herculaneum (Iu. Miller, St. Petersburg, to E. Harden, 19 October 2001). If we assume that Anna Whistler could have made a mistake in her attribution, we can propose that the object she saw was an ancient Greek bronze helmet, totally covered with rust, with two ear protectors, and decorations on it of consummate taste, found in a tomb in the environs of Kerch, a seaport in the Western Crimea, near ancient Panticapaeum (Seyger, Katalog redkogo oruzh'ia, vol. 2, p. 140, item 405).
854. See Image 394. This enormous lock was on the door of the Great Hall (Hall of Knights). It was found in 1839 in Jerusalem, in a ditch that encircled the wooden tower of David, and was obtained by the Russian consul in Jaffa, who sent it to the then minister of Finances, Count Kankrin, for presentation to Nicholas I. The lock is made of forged iron, weighs 38½ pounds, is square in shape, and is more than nine inches across. The mechanism consists of a cylinder four inches in diameter. The key, which is thirteen inches long and weighs five pounds, fits into an opening made in the iron casing of the cylinder and at a certain distance from the orifice of the cylinder presses on six springs of the most clever construction, as a result of which the lock opens. To lock it again, one has only to remove the key and the springs return to normal position and go back into their chambers, once again uniting the opened parts. In the lower part of the lock may be seen an indentation which probably held a silver plate with a depiction of the cross of Jerusalem on it, but unfortunately the plate has been lost. The two sections comprising the head of the key also form a cross of Jerusalem. The coat-of-arms of the Jerusalem Latin Kingdom consists of a shield, on the silver of which is depicted a double gold cross, which is counter to the rule of heraldry that requires that color should not be placed on color nor metal on metal. This deviation from the accepted rule was made so that later generations should seek a valid reason as to why this incorrect coat-of-arms (armes à enquérir) was formed. The external appearance of the lock, together with its size and weight, prove that it was used for locking city or tower gates, while the representation of the cross of Jerusalem repeated on the lock and key may serve to indicate when it was made – probably at the end of the twelfth century, when the Crusaders still held Jerusalem. The lock has survived intact and in good working order, thanks to its thick iron walls, while the mechanism is located so deep that it could not be subject to rust. It was also preserved by the dry Jerusalem soil and the hot climate (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 129–130; Williams, Holy City, [pp. 504–505]); Illustratsiia. Ezhenedel'noe izdanie vsego polez'nogo i iziashchnogo [Illustration: A Weekly Publication of All Things Useful and Elegant], 2nd year, vol. 3, no. 25 [July 6, 1846] [no. 61]: pp. 390–399).

855. Both sets of equestrian accoutrements appear in Kaemmerer, Tsarskosel'skii arsenal, and both are cited as the gift of Sultan Mahmud II (1784–1839). The first set mentioned by Anna Whistler was presented to Nicholas I (see Image 420–423) as a token of gratitude for aid rendered in 1833, when he sent a detachment of Russian troops to Unkiar-Skelessi to stop Ibrahim Pasha, son of Mehemet Ali, who, after defeating the Turks at Nezib, was menacing Constantinople. This gift consisted of a saddlecloth, harness, pistols, holsters, and stirrups. The saddle cloth was made of dark blue cloth with a red cloth border and gold fringe. Along the border and in the corners were embroidered in thread of gold arrows, quivers, and torches intertwined with laurel leaves and decorated with large diamonds.

All the remaining pieces, except for the stirrups, were also studded with diamonds. The other set, consisting of a saddlecloth, harness, pistol holsters, and a saber, was sent to Nicholas I by Sultan Mahmud II after the conclusion of the Peace of Adrianople in 1829. The saddlecloth was made of pale lilac-colored cloth with diamonds along the border. The diamonds were placed in designs sewn with thread of gold depicting garlands of flowers and leaves tied with ribbons and bows. In the corners of the saddlecloth were military trophies also sewn with thread of gold and decorated with diamonds. The fringe on the saddlecloth was also thread of gold and decorated with brightly colored silk tassels. The saber had a Damascus steel blade 35 English inches long. The other parts of the saber and the scabbard were of gold, covered with pale lilac enamel with diamond garlands like those on the saddlecloth. The remaining pieces were made of glossy black leather and decorated with gold armatures and with many diamonds set in small panels of chased gold. The 1829 set is represented in Plate 29 of Kaemmerer, Tsarskosel'skii arsenal, the 1833 set in Plate 30. The detail given above is taken from the text in Kaemmerer, Tsarskosel'skii arsenal (facing the plates). Both sets are also described and historical detail given in the 1840 catalogue (Seyger, Katalog redkogo oruzh'ia, vol. 2, pp. 3–4) and the 1860 catalogue (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 201–202). Dr. Edward Maynard also drew these and enclosed the drawing in a letter to his wife in September 1845 (see Image 332). See also Lincoln, Nicholas I, pp. 199–207.

856. Pushkarev recorded in 1842 that the Armory had a portrait of Charles XII and plaster masks of Peter the Great (see Image 411) and Charles XII (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 74). In the 1860 catalogue, the portrait and masks are described in greater detail (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, pp. 80–81). Reference is made in the 1860 catalogue to Swedish cuirasses transferred to the Tsarskoe Selo Armory from the Narva Armory (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, p. 122), but no mention is made in these works of bejeweled swords taken from the Swedes in battles between Peter the Great and Charles XII. In response to this passage, Nils Drejholt of the Royal Armory in Stockholm pointed out that “there might be swords or sabres set with precious stones belonging to Swedish officers, but then they must have been taken as booty during the war or gifts from officer colleagues, they were never used in the field” (Nils Drejholt, Stockholm, to E. Harden, 18 January 2002). Dr. Yuri Miller said it would be rather difficult from such a description to establish which swords

- in the collection were the right ones, as the collection contains numerous swords of this type decorated with precious stones. It is possible, however, that trophies taken by Russian troops during the Northern War with Sweden did end up in the Armory at Tsarskoe Selo (Iu. Miller, St. Petersburg, to E. Harden, 19 October 2001).
857. Anna Whistler is referring to the Great Hall, or Hall of Knights, the octagonal room with a high vaulted ceiling on the second floor of the Armory (see Image 392). At the base of the vaulting, all around the hall, hung shields with the coats-of-arms of the provinces, painted by Fyodor Pavlovich Briullov (1793–1869). Here, too, were represented in natural size tableaus of a duel and a knight's initiation (Bur'ianov, Progulka s det'mi, vol. 3, p. 117; Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 75; Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, p. 131; Benois, Tsarskoe Selo, p. xxxiii; Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, p. 112).
858. The basement floor of the Armory had rooms for servants and accommodations for housekeeping; on the lower (ground) floor were a vestibule, two reception rooms, a hall, a study, a library, and a bedroom; on the upper floor were a large hall and several adjacent studies (Gille, Tsarskosel'skii muzei, p. ii). The abovementioned bedroom was also referred to as the "Empress' room" and would have been at one time the sleeping quarters of Empress Elizaveta Alekseevna (see Image 419), wife of Alexander I (see Image 418). Pushkarev pointed out in 1842 that "Her Majesty's bedroom" had in it a cross given to Nicholas I (see Images 420–423) by Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (see Image 425) on 6 December (OS) 1837 (Pushkarev, Opisanie Sanktpeterburga 1842, p. 75).
859. Plans for turning a part of the empress's study into an oratory were in process as early as 11/23 August 1844, less than a month after the death of her daughter (RGIA: Fond 487, op. 5, d. 1902. Po ustroistvu mole'noi komnaty v Novom Dvortse 11 Avgusta 1844g. – 20 Sentiabria 1848g. [Concerning the installation of the Oratory in the New Palace 11 August 1844 – 20 September 1848] [OS]). For a description of the completed oratory see the entry for August 12/24th Monday [1846], NYPL: AWPDP, Part II and accompanying Note 487 and Image 452.
860. Although the work went on for more than a year, memorial services were held in the oratory on 28 July /9 August 1845, during remodeling, to commemorate the first anniversary of Grand Duchess Aleksandra Nikolaevna's death (RGIA: Fond 516, op. 28/1618, d. 154. Zhurnal Kamer-Furierskoi dolzbnosti po polovine Gosudaria Imperatora Nikolaia Pavlovicha, 1845 [Chamberlain's Journal for the Apartments of Emperor Nikolai Pavlovich for 1845], fol. 370v).

861. “The Bible teaches plainly, that as we die, whether converted or unconverted, whether believers or unbelievers, whether godly or ungodly, so shall we rise again when the last trumpet sounds. There is no repentance in the grave: there is no conversion after the last breath is drawn. Now is the time to believe in Christ, and to lay hold on eternal life” (John Charles Ryle, Practical Religion: Being Plain Papers on the Daily Duties, Experience, Dangers, and Privileges of Professing Christians, 3rd ed. [London and Ipswich: William Hunt, 1883], p. 318).
862. Grand Duke Aleksandr Nikolaevich (see Image 425) would be returning from the maneuvers at Krasnoe Selo.
863. The problem of supplying water for the ponds of Tsarskoe Selo was solved in 1749 by bringing it from springs near the village of Bol'shoye Vittolovo, six kilometres northwest of Tsarskoe Selo. This water supply was later found to be insufficient and a new source was found, but at a greater distance. A conduit built between 1772 and 1787, in the reign of Catherine the Great (see Image 414), brought water from springs located in Taitsy, the estate of A.G. Demidov, sixteen kilometres from Tsarskoe Selo, and solved the water supply problem for the ponds and for drinking for a whole century (Vil'chkovskii, Tsarskoe Selo, p. 23; Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, pp. 14, 16).
864. There was a Chinese Village in the New (Alexander) Park, the construction of which had been undertaken in 1782 by Charles Cameron (1745–1812). It had originally been “designed by V. Neelov [1722–1782], possibly with the participation of Rinaldi” (c. 1710–1790) (Brumfield, History of Russian Architecture, p. 280). While reflecting the reality of “a renewed interest in trade and political expansion in the direction of China,” “the creation of such artificial environments also signalled an ability to transform reality, a confrontation of nature and artifice characteristic of imperial estate design since the time of Peter I” (Brumfield, p. 270).

One of several Chinese bridges, the Great Chinese Bridge (Bol'shoi Kitaiskii most) Anna Whistler mentions, located close to the New (Alexander) Palace, was a stone bridge (see Images 389–390). The railings of this wide, flat bridge consisted of tall granite amphorae connected to one another by interwoven branches of imitation coral, forged from wrought iron and painted red. The side walls of the bridge were faced with pink granite. There were four granite pedestals in the center portion of the bridge, two on each side, in a line with the amphorae and located above those points of the bridge where it rested on the edge of the grassy banks. On the pedestals at this time were four plaster Chinese figures dressed in national costumes of various colors and seated cross-legged. Each figure held a lantern on a pole in one hand. (Petrov, Pushkin: Dvortsy i parki, pp. 100–101; Lemus et al., Muzej i parki Pushkina, p. 83; S.S. Bronshtein, Arkhitektura goroda Pushkina [The Architecture of the Town of Pushkin] (Moscow: Gosudarstvennoe arkhitekturnoe izdatel'stvo Akademii arkitektury SSSR, 1940), p. 34; Pamiatniki arkitektury prigorodov Leningrada, pp. 114–115).

865. Anna Whistler and Debo went to a house in Tsarskoe Selo where the employer of the governess, Miss McLean, lived. The house of Varvara Alekseevna Olenina (see Note 867 below and Image 306) was located in the Second District of the Third Ward on the corner of Kuz'minskaia and Kolpinskaia streets, numbered 173 and 174 (RGIA: Fond 485, op. 3, ed. khr. 801 Tsarskoe Selo. 2<sup>aia</sup> chast' III Kvartal General'nye plany uchastkov N 173, 174 na uglu Kolpinski i Kuz'minskoi ulits i fasady doma na nem, prinadlezhavshikh Oleninu i Stepanovu. Arkh. Nikitin N.E. 1840s, 1870s gg. [Tsarskoe Selo, Second District, Third Ward. General Plans of plots 173 and 174 on the corner of Kolpinskaia and Kuz'minskaia streets and facades of the house on it belonging to Olenin and later to Stepanov. Architect N.E. Nikitin. 1840s and 1870s]. On a plan in this file proposing changes to the house in the 1860s, there is evidence that the widowed (in 1843) V.A. Olenina became the owner in 1845.
866. Neither Miss McLean's first name nor important dates of her life appear in any of the documents I have consulted. Some additional information about Miss McLean and her life as a governess can be inferred from material in the Olenin Archive in the Rukopisnyi otdel Rossiiskoi natsional'noi biblioteki (RNB OR) [Manuscript Division of the Russian National Library], St. Petersburg. One item is a list, dated 7 February 1842, of subjects to be studied, set by the father of Miss McLean's charge when his daughter, nicknamed Aty (or Attie), was seven. They are: religion, Russian, French, German, English, geography, history, arithmetic, penmanship, drawing, music, and dancing. This is followed by a timetable showing that she had lessons every day of the week, including Sunday, when for one hour in the morning she studied religion. The second item is a letter written by Aty to her father, when she was seven. Dated 9 June 1842 and written in good English, it mentions Miss McLean twice: “if I am good and learn well, dear Papa will you buy me a Microscope, I have been learning about Snow, and Miss McLean tells me that it is very curious to look at it through a Microscope ... Miss McLean begs to be remembered to Grand Mama and yourself.”

On a third item, which consists of verses in English, it says “Atty, aged 10 years!” In the hand of her mother, but apparently written at a much later date, it says: “To me” and “In childhood how well she wrote but later ...” The material copied here by the child is called “The Tzar and the two Shepherds.” It begins: “The Tzar has wandered from the city-gate.” The Tzar then meets two shepherds in succession. The first cannot by himself manage his “poor lean flocks,” decimated by the wolf because the shepherd’s lazy dogs sleep in the shade. The Tzar is comforted to see that there “is another sovereign, just like me.” But as he continues to wander, he meets “the loveliest flock that ever grazed” and finds their shepherd under a linden tree, playing a pipe. Though a lamb strays and the wolf appears, that shepherd’s vigilant dogs drive the wolf away. All the while, the shepherd goes on playing. The Tzar loses all patience with him and berates him for his lack of concern despite his success, but receives the answer: “Tzar! here no evil can betide my sheep / My dogs are faithful and they do not sleep.”

From these items we can infer that in August 1844 Miss McLean had been governess to Aty for at least two-and-a-half years; that somewhere in that long day of study, in addition to the subjects in the timetable set by the little girl’s father, she introduced her, and early, to the then unfeminine subject of science, and captured her interest; and that like many a British governess she attempted to give her foreign charge a political education along the way (RNB OR: Fond 542, no. 1011, Stoianovskaia (rozhd. Olenina) Al-dra Grig. Pis’ma (2) ee k ottsu, napisannye v 7-letnem vozraste, raspisanie zaniatii, i igrushechnoe izobrazhenie karety i uprazhneniia v angliiskom iazyke [Stoianovskaia (born Olenina) Al-dra Grig. Two letters to her father written at the age of seven, a timetable of lessons, a toy depiction of a carriage and exercises in the English language.]) The “toy depiction” consists of pictures of three types of carriages: one black and white, and two colored. On the back of each, it says “Made by Crichton and Feild Edinburgh,” who were “coachmakers of Leith Walk” (Jeremy Howard, William Allan: Artist Adventurer, with contributions from John Morrison, Sara Stevenson and Andrzej Szczerski [Edinburgh: City of Edinburgh Museums and Galleries, 2001], p. 43).

Miss McLean was still with the family in the early 1850s, when the widowed Varvara Alekseevna was living on her Voronezh estate as well as in the city of Voronezh, and Aty was at least sixteen (N.N. Ogloblin, “Iz zapisnoi knizhki” [“From My Notebook”], Nasha starina 5, no. 11 (1914): p. 489).

Miss McLean was the close friend of both Mrs. Eliza (Lamb) Maingay and her daughter, Eliza Ann Maingay. The Maingay family had returned to England permanently in May 1844. See Maingay in Appendix E and Images 259, 262.

867. As Anna Whistler had just made the acquaintance of Miss McLean, she may have had in mind three other governesses. It has not been possible to determine who they were, but Miss McMaster was probably one of them.
868. Varvara Alekseevna (Olenina) Olenina (3/15 February 1802 – 15/27 September 1877; see Image 306) was the elder daughter of Aleksei Nikolaevich Olenin (28 November /9 December 1763 – 17/29 April 1843; see Image 307), from 1811 until his death director of the Imperial Public Library and from 1817 until his death president of the Imperial Academy of Fine Arts. Her name was pronounced “Ahlay’nyeenuh,” which Anna Whistler heard as “O Lainy.” Olenina had a weak constitution, and both she and her daughter were so short that, as she told it, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich called them “dwarfs” (Ogloblin, “Iz zapisnoi knizhki,” p. 489). They had inherited their tiny stature from Olenina’s father, whose surname had engendered the pun “O le nain” (“Oh, the dwarf?”) (Mary Stuart, Aristocrat—Librarian in Service to the Tsar: Aleksei Nikolaevich Olenin and the Imperial Public Library, East European Monographs, no. 211 [Boulder, CO: East European Monographs; New York: Columbia University Press, 1986], p. 71).
869. The daughter was Aleksandra Grigorievna Olenina (29 August /10 September 1834 – 21 January /2 February 1899), called Aty, who at this point in August 1844 was almost ten years old. She married Nikolai Ivanovich Stoianovskii (31 December 1820 / 12 January 1821 – 20 May /1 June 1900), who became an actual privy councilor, state secretary, and member of the State Council. He also wrote a biographical essay about his wife’s grandfather, Aleksei Nikolaevich Olenin (A.A. Olenina, Dnevnik.

- Vospominaniia* [Diary, Memoirs] [St. Petersburg: Gumanitarnoe agentstvo – Akademicheskii pro"ekt, 1999], pp. 229, 240–241n25). The aforementioned memoirist was Anna Alekseevna Olenina (11/23 August 1808 – 15/27 December 1888), the sister of Varvara Alekseevna Olenina.
870. Henriette Wilhelmine (Bohlen) Halbach (15 September 1803 – 14 March 1870), and her daughter Alwine Halbach (6 March 1829 – 16 April 1890) were friends of Anna Whistler's from Philadelphia. They were related to her sister-in-law, Maria (Cammann) McNeill. See the biography of the Halbach family in Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
871. Varvara Alekseevna Olenina's parents, upon their marriage in November 1791, were given a three-story house at 125 Fontanka in the Third Ward of the Third Admiralty District, between the Semenov and Obukhov bridges. After she herself married, the house was given to her in 1824 as a dowry (L.V. Timofeev, V krugu družei i muž: Dom A.N. Olenina [In the Circle of Friends and Muses: The Home of A.N. Olenin] [Leningrad: Lenizdat, 1983], pp. 10, 260). For differing information see Olenina, Dnevnik, p. 213n248.
872. On 3/15 February 1823, Varvara Alekseevna Olenina married a distant cousin, Grigorii Nikanorovich Olenin (1797 – 25 July / 6 August 1843) (see Image 306), son of Nikanor Mikhailovich Olenin and his third wife, Ekaterina Petrovna (Savel'eva) Olenina. As of 1827, he was a retired captain of the Guards General Staff. In 1830, he entered the civil service and carried out special assignments for the Ministry of Finance; in 1832, he became a member of the State Council and in 1840 achieved the fourth-highest grade in the Table of Ranks, that of actual state councilor. His resemblance to Emperor Alexander I (see Image 418) was apparently remarkable (Olenina, Dnevnik, p. 195n152). He died three months after his father-in-law. Varvara Alekseevna Olenina was thus in mourning for both her father and her husband when Anna Whistler met her, and had herself been confined to bed for seven months due to an attack of paralysis after these two deaths (Olenina, Dnevnik, p. 39).
873. An exquisite watercolor portrait of V.A. Olenina and her husband, executed by Karl Briullov in Rome in 1827 (today in the State Tret'iakov Gallery; see Image 306), does not, in my opinion, show a beautiful woman. The resemblance of her husband to Alexander I (see Image 418) can be seen in the bust of the former by Samuil Ivanovich Gal'berg (1787–1839), also executed in

- Rome in 1827 (today in the State Russian Museum) (Olenina, Dnevnik, p. 195n152, 211n243).
874. It has not been possible to ascertain who this Russian general was.
875. Varvara Alekseevna Olenina had one brother, two of whose sons could have been Colonel Todd's guest that afternoon. The eligible sons of her older brother, retired Major General Petr Alekseevich Olenin (21 December 1794 / 1 January 1795 – 22 August / 3 September 1868), were Aleksei Petrovich (26 January / 7 February 1833 – 1910) or Sergei Petrovich (b. 11/23 January 1834). His other sons were too young, as were those of her younger brother, Aleksei Alekseevich Olenin (30 May / 10 June 1798 – 25 December 1854 / 6 January 1855) (V.V. Rummel' and V.V. Golubtsov, Rodoslovnyi sbornik russkikh dvorianskikh familii [Genealogies of Russian Noble Families] [St. Petersburg: A.S. Suvorin, 1887], vol. 2, pp. 231–233; Olenina, Dnevnik, p. 163n9, 216n261).
876. It has not been possible to ascertain who the captain of the Horse Guards was.
877. The village of Pavlovskoe was presented at the end of 1777 by Catherine the Great (see Image 414) to her son, the Heir Apparent, Grand Duke Pavel Petrovich (1754–1801; see Image 417), and his wife, Grand Duchess Maria Fyodorovna (1759–1828; see Images 415–416). Here, in the 1780s, the Scottish architect Charles Cameron (1745–1812) built for them the Great Stone Palace, a villa in the Classical style, and was entrusted as well with creating a park, which resulted in seven individual landscape parks with temples, pavilions, sculpture, ponds, bridges, pastoral buildings, a dairy, and a farm. In 1796, when Grand Duke Pavel Petrovich became Emperor Paul I, the villa, as his official residence, was remodeled and expanded and the estate called Pavlovsk (P.E. Bukharkin, ed., Os'mnadsatoe stoletie [The Eighteenth Century], vol. 1 of Tri veka Sankt-Peterburga Entsiklopediia [Three Centuries of St. Petersburg: An Encyclopedia], 3 vols. [St. Petersburg: Filologicheskii fakul'tet Sankt-Peterburgskogo gosudarstvennogo universiteta, 2006], bk. 2, pp. 74–82). At the death of the Dowager empress in 1828, the estate passed to her son, Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (see Image 439). He agreed to permit the St. Petersburg–Tsarskoe Selo Railway to be extended into the park territory of Pavlovsk with its terminus at a pleasure garden (see Image 384). At his death in 1849, the estate passed to the second son of Nicholas I, Grand Duke Konstantin Nikolaevich (see Image 436), whose property it was until 1892 (L. Koval', Pavlovsk. Dvoret. Park.

Putevoditel' [Pavlovsk: The Palace, The Park: A Guide] [St. Petersburg: Art-Palas, 1998], pp. 21–28).

Anna Whistler uses the word “Pavloski,” which is the masculine nominative adjectival form “Pavlovskii” from the name of the estate, Pavlovsk. It would be clear to Russians that the expression intended was “Pavlovskii vokzal,” or “the Pavlovsk pleasure garden.” The second “v” in “Pavlovskii” is hard to hear and sometimes not pronounced.

878. Miller was Colonel Todd’s servant. It has not been possible to ascertain the name of the chasseur who replaced La Ronne.
879. It has not been possible to ascertain who the head gardener with “the supervision of the whole town” was. I believe Anna Whistler meant that the head gardener of the Imperial part of Tsarskoe Selo also supervised the landscaping of the entire town of Tsarskoe Selo.
880. The member of the Imperial family about whom this anecdote is told was Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich (see Image 439), the owner of Pavlovsk, and the person to whom he complained was the “pensioned officer [who] has superintendence of the grounds” (Jermann, Pictures from St. Petersburg, p. 218). This officer and the head gardener are not likely to be the same person (see previous Note). Grand Duke Mikhail Pavlovich did not suffer gladly any breaches of established behavior by his officers and was frequently the butt of jokes such as this (Vilinbakhov, Faibisovich, and Letin, Khrabrye dela vashi, p. 32).
881. The idea of creating a pleasure garden at Pavlovsk (see Image 384) belonged to the builder of the Tsarskoe Selo Railway, Franz von Gerstner (1796–1840). After the Tsarskoe Selo–Pavlovsk stretch was opened on 22 May (OS) 1838, he started the first musical evenings, which began as musical entertainment “by local ensembles and military bands” during dinner, and also dancing. Actual concerts were established somewhat later. In the early years, the railway administration thought the Pavlovsk Pleasure Garden could function year round. The director of the winter concerts, whose brief term lasted for part of 1839, was the Austrian violinist, choirmaster, and well-known composer of ballroom dances, Iosif Labitskii (1802–1881) “from Karlsbad in Bohemia.” A troupe of Moscow gypsies also had a successful run during the winter months, along with Labitskii. But despite their success, in January 1840 the administration of the railway took a decision to eliminate the winter performances. Overlapping with Labitskii’s tenure and appointed as the first permanent director of summer concerts at the Pavlovsk Pleasure Garden was Jozef Hermann (see Image 201), from Vienna, who performed there for six summer seasons (1839–1844). Hermann’s successor from 1845–1848 was Johann Gungl (1828–1883). He was replaced by his uncle, Joseph Gungl (1810–1889), who gave concerts with his Berlin Symphony Orchestra in 1850–1855. From 1856 through 1865, and in 1869, the director was the famed Johann Strauss (1825–1899). While the first forty plus years were devoted to ballroom music, classical music was also performed, and a military orchestra at times vied with the concerts (N.B., “Pavlovskii vokzal” [“The Pavlovsk Pleasure Garden”], Stolitsa i usad’ba [The Capital and the Country Estate] 40–41 [September 1, 1915]; Haywood, Beginnings, pp. 127–128, 136, 138–139, 140, 141–142; Petrovskaia, Kontsertnaia zhizn’ Peterburga, pp. 118, 124, 140, 178; Rozanov, Polina Viardo-Garsia, pp. 24–62).

On 3/15 January 1844, almost all of the Pavlovsk Pleasure Garden burned down. By 13/25 May of the same year, the building was already rebuilt and reopened (Rozanov, Polina Viardo-Garsia, p. 37). Once again, Anna Whistler saw a freshly restored building.

882. For Hermann, see previous Note.
883. Anna Whistler wrote a second entry dated Wednesday [August] 28th that described the activities of that day.
- Persons mentioned in this entry who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Sarah Adams, niece of Major Whistler and his first wife (Sarah Adams); Martha (Kingsley) McNeill, Anna Whistler’s mother (Mother); Maria (Cammann) McNeill, sister-in-law, and Catherine Jane (McNeill) Palmer, sister of Anna Whistler (Sisters); William Bonamy Maingay, brother of Debo Whistler’s dear friend in England, Emma Elizabeth Maingay (William Maingay, Mr. M); and William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, his wife (the Gellibrands). It has not been possible to ascertain the name of William Maingay’s coachman. In this entry, it is established that the Gellibrands’ dacha was located on the estate next to the one on which the Whistlers were living.
884. It has not been possible to locate this letter from William Gibbs McNeill to Major Whistler.
885. These houses were the Old Corner House in Stonington, Connecticut (see Image 37), and William Gibbs McNeill’s house at 67 Irving Place in New York.

886. These were Anna Whistler's Florida relatives. Charles was her brother, Charles Johnston McNeill (6 March 1802 – 2 March 1869); Sophia was Sophia Hermes (Gibbs) Couper (7 November 1812 – 20 March 1903); and Kingsley was Kingsley Beatty Gibbs (25 July 1810 – 16 October 1859). Sophia and Kingsley were Anna Whistler's first cousins, the children of her mother's sister, Isabella (Kingsley) Gibbs (13 January 1774 – 21 January 1838) and George Gibbs. Laura was Laura (Williams) Gibbs (1820–1892), the second wife of Kingsley Beatty Gibbs (married 14 January 1841). They were all apparently visiting in New York and Connecticut (Jacqueline K. Fretwell, "Kingsley Beatty Gibbs and His Journal of 1840–1843," El Escribano: The St. Augustine Journal of History 21 (1984): pp. 53, 61, 69, 86; Margaret Gibbs Watt, The Gibbs Family of Long Ago and Near at Hand, 1337–1967 [Jacksonville, FL: Printed by the author, 1967], pp. 17, 20, 29–30, 77, 88, 100). See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.
887. Persons mentioned in the entry for Thursday [August] 29th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Catherine Julia McNeill, Deborah Whistler's first cousin (Jule); Sarah Adams, Deborah Whistler's first cousin (Sarah Adams); Emma Elizabeth Maingay, Deborah Whistler's close friend in St. Petersburg, now returned home to England (Emma); Reuben Goodale Fairbanks, an American employed in building the St. Petersburg–Moscow Railway (Mr. Fairbanks, Mr. F); Pyotr, the Whistlers' coachman (our Péotre); William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, his wife (the Gellibrands, Mr. G, Mrs. G); William Hooper Ropes, merchant (Mr. Ropes) and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes (Mrs. Ropes, his little wives) of the Gellibrand party.
888. "The English theologian and historian Thomas Fuller appears to be the first person to commit the notion that, 'the darkest hour is just before the dawn' to print. His religious travelogue A Pisgah-Sight of Palestine and the Confines Thereof, 1650, contains this view: It is always darkest just before the Day dawneth. The source of the proverb isn't known. It may be Fuller himself, or he may have been recording a piece of folk wisdom. In 1858 ... Samuel Lover attributed the notion to the Irish, in Songs and Ballads." ("The Meaning and Origin of the Expression: The Darkest Hour," The Phrase Finder website).
889. The reference is to Mary Swift (1826–1884), daughter of Captain William Henry Swift (6 November 1800 – 7 April 1879) and Mary (Stewart) Swift (c. 1804 – November 1837). Her married name was Ironside. She was Deborah Whistler's first cousin, as her father was the brother of Major Whistler's first wife. See Stoeckl, Howard, Swift, Ironside in Appendix E.

A silhouette was made by Auguste Edouart of Captain William Henry Swift at Saratoga Springs, New York, on 14 July 1842, of which it has not been possible to locate an image (Jackson, Ancestors in Silhouette, p. 225).

890. Reuben Goodale Fairbanks's wife was Lucy S. Webb (b. Windham, CT 24 November 1806). They married on 11 March 1831 in Windham, Connecticut (certified copy of the Fairbanks/Webb Marriage Record, Office of the Town Clerk for the Town of Windham, Willimantic, CT). In 1844, Reuben and Lucy Fairbanks then had four children: Mary Eleanor (b. 16 June 1837); Henry Webb (b. 9 September 1840); Sarah Lucy (b. 23 September 1841); and Annie Julia (b. 29 January 1843). Mary Eleanor was 7 years old; Henry Webb was almost 4; Sarah Lucy was almost 3; and Annie Julia was 17 months old. See Fairbanks in Appendix E.
891. Attempts to ascertain whether Mr. Fairbanks's family was in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, produced negative results. The censuses were of no help, as the time period was between the 1840 and 1850 censuses. Anna Whistler frequently made mistakes in recounting details of other people's biographies. Perhaps the family went to Litchfield, New York, while Mr. Fairbanks was away, to stay with his relatives. See Fairbanks in Appendix E.
892. Anna Whistler is referring to the recent takeover of Tahiti by the French and the exile of its queen, Pomare IV (1813–1877; see Image 293). Pomare was queen from 1827 until her death. She was deposed in November 1843 by the French, who then made Tahiti their protectorate. In March 1844, Queen Pomare was taken by the British at her own request to the island of Raiatea, where she was to live in exile for almost three years. She wrote to Queen Victoria, pleading for British protection, but received a letter from Lord Palmerston, who said only that "Her Britannic Majesty ... was 'strongly interested' in the prosperity of the islands, but 'must decline entering into any engagement of the kind suggested'" (David Howarth, Tahiti: A Paradise Lost [London: Harvill Press, 1983], p. 213; see also Edward Dodd, The Rape of Tahiti, vol. 4 of The Ring of Fire, 5 vols. [New York: Dodd, Mead, 1983], chapters 5–15).
893. "Darbys and Joans" is a reference to devoted, long-married couples, especially of advanced years. The probable source is an eighteenth-century song: “The Joys of Love Never Forgot: A Song” (Gentleman’s Magazine 5 (1735), p. 153):

Old Darby with Joan by his side,
 You’ve often regarded with wonder;
 He’s dropsical, she is fore-ey’d,
 Yet they’re ever uneasy asunder.
 Together they totter about,
 Or sit in the sun at the door;
 And at night when old Darby’s pot’s out,
 His Joan will not smook a whiff more.

894. The misses Wilks were the daughters of Grafton (bap. Leeds, Yorkshire 17 December 1779 – St. Petersburg 24 May / 5 June 1830) and Elizabeth (von Kettler) Wilks (bap. St. Petersburg 30 August (OS) 1791 – St. Petersburg 28 September /10 October 1864), who were married in St. Petersburg on 28 June /10 July 1813. The daughters were: Cornelia (bap. 20 January 1815), Mary Ann (3/15 October 1819 – 30 October 1895), and Elizabeth (b. 24 April /1 May 1824). Of the three, Cornelia was born in Leeds, Yorkshire. Mary Ann Wilks married Henry Richard Cattley (27 October 1818 – 13 December 1898) on 17/29 May 1846; Cornelia Wilks married Charles Moberley, widower, Russia Company agent in St. Petersburg, on 25 September /7 October 1846 (PREC STP, nos. 2525, 5609, and 5644).
895. “Home, Sweet Home” was written by John Howard Payne (1791–1852), American actor and playwright. Originally, the song was part of the opera Clari, the Maid of Milan (1823), music by Sir Henry Rowley Bishop (1786–1855) (Gerald Bordman and Thomas S. Hischak, Oxford Companion to American Theatre, 3rd ed. [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004], s.v. “Clari, the Maid of Milan”).
896. 1 Corinthians 1. This epistle begins with Paul’s salutation to the Corinthians and continues with his exhortation to unity.
897. Persons mentioned in the entry for Friday Sept 13th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary to the American Legation (Maxwell, Mr. Maxwell, Mr. M, his young friend, his friend, his young master, their kind friend, her countryman, our young friend); Le Ronne, Maxwell’s servant (Le Rond); Deborah Delano Whistler (Sister); William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, his wife (the Gellibrands); Martha Reed Ropes, sister of Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (Martha); and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, sister-in-law of Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand and Martha Reed Ropes (Mrs. Ropes, Mama).

898. “I reached the Imperial City on Wednesday - Sept 11th at 12 M. after an absence of precisely three months – less four days ... There was my friend the Major [see Images 7–8, 21] on the outskirts of the crowd, and several other well known faces to give me welcome” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
899. Anna Whistler says “in my heart” because she did not actually go to meet the boat, but waited in their rooms at Dom Ritter. Maxwell explains:

I thought of proceeding to the Hotel de Paris, but the Major, knowing perhaps the queer things that sometimes happened there, insisted that I should not, and prevailed upon me to go to Miss Benson’s, near at hand, upon the river, and a few doors from the house he had taken for the winter. He went with me. I knew Miss Benson, as hers was the house the American Minister had occupied last winter - I engaged rooms and this done, “Come”, said the Major “Miss Whistler is waiting to see you”. I went out with him and I soon discovered this lady upon the balcony of an adjoining house. It was the house. a part of which they had hired. I entered and of course was rejoiced to find myself in the presence of so good a friend. They had I suspect come to town to meet me, for I left them when they stepped into a carriage to return home, having promised to join them in the evening. (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43)

Maxwell may have intended to say “It was the Ritter House.” There is no blank space, but there is a carat between “the” and “house.” See Benson in Appendix E.

900. “I then paid my respects to the Consul, who is in a most miserable state of health, and learned from him that Colonel Todd, had left only three days before to attend the coronation at Stockholm” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43). Abraham P. Gibson (1791–1852; see Image 279) was from 1819 to 1850 the American consul in St. Petersburg.
901. “I ... jumped into the cold water of the Neva, dressed and rode out to Dom Drury, where I found myself as happy as if I had just

- reached home. The boys were glorious - Miss Whistler as musical and as amiable as ever, and I was introduced to Miss McNeil, a maiden Sister of Mrs Whistler, who left the Highlands to winter here. I remained one day in the country and learned all that had transpired during my absence” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
902. “As the boat came along side the pier, I discovered my old servant, standing all ready, on duty, as stiff as a poker, his moustaches curled up on both ends, and displaying in his visage no signs of joy except those that shot out of his eyes” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
903. Anna Whistler pointed out on several occasions that Aunt Alicia was an American because she had been born in North Carolina.
904. Maxwell humorously alluded to a privilege of his post: “Holding my passport open before me, and displaying before the crowd of officials the great seal of state attached thereto, I marched freely and unimpeded upon the strand and the luggage - including the despatches; that is, a hundred real Havana’s for the Major and a dozen cambric handkerchiefs for Mrs Whistler; followed after” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
905. Emily Mosley Law was born on 7/19 November 1827 (d. 2/14 February 1880), but there was another daughter, Isabella Sarah, born on 30 March /11 April 1830 (d. 1/13 February 1866). However, the name Emily is given in the diary as that of the youngest Law daughter (PREC STP for 1830, p. 142; Foster’s Peerage, p. 264). See Law in Appendix E.
906. This is a Russian command meaning “faster,” spelled “skorey” and pronounced “skahray’.” Anna Whistler adds an English suffix that gives it the meaning “urging him to go faster.” The cart is called a “lineika” (pronounced “linyey’kuh”).
907. Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes had to go to Louisa Harriet Ropes, her youngest child (b. 18 November 1843).
908. Todd had left a letter with Major Whistler for Maxwell when departing for the coronation in Stockholm: “It was his wish that I should remain for the winter in his society, that he could not give me, leave of absence, but would if I insisted receive my resignation ... Of course I must remain for two or three weeks until his return, when I shall I think make my arrangements and leave Russia” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 15, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 42; and an unnumbered letter to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, Hamburg, Aug. 31, 1844).

909. The Whistlers’ apartment was in a house “a few doors from” the misses Benson’s boarding house and was “a very fine one” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, entry of October 4 in letter of September 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43). The house was registered in the name of Mariia Ivanova Ritter, wife of a Narva merchant, Robert Vil’gel’mov Ritter. Announcement of its purchase was recorded on 24 June (OS) 1837 in a register listing city residents (Tsentral’nyi gosudarstvennyi istoricheskii arkhiv Sankt Peterburga (TsGIA SPb) [Central State Historical Archive of St. Petersburg]: Fond 781, op. 4, d. 78 Alfavit gorodskoi obyvatel’skoi knigi “R” [Alphabetical book, letter “R”, of city residents], 1820, f. fol. 34. Although dated 1820, the volume goes up to 1873. The address of the house was No.  $\frac{237}{293}$  English Embankment, First Admiralty District, First Ward. Anna Whistler clearly recorded in her first diary entry after moving in that it was called Ritter’s house and noted this fact more than once. The family lived on the third floor.

Two books by T.A. Solovieva on the history of the buildings on the English Embankment – the second (2004) a fuller version of the first (1998) – while they give much valuable information, require further research on the house in which the Whistlers lived. These books create several problems, the most important of which is the ownership of the house. Apparently, this particular building was unusual in that at times “[in] its history it was divided into two separate houses,” “then united into one again” (T.A. Solovieva, K prichalam Angliiskoi naberezhnoi. Putevoditel’ [To the Piers of the English Embankment: A Reference Guide], Po ‘glavnoi ulitse’ Sankt-Peterburga [Along “The Main Street” of St. Petersburg] [St. Petersburg: Icarus, 1998], p. 164; this is a bilingual Russian–English edition, but the translation given here is mine). The Whistlers are said to have lived in the house on the right, but the owners from whom they rented are given as the Shakhovskoi family, members of the nobility, to whom the house belonged as of 1796 (Solovieva, K prichalam, p. 153). The name of Ritter is not mentioned at all in conjunction with either the right or the left house. In a phone conversation, Solovieva, in answer to my objections, said she would research further, but I have not since heard from her; therefore, the only information about the building that can be accepted by me for the time being is the record in the “Book of City Residents” and what Anna Whistler herself writes about their home. For a discussion of house ownership in St. Petersburg, see Krasnova, Domovladieniia Sankt-Peterburga, pp. 212, 214, 215.

910. Persons mentioned in the entry for Sept 23<sup>d</sup> who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Thomas Drury Sr., the Whistlers’ dacha landlord, and his wife, Mary (Little) Drury (Mr. Drury, our good old landlord, the Drurys); William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant, and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, his wife (Mr G, the Gellibrands); Alexander Drury, son of Colonel Thomas Drury Jr. and Caroline (Bajinsky) Drury, and grandson of Thomas Drury Sr., the Whistlers’ dacha landlord (T’scharsinka); William Hooper Ropes, whose family were now the Whistlers’ neighbors across the hall in Ritter’s house (Mr Ropes); John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary of the American Legation (Mr Maxwell, this countryman of ours); Joseph Samuel Ropes, brother of William Hooper Ropes and Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand (Mr Joseph Ropes); George Henry Prince, first cousin to Joseph Samuel Ropes, Mary Tyler (Ropes) Gellibrand, and William Hooper Ropes (Mr Geo Prince). The dacha neighbors were Thomas Drury Sr. on one side and William and Elizabeth (I’Anson) Drury, his son and daughter-in-law, on the other side.
911. On Tuesday, 17 September 1844, the Whistlers returned to St. Petersburg.
912. Mary T. Gellibrand to Wm. Ladd Ropes, Peterhoff road, Sept. 7/19 [1844], MHS: Ropes Papers. William Ladd Ropes was her first cousin.
913. On Tuesday, 24 September 1844, Major Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) left on another inspection trip with Count P.A. Kleinmikhel’ (see Image 243).
914. On Friday, 20 September 1844, the family wrote letters to be sent with the diplomatic courier.
915. Anna Whistler called her brother, William Gibbs McNeill “Mac” (see Image 31).
916. George Henry Prince noted the evening of Saturday, 21 September 1844 in his journal:

Sept. 11/23, 1844. On Saturday I dined at the house of Major Whistler, or “The Major” as we call him here among ourselves. Had a good dinner and enjoyed myself much after dinner ... Mis[s] Whistler (the graceful “Debo” - Deborah) sang and played on both piano and harp. The Major gave us some Irish songs and the little boys made sports for us. Mrs. W. seemed pleased to have her countrymen as guests and spared no trouble to have all first rate. There were three of us - M. Maxwell, Joseph (Ropes) and your humble servant. (Raymond and Prince, “Whistler,” p. 13)

917. Mr. Hedenschoug is intended, but Anna Whistler wrote only half of his initial. What looks here like an uppercase F in her cursive writing is the first half of an uppercase H.
918. Persons mentioned in the entry for Thursday [Sept.] 26th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Charles Donald Whistler, who had died a year earlier on the John Bull en route to St. Petersburg (Charlie, little one); George William Whistler, the eldest Whistler child (gentle George); Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler’s half-sister (“Aunt Alicia”); Joseph Swift Whistler, who died at the age of fifteen on 1 January 1840 (Joe); Henry Cammann McNeill, who died at the age of ten on 7 August 1840 (Henry); Count Pyotr Andreevich Kleinmikhel’, head of the Department of Transport and Public Buildings (Count Kleinmikhel’); Aleksandr, the Whistlers’ servant (Alexander); Fyodor, the Whistlers’ dvornik (Fedor); William Hooper Ropes, whose family lived across the hall from the Whistlers (Mr. R., Mr. Rs); George Henry Prince, Mr. Ropes’s first cousin (Geo Prince); John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary of the American Legation (Mr. Maxwell, Mr M); Hugh Maxwell, father of John Stevenson Maxwell (his fathers farm); William Clarke Gellibrand, English merchant (Mr. Gellibrand); Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes, wife of William Hooper Ropes (Mrs. Ropes); Ellen Gellibrand Ropes, Mary Emily Ropes, and Lousa Harriet Ropes, daughters of Willam Hooper Ropes and Ellen Harriet (Hall) Ropes (children); Mary McNeill, daughter of William Gibbs McNeill and niece of Anna Whistler (Mary McNeill).
919. On Sunday, 22 September 1844, Anna Whistler did not go to church, because she was overcome by memories of Charles Donald’s death on the Alexandra a year before on 24 September.
920. “Aaglitzkie Tscierkoff” means “English Church.” The adjectival form given here was used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries and appeared in the literary works of Nikolai Leskov in the nineteenth century. Anna Whistler would have learned it from her English friends, who were making an “in joke.” For a linguistic explanation, see Maks Fasmer, Ètimologicheskii slovar’ russkogo iazyka [Etymological Dictionary of the Russian Language], ed. B.A. Larin, trans. and with additions by O.N. Trubachev, 2nd ed., 4 vols. (Moscow: Progress, 1986), vol. 1, pp. 60– 61. In regular Russian parlance at this time, “English Church” would have been “Angliiskaia tserkov’.”

921. 1 Thessalonians 4:13: “But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope.”
922. The message of 1 Corinthians 15 is the resurrection of the dead, with Christ’s resurrection as the pledge of our own.
923. See John 11: 1–44, also on the resurrection of the dead.
924. See Notes 139 and 140 above. On 4 November 1844, Major Whistler received his first letter from George, dated 26 April 1844, Honolulu, Oahu, Sandwich Islands. George had been in Honolulu three days when he learned of a vessel sailing for Kamchatka and took the opportunity to write and bring his family up to date on his life from the time he had left Anna Whistler at Travemünde. The Lausanne, in which he had sailed to the Sandwich Islands, was not going to the mouth of the Columbia River, as originally scheduled, but returning immediately to the United States. As George did not wish to arrive in the United States in winter, he planned to leave the Lausanne and visit the various islands, returning home on another ship the next summer (1845). He was in good spirits. His health had improved constantly from the time of his departure from New York, so much so that he considered himself quite well. He had had some hard times, however: they had “lost all their fresh provisions and vegetables soon after sailing and lived upon nothing but salt pork and beef and rice for 140 days” (Major G.W. Whistler to General Joseph Gardner Swift, St. Petersburg, entry of November 5 in letter of October 28, 1844, NYPL: Swift Papers). It has not been possible to locate the letter of young George Whistler, the contents of which Major Whistler imparts to Gen. J.G. Swift (see Image 11).
925. 1 Thessalonians 4:15–18: “<sup>15</sup> For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep.

<sup>16</sup> For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: <sup>17</sup> Then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. <sup>18</sup> Wherefore comfort one another with these words.”

It has not been possible to identify the friend who sent Anna Whistler this volume concerning resurrection.

926. Sweet Louly is Louisa McNeill, daughter of William Gibbs McNeill (see Image 31) and Maria (Cammann) McNeill, who died on Ash Wednesday 1840 at the age of eight (Anna Whistler to James Whistler [no place given] Monday morning Oct 30th [1853], GUL: Whistler Collection, W439). This letter was written in 1853: i.e., in the same year as the death of William Wyatt McNeill, which occurred on 4 June 1853 and is mentioned in this letter.
927. Major Whistler (see Images 7–8, 21) and Count P.A. Kleinmikhel’ (see Image 243) had left for an inspection trip on Tuesday, 24 September 1844.
928. William Ropes and Company’s counting house had moved to its new location in the Ropeses’ apartment during the summer of 1844 (Raymond and Prince, “Whistler,” p. 11, entry of July 5/17, 1844).
929. Communicants of the Russian Orthodox Church were required to take a weekly bath.
930. The autumnal equinox occurs on 22 or 23 September. The sun crosses the equator and makes day and night of equal length everywhere on earth. “Equinox” also refers to gale-force storms that occur in this period (Oxford English Dictionary, s.v. “equinox”).
931. Anna Whistler is referring to Wednesday, 25 September 1844.
932. The boxes would go to Cronstadt on Friday, 27 September, and the ship would sail for New York on 28 September. The ship was the Elsinore, Captain Julius, who “has now on board his ship the greater part of my effects and some presents for you” (John S. Maxwell to Mrs. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Sept. 30, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 43).
933. Mary T. Gellibrand to Wm. Ladd Ropes [her first cousin], Peterhoff road, Sept. 7/19 [1844], MHS: Ropes Papers.
934. Persons mentioned in the entry for Friday [Sept.] 27th who have appeared earlier in the diaries are: Martha (Kingsley) McNeill, Anna Whistler's mother (dear Mother); Alicia Margaret Caroline McNeill, Anna Whistler's half-sister (Sister Alice); Eliza Isabella (McNeill) (Wellwood) Winstanley, Anna Whistler's half-sister (my Twin Sister Eliza); and John Stevenson Maxwell, secretary of the American Legation (Mr. Maxwell).

935. "Moscow silk," was not, strictly speaking, silk. A factory named "Moscow Silk" was opened in 1820 on the bank of the Moscow River in the former Savvinskaia patriarchal district by the Moscow merchant, Rodion Dmitrievich Vostriakov, who owned it for 35 years. It came to occupy a prominent position among textile and trimmings factories in Moscow. The Moscow Silk Factory produced calico, which is a printed cotton fabric ("Moscow silk," Wikipedia, accessed 16 January 2021, https://ru.wikipedia.org/w/index.php?title=Moscow\_silk&oldid=111765176). Anna Whistler was therefore buying high-quality, fast-printed calico cloth to send to her family in Stonington and New York.
936. "Kazan shoes" are boots of soft leather without demarcation of a sole and heel (see Image 365).
937. In explaining to his father (see Image 55) about the six packages he was sending home and hoped would "reach New York before Christmas," Maxwell pointed out that one box contained presents "from M<sup>r</sup> Ropes for M<sup>r</sup> [George] Newbold [(1780–1858)] the President of the Bank [of America]," while the "box sealed with purple ribbon [was] from M<sup>rs</sup> Whistler" and was to be sent "to M<sup>r</sup> Cammann's office [Cammann and Whitehouse] in Wall Street with word to send it to Stonington." In the event that his father should balk at suffering "any inconvenience in this matter," Maxwell urged him to do it anyway, and reminded him: "I have, in illness and in health, found friends and companions in the families of Mess<sup>rs</sup> Ropes and Whistler and for the latter I hold an affection both true and steadfast. There is nothing under heaven that is fair that Major Whistler would not do for me, and I assure you, there is nothing honourable I would not do for him" (John S. Maxwell to Mr. Hugh Maxwell, St. Petersburg, Oct. 5, 1844, N-YHS: Maxwell Papers, no. 44). See also Emma W. Palmer to E.R. Pennell with copy of a note from James Whistler to his cousin, Amos Palmer, Letters Relating to Whistler, LC: P-W, box 296.

Amos Palmer (1827–1861) was the son of Anna Whistler's brother-in-law, Dr. George Edwin Palmer (1803–1868; see Image 36), and his first wife, Emma Ann (Woodbridge) Palmer (1802– 1839), and brother to Emma Woodbridge Palmer. See Whistler ... Fairfax in Appendix E.

THE ST. PETERSBURG DIARIES OF ANNA MCNEILL WHISTLER

PART II: 1845–1848

St Petersburg. March 1845 Ash Wednesday – Old Style – <sup>1</sup>

Something occasionally has whispered me since hearing of the comfort my dear Mother takes in reading my last years journal that I ought for her sake to note down whatever interests me during my absence, to transmit to her, & altho my life yeilds little variety & therefore self & my own thoughts must oftenest be the theme I shall not fear her criticism will be harsh or that one so indulgent, will turn away from my egotism. Perhaps I may revert to a few striking events during the past Winter on another page, but today shall begin my remarking upon the delightful length of day light, which induces me to rise early & to leave my room in good time to see that my darling boys are at their scripture lessons & hymns, to attend somewhat to the preparations for breakfast, to order up the “Sumavaa”<sup>2</sup> & to ring the prayer bell for my family devotions before eight oclock when we seat ourselves at table, after the blessing Jemie gives us a verse from the psalms, Willie another & I who wish to encourage them in the practise am ready with my response, thanks to our dear friends the Nichols<sup>3</sup> for the sweet example! One to look out upon the bright sun shine these days & very clear sky might be tempted to hope a balmy spring temparature, but Winter still has his severe grasp firm as it has been these three months, the Thermometer still testifies to 22 deg Ro-<sup>4</sup> & really returning from Church this noon as we met the sharp wind I feared little Willies cheeks would be frost bitten. We find our rooms fronting the Neva penetrated by it thro the double sashes & I am at this moment wrapped in my grey Duffle Cloak<sup>5</sup> with feet upon a heated stool, with the desk dear Mr Winstanley presented me drawn to the warmest corner of my room- close by the Peach, which communicates heat to the drawing room. I try to think more of my comforts than of the extreme cold, but Oh how thankful I shall be when the weather moderates so that Jemmies long imprisonment may end & Willie can have double enjoyment in having this dear brother with him on the skating ground, or at the ice hills. Whistler would go to Alexandrofsky after our two o'clock dinner, tho it is so terrible to meet the icy breeze, wrapped in a Shube with a seal skin cap & fur boots he looks defiance, & business admits of no holidays to him but the blessed Sabbath, when he shuts his Chancelery to all & we feel more than ever did before that it is our Heavenly Fathers next best provision to us poor mortals to the Bible. Last week was the beginning of festivities in the Square called Marcelaneetza, or butter week —<sup>6</sup> it is a sort of reconciliation to the severe fast upon which the poor Russians have entered this, now of course all trace of amusement has disappeared until Easter, the food of the poorer classes will now be brown bread & oil or salt for six weeks, ah how lamentable that those who ought to be their spiritual guides should not understand our Saviours words “not to appear unto men to fast.”<sup>7</sup> This morning we read the [58th] Chap of Isaiah<sup>8</sup> instead of continuing our course of the Acts of the Apostles<sup>9</sup> & afterwards as I listened to the gospel appointed for Ash Wednesday,<sup>10</sup> it struck me how exactly they accorded, in the first we are told to deal out bread to the hungry, & in the other not to lay up treasures upon earth, evidently shewing that self denial & a readiness to contribute of our abundance is the acceptable fast in the sight of Him who knows our besetting sin to be selfishness. Yet far be it from me to condemn restraint upon personal indulgence of our appetites at this especial season which the fathers of our church have recommended by their example, but individual conviction must make it beneficial, & it should be improved for self examination & the study of Gods word to advance us in our course heavenward, where the worst of us hope to arrive after the trials of this life are over, therefore I would that all who belonged to me would make this distinction between Lent & other seasons, that they would withdraw more from the world, to prevent any dissipation of thought or time, which properly observed year by year would be a source of thankfulness throughout all Eternity. These anniversaries always carry my reflections to the rest prepared for the people of God. My little darling niece Looly<sup>11</sup> has been much in my thoughts today, if memory serves me right it is five years today since her Saviour took her back to

His own bosom, & propably now her dear mothers thoughts mingle with mine – How consoling that hearts can sympathise tho Russia & America are in opposite hemispheres! Last week how favored I was by letters from Maria & Kate, but above all my own gentle Mothers was full of love, I considered these as New Years presents from home, the most acceptable I could have received! What a contrast their open winter is to ours here, Kate gathered violets in her parterre on the 1st of Jan! she gratifies me by remarking that her little fair haired Georgy<sup>12</sup> reminds every body continually of my heaven born baby Charlie! ah how thankful I am when any of those who loved that gentle one, write me of him, for he is not dead to me! he is always upon his bereaved mothers pillow & his fond tones mingled with Kirxies & all “who have gone before” sound in memory when all other voices are hushed in sleep. – But here comes my good boy Jemmie with his history in hand to read to me as he does every afternoon= previous to coursing his German with Mademoiselle<sup>13</sup> before tea= we were fearful the boys should lose their own language, in other tongues, & thus I gain a half hours enjoyment from hearing each of them read daily. May God answer my prayers for their happiness

Tuesday March 25th <sup>14</sup> Every week I feel how swiftly time flies yet can scarcely realize that it will be a fortnight tomorrow since I began what was intended as a journal But there is so little variety in my domestic life that nothing has offered worthy of record. I sent off letters to my dear mother & Kate by the last Courier, & began to write M<sup>rs</sup> Lee<sup>15</sup> of Springfield in anticipation of the next opp for Liverpool. On Wednesday Whistler left us early in the morning & took a charming sledge ride to Cronstadt with M<sup>r</sup> Ropes a distance of 29 versts on the Neva, they described it as something like old times in America, with their bells & wishing we had been with them, the road was so smooth & the weather so bright, with no wind they were sure we should have enjoyed it, but as they had gone purposely to dine with Capt Kruger<sup>16</sup> of course we had not thought of it, he is an uncommonly interesting sailor to me, for his manners are softened by his deep religious feelings, & Whistler as much as myself is glad to welcome this Englishman to our parlor circle when he can spend an evening in town. he treated them to “Sea pie” an excellent dish, from their description must be like a hodge podge from its variety of meat, vegetables & pasty stewed in a pot. Debo to beguile the tedium of her fathers absence had invited the Misses Wilkes<sup>17</sup> to tea, & Mrs Ropes being deserted came in to join our ladies party, but it damped all our spirits that Aunt Alicia was taken ill & obliged to keep her bed, she suffered several days from a cold she had taken, I was not aware how unwell she felt when I went the same day with our dear boys in Col Todds chariot & four to the ice hills, they have been thronged lately as it not probable the season can last cold enough for them much longer. The Rizzleys<sup>18</sup> were there, as it was my first rencontre I was rather astonished at M<sup>r</sup> R seizing me by the hand as an old friend, but probably he was thus eager to meet me only as a countrywoman, his little boys of five & seven years old were steering themselves alone as if accustomed to the steep hills all their days. of course my James felt impatient to try his skill, but as there was a shower of snow while we remained I feared their taking additional colds, & they always find gentlemen glad to afford them protection & a kneeling place behind their sledges. I was very much mortified at witnessing the capsize of our Ambassador while he condescended to go down hill with one of the young Englishmen, it is an amusement only suited to Col Todds grand children! but he is not easily discouraged by failures in foreign languages or customs & since then has had several tumbles, for the ice hills are the rage & he has his own little sledge there & is learning to pilot himself. Last thursday evening instead of Debo going to the German Singing Society<sup>19</sup> she was taken ill as my sister had been, with chill, fever & nausea, an epidemic it seems, I dont think she has suffered as much in many years, she is not yet able to leave her room, tho this afternoon she is enjoying M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes cheerful chat. what a dear kind neighbour this little lady is to us, when she came in with her work just now I thought "she finds time for every thing" for tho kept awake last night three hours by her Loulou<sup>20</sup> who is teething, I found her gay as a lark & busy as a bee when I went to enquire after baby this morning, then she went to drive all the way to M<sup>rs</sup> Woods<sup>21</sup> thro sleet & wind (for that friend is ill) after which I heard her practising singing (my room is between her drawing room & ours & I can hear all her high notes her voice is so powerful) soon her good little husband will be returning from Change & then she will go in to cheer him at dinner & devote her evening to him, for when not engaged in his Counting house they are inseparable, she really is a pattern of a Christian, wife & young mother & I have never known her fine temper ruffled. Last Sunday according to a previous notice D<sup>r</sup> Law preached a most admirable charity sermon for the poor funds of the British Factory, bringing before us our debt to them individually, that thro their supporting the Chapel we were all enjoying the blessed privilege of hearing the word of God in our native tongue in a strange land, & proving to us how many were the demands upon the munificence from British emigrants & poor,<sup>22</sup> my good husband said if his purse had been full he should have willingly emptied it in so right a cause. little Willie tho not at all well had gone to church purposely to give his mite, one of the large vases at the door was opened for the offerings of the congregation & as the attendance was very general I hope a handsome sum was collected. But my wish is soon to take to M<sup>rs</sup> Law a contribution for the private charities of herself & our pastor, the world knows not how many apply to them of the humblest, poorest class of British poor, they have lately taken rooms over on Vasili Ostrow to give an Asylum to some houseless, aged wanderers<sup>23</sup> & the Sacrament offerings aid in supporting them, but of course it is not sufficient. M<sup>rs</sup> Law made great efforts to establish a Hospital to which was to have been attached a poors school, she held a Bazaar at the Parsonage in the Christmas holidays for it, but the factory opposed it<sup>24</sup> & as they called D<sup>r</sup> Law twenty four years ago, he is still their servant. but he prays that God in his own good time will enlarge their views, that he may be allowed to do more for the cause of Christ in this land. Whistler described to me what a pretty neat Chapel & parsonage is the English one at Cronstadt,<sup>25</sup> (M<sup>r</sup> Williams is still preaching there)<sup>26</sup> ah how much I wish I could worship once in that sanctuary where the body of my baby Charlie was placed until it was sent to its narrow bed across the Atlantic! But now I must summon my James to read, it is nearly six oclock & I would not in sad sweet reveries of the dead, neglect my duty as a mother to the dear boys God still spares to us. As we were walking from Church on Sunday, our Ambassador overtook Whistler & I, he seemed very eager to report to us what had occupied him all the day previous, three hours he had been among the Diplomatic Corps at the Kazan Church attending the funeral of the Countess Straughanoff,<sup>27</sup> the patroness of every benevolent & charitable institution she had been & she was universally beloved, as her death is now lamented. Then the Col told us of the English Club<sup>28</sup> dinner he had attended where he made a speech in Russ. comparing queen Victoria to the Queen of Sheba, but reversing the rule, by alluding to the Emperor Nicholas' visit (as king Solomon) to her court.<sup>29</sup> the col was quite satisfied as his fancies amused the Russians as much as English present.

Tuesday. April 1st <sup>30</sup> Having just despatched my letters by the English Courier for the Boston Steamer (to Mother Maria & M<sup>rs</sup> Lee I will record the delight I experienced last evening when my young countryman George Prince came in with his hands full of American letters<sup>31</sup> for us. We had expected them all last week, but as they were directed via Hamburg they were so delayed, that harbour being closed by ice. Whistler had stepped out I sent the Dvanic to Col Todds<sup>32</sup> but he was not there. so I could wait no longer & had read our dear Georges letter to him, & was reading Marias ere my husband came to enjoy the same glad surprise. George wrote us from Brooklyn ere we supposed he had embarked from China! & reported himself in perfect health & now our hopes are excited that he will make a Summer voyage to see us.<sup>33</sup> But how seldom in this world of trial can joy be unalloyed – if we feel for others woes as our blessed Saviours example should teach us to do – the second page of Marias letter was filled with the sad particulars of the sudden death of Debos school mate Charlotte Canda.<sup>34</sup> what a warning to us all but to the young especially! that “in the midst of life we are in death”<sup>35</sup> Whistler wept as he listened to the mournful but too true statement, for he remembered her as a child of most bright promise & knew she was the idol as the only child of her Parents. She had attained her 17th birth day on the 3rd of last Feb & having been invited to celebrate it at a friends house her father attended her thither to pass the evening taking a friend of hers in the Cab with them, at about eleven clock they bade adieu, after having probably had the usual resources of music & dancing for Charlotte was a fine performer, the driver was ordered to stop at the door of Miss L. B.....<sup>36</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Canda handed her up the steps, which while he was doing a gentleman in another carriage called out in joke “you had better mind your own fair daughter, she is worth all others put together” then drove on- When poor M<sup>r</sup> C flew back to his charge the Cab was no where to be seen, he thought as the night was so cold they had driven home, thither he ran, but no tidings from his servant at his own door of his daughters return, drove him half distracted to the stable calling aloud her name as he went- there he found the Cab empty! by the time he had regained his house again he met a summons to proceed with his distracted wife to a hotel where he understood Charlotte was ill! in truth she had been thrown out of the Cab by the horses taking fright while the driver had left his box to endeavour to warm his hands & had been picked up by two gentlemen, her skull fractured by striking against the stone pavement, they carried the senseless sufferer into the hotel where she was recognized & her parents sent for only in time to hear her last sigh! thus in a short half hour from her fathers leaving her, (- that brief moment -) he found only the senseless body of his Charlotte, who had been the delight of his eyes, the pride of his heart. It will be long ere that bereaved mothers shriek of anguish will be forgotten by those who heard it as she exclaimed "Wherein have I failed in my duty as a mother that God has taken my child from me?" Ah it is a fearful thing to idolize what death must touch! to appropriate (what is only lent us to train for Heaven) to our own purposes. God had endowed this only daughter with much that might win hearts, & if her Parents led her affections to her Saviour we must trust He has taken her to lead theirs to Himself. God does not willingly afflict, we poor blind mortals cannot see His purposes of Mercy thro the clouds & darkness which surround His throne,<sup>37</sup> but if we kiss the rod He will give us also the staff to support us. However sure seem earthly promises to us, they are deceitful, this world is not our home & we must enter Heaven thro much tribulation! God called that beautiful young flower (we trust to bloom in Paradise) early because He knew it best. Her parents position among the rich in a gay city, had placed her in the unsafe path leading to Fashion & Folly and severe as they feel the wrench to them, she was taken from temptations & trials which might have entailed everlasting woe. Debo remarks what a dutiful, affectionate daughter Charlotte was! her parents had toiled in their school, to make her rich & accomplished - all their plans for this life were for Charlottes elevation. Where is she now? Oh may all parents profit by the lesson! Debo has lost in these two past winters two intimate associates younger than herself Fanny Peabody<sup>38</sup> & now C. C. Oh may the still small voice continually remind her of the frail tenure of all earthly friendship, that she may strive to make Jesus the bond of union between herself & all she loves, may she exert her influence with her companions & with her brothers to lead them to Jesus. Many warnings have been sent us all within this last twelve month, those in the most elevated rank have not been exempt. Where are the two young brides of the Imperial family who previous to the Last Lent caused such festivities in St Petersburg<sup>239</sup> the fair forms of each mouldering in the dust. And it was at the funeral of the G<sup>t</sup> Admiral Gregg<sup>40</sup> the tidings of the death of the Grand Duke Michels daughter overtook him,<sup>41</sup> that very day was the anniversary of the Grand Duchess Helens<sup>42</sup> masquerade in honor of her nuptials! the news came that the young Duchess of Nassau had died on the anniversary of marriage, she had only been a few days ill. The Imperial family have appeared sincere mourners for the Emperors youngest daughter the favorite Alexandrine, until last evening I have not heard of their having been at any place of amusement, then as the annual charity concert was given for the sufferers in the Russian Army<sup>43</sup> it was indispensable. Debo wished much to attend it, but not a ticket was to be obtained. No doubt all her delight would have been changed into sorrow - if she had listened to the hundreds of instrumental & vocal performers - the tidings of Charlottes death must long ring a knell thro all our memories. And our sympathies were also asked for Mary Bedford upon the death of her fond mother.<sup>44</sup> how Mary clung to her! & now she is an orphan at 18 years of age! but we hear she is resigned to the will of God, she sorrows not as those without hope. This evening I have promised to go to the German Academy<sup>45</sup> for sacred music with Whistler & our Debo, she being one of the class, it is time for me to hear Willie & James read now, dear little fellows how glad them seem at the prospect of their brother George coming to Russia!

Thursday 10th April.<sup>46</sup> The weather has continued very wintry the past week, snow almost every 24 hours & 15 deg of cold except where the suns power was felt. Whistler & Debo went to Alexandrofski Sunday p-m<sup>47</sup> to their little congregation of Americans & heard an excellent sermon from M<sup>r</sup> Ellerby, but they had a snow storm to drive thro returning. And since then Debo & I have wished in vain favorable weather for making calls - until yesterday when her Russian master<sup>48</sup> came & prevented her - I then took Jemmie to Dr Thompsons<sup>49</sup> to have two teeth filled it was not a very tedious operation & now I am thankful my dear boys mouth is in good condition. I found Mrs Harrison with my Sister on regaining our own home, the sun had not dissappeared when tea was ordered, we had quite a long table full, besides having to send it in the Chancelery to Whistler & some officers, scarcely had I finished, when our footman summoned me to the drawing room to receive Mrs De Glinkey,<sup>50</sup> she had brought her little girl according to her promise to come some day sociably, & I did not order a repetition of our repast immediately as the twilight was so pleasant for the childrens pastime & I knew she must have lately left the dining table. I am always delighted to have a chat with this lady who is so fond of my own dear native land - and she is so domestic in her feelings & so devoted to her children, it greived me to hear that her eldest boy had been ill & therefore she had not brought him - as her husband is a Russian of course, her children must belong to the Greek Church, & the unwholesome fast of Lent had quite disordered him, no milk, eggs, butter, or meat allowed, no wonder the mixture of oil in porridge, or the pickled fish had proved unsuitable for a hearty boy of five years old!<sup>51</sup> & then the fatigue of two hours standing thro prayers not intelligible at church (for seats are not admitted into the Greek church where all who do not kneel, stand. Mrs D. G herself a Lutheran dissapproves of ceremonies which cannot be explained to children & yet is obliged to submit hers to this severe regimen. she told us of her little girl - not quite as old as my Willie - taking the Sacrament of the Lord supper! When tea was handed the little creature asked so conscienciously if there was butter in the cake which we offered her! fortunately there was dried rusk<sup>52</sup> without, I involuntarily expressed to the mother my opinion of the error of these seasons of public fasting, & she was even plainer in her judgement against them, we agreed that excesses were never becoming the followers of the self denying Saviour, but that the system practised here, of abstaining for a certain time & then rushing into the extreme of indulgence was not upheld in the bible. when I alluded to the acceptable fast spoken of in the 58 chap of Isaiah,<sup>53</sup> she eagerly asked to see it, that she might enforce it in her mother=~~in~~=laws<sup>54</sup> family. Far be it from me to argue against fasting, where a feeling of humiliation in the sight of God prompts the self convicted sinner to afflict his soul so that the indulgence of the animal part of his nature becomes (as in the afflictions wherewith we are visited for our correction by the will of our heavenly father) distasteful to him. Our blessed Saviour tells us not to exhibit our fasting, we are not to appear to men to fast, but in secret let it be to Him who reads the heart & tests its sincerity. I think Lent is wisely set apart by our church as a season for self denial in resisting the demands of the world upon our precious time & thus giving us leisure in retirement for contemplating the wonderful love of our blessed Saviour, who as at this time spent whole nights in prayer for those “who know not what they do”<sup>55</sup> & who suffered for the sins of the whole world, if we are willing to prepare for the commemoration of Earthly conquests, surely we should not excuse ourselves from yearly devoting this season peculiarly to contemplating all that He has done to conquer death for us, whom He has purchased with His own blood, & for whose immortal souls He still intercedes. He waits to be gracious to us! Good Lord make us willing, as Tho art able & draw us by the influences of the Holy Spirit! for we are our own enemies & cannot approach Thee as we ought! Oh that all who are bound to me as a family on earth could feel that they are but travellers bound for the heavenly Jerusalem, where some of our loved ones have been early taken to await our arrival! then the service of Christ would be chosen in preference to the vanities of the world. We delight to speak of that which engages our hearts, how strange then that the Saviour & His interests are so seldom subjects of conversation! We are glad to serve those we love! And there is much that we might do if we really had that supreme love for Christ which we all flatter ourselves we shall not be found deficient in, when called to testify by our works what place we shall occupy thro Eternity. We are not to bury our Talents<sup>56</sup> in the Earth. How little the young think of their accountability when all that they seek to accomplish is to charm away the present hour! & they persuade themselves that their suavity of manner is proof sufficient of inward joy from secret communings with God. & that it is enough to praise Him with the heart without the lips joining in it. But Oh is it thus in our home in Heaven? Angels & glorified spirits continually sing Glory to Him who has redeemed mankind, & as this world is only a school for that is it not rational to argue we should practise here what we hope to be perfected in here after. I delight in sacred music which lifts the heart to mingle in heavenly choirs. Ah if I were Empress of these vast dominions of Russia I should cultivate a taste for sacred music in the circles of fashion by prohibiting any other during the Lent Concerts at least, then Composers would turn their gifts into this channel & the excuse would not be made, that no peices were to be found worthy the exalted subject As I am denied this enjoyment, I try to wait patiently till the holy spirit tunes the heart, when the harp will accord - knowing I deserve nothing - & finding refreshment in reading those works which lead my mind to heavenly joys. M<sup>rs</sup> Wilsons<sup>57</sup> letters in her memoirs awaken such feelings as I suppose fine musical compositions do to those who make music the feast of their fancy. When I examine myself after every day & grieve over the many evidences I have shown of a worldly strife. Oh what doubts attend me of my love to the Saviour, who sought not His own, but others good. Oh that the Holy Spirit would endow me with long suffering & great kindness! And when I contrast my idleness in the vineyard of Christ, to the labours of M<sup>rs</sup> Wilson in India I fear that the light that is in me is darkness in the sight of Him, for whom I yearn to devote my all. I feel as she does with relation to children that “they are precious gifts from the inexhaustible fountain of our Heavenly Fathers love & kindness to us” and that “we can only use the gift aright when we present it a willing sacrifice on His altar” her only prayer for her little ones was that they might be inspired with zeal & love to become missionaries to the heathen! as she was herself – for herself with regard to them- she prayed always that she might realize her responsibility in having a little immortal to train for heaven! Few as are my proofs of love to my Saviour I trust I do not deceive myself in sincerely desiring only spiritual gifts for my dear children, I commit their prosperity while on Earth to His providence, knowing that if they serve Him, they shall want for nothing. I am too eager now to see fruits of that love, Oh God give me faith to cast all my care upon Thee! my besetting sin is impatience Oh make me perfect thro suffering! & answer my poor prayers in thine own good time that all mine may be thine! By thy power I have been enabled to rejoice that Thou has early taken some of my little ones from me to dwell with Thee forever! Yet Thou knowest my heart does not separate them from those still left to cheer me, upon my pillow they are all embraced & tho busy memory will sometimes harrow my tenderest sympathies with vivid views of past bodily sufferings, my tears are not bitter while I again fancy I hear Kirkie say "how sick I am," or my babys gentle voice as in the last hour he spoke to his fond Mother, "Charlie's most done," no more medi - sank you dear Mama" for all that is passed I am assured was in mercy. They are not lost to me! & Oh better still they are secured from suffering, their redeemed souls are where I prayed they might be: And in feeling thus & thinking of the many awaiting us at home, can it be wondered that I should yearn to see those still exposed to temptations in this world, cultivate tastes for higher enjoyments than charm the thoughtless votaries of a false system of recreations! This morning I have not walked as lately with my dear kind husband because he was too hurried with writing to go with me directly after breakfast & hence after my bible reading I feel into a train of reflection & have penned some of my thoughts which only my children can ever appreciate. A week has passed exactly since the last date on the other page for this [is] Thursday 5th/17th <sup>58</sup> of April, nothing remarkable has occurred, except the thaw accompanied by delightful bright weather. Our children have left the breakfast parlor before eight oclock lately each morning to trundle their new hoops on the Quai with their Sister & Governess,<sup>59</sup> & have brought home bright red cheeks & buoyant spirits to enter the school room with & to gladden my eyes. Jemmie began his course of drawing lessons at the Academy of fine Arts<sup>60</sup>= just on the opposite side of the Neva - the building exactly fronts my bedroom window= last monday, he is entered at the 2nd room<sup>61</sup> there are two higher & he fears he shall not reach them, because the Officer<sup>62</sup> who still is to continue his private lesson at our house every Saturday is a pupil himself in the highest & Jemmie looks up to him with all the reverence an Artist merits & his master besides! he seems greatly to enjoy going to a class & stands next a youth of 16 (Caslett)<sup>63</sup> who being English notices my boy kindly. I congratulate myself for his sake that amusement & health are thus united with improvement in his leisure hours. he could not cross upon the ice on the Neva yesterday, as the barricade has already been placed to prevent sledges<sup>64</sup> so he had a longer drive by the bridge, & felt very important when he told me he had to give the Ishvostic 15 copecks silver<sup>65</sup> instead of ten! As he conns his tasks now directly after dinner (for the mornings recitations) he was ready to pursue a beautiful tale he has lately been reading to me until tea time, but he would have put "Ewen Malcolm"<sup>66</sup> out of sight when Capt Kruger<sup>67</sup> called, if that frank sailor had not begged to hear how Americans read, Jemmie did not dishonor his country by any awkwardness, & gave our English friend a paragraph on Swiss scenery. My boys as well as their parents like to talk to this cheerful, excellent son of Neptune, he appears to me a sincere christian & is always heartily welcome when he comes from Cronstadt, but as he was going to the Lecture (upon his favorite poet Milton)<sup>68</sup> delivered by one of his countrymen at the Vestry room of the English church, he declined staying to tea. he & Jemmie had a good natured argument about the prospect of a war between our two countries & each came to the decision that the Oregon Territory<sup>69</sup> had best be left to the possessions of the Indians, that<sup>70</sup> that hostilities should be resorted to between people who ought to conciliate each other, as the only two nations upon earth of the same language, the same religion & habits. At the Merchants Exchange where the English part of the S<sup>t</sup>. Petersburg fraternity meet daily - War between America & England is now the exciting theme, but I trust it will prove like many of their other speculations! which it is to their interest to indulge in merely as an incentive to trade. Much as I yearn to be recalled to my native land I pray it may not be the trump of War, which will make it my husbands stern duty to take up arms against a country I so much love as England. We wrote by tuesdays Courier.<sup>71</sup> I to Eliza<sup>72</sup> & a note to poor M<sup>rs</sup> Canda. Debo to Jule & that lady. Old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon came that day to dine with us. she was cheerful & grateful as ever, Whistler was most attentive, handed her in & placed her at his right hand, she was the life of our circle & told us her 81st Anniversary of her birth day would be next Sunday!<sup>73</sup> In the afternoon Debo's fond father could not resist her invitation to promenade with her in the Nevski, as for a rarity he was not hurried by business from her side, she came back with a border of mud upon her silk dress! indeed he said he had had to ferry her across the Isaacs square<sup>74</sup> in a Sledge & wade over on foot himself! old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon laughed & threatened Debo that she should report what a termigant of a daughter we have, to compel her father to parade her thro the fashionables at such cost! The old lady was obliged to bid us good evening at 9 1/2 lest she should be locked out. I smuggled<sup>75</sup> a bottle of fresh cream under her cloak, as she is obliged to deny herself the purchase of such luxuries. I always think most of my own mother when I can shew kindness to one who is like her, cheerful, useful & so neat & erect. M<sup>r</sup> Strokoffski<sup>76</sup> came & also Capt Klockoff<sup>77</sup> to spend the evening sans ceremonie. I hoped, agreeable as they are, that when M<sup>r</sup> Maxwells friend made his congé<sup>78</sup> at eleven, Whistlers aid would also take his leave but he chose to seat himself again. I soon stole off tho it is rather awkward doing so for my room is adjoining our Salon de compagnie, but I had the fidgets & I cannot reconcile it to my conscience to jumping into a prayerless bed - from which many never rise - it was a quarter past twelve before my head touched the pillow, & yesterday I was up at quarter to six, for between the day light at four peeping in & Debos bird on our window greeting it, and my desire to have breakfast in good time for my children to gambol in the fresh air before school time, I cannot indulge in the sluggishness, which in Russia I have yeilded too much to, the warm rooms create it, & since coming here I have had no darling little Charlie to awaken me.

Saturday afternoon 19th April.<sup>79</sup> Tomorrow will be Palm Sunday russian style.<sup>80</sup> these last three days the Gostinandvo has been filled with toys to tempt the lower classes & children, tomorrow it will still be thronged by those who do not recognise the Sabbath as “rest.” Aunt Alicia not having seen the spectacle went with my boys & Mademoiselle today. Willie appeared to think me exercising self denial & tried to persuade me to be of the party, he & James came back laden with gew gaws to the value of a silver ruble apeice - and pleased their mother that they had sought something for each of our good servants, my dear Jemmie has not been quite well lately; one or the other of my boys seem ever affected by the Neva water, God grant them health! it is indeed a grief to me to observe dear Debo too so feeble this spring. But I am thus constantly reminded that this is a world of care. As next week is one set apart for devotion in the Greek church the Concerts even are put a stop to & all the Italians go elsewhere to make new engagements I suppose.<sup>81</sup> I am relieved that the season is over, as my daughter will no longer be tempted into crowded rooms, to keep late hours, she has not been able to resist musical attractions, & yet is too little restored since her last illness to rise till we have finished breakfast, besides the privation it is to me that she is not among us when we meet at family worship, I know the excitement is injurious to health. The Empress had signified her wish that a Concert should be held in the "Salle de Noblesse"<sup>82</sup> at four rubles argente a ticket the profits for Orphans under her patronage,<sup>83</sup> & of course for so good an object & to see the Imperial family in that most magnificent room in all Europe, we would not refuse, even Martha Ropes who has scarcely left her room this year has been bracing her strength for the exertion. I have always supposed it might be, expected of me that I should be able to say I had seen the Imperial family & the Hall of the Noblesse & this had caused me to reserve this charitable public amusement when I excluded myself from all others, so altho I would rather have staid quietly at home with Aunt Alicia & my boys, I suddenly yielded to Whistlers wish that I should go with Debo & himself, something whispered me "you know not what changes may occur to prevent another season"<sup>84</sup> & I went rather to have it over than with any anticipation of selfish gratification. The crowd was not so great as was expected, but the heat excessive, & altho the Empress & the Grand Duchess Olga were in the canopied & gilded box surrounded by ladies of the Court, I should judge from the lack of elegance in the costume of the crowd it was not the most fashionable this gay metropolis boasts of. I must confess that across this immense room I could not discern the features of the Empress & her beautiful daughter to my satisfaction, altho the general effect of their appearance was quite regal. the former entirely in white wore feathers & diamonds, the latter dressed in pale blue wore flowers in her fair hair (for at the birth of the 2nd infant son of the Héritier about six weeks since a Ukâse had been issued requiring the general mourning for the two young Grand Duche'ss to be discontinued)<sup>85</sup> I did not wonder they only lingered long enough to evince their interest in the charity which they had begged the public thus to contribute to, for the music was too loud to be endurable to one of weak nerves & the heat made the place like a Purgatory, the poor Empress has not been in the world since her beloved Alexandra left it, & I trust her heart will never return to its follies. For myself the delight I felt was that such places no longer could interest me & nothing could again tempt me into them, for tho Garcia, Rubini & Tambourini<sup>86</sup> sung solos or trios it was not to my taste, my imagination guided by my husbands description of the splendour of the Salle de Noblesse had far exceeded what I really found it to be, he was tired as I was Debo looked fatigued & very amiably offered to leave before it was over, but we depended on M Ropes Russ for calling our Coach & they like to see the last as well as the first of every thing. We all wondered Martha who has lately been so subject to swooning should have had strength to get thro the crowd, & then we were all exposed to catching cold waiting out in the Street till our Hackney<sup>87</sup> could come up after all the Court equipages. the carriages having all been formed into line by the Gen d'armes who surrounded the place to keep order. How much trouble is taken to procure good out of evil! thought I! it is a question if every one had contributed their four rubles silver without the amusement whether the clear profits had not been greater! but men are children of a larger growth,<sup>88</sup> & few willing I fear to give of their abundance without some earthly equivalent, A reward is promised in Heaven! But I condemn not those whose opinions differ from mine. I only regret that they barter a certainty for an uncertainty. Music at home with a few dear friends to enjoy it with us, is a source of unfailing delight, & I shall wish never to out of it to seek it, unless to Church. It is a happiness to have ones mind made up as to what constitutes enjoyment, experience has decided me, there can be none in scenes which distract our thoughts & prevent us mingling heavenly prospects with them. I have not attempted to describe the Salle de Noblesse for it would be folly in me to attempt it, the pure white pillars not of marble but a kind of composition are many & divide the wide promenade for spectators or loungers, from the centre appropriated to dancers, which of course was filled with seats at the concert, the throne or Imperial box is gilded & in the most conspicuous situation about half way from where the musicians are placed & the entrance, ever greens are always used as decorations upon its steps, eight immense chandeliers of crystal are reflecting the most brilliant light over the company & many smaller ones at the sides & thro the corridors make every corner bright almost as sunshine. Oh how glad I was to get home at eleven o clock, I was too tired even to partake of the refreshments Aunt Alicas thoughtful attention had provided, I left Debo & her father to divide the jelly & dry rusk & thus gained time at the eleventh hour to collect my thoughts for reading & commending all I loved to the mercies of our Heavenly Father. It was past midnight when my weary limbs were at rest.

Tuesday [April] 22nd <sup>89</sup> Such a change in the temperature since last week! quite a snow storm Sunday afternoon, yesterday scarcely any thawing even at noon. we went to prayers however, but were not tempted to walk further than to church & back. Martha Ropes spent the rest of the day with Debo, quite frolicsome, the noisy concert has made her quite rife for amusement I fear, in the evening her brother Joseph joined us at tea. I took french leave<sup>90</sup> of the circle while I read to my boys & then one of McNeills excellent lectures which he wrote especially for Passion Week upon the Sympathies & sufferings of our Saviour,<sup>91</sup> to my Sister, for I knew the young trio at the Draft table would not require me; & I have determined not to let trifles prevent our reading this week what is so appropriate. We were just at the close of the lecture upon the treachery of Judas Iscariot when Debo came to say good night, as Martha has to keep early hours, on my return to the parlor Mr Joseph & Whistler were so deep in public affairs I found they could dispense with me & gladly retired to my own snug apartment for the night. The Neva presented a strange scene this morning, hundreds of men forming a line thro its centre cutting a passage, to break the force of the ice when nature unlocks its fetters, to save both bridges from injury. Certainly the Russians are most remarkable for precautions, to save life or property. In our country it would be a serious expense to cut up a river as they are doing the Neva. but here the Emperor must be well satisfied that it gives employment to so many of his poorest subjects. We went again to prayers at Church, every seat appropriated to the ladies was occupied. some ventured to the gentlemen's side, I thank God that I felt His presence today in the midst of us! & not fatigued altho the service was long. We read the Psalms for the 9th day - & how beautiful are those Epistles taken from Isaiah<sup>92</sup> for both yesterday & today! Martha R dined with Debo, who took a drive after, with her, but complained of the bleak wind & rough Streets.

Friday 2nd May<sup>93</sup> We had a kind note from the Parsonage reminding us that it was 20th April old style the wedding day of our Pastor & that altho no invitations were ever sent out Mrs Law always received their friends that evening. Debo recalled a pleasant dance the last anniversary

& was delighted at the prospect of another. I determined not to resist this effort at sociability as I had done all their formal invitations to large parties for I felt we could not expect to receive our Pastors family under our roof if I always refused their hospitality. after shopping with Debo in the way of artificial flowers & white gloves for her I felt very much fatigued for the streets were in a most uneven state, but my kind Sister relieves me of household cares so after a warm bath I laid down with a book & thus missed seeing M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand when she called. which I regretted exceedingly as she has not been well enough to go out lately. Altho the weather was so unfavorable it was by turns snowing or drizzling we met quite a number at nine o clock, after the kind reception from our Pastor & M<sup>rs</sup> Law - who looked so bright & happy upon this their 30th anniversary,<sup>94</sup> that they might well have made all the single present willing to enter the list for matrimony - we took tea in the little carpetted parlor, but soon after were drawn to the large entrance room with parquet floor by the sound of music & dancing. I knew Debo was at the piano for it was one of the waltzes she often plays & she is never among the waltzers. By turns the parents of the young ladies chatted with me, & found<sup>95</sup> that some very few disapproved of this mazy movement as much as I do. M<sup>r</sup> Catley<sup>96</sup> remarked that the Polka was only suited to the stage! I thought it only becoming mere children! M<sup>rs</sup> F. Baird<sup>97</sup> looked well notwithstanding she was in the same quadrille with her son Charles,<sup>98</sup> for the quiet of Passion week had restored her somewhat after a long winters dissipation, she wore new diamond, her broach was so novel I could not but look at it tho I am seldom attracted by jewellery, it was in the form of lily of the valley the single leaf of enamel, the sprig of lilies upon it of large diamonds. perhaps if the English Ambassador<sup>99</sup> had not complimented her upon her good taste I should not have noticed it. M<sup>rs</sup> Law & I had a nice talk about her darling little grand children.<sup>100</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Caslett<sup>101</sup> took an opportunity of expressing a hope that we should be at her ball next week but I excused myself - Attracted by some beautiful plaister models of Thorswaldens exquisite sculpture I had a full description of the originals in the church at Copenhagen which made me wish more than ever to go there.<sup>102</sup> Soon after Whistler came in (business had detained him at home until half past ten) I took french leave, as Debo would be under his guardianship & was in my own room before eleven, listening to a cheerful letter from Preston<sup>103</sup> which my Sister had received & felt compensated for the exertions I had made for others by an approving conscience the Searcher of hearts knoweth that my enjoyments are not in the world! I often err no doubt thro my wish to gratify my dear daughter for my judgement & experience both condemn the false system of enjoyment, the world offers, but I so yearn for sympathy from Debo, that I am willing when there is no glaring folly to meet her more than half way. her father could not persuade her to leave the gay throng until after supper & I was not asleep when they came home at one o'clock. I grieved that Whistler should be distressed by her selfishness, for tho he makes many sacrifices of his own inclination to attend upon this only daughter, he expects consideration in respect to his peculiar views of propriety, & late hours her health will not bear, however he ever evinces forbearance from reproaches & probably she was not aware how much she had dissappointed her dear father when he kissed her fondly as usual for good night, & I hope she rested better than he did, for her cheek looked pale & her eye languid, tho she persuaded herself the excitement would do her good. I can see our Heavenly Fathers wisdom in exiling us from our native land where Debo's intimacy with many gay circles, might tempt us to yeilding entirely to her inclination & thus health be wasted, here the evil effects of dissipation are so glaring that even she must be assured we are right in confining her to a very limited participation of gaieties natural to youth.

Saturday [May] 3rd <sup>104</sup> of course dear Debo was not able to rise to join us in the family devotions, she breakfasted in her own room at nine, her father had been called out ere then so that they did not meet till almost bed time (when he went to Mrs Gellibrands where she dined, to bring her home, Mrs Grant<sup>105</sup> spent the morning with her, they practised two hours duetts, then walked out on the quai. Mrs Ropes brought in her work & sat in my room where I had stationed myself at my work table for I am just now much interested in replenishing my husbands stock of linen, she is invariably cheerful & affectionate, I was grateful to her for bestowing so much kind attention upon me. Jemmie was taking his drawing lesson. Willie gone with Mary to see his little friend Scharschinka Drury who has been shut up with effects of measles all winter nearly & now has very sore eyes - Aunt Alicia with willing feet attending my family arrangements in pantry, dairy & kitchen, so dear Ropes chat quite dissipated the sadness I might have yielded to alone, when last I was cutting out shirts it was four summers ago shut up in my room at Springfield, Sister Julia assisting me, dear mother then my house keeper!<sup>106</sup> Ah how much I think of her so far away! but God appoints our separation therefore I check even the rising wish that it should be otherwise. It is exactly a week since the last letters by the Boston Steamer reached us. I can scarcely define my emotions when this feast of many letters from home<sup>107</sup> came in late Saturday evening, after the calm of Passion week, we had every day been contemplating the love of our Saviour for us, & had after divine service on this last day of the week partaken of that holy Supper which is to shew forth His death & resurrection. Sister had just finished one of McNeiles most touching lectures<sup>108</sup> appropriate to the season, & the world with all its contending interests seemed to have retired, How full was my whole soul with love & thankfulness as I perused my mothers letter! it was long & satisfactory, for altho it told us darling Willie Wyatt<sup>109</sup> had been extremely ill, it pronounced him convalescent & but for it, I should very naturally have allowed my imagination to picture only Marias anxious watchings & her exhausted frame. dear Sister! it is trying to be so far from you when I might by sympathy at least mitigate your sorrows! Whistler did not get back from Alexandrofski that night till late, his letters from George & the Gen.<sup>1</sup><sup>110</sup> kept us wakeful, May the infirmity be compassionated which induced me to mingle thoughts of those dear absent ones with my prayers on Easter Sunday<sup>111</sup> at church! Why cannot I cast all my cares for others on God, as I do the future in temporal things for myself? I know He knows what is necessary to fit us all for the last great change, I experience that His chastisements are in love & in the review of my own life am so convinced of the benefit of affliction that I would not have had one stroke less if I might choose-yet I tremble for those dear ones for whom I daily pray “all things may work together to bring them near to God<sup>112</sup> & that they “may count all things as nought compared to the knowledge which is in Christ Jesus”<sup>113</sup>. Oh how small is my practical faith! In the afternoon of that Sunday as we had no public worship I read to my dear James & Willie from their favorite Abbots “School boy”<sup>114</sup> - how astonishing that any of the children of a larger growth even considered wise men in the world should reject such counsel! the lesson in this little world are admirably adapted for all capacities to yeild happiness for this life which may be delightful contemplations thro out Eternity. Debo drove with M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison to the service at Alexandrofski – Whistler took M<sup>r</sup> H to Tsarskoe Selo to see Col Todd & get a peep at an American newspaper if possible, as our Ambassador never sends us such a favor - We all met at tea & partook of some of Aunt Alicias nice sweet curd & cream.<sup>115</sup> her friend old M<sup>rs</sup> Baird having provided her with Rennet,<sup>116</sup> which we could not buy here – But I linger a whole week & must skip back to last Sunday<sup>117</sup> to note down that the bridge of boats having been drawn back from the Quai in anticipation of the breaking up of the ice all the portion of our congregation belonging to Vassili Ostrow were prevented attending church, I was not well enough to go in the morning & enjoyed quiet reading at home, & was thus invigorated to listen to a most excellent discourse from D<sup>r</sup> Law in the afternoon text 2nd Epistle of St Peter 1st chap 10th verse.<sup>118</sup> What a pity so few were there to profit by it! Ah how strange that christians who can make leisure for every day to throng the Church during Passion Week, should yet absent themselves every Sabbath afternoon from joining in public worship. merely upon the plea of hospitality to friends; or family enjoyment, perverting the 4th Commandment<sup>119</sup> to their own injury. Oh how long it is before early habits thus formed can be broken, that we can feel it a privilege to spend the Sabbath in communion with heavenly objects & that it becomes indeed a day of rest. God will bless our endeavours to keep it holy, even if our natural estrangement towards Him tempts us to question the benefit we shall reap from perfect obedience “We shall reap if we faint not.<sup>120</sup> Oh if we could but remember that we have to deal with a just & jealous God as well as a merciful & compassionate Saviour, what remorse might be spared! but human pride asserts human privileges & like the Israelites on their journey we continue to rebel: And thus Canaan<sup>121</sup> is lost to multitudes now as then.

Monday 5th of May I was aroused unusually early by the voices of Whistler & all the young ones in the drawing room, even Debo in her dressing gown was there to enjoy the sight of the flowing Neva, yes its dirty winter garb had been cast off in the night & tho the weather continues cold we may hope an agreable change. The ice continues floating in great dirty flats all day & as the wind rises the chilly feeling increases. Henrietta Law<sup>122</sup> to pass the evening in practising with Debo, we enjoyed a most gorgeous sunset at eight o'clock. beautiful starlight succeeded, Whistler found us still lingering over the tea table when he returned after nine from Alexandrofski, he was very glad of a hot cup of chocolate as he said he had not suffered from cold in a drive during the winter.<sup>123</sup> We amused ourselves looking over "Letters from the Baltic"<sup>124</sup> while the music was going on. I had read Miss Rigbys work before I left Boston, but since becoming familiar with Russian scenes it is much more forcible, one of her remarks upon the baptismal ceremony in the Greek Church made me laugh they cross the eyes to express the vow not to look upon evil, the mouth to prevent the utterance of evil communication & she thinks the same charm of the † must be passed upon the nose, as Russians seem not to be annoyed as others are by the odious smells which infest every avenue to the public, their churches, Academy of fine Arts &c – By the way I may mention that our home on the English quai is directly facing that last named imposing building, the window in my room is opposite the principal ferry stair,<sup>125</sup> & if ever I am at a loss for variety I can watch the embarkation of the passengers in the ferry gondolas, tho I rather think it will only be interesting to me when Jemmy is among them, for soon as the ice is all gone he hopes to cross three times a week to take his drawing lesson at the Academy.<sup>126</sup> But the Governors boat from the fortress is always the first to cross, none dare venture till he has gone thro the ceremony of filling a glass with Neva water & on presenting it to the Emperor in the Winter Palace has a goblet of gold peices in return for the intelligence<sup>127</sup>

Tuesday [May] 6th <sup>128</sup> The sun rising upon my pleasant window awakes me every morning now, long before I can persuade myself to profit by his bright example, but I sprung up on the instant this morn to see the state of the Neva, looked at the watch, it was five minutes to four o'clock! the thermometer said four degrees cold & the wind was blowing so fresh down to the Gulf that all the ice along shore had disappeared during the night. Of course I took a nap after thus gratifying curiosity. The young folks took a walk upon the quai after breakfast, & came in complaining of cold, except Jemmie whose cheeks looked like damask roses. Debo & I wore our Shubes when we went in the Droszky to the Gostinandvo, to purchase a riding habit for her, & were glad we had not sent away our furs, which we discarded long before, last Spring. M<sup>r</sup> Ropes met us quite a pro-pos in the market & made some good bargains for us I was tempted to purchase a pretty Moscow silk<sup>129</sup> to send to America, & also one or two dresses for my spring out fit, as I have only my black bombazine now in wear. On our drive returning past the Palace we saw the quai on the island completely manned, from the Fortress to the bridge, hundreds of people & from the firing of cannon we knew the governers boat was upon the voyage across the Neva, in the afternoon the river was alive with gondolas how glad the island population must be that their embargo is at an end, still carriages must wait for the replacing of the bridge, floating ice will be an impediment for a while & besides, with all their watchfulness & authority, two of the boats forming the bridge were carried down by the ice, while probably the lazy Russians dozed on their post.<sup>130</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Harrison came in while we were at dinner & repeated his wifes invitation to my Sister for her promised visit, so she agreed to return to Alexandrofski with him, she instructed Mary in all her duties to save me exertion during her absence & then made her own few preparations. dear kind Sister! how shall I feel when she is packing up to go to England! while even the prospect of this weeks absence made my heart sad, much as I hope she may enjoy the visit to our amiable young Countrywoman & her sweet children.

Wednesday [May] 7th <sup>131</sup> Such a bright day! the river gay with boats we begin to anticipate arrivals soon at Cronstadt from England. Whistler has been to Alexandrofski already today Sister freighted him with lots of love from her warm heart to all at home, she whispered him when none were by that she had nearly perished from cold in the night! their house has lately undergone many improvements, but taking out the double windows was rather premature, I dare say my dear Sister Alice became chilled in her evening drive for we could not persuade her to wear a fur, she said she was not made of stuff to chill, & only took my grey cloak to protect her from the muddy road. otherwise her English silk mantilla<sup>132</sup> she would consider heavy enough for May! But Oh we are not in that green isle! even there the season has been unusually long & cold. I had the favor of a peep into an American news paper of M<sup>r</sup> Harrisons the other day, date 1st March, the Norwich<sup>133</sup> had made its first trip from N York to Albany! that was unseasonably early for Hudson navigation. I am getting impatient for letters from Brooklyn<sup>134</sup> again!

Saturday [May] 10th <sup>135</sup> Nothing new to record except my having gone in Whistlers droschky yesterday with him to Alexandrofski - from having suffered great fatigue when we went in the Winter - my only tolerably long sledge ride in Russia - I feared to venture since, but trust "now the ice is broken" I shall often be my husbands companion in his pleasant, low & easy vehicle as I cannot walk far enough to be of essential service.<sup>136</sup> I found only little Annie, Henry & their young German Governess<sup>137</sup> Mr & Mrs H having taken my sister to Gen Wilsons<sup>138</sup> about 3 versts further up the river, to explore the extensive weaving fabric, where damask is brought to such perfection a price of fifty silver rubles is often readily obtained for one table cloth & one dozen napkins. I had great satisfaction in the hour I spent with these affectionate children & practised some of my bad french upon their Governess by way of encouraging her, as she is timid & a stranger, not able to converse in English tho she comprehends it when spoken. Then there was all the new furniture to admire & the improvements in their house to approve, so the time flew while Whistler was in the works making some experiments in iron. We set out before sunset - right glad were we of our furs for the air was frosty still, how much we enjoyed our nice tea, home made bread & home churned butter as also bonny claba & cream<sup>139</sup> at nine o'clock - our boys were ready by the time I had finished for me to read to them as Mary had taken care they & Mr Hadenskougg should have a plentiful bread & milk supper before my return. What beautiful evenings we have now! the ruby glow of sunset continues at the horizon & the bright stars & new moon are so brilliant in the clear canopy above. Oh how I delight to feast my eyes thus after the duties of the day are over & I have quiet & leisure to reflect upon the past, how I pity any who can look unmoved upon the wonders of nature! & I am grateful that I inherit my mothers taste for such contemplations, Grandmother<sup>140</sup> & "the little ones who have gone home before us are fond associations with Gods own coloring in the firmament, and soon memory will bring many sweet pictures before me when the approaching season, for flowers greets me. But we must wait for May blossoms yet awhile, not a spear of grass yet! the ice has continued in sight all the week upon the river, tho the barges continue to ply with passengers between the city & island, the bridge is often drawn to one side to let the masses from Lake Ladoga thro. how perfectly pure & white it looks in comparison to that which was walked over by thousands during the long winter upon the river & canals. And as there is no avail in being impatient I try to admire even this variety from muddy ice, to fresh & clean. One certainly does not take the lively interest in a foreign land we do in our own, where nature dictates to us when to expect singing birds & blooming violets. Poor Martha Ropes is anxious for suitable weather to see all she can in the neighbourhood of St Petersburg before her long voyage back to Boston. & we hope a brief spring for her enjoyment. she has been sitting with us this morning, working secretly at slippers to surprise Mr Gellibrand on his birth day which will be next tuesday,<sup>141</sup> while her fingers have plied thus industriously, she has been talking of the intended wedding of Dr H.<sup>142</sup> their family physician, it is to be “published” tomorrow at the English church. the long smothered attachment between him & Miss J-<sup>143</sup> has so suddenly revived that it has become the interesting theme in the English circle. his little girls think it will be quite a blessing for them to have a new Mama & I trust she may exercise such an influence over them that her task may be rewarded, they have been rather too little controlled, but they are reasonable & affectionate - & she gentle - scarcely double Alices age will no doubt win them, for her love to their father it is said has undermined her health & she was their own mothers favorite companion - one of the few who saw that beautiful & excellent woman in her great sufferings during the three days after her sudden attack which was ended in death about three Summers ago.<sup>144</sup>

Tuesday 13th May.<sup>145</sup> Three records to make of today, have just finished a very unsatisfactory letter to my dear Sister Ktie to despatch by the Courier for England, in hopes of its meeting the Steamer for Boston by 4th of June. My life is so monotonous that I can only tell them what they know that distance only strengthens the cords of family love & that I envy even every scrawl I send home. I miscalculated about a semi monthly Steamer for April & thus brought dissatisfaction to myself instead, must be more patient & not indulge in anticipations in future. This is the 1st of May, Russian style, weather very cloudy & moist, but I dare say this unpropitious aspect of the clouds will not prevent the usual fête at Catrinoff,<sup>146</sup> as the rich will go around the gardens in equipages better than if the dust of yesterday had been attended by its sunshine & the poor heed not the weather, the holiday they will not lose. occasionally we see fields of ice floating down the Neva from Lake Ladoga, so green fields would not be in keeping. & I am sure they never dance around a May Pole<sup>147</sup> near this city whatever the peasants may do in the south of Russia, I would go to the fête myself to see that, but in all their holiday games here there has been no exhibition of gladness of heart, one never hears a merry laugh or sees a bounding step, they swing, or ride on hobby horses with the same decorum they would enter church, & to a reflecting observer it is sad to witness that on Gods own holy day the seem most unrestrained. last Sunday afternoon we attended Mr Ellerbys preaching at Alexandrofski as the Harrisons invited us us to be present at his farewell discourse to our countrymen the Mechanics at his works.<sup>148</sup> My feelings were perhaps peculiarly solemnized by the view which had been presented of using every means for salvation, & the crowds of idle Russian peasants herded together on our ride back to town really distressed me, some sleeping, some drunken, some playing their native game with bones,<sup>149</sup> I wondered those who could speak their language should not warn them of their misapprehension of Gods commandments, immortals merely vegetating in their short uncertain state of probation, how can the thousands of protestants of the English here be indifferent towards the poor, good natured peasantry, whose language they are so eager to learn, to employ them for their own convenience. It is not surely enough to excuse them when all shall stand together at the judgement seat of Christ, that the Greek Church was considered christian. Oh when shall the true light be given to the Shepherds of this countless flock! that they may exert their power over them to make them happy for time & eternity. Today is the anniversary of Mr & Mrs Gellibrands wedding,<sup>150</sup> it is to be celebrated at Mr Ropes as usual & we have promised to join their family circle at tea with a few other friends.

June 6th Old Style today is & 18th our calender<sup>151</sup> – My illness interrupted for two weeks any record of family events & feelings – since then preparing sundry gifts to send my Sister Kates children by Mrs Gellibrand & Martha Ropes who embarked last week for Boston required all the effort I could muster in my debility after so much fever.

I have not felt so ill in many years as upon taking cold in a drive a damp afternoon with my dear husband to Alexandrofski, a cough I had fancied could not attack me in Russia for I had never been two years exempt from one till my residence here, but it racked me distressingly & with fever in my head my whole nervous system was deranged. Never can I forget Dr Rogers untiring attention, at first visiting me twice a day, then once & still he looks in upon us two or three times a week. What a comfort too to have the tender care of my dear husband, soon he must leave me for a fortnights absence on the rail road, but thank God it was not necessary while I was ill. My kind Sister too relieved me of all domestic anxieties & Mary anticipated all my wants. Mrs Ropes too used to bring her sewing & sit beside me, but I was not allowed to talk, so visiting my room was rather discouraged by the doctor & my watchful husband. however when I could read, my spirit was refreshed by perusing the "Memories & Remains of Murray McCheyne of Dundee"<sup>152</sup> which delightful work a young Scotsman had lent me just before & ere I had quite finished it, Capt Kruyger set me the Rev<sup>d</sup> George Williams new work on the Holy Land,<sup>153</sup> I must try to read it thro ere his return from England, for it was a farewell loan when my boys favorite called to say adieu.<sup>154</sup> & there is scarcely another copy of the work in Russia. nothing could have drawn me from the perusal of so interesting a volume but the necessity of aiding our dear Debo in getting her wardrobe ready for a contemplated visit to her Aunt Winstanley. and I have felt glad that my strength was sufficiently restored to drive as far as the Gostinandvor<sup>155</sup> to shop for her & more important yet that I could ply the needle for her notwithstanding a constant pain in my side. The weather is still very unfavorable to my getting rid of that, bleak winds continue to prevail & vegetation is at least a month behind what it was the last season. While a prisoner to my room W<sup>m</sup> Maingay arrived from Germany bringing tokens of his Mother & Sisters regard for us. I have not yet seen him as he has only called to deliver these, & has not appeared at church the two last Sundays,<sup>156</sup> when I have been there. Mr W<sup>m</sup> Millers return from Scotland<sup>157</sup> caused quite an excitement in our house about the same time for he sent so many packages, curiosity was quite rife. but Aunt Alicia soon unraveled the mystery, she had commissioned him to purchase her some tokens of her love for us all, a beautiful suit of dark blue silk tartan for each the boys, a bible & prayer book bound in one for me, & a unique travelling case for Whistler, knife fork & spoon of steel & silver. How often this warm hearted Sister brings my dear departed father<sup>158</sup> before my minds eye! may she be blessed for all her proofs of a Mothers love to me! since my earliest recollections I look back upon her care for me, & now that religion has purified the bond of sisterly attachment, we sympathize more truly than ever. she could not have given me any thing so valuable as the complete volume which is now my companion in the solitude of my chamber & when I attend the house of God. I have resigned to darling Jemmie now the Polyglott bible<sup>159</sup> which was his sainted brother Joes & since his death had been preferred to me to any other, because of the association, may James be aided by the holy spirit to love & to value the unpretending looking volume! But I must not omit to record that we received also by M<sup>r</sup>. M many other tokens of friendship. his brother<sup>160</sup> wrote the kindest note to my husband offering for the acceptance of Debo & myself curious pebble brooches & a tartan scarf to the former to experiment upon – & the bearer managed to slip in a pretty Edinburgh reticle with the Thistle embroidered in gold upon satin tartan. Then Eliza Stevenson now M<sup>rs</sup>. Tom Smith<sup>161</sup> sent her (with the sweetest bride like effusion descriptive of all her wedded bliss! the tiniest embroidered pocket handkerchief - which had been one of the bridal presents to herself. Soon as M<sup>r</sup>. Miller ascertained that I had resumed my place at the family board, he invited himself to dine with us one Saturday, telling me in his note I need not fear he would wear out his welcome by staying all the evening for he had an engagement at 7 o'clock – however he put that off, for the weather was tempting enough to make Whistler accede to his after proposal of all taking a drive to the Alargna<sup>162</sup> one of the charming islands where the Imperial family have been since the ice dissappeared. I did not go of course, my boys brought me a bunch of butter cups the first wild flowers which have greeted my longing eyes this season. & they told me of having hailed W<sup>m</sup>. Maingay who was rowing a party in his English barge<sup>163</sup> in his sailors costume. Debo & Mademoiselle regretted I had not been there to meet the beautiful Grand Duchess Olga & Empress. but I had enjoyed a tranquil hour or two at home much more, for the trifling exertion of entertaining a guest or two was fatiguing to me, still so weak. Mr Miller made the boys merry as crickets, gave them a lesson in a Highland dance to the quickest time Debus fingers could move over the keys. But after tea when Capt K<sup>164</sup> would have proposed more music our frank Scotsman opposed it, as out of all reason to begin again after ten. the twilight is really so deceptive no wonder the lovers of amusement encroach upon the hours when we should be at our devotions, previous to rest. I was obliged at last to steal from the drawing room to my chamber, which Mr Miller thought was hint enough that it was time to make his congé.

If I had not been too busy, until taken ill, I should have recorded the magnificent spectacle we witnessed on the 14th of May.<sup>165</sup> Capt K had succeeded in obtaining a window for us in the 4th Story of the Prince of Oldenburghs palace overlooking the Champ de Mars,<sup>166</sup> & tho it was rather humbling to our independent spirits to have to wander thro his stables & once stand to one side while the Emperors daughter passed from her chariot to the honored part of the palace we mounted the wearisome back stairs & found we were favored, among a distinguished few ladies & officers who had reached the desirable eminence before us. It is impossible to convey a conception of the effect of 80.000 troops with their field peices, banners &c glittering in the Sun Shine,<sup>167</sup> for the weather was propitious, altho a slight shower obliged the Empress & Grand duchesses to abandon their elegant English equipage after they had driven thro the avenues among the troops to receive their cheers. we had a perfect view of these beautiful women, the Grand duchess Olgar was dressed in sky blue, the wife of the Héritier in pink & the Empress in Lilac. the troops in their new gaudy uniforms of every hue gave the effect of a vast bed of tulip. The Emperor rode proudly among them, no one could have mistaken any other for the monarch tho the Grand Duke Michel (his brother) the Grand duke Alexander & Leighthenburg<sup>168</sup> followed close upon him. What a multitude of splendid horses were there & so exactly alike for the several batallions. As the Emperor received the shouts of the several companions as he passed him in their maneuvers methought he looked too proud for mere mortal & I wondered if he remembered the presence of the King of kings! for I thought how small was all this array in comparison to the Armies of heaven. On three sides of the square field were palaces, on the fourth the Summer Gardens, so that the dull realities of life were completely secluded & yet I could not forget them, in my minds eye I contrasted the sheep skins of the ignorant & dirty peasantry & I knew too how many hearts were wrung to afford this army numbers for its ranks,<sup>169</sup> & while famine raged in the interior<sup>170</sup> it must be supported at an expence which would have made the poor comfortable, & what was all this for? to display the power of one man & to make his subjects tremble to disobey his slightest wish, a silver ruble was to be given to each soldier after the review,<sup>171</sup> in how short a time thus nearly 80.000 would be squandered in drunken revelry. The maneuvers detained us many hours & an elegant luncheon was sent to every apartment in the palace for its visitors, chicken salad made more refreshing by jelly of calves feet as one ingredient, the nicest cold ham I have tasted in Russia, &c, followed by ices, we scarcely needed that dinner should have been ordered at six o'clock at home. I was most delighted at the modest politeness of my little Willie that day. he attracted much notice from a Russian family which shared our window, answered them in french or russ whenever addressed & proved that he was grateful for the kindness of the ladies, by offering to put down their empty glasses & plates as he observed them in their way. darling boy! may he never become conceited or selfish! I do not like to make comparisons, for Jemmies eagerness to attain all his desires for information & his fearlessness, often make him offend us because we love him too tenaciously to be reconciled to his appearing less amiable than he is, the officers however seemed to find amusement in his remarks in french or english according as they accosted him. they were soon informed of his military ardor & that he hoped to serve his country – England – no indeed! Russia then? No, no, but America of course!) My poor boy how little you dream of the horrors of the battle field, a review is the pageant of the sad reality. but I should pray you may be clothed in the whole armor of God.<sup>172</sup>

June 28th <sup>173</sup> I have been giving dear Debo all my spare hours to put her wardrobe in order for a visit to her Aunt Winstanley, the impossibility of obtaining a berth on board the Steamer in which Mrs Busk<sup>174</sup> went, was a great vexation to her, I had never known Debo so energetic as she was in her efforts to obtain her wish to reach London. I told her all must be ordered for her good as we had taken every means in our power, she would yet find it providential that she was delayed, still her first & last question night & morning was about Steamers for England, & her father was urged to get Col Todds aid in obtaining her passport, at last all was arranged to her satisfaction, the money pd for her berth in the Hull steamer<sup>175</sup> & Mrs Cotton<sup>176</sup> delighted to taken her under her care & she felt it long to wait till thursday of this week. her father was obliged to start for the rail road last Wednesday<sup>177</sup> & his parting words were "be a good girl & write me often from England." we looked for American letters that day by the Lubec Steamer<sup>178</sup> which was due, I wondered what Debo would do if she heard George had made up his mind to visit Russia in the course of the Summer, tho I concluded we should not have him till August as I thought he would embark in a ship from Boston to Cronstadt. I advised Whistler to leave me an envelope directed in Russ to overtake him on his route interior in case of letters, which he did. But instead of letters, came George himself the afternoon of the day his father left home for Moscow in 24 hours more Debo too would have been gone! who can say chance has aught to do in the events of a day. Our very hairs are all numbered,<sup>179</sup> & our Saviour never loses sight of those who put their trust in Him. my constant prayer is that He will guide each one of us & that all things shall work together for our eternal progress to His right hand. Delightful as were my emotions on welcoming my dear Son, when the excitement was over & I left to reflect upon the unexpected changes of the day - a kind of awe mingled with gratitude to God, and I wondered if we should yet see some especial purpose of our Heavenly Father in His arrangements for us this Summer - perhaps not - many would ridicule my superstition but tho my health is sound & my prospects of long years to come are flattering I always realize how slight is the tenure, & tho I would not say so to others, the thought has more than once occurred that dear George was sent here & Debo detained at home for a mothers blessing.<sup>180</sup> May the Holy Spirit make me willing in the day of His power to cast my whole care upon God! Debo became as eager to get rid of her ticket for a place on board the Rob Roy as she had been to obtain it, & the agent behaved most generously in returning its value. After she had read her letters which her dear brother brought & admired all the gifts sent her by her young companions she took a tete a tete stroll up the Nevski with him, and I was left to rest on my sofa with the refreshment of my dear mothers letters, for Aunt Alicia had an engagement at Alexandrofski whither she was accompanied by Mademoiselle & Willie - and I persuaded Jemmie to attend his drawing class tho he could not bear to lose hold of brother George! he went for two hours to the Academy of Fine Arts & Mary went to ride, with M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes darling little trio of girls & two nurses,<sup>181</sup> as she usually does two or three times a week- My loved mother had picked a wild flower from the grave of my little Kirkie & Charlie, & dried it to send me, it is a precious gem to me! and those heavenly lines upon the Adoption,<sup>182</sup> soothed my spirit as strains of sacred melody. Oh, I would not have exchanged the holy communings I held in my solitude that evening for all that the world calls delightful! After tea George came & sat beside me talking of Stonington & Brooklyn till I could almost fancy myself there. but our bodies were tired tho our spirits were eager still for all that each could give of the past! We only wanted my dearest Whistler at home to render our happiness complete. but he had just left us for a fortnights absence! George & I determined to write him immediately & forward all his American letters - which he was bearer of - we did so the next day.<sup>183</sup> How very sudden the transition must appear to our dear George, leaving Boston as lately as the 1st day of this month & arriving at this city of Palaces upon the 25th having passed a week in England he could tell us of Aunt Winstanley who will scarcely expect Debo now. The Capt of the Rob Roy behaved very handsomely in returning the passage money & Debo went to the boat to bid adieu to her friends in high glee, M<sup>rs</sup> Cotton said how lonely she should feel without her, neither M<sup>r</sup> or M<sup>rs</sup> C have ever been further than Cronstadt from this, & with three little ones<sup>184</sup> to take care of it is a pity they are not tried sailors, she has the sad prospect of scarcely reaching England in time to receive a dying Sisters adieu & has had to leave a little infant only a month old as nursling to a Russian under her other Sister M<sup>rs</sup> Andersons roof. how various are the trials of human life! but God does not willingly afflict! & our blessed Saviour assures us He sympathises with all His children. Oh that we could lean upon His bosom in holy love & confidence!

July 8th tuesday evening.<sup>185</sup> It is so impossible for me to journalize without neglecting the claims of those around me that but for the wish to bring an absent parent in imagination to our family group at St P I should abandon the attempt. Whistler is still upon the road I am sorry he will not reach home to greet dear George on his birth day.<sup>186</sup> I have treated James & Willie to each three silver rubles for birth day gifts to present brother George tomorrow morning & am dissappointed in my search after a bible to offer him in place of the Polyglott I gave him twelve years ago. however if I cannot procure one from England, ere he must wend his way back to our native land, I know he will prize the one I use doubly, & Aunt Alicia has generously offered to replace it with another to me. Gods word is indeed my daily food. & I pray His holy Spirit may open the hearts of all my children to its beauties

[Thursday] August 28th <sup>187</sup> After having closed a letter in answer to one received last evening from my indulgent mother, I occupy this twilight hour in recording the mercies of my heavenly Parent “not knowing what this night may bring forth”<sup>188</sup> my symptoms are of approaching illness I cast myself with entire confidence on a divine Redeemer & pray if years on earth shall be added to my term of 40 years His spirit may guide me into the paths of righteousness & that my children & beloved husband may continue united with me in striving to honor Him. When I look back upon Gods dealings with me they have indeed been such as to cause me to praise Him not only with my lips but in my life! & shall I not devote my all on earth to Him, who hath so mercifully led me for forty years thro this wilderness. If He calls me from the joys of an earthly home Oh may it be to a heavenly Canaan! My heart clings too fondly to ties here. husband, children Mother! absent brothers, sisters & a native land hold out strong inducements to make me yearn for many years! but I earnestly pray to have no will but as God wills & that Jesus may be preferred to all other ties however deserving of my best affections. Have mercy on my human weakness Oh Thou who rememberest my frame! Let me lean on thy compassionate bosom & cast my cares on Thee! Yesterday being the anniversary of the birth of my last little one, I almost hoped would have brought to my embrace the one expected this month. but every day is precious as I have duties for my hands yet to fulfil. We should strive more than we ordinarily do, not to neglect present time, “Tho in the midst of life we are in death”<sup>189</sup> All that I attempt now has that awful import. May these impressions never leave me. I heard of the death of my friend M<sup>rs</sup> Nichols<sup>190</sup> of Lebanon last evening, rather should I say her entrance upon eternal life, may her bereaved husband be comforted with hopes of being re-united to her & their little ones<sup>191</sup> when his work in the Lords vineyard is finished & it shall be said to him “well done faithful Servant”<sup>192</sup> How often have I looked back upon the piety of that family circle at the Lebanon Parsonage with satisfaction. I only, envy such, on earth, & pray the habits I have endeavoured to give my children may become their choice thro the influence of Gods holy Spirit. Oh that they may value time as they ought! referring all their pursuits to Eternity! How inexcusable are those who avoid the means for improvement, I have read “James Anxious Enquirer”<sup>193</sup> again lately with startling interest, & today took up Abbotts “Religion & Happiness”<sup>194</sup> wishing all I love might see the force of his arguments as I do. But my dear husband & children understand my views as being simply those of the bible & I pray they may live separate from the world, whether I am their companion & encourager in the narrow path, or whether from the grave I speak to them. Now bodily pain makes me restless & this may be my last page! I have just been drawn to the window overlooking the court, by Dounias expressions of admiration, my nerves are weak surely, for why should I weep as I gaze on my precious Debos graceful form as she is riding thro the Archway with M<sup>r</sup> Ropes & his wifes Sister Emily Hall<sup>195</sup> they look so happy & the weather is so propitious for their enjoyment, but the future for that daughter presses heavily upon my heart if she should soon be left Motherless!

But let me not wish to “guide the hand of God, nor order the finger of the Almighty”<sup>196</sup> What an oppressive burden is taken off a Christians shoulders, by the privilege of leaving all consequences while in the path of duty, to God. The follower of Jesus need not say how shall I bear this trouble! how remove this difficulty! how get thro this deep water! Casting all care upon the All-wise-all merciful I commit myself & all who are dear to me to God. Tomorrow I may not be here! But He is from Everlasting! To Him I turn in prayer.

October 23rd <sup>197</sup> So much have I been occupied since the last page was written it has proved quite impossible for my pen to note the changes which have marked the time. How solemnized were were feelings as I completed even that, for the pains of my body made life seem uncertain, but our Heavenly Father has indeed given a fresh spring to my earthly existence & I pray for His grace to spend it in bringing my children up in His service. At about half past one o'clock on Friday morning August 29th our little darling Russian boy was born,<sup>198</sup> his fond father & Aunt Alicia who had by turns comforted me by their presence in my chamber, waited in the nursery to see the fine healthy babe put in his Karita<sup>199</sup> by Naanooshka,<sup>200</sup> soon after which our dear Debo & George were told of the acquisition, the latter only, expressed dissatisfaction that it was not a little Sister, as to James & Willie, another little brother was just what they wanted! Willie was so captivated he would fain have attached himself to Titania's<sup>201</sup> apron string! & always thought it a great treat if he might have the glass of mother's milk which baby did not want, or a reward if allowed to see him in his Karita. Every hour testified God's goodness to me. Dr Handysides<sup>202</sup> visits seemed only to be to advise caution to keep well & to congratulate me upon having so vigorous an infant. Titania was called to Alexandrofski to fulfil her engagement to my American friend<sup>203</sup> when baby was eight days old & it has been my pleasure every morning since to bathe & dress my sweet boy. but when she was a fortnight old she was permitted to come to see him & to be present at his christening,<sup>204</sup> which took place in our drawing room in presence of all our American friends & was performed by Dr Law, (my Sister Alicia & George being Sponsors while Whistler stood proxy for our pastor the Rev<sup>d</sup> H Lee of Springfield Massachusetts who we think will not object to being God father to our little John Bouttatz. Yes we have named him in compliment to our Russian friend Col Bouttatz, for he has evinced love towards our other children & must ever be associated with those (God early recalled) Kirkie (who loved him for his gentle attention, & Charlie whom he was the last to look upon! Probably he may never see this name sake! for he is thousands of versts away, engaged in some mines on the borders of China in this vast Empire.<sup>205</sup> tho if he ever can visit us I am sure he will love the little Johnnie who is such a delight to us all. That Sunday of the christening being the 3rd after his birth I sat at the head of the dinner table – but I ought not to omit to mention all our domestics<sup>206</sup> were witnesses, & each drank his health & tasted the rich cake offered to our guests. Yohon our faithful German footman who is a Lutheran. Christina & Doonia our laundress & house maid who are Russians & therefore of the Greek church & Marie our cook a Fin, each seemed equally interested, tho our own good Mary shed tears of emotion, for she as having been Charlies nurse & now Johnnies feels most with us. May He who was in the midst of us, Accept this little one & regenerate him by the purifying influences of His holy Spirit & may we his parents fulfil our vows to work with God & strive to keep this lamb of Christs flock from straying away from the fold! Gladly do I renounce the vanities of the world! Oh may God help me to obtain a conquest over my own sinful passions that my example may not be a stumbling block to any of those entrusted to my care. May I never forget they are not my own, but Christs, & to be required at my hands! Awful responsibility. The next day was one of some bustle & I avoided it by keeping to my room, for I must store up all my energies for the demand in prospect. It had suddenly been decided that we must part from our dear Debo whose health needed a change & Mary was aiding her in packing for a long absence from home, we must none of us selfishly murmur, for God had marked out our course of duty. As last June every effort she made to set out for England was frustrated, so at this time every obstacle was removed & on tuesday she embarked with her kind Aunt Alicia & her brother George on board the Rob Roy for Hull,<sup>207</sup> the agent of which had so considerately restored her passage money when he heard that our plan of sending her in June was frustrated by Georges visit to Russia I bore up against my grief at parting with three at once, not only for their example but for my dear husbands sake, & would it not have been sinful to have had rebellious wishes, when an Invisible & Heavenly Parents hand had the helm. “for without Him not a sparrow falleth”<sup>208</sup> Whistler took our boys to Cronstadt to see their Sister, Aunt & brother on board the English Steamer. So many arrangements were requisite to be completed that day in preparation of the new Tutors coming the next, that Mary with Doonia & Yohon were all busy, I only gave orders as I sat beside & attended to my baby. We required no dinner except in the kitchen! But tho I was well pleased to have had our appartments restored to perfect order & many comforts concentrated in the two rooms<sup>209</sup> to us for sleeping, I realized how desolate the circle when at nine in the evening my dear husband & boys returned & we four sat down to tea, where the table was wont to be crowded. That night Whistler & I were still seated in earnest conversation about our darling daughter until after midnight, he had spent some sleepless ones in the prospect of this necessity for a separation from her & it became my comfort to soothe & cheer him by sympathy & by leading him to cast his care upon Him who could make all which seemed adverse work together for good to her. Mons Lamartine<sup>210</sup> was installed on the 18th of Sept<sup>211</sup> as Tutor to James & Willie. I rather dreaded heading my own table the first day while my husband was at Alexandrofski, as I could not converse with a German & he had I knew lived two years in the family of Gen<sup>l</sup> Chiffkin, whose lady<sup>212</sup> of course could freely do the honors, as Russ Italian & French she is equally versed in, however as there was no resource I collected all my mental powers & went out to welcome him as one of our family circle, he came forward with the utmost politeness & respect, kissed my hand, & the freedom with which my boys chatted with their tutor soon made me quite comfortable. I could comprehend – & this was enough for it is difficult to determine which is the greatest talker Jemmie or Mons Lamartine, he is about fifty years of age - yet perhaps his sallow & very thin visage makes him look so, for his black hair is not the least turned. He takes all his meals at our table, only his lodging is at the house where old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon has hers, she recommended him to us, & so grateful is he that once when she was out he took the chance of testifying his gratitude by spreading a handsome quilt upon her bed which he had purchased purposely. One excellent trait in his character is his affection for his Mother who is supported from his salary, he looks sad when he speaks of the improbability of his ever visiting home again! he seems truly pious, attends his - the Lutheran - church regularly every Sunday morning & would always join our family prayers as he has done once or twice but like most people on this continent is not fond of early rising! he only manages to catch his breakfast with us. At 12 precisely Yohon takes him a cup of Soup & each of the boys a boiled egg to the Cabinet d'étude at 1 1/2 they go out to walk, great has been the demand for patience & perseverance with the tutor until they are broke of their wild pranks in the school & on the street, he must indeed discover a vast difference between them & Russian lads who are drilled from infancy to politeness & submission

Oct 24th I have been sending off my second letter to dear Debo for this is her birth day,<sup>213</sup> we have also been favored twice with epistles from her,<sup>214</sup> she had been on a visit to Flish<sup>215</sup> with her Aunt & Uncle Winstanley & altho this season there is too much rain in England to render travelling delightful as it otherwise would be, she found the sunshine of hospitality & kindness under M<sup>r</sup> Ainsworths<sup>216</sup> roof & the day of the journey back the weather was propitious, they made the circuit of the Lakes<sup>217</sup> & Debo was charmed with the scenery – her health benefitted also by the fortnight among the mountains. She is looking forward to our dear friend Kate Prince meeting her in Preston! May He who is the hearing of prayer answer mine for the happiness of my dear daughter! cheer her during her trying separation from us & turn all that seems adverse to her wishes into cause for gratitude hereafter, May He unite our hearts perpetually in love to Jesus & grant that we may always remember in passing thro temporal scenes, the end of being that we may enjoy them only as pilgrims upon earth, referring all things to Eternity. May my dear daughter only seek friends among those who are the friends of Jesus! In England she has the advantage of hearing from our native land speedily & keeping up a regular correspondence with dear George & Julia. She will open the mysterious packet I put sealed in her trunk containing her birth day souvenir & tho trifling in comparison to last 24th of October, it will tell her mother thinks of her.

Saturday November 29th <sup>218</sup> Baby is exactly three months old today, his mother records with thankfulness that he has always been well, but little Johnnie does not give her hours for her pen or book, hence the wide gap again in this which must be brought up at the close of this month. How many events for gratitude to God crowd for notice. Our dear Georges letter announcing his landing in New York reached us exactly three weeks after its date! the most prompt communication yet, between the U S & Russia. During the Steamer G<sup>t</sup> Britian's<sup>219</sup> voyage thither George was exposed to great peril, once this immense ship was surrounded by breakers among Nantucket shoals, the experience he has had even since he left us ought to excite trust in an Almighty, invisible hand which led them out of their perilous situation to the haven where they would be - for Debo had acknowledged how fearfully near, death seemed on the boisterous voyage they made to England. Oh how she would have trembled again could she have been aware how the sea raged around her dear brother! but she was spared even hearing of the uneasiness felt for the safety of the G<sup>t</sup> Britian - as this was only her 2nd trip to N York & she was 19 days accomplishing it - We have heard lately from our dear daughter how glad she was made by a letter from George - she had just returned to Preston after having spent a fortnight at Waterloo,<sup>220</sup> where she had gained so much strength from sea air that she had explored its environs on foot or Donkey without suffering fatigue. Kate Prince was still in Paris! and Aunt Alicia had remained in Liverpool. Debo missed her as a part of home, notwithstanding the fondness lavished on her by Aunt Eliza & that she is a favorite of Uncle W. They mention the death of our old friend M<sup>rs</sup> Stevenson<sup>221</sup> in London. for many years she had been tried with illness & afflictions. Oh that thro much suffering she may have entered glory! she was one who lived but to serve those around her! May it be said unto her at the day of Judgement "inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these - ye did it unto Me"<sup>222</sup> but I have heard nothing of her death except that it was sudden at last. Oh may it find me prepared to meet my Judge! I have received a most happy report of the illness & death of my friend & countrywoman M<sup>rs</sup> Nichols from her husband the Rev<sup>d</sup> John Nichols<sup>223</sup> of Lebanon Connecticut - her love for the holy scriptures had been so sincere she had long carried a pocket volume even on her drives of a few miles that she might read a few chapters by the way- no doubt this truly united husband & wife held sweet counsel upon the word of God - for he says his wifes hopes were all founded upon the promises of scripture & that she found them all true. she was inspired to write devotional lines for his comfort on her bed of suffering & the only wish she had unsatisfied at the last hour was that he might go with her! But it is his Saviours will that he shall yet work in His vineyard & tho M<sup>r</sup> N says he shall never come out of the shade God has cast over him I am sure many that the world envy may on their death bed wish they had been as this lonely man!

Saturday night Dec 27th <sup>224</sup> It is almost useless in me carrying on a record of the events of this year, when once a month, a half hour only can be thus devoted. But I have still the bountiful goodness of my Heavenly Father to inspire me with a desire to note down, & the hope that as the days lengthen & darling baby is less dependent upon me I may collect what may be pleasing to send my honoured mother. Debo's letters once a fortnight<sup>225</sup> continue regularly to cheer us, we look forward to the every other Monday as eagerly as children do to holidays. her last closed with the words "in one hour Kate Prince will be here" & her next we suppose will tell us of the treat she felt the society of that dear friend from Lowell to be, but now we imagine her to have changed the scene again as she was to spend the Christmas at Chaddock Hall<sup>226</sup> where, when I was Anna Mac I passed these holidays so delightfully that I almost fancy myself there now beside my dear Sister & kind brother Winny who have my Debo under their wing as they then had me. We have missed her much at home, the fond little brothers were right when they said it would not appear like Christmas without Sister & Aunt Alicia & Mademoiselle!" Their kind tutor has most amiably devoted the four days holidays to their benefit however. On Wednesday the birth day of the young Harrisons<sup>227</sup> was celebrated & while James & Willie were there in a party of 30 children, Mons Lamartine laden with bon bons aided Yohon in decorating a tree according to the German custom, wax tapers of every color fixed on every twig of the ever green, (which was brought from "Dom Drury" Peterhoff road<sup>228</sup> by one of the good old gentlemen peasants for Willie who was right glad to reward him with "Na Chi"<sup>229</sup> — grapes hung down from every bough, sugar roses, strawberries, raspberries & currants to be plucked & offered to the young guests, if Willie had not be disappointed that Sarsha<sup>230</sup> could not come & that the Zargoshkins<sup>231</sup> were not allowed to stay to dinner, his satisfaction would have been complete. But I must not forget the pleasant drive the boys took with me (as soon as baby's nap released me, in our New sledge, we stopped first at old M<sup>rs</sup> Leons to remind her we should dine early as she had promised to come to help me entertain the juvenile party - and to deposit a gift with her & cakes in the tutors apartments, being next hers, then we drove to M<sup>r</sup> Woods to ask for Kitty & Willy<sup>232</sup> to dine the next day as James fête. — A gift descended upon that family in the form of another daughter,<sup>233</sup> Kate was all full of joy to announce it the day after saying "now we are several girls & boys, but I hope we shall be ten or a dozen that we may play all sorts of games in a family circle by & bye" the little lady was dressed in a rose colored muslin & her cheeks became the same hue, my husband was quite charmed with her naiveté

& said aside to me the Woods were the life of the 16 who assembled around our dinner table, – but I must not skip over Christmas day, & first, let me never forget my experience of Gods mercy in permitting us to assemble at prayers in health! As I seated myself at breakfast table what was my surprise to find under my cup a beautiful gift from my faithful nurse Mary, a carved ivory seal for my desk with the initials of my name in silver & a type of her own fidelity in the chaste cart dog at the top. I was moved almost to tears by her humility in placing it for my acceptance & the boys were not slow to report to her after breakfast that “father said he never could find any thing so pretty” when they went to give her a large bun & to distribute one to Yohon, Hadenskougg, Dunia, Coharka, Christine & Coacher.<sup>234</sup> Willie could not in two turns bring the load from the German bakers,<sup>235</sup> without aid, & his labour of love created much mirth in the bufet. After babys bath I was soon ready to take the boys a drive in our beautiful new Sledge, we called at Mr Woods to invite his children to dinner the next day. tho our first stop had been at Madame Zagoshkins for her two little girls,<sup>236</sup> who attended by their nurse were at our house by the time my boys could get dressed to receive their guests, but these were not allowed to stay more than two hours. I am guilty of repetition I find from seizing odd moments after days intervening. For we have entered upon a New Year 1846. And never was there lovelier weather than Thursday the 1st of Jan. Our boys were to have spent it with their young countrymen the Eastwicks<sup>237</sup> upon the American Ice Hills at Alexandrofski but Jemmie had been imprudent in venturing upon the Skating ground before it was freed from snow without overshoes, also be it recorded to his disgrace he had run thro every pile of new fallen snow which had been scraped together by the sweepers on the English quai. he paid severely for his exploits by narrowly escaping Croup & he was asked if going thro the Allegahany Mountains<sup>238</sup> was preferable to the ice hills – As he poor fellow had to keep his bed the New Years day I stole Willie from the school room to go to the market with me having yet the Old Style Christmas<sup>239</sup> to prepare gifts for. how striking was the Winter scene as we went out upon the Quai. the sun shone so brightly upon the gilded spire of the Old Fortress Church on the opposite side of the frozen Neva, which is not yet soiled by the winters travel over it. We were altogether out two hours for after shopping two we came back to get dear father to help me choose new caps for the boys. very becoming they prove, of maroon cold velvet. he selected a Polka Hat<sup>240</sup> for himself, the boys thought it put him quite in a dancing mood when he went home! Another American mail without a line from George, if he could only conceive how disappointed we feel he would not omit writing regularly. A letter from Mary Mac<sup>241</sup> informs us he is in Baltimore & Mr Winans informs us it is in his fathers works our dear Son is interested.<sup>242</sup> he should not have deputed to others this intelligence, for we look to him now for our medium of communication, since Julias<sup>243</sup> letters are directed to Debo in England, & my dear Mother is in Florida for the Winter

Monday [January] 5th Russian Christmas Eve.<sup>244</sup> Willie looked so nice when Mary completed his simple toilette & sent him by Coacher to Mr Morgans<sup>245</sup> at 6 o'clock, with many charges not to disturb ringlets or plaited frill by his furs - and seemed so full of bright anticipations of all around the green tree, the little companions he was to frolicwith till 9 o'clock that I felt more than ever sorry dear Jemie's cold still keeps him prisoner, and he so good humouredly saw Willie depart! only we disagreed about the advice he gave to fill his pockets full of bon bons - After our tea, Mons Lamartine being away, Jem & I hied to the school which was in the nicest order for our setting the plates, my apron & pocket filled with the gifts selected during my several shopping excursions of last week with my little Willie as interpreter in German. French or Russ as the various magazines<sup>246</sup> needed. We had to reserve dear fathers portion for when I might arrange the several articles in my own room as he soon followed us to the school room. We had just filled the plates eight in number when Willie returned from the party, he being the first to tear himself away from the facinating circle at Mr Morgan. which had been considerably increased by the entrance of masked ladies my innocent Will could scarcely believe Miss Emily Law was not a real Russian Nurze, tho he knew Miss L was not a Monk or Miss Isabel a Cossack<sup>247</sup> - he came home laden with spoils for it is the custom in this land to take all the bon bons one cannot eat & those who are not au fait,<sup>248</sup> have them pressed upon their pockets. The last thing attended to by our boys was hanging up their stockings & Mary acted as a liberal Santa Clause, she would not again tease them as she did New Style by putting in a bit of string & an old end of a Sterine Candle. They were quite rich in the morning & yeilded to my proposal not to open the door of the school room until after dinner. Willie hid the gift he had for dear father by his plate before breakfast & after the blessing had been pronounced I pretended something called me to the Corridor & softly stole behind Whistler with the new Umbrella open & shaded his head, this caused the boys a merry moment & then father discovered Jemmies tobacco box, which coming from the Demidoff<sup>249</sup> is completely Russian. he declared we had all cheated him as he had supposed gifts were only provided for the servants & he had none for any of us. But the boys did not agree to that when James found his watch converted into gold by fathers forethought & Willie received a costly & instructive game called the Gallery of Versailles<sup>250</sup> Johnnie we all claim as our richest New Years gift & kisses is all we offer for his acceptance. Our Servants all were thankful to attend church as we did, Mary of course could not leave baby. Doct Laws text was "Jesus Christ the righteous" some parts of it did not satisfy me. he wore his scarlet robes & cap. altogether the effect was too high church for a simple republican.<sup>251</sup> Many more communed than usual, I remarked for the first time our friend Mr W Miller, yet very probably he has often received this sacrament without my being aware. I always now am irresistibly led to notice the Hon<sup>ble</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Bloomfield<sup>252</sup> at church, since her piety is her distinguishing grace. she is sweetly devout and I should judge her unaffected & humble minded. What a contrast to the gay, worldly, old Lady Stewart who occupied her place when we first came to St Petersburg I was pleased that only my dear husband & boys waited dinner for me, as the servants were the sooner freed from attendance, Yohon took the contents of his Christmas plate home to gladden his children, & Coacher asked to take his pie to share it with his brother, he promised to send the 3 ruble note to his wife who is a slave<sup>253</sup> in Moscow. The three women servants would kiss even Whistlers hand when the came up to the drawing room to receive their plate & dresses. As to baby the nearly devoured him with kisses. Mary had to run off with him to the nursery. she said she had never before such beautiful gifts. I felt so happy that I had succeeded in gratifying all I asked for no greater treat. Our tutor did not get his gifts till yesterday the 8th as he has been sick. Hadenskougg seemed equally delighted with his. & Even Pasha<sup>254</sup> had a mince pie. How easy it is to create good will among those who are not pampered & selfish. I had quite depended upon a Christmas offering from my dear Debos pen & was dissappointed when the envelope contained only a hurried note from her to her father & the others directed to friends here, she has spoiled me by the regular & fond epistle once every fortnight, for tho I was glad to get a note from our dear Kate Prince - who also sent one to each of our boys,<sup>255</sup> I craved more. I had forgotten to mention that of late I have had to pay several visits to our countryman Doct Maynard,<sup>256</sup> he has almost charmed away my dread of a dentists chair by his skill & gentleness, even in the fearful operation of extracting. I did not suppose I could voluntarily have submitted to losing three teeth, as I have done at a sitting lately. This countryman of our dined with us today en famille as did M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison & Annie unexpectedly. We had one of my mince pies, for the first time since leaving Springfield I ventured in the kitchen to try my skill as a pastry cook, but alas want of practise caused labour without satisfaction. I wished these might meet others who at our table<sup>257</sup> tomorrow. but they are always welcome even when I am not prepared to show off my best house keeping.

Friday evening [January] 9th <sup>258</sup> My husband had engaged to take M<sup>r</sup> Curtis<sup>259</sup> & his daughter<sup>260</sup> to the Alexandrofski works but the snow was yet falling in heavy flakes as it has done this winter & they decided to wait for more favorable weather. We invited our good neighbours the Ropes to meet them at our five oclock dinner but M<sup>rs</sup> R had not a moment to spare from poor Hannahs<sup>261</sup> sick room & also her three little girls are quite ill with cold, how various are the scenes of this uncertain life. Whistler & I took our little Willy to church yesterday to attend the funeral service of our old landlord M<sup>r</sup> Drury,<sup>262</sup> he was so deeply interested he wished (as we drove back thro the Galernia, many times we might to go to the grave, he had noticed the grief of even the poor slaves who were present when their old masters coffin was moved down the aisle & said how solemn it looked to see the little grand children weeping & all the family in deep mourning. I shared my little Willies feelings & it was rather an effort for me on returning home to bustle about getting fruit &c ready for our expected dinner party. Col Todd was the first to make his appearance so we had some private chat in the drawing room upon the Presidents Message<sup>263</sup> & the Cols own contemplated return to our native land,<sup>264</sup> before Mr Clay came, with an apology from his lady<sup>265</sup> whom he left in bed. Mr Joseph Ropes was quite an acquisition, for Mr & Mrs<sup>MS</sup> Curtis<sup>266</sup> were the only two besides. the dinner was a nice one & all passed off well to my relief. We had Codfish which is brought from Archangel<sup>267</sup> frozen & we had also American cider the gift of my kind friend Mrs Gellibrand. but it was not from Newark<sup>268</sup> I fancy. A bright moonlight night & the report of a thaw, which with such an unusual quantity of snow was not desirable. We sent the Curtis to Misses Bensons lodgings in our sledge at eleven, the others had taken leave before tea. the col having two other engagements for the evening. It is always a weight off my mind when a dinner party is over whether as an entertainer or a guest, I prefer unceremonious hospitality.

March 9th 1846.<sup>269</sup> Monday night. I should give up journalizing as it is so seldom I have an hour not demanded by some higher duty. but hope always urges me on, there may come a time when I can make weekly records at least, & if we ever return to our native land my boys may like to refer to this period of their sojourn in St Petersburg. The weather this winter has not been as it was last year. Thro Dec we had much rain & the river was unusually late in closing. January was frost unyeilding till at last we became accustomed to 20 deg of cold & upwards. truly I realized the old adage in February “as the days lengthen the cold strengthens”<sup>270</sup> and we each have suffered in turn. I have taken cold after cold, my husband also from exposure in his drives to Alexandrofsky has had repeated attacks, and once our precious baby was so ill I wept over him trembling to see him suffer, but God blessed the means used & since then he has been gaining upon our little countryman “Sweet William”<sup>271</sup> next door & does not yeild the palm for sprightliness to any of the babies of his age. The frosty weather yeilded very mal a-propos no doubt the people thought, for the thaw began with the Carnival, nevertheless the crowd thronged all the places of amusement in the Square & when we drove home that way one day - week before last - from a shopping excursion in the Nevsky the Circus riders were trying to entice the multitude to pay & enter. Jemie felt quite tempted by the 1/2 doz riders who had come out to shew their horsemanship, & wondered I could resist the invitation but I always reply to my boys that the Spectacle for us is outside, where the holiday scene tho painful to reflective minds, certainly is peculiar to Russia, the ice hills in the centre with their sledges in active business. the gaily painted pavilions some offering swings, others boats on wheels. others cars on a circular rail way. then the theatres with all their tawdry signs, at a signal all are set in motion together & the poor people fancy themselves happy while they chaunt their own peculiar measures, tho the Police are surrounding them on their huge black horses to make them remember they must keep their mirth within bounds in this Imperial city. This holiday when none will work who can avoid, commences on the Lords day & is kept up thro another Sabbath immediately preceding Lent. Indeed the whole community are rife for amusement before the fast. The theatres, concerts & Operas offering three times instead of once in the day. Our boys found it so tantalizing when the Eastwicks came from Alexandrofsky to our house purposely to take them to the Cachels<sup>272</sup> that I almost feared their father would yeild, but the most unselfish feelings induced him to say nay. they had always been happy without these experiments & he would not risk their following the multitude in their chase after folly. It was kindly meant by the Eastwicks & I rejoiced on reflection that my dear boys seemed convinced by their fathers arguments, they should have had a course upon the Neva in the Laplanders sledges<sup>273</sup> drawn by Reindeer Whistler went to seek this seasonable pastime for them, but for that day the races were over, so he sent Yohon to secure for them seats at the Theatre des Enfants<sup>274</sup> for the morrow. Mary went with them. it was noon & I gladly took her post in the nursery. when my dear boys came back by 3-oclock & Willie acted all the little poupéts parts, sung, danced, disappeared to come again before me with fresh novelties, I felt that few could enjoy more innocent amusement than we. he so artlessly said to me when describing the scenery stage &c “Oh Mother it all looked so grand I was afraid real people would come out to act & then I knew we ought not to stay as you do not approve of any but poupéts acting” – I wished within my heart he might ever make this distinction & never have the sin recorded against him of encouraging immortal beings in thus frittering away their days in rehearsals & their nights in exhibitions! Jemie was in extacies when he told me of the beautiful dissolving views which had closed the exhibition

& they had each said to Mary as they drove thro the Square, how glad they were that father had not let them break the rules to go in that rowdy crowd. Even poor Dounia our Russian maid tho the boys had each presented her a half silv ruble to amuse her Sat afternoon at the Cachels had not gone, she spent her money in coffee & sugar & congratulated herself that she had not yeilded to the temptation to throw it away upon Swinging &c. Our coachman got drunk without leave or licence, but he was the only one of our household who heeded the general holiday. My dear husband who has often dieted during the winter to get rid of illness was obliged to consult doct R & it happed luckily as some would say, but providentially his setting out for an inspection of his rail=road had been delayed for he would have been as badly off as Mungo Park.<sup>275</sup> I had little sleep while he was ill for baby too was yet in a precarious state & probably anxiety for them both, aided by the closeness of our heated house affected my heat,<sup>276</sup> then the preparations for Whistlers departure exposed me to draughts for last Sunday week<sup>277</sup> which was the day succeeding, I was scarcely able to open my eyes from congestion of the brain. I immediately directed my attentive Mary to apply synapisms<sup>278</sup> to my ankles, back of my neck & throat. and took a dose of oil, by noon however I sent for the doct who approved of my course & only advised a mustard foot bath, but darling Johnies teeth caused me a sleepless night & I realized the next morning how ill I still continued. however during the week which has elapsed I have gradually recovered. letters from dear George in Balt came to divert attention from self – & others to enclose his father to meet him at Tver.<sup>279</sup> also one from Debo<sup>280</sup> to interest me. she writes of the signs of spring coming violets & crocuses opening & of her walking miles without fatigue. how great her advantages to be where her feet can press the soil! but she only is eager to fulfil her term of absence from home & be restored to us again. I cast the future upon the Lord who so gently leads her & warms hearts to love her wherever she is. thanks be to Him that her health is restored, I will not even dread bringing her back to the unwholesome atmosphere of this city founded on a bog-for He has ordered our sojourn in it. The thaw has now lasted nearly a fortnight, it would be imprudent for me to walk, I even rode the trifling distance to church last Sunday, it was Sacrament & I took dear old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon home in our sledge tho her lodging is such a step from the church, but she must have waded ankle deep in mud to get thro their gateway. My boys too remained for me thro Communion & thus gave their mite to the poor at collection. Ah how sad it is to observe how many turn their backs upon the Lords table & satisfy their conscience by the form of attending once or twice a year! but M<sup>ES</sup> Bloomfield is never absent either from public service or communion, she looks so devout & acts with such sweet humility my heart warms towards her with sisterly affection. & yet in this world we must always be as strangers to each other. How much it says too for the household of the queen of England that one who was among her maids of honor should so consistently walk in the narrow path honoring God in the midst of a people who are so indifferent about keeping the 4th Commandment. My Mary always remarks upon Sir John<sup>281</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Bloomfields attendance in the afternoon when so very few go to hear the word! Doct Law does not spare the luke warm, he reproves & exhorts them to turn from the error of their ways. I was much delighted to learn by a note from M<sup>rs</sup> Law last Saturday that the two poor Englishmen who have been supported at her Hospitium<sup>282</sup> have at last collected the needful sum for their return to their families in England. poor fellows they no doubt are trudging willingly over winter roads their weary long way! while I am daily lamenting that my husband has to ride over such between this & Moscow.

Tuesday 10th March.<sup>283</sup> Jemie still marks down how many deg heat in place of cold in the mem he keeps of the weather for his Father. Appearances certainly portend an early breaking up of icy bands, & how delighted I shall be when safe to send baby out into the open air even in a carriage! he enjoys Marys bringing him even into the drawing room submits to being wrapped up to pass the back stairs the only part of our lodgings not heated, for he likes change of scene & for these first six months of his existence has not had much variety. he certainly is very frolicsome for his age! This morn I was quite surprised at receiving another letter from Wellesly House.<sup>284</sup> I immediately replied to my dear daughters affectionate epistle to assure her of our all being quite well again. she reports herself quite a Hebe<sup>285</sup> & the kind Maingays are so urgent for us to spare her longer to them to profit by the air of Shooters Hill that I only wait her fathers acquiescence to accept M<sup>r</sup> M- invitation. Jemie voluntarily gave up going over to the Academy to draw this afternoon that he might do something to surprise dear father, in anticipation of his coming home. No one ventured in the sledge therefore, my little effort at shopping in the Nevsky yesterday made me look most disreputable with mud plaisters on face & shube so I shall probably work up the materials purchased for my dear Mothers caps & write letters to go with them by M<sup>r</sup> J Ropes to America the rest of the week unless frost comes to purify the atmosphere. Our poor Dounia is ill today, no doubt the effect of the unwholesome diet, she observes the fast strictly. Oh how I wish I could read to her the 48 chap of Isaiah!<sup>286</sup> can it be possible the fathers of the Greek church read the bible & yet make the poor people believe they commend themselves to our Saviour by abstaining from milk, butter, eggs & meat, to substitute oil, mushrooms & cold fish. He who is a spirit & requires to be worshipped in spirit & in truth! Oh when will the true light shine upon the East, - whence it first dawned - Oh that the few scattered over the Earth who have it, would let it shine before men, to glorify their father in Heaven! I am continually admonishing James & Willie of their responsibility. they have been taught from the scriptures always. May God the Holy Spirit make them wise unto Salvation.<sup>287</sup>

Friday night 1/13 March.<sup>288</sup> We have had fine bright sunshine today. I sent the boys with Mary in the Sledge before their school commenced this morning as Mon L-s<sup>289</sup> passport obliged him to be late in coming. they were so sure the Ice Hills would be "first rate" I sent them to reconnoitre, the Mujic<sup>290</sup> promised impossibilities if they would give him Na Chi, & they came home in full faith of returning in the afternoon to find the hills like glass & to go down to their hearts content, but a drive I took at noon with dear old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon admonished me against consenting to any risk of their getting wet. the thaw was in full force many men at work in the Nevsky could not keep the sledging even, & we must submit to being spattered with mud until the ice is quite gone.

Saturday 14th March<sup>291</sup> a fortnight this afternoon since Whistler, Winans & Capt Klokoff left us for the inspection of the railroad. I was surprised as delightful<sup>292</sup> last evening to have my scribbling put a stop to by my husbands unexpected return home, he found the travelling better than I had anticipated for him, had not felt well, but had gone all the road to Moscow, where he attended divine Service last Sunday, he came back upon the grand chemin<sup>293</sup> which from the expectation that the Emperor would soon travel to Moscow<sup>294</sup> was in fine order, many hundred peasants constantly labouring to keep it smooth. And here I will note what Whistler has seen in Summer, women & children weeding this turnpike lest his Imperial Majesty, or the Count K's eyes should be offended by a weed or any grass peeping out of the gravel My dear husband had not forgotten us in his fortnights absence, for each of the boys he brought a gun which Yohon is to teach them how to use, they had merited rewards for good conduct & I was delighted to see them so. Mary's gift a screw cushion<sup>295</sup> was just what she had wished for & the pretty hand bell the only thing I was not already supplied with. What a holiday it causes throughout the house when father comes home! of course much bustle too. I have been very busy in unpacking. Whistler had taken a canister of cakes to make presents at some of the officers house where he is always hospitably entertained, but the ingredient of butter condemned them & he brought them back. I sent one large loaf to the kitchen for the Fin Cook & laundress do not substitute or fast as they call the Lent regimen. I gave the other to Yohon to take home tomorrow to his wife & children, for Lutherans also are quite exempt from the six weeks abstinence, tho of course as in our church this is a holy season in theirs. How impressive would be the fact that all denominations of worshippers observe this portion of the year religiously if all were sincerely penitent in the sight of God! Jews & Christians!

[Wednesday] April 15th <sup>296</sup> How astonishing that I who have nothing to do with dissipation, should command so few convenient seasons for recording passing events in the quiet routine of my life in Russia, for I am blessed in good servants & my good Mary even relieves me of bathing baby now besides sewing for him entirely when he takes his naps. but the system of housekeeping is not upon the principle of saving time, which is the least of all things valued in the East. And this month past I have been much occupied in a sick room. My dear husband was seized by such an alarming attack a few days after his return from the road that altho all doct Rogers skill was exercised, we found nothing to remove the excruciating pain for many days warm applications yeilded relief, & my unceasing activity was demanded by night & by day to repeat the poultices often enough. how thankful I felt that he had not been taken so very ill away from his nurse & physician, and how grateful when at last he could take nourishment & sleep! While the rumours of sickness & death were on all sides, we were spared. Oh that we might improve our prolonged existence here to the glory of God & the benefit of that part of our being which cannot die! baby was dangerously ill after his fathers convalescence & doct R was only surprised that I did not complain of fatigue from watching one sick couch then another, when I could be dispensed with my symptoms shewed a deranged system & I have feared I should suffer the debility many complain of here after the long confinement to heated rooms. My dear husband was sufficiently recovered to go for us both to the dinner party our friends the Gellibrands gave to the Americans.<sup>297</sup> but I was still too unwell last Wednesday, to accompany him to another, next door<sup>298</sup> where he met them, W<sup>m</sup> Maingay, the Meirrilees & several other English friends. How far it was from the thoughts of any them assembled around Mr Ropes hospitable board that the youngest & most blooming among them would this day be deposited in the tomb, yet difficult as it is to realize, we have listened this morning to the funeral address which Mr Ellerby made at the American Chapel over the coffin of this young christian, and my prayer is that the impression may be deep & lasting. It is just a week today since Emily Hall<sup>299</sup> in the bloom of health apparently sat for Mr Wright<sup>300</sup> to take her portrait, the family never put off what may be done in good time & her return to England so soon as the navigation might be free being urged by her parents & sister<sup>301</sup> at Leeds, her fond Sister here wished to secure a likeness of her favorite Emily at least. tho they were all hoping now the Neva's ice was disappearing they might remove to Pavloski early enough for her to participate in Summer scenes in Russia as she had so much enjoyed the peculiarities of its Winter pleasures. The Ice Hills she was quite a heroine there! and sledging she had compared to flying so exhilarating she found these exercises is the pure cold clear atmosphere. she likewise enjoyed exceedingly going to the Ménage<sup>302</sup> attended by her brother-in-law, who always must ride on horse back for health – last friday<sup>303</sup> they were in the quadrille of Equestrians! she the admired of the set for the ease with which she managed her steed, & he so proud of his Sister Emily! After dinner he proposed walking with her to the Gostinandvor to shew her the curious spectacle of the toy booths

& the immense crowd collected to sell & buy trifles, for the Palm-market was a novelty to her, she expressed herself pleased as was her wont where she saw their desire to delight her, but in the evening confessed she was not well upon their noticing her pale cheek & unusually quiet air, took some remedies for a cold & went early to bed. last Saturday<sup>304</sup> - the next morning - Emily was up in good time for family prayers & to make breakfast for Mr Ropes, for the baby<sup>305</sup> & little Ellen being ill, their mother was not allowed to make any exertion. When I stepped in just before our dinner time to ask after the little ones, I was struck with their kind Aunt Emilys paleness & felt it unusual with her not to take part in the friendly chat with her sister & myself, especially as we touched upon the subject of her return to England, for Mrs R was fearing in six weeks she should not be able to finish the beautiful peice of embroidery, she had all winter been trying to complete for her Mother, but during the past nine months she remarked "we have never all been well! I always have some one to nurse!" Little Ellen then wished her Mama to stop working, take her on her knee & read a story to her, upon which Aunt Emily put by her own embroidery & soon Ellen was happy with her fond arms around her neck, who then began telling of having taken little Louisa to the drawing room windows that morning to see the ice floating down (the river having been released from its Wintry fetters in the night<sup>306</sup> - and she so fondly repeated all the untutored remarks of the little two year old neice, that love & kindness was every tone, still I was pained by her strange look, & when I heard towards evening that Dr Handysides had prescribed for Miss Emily who had gone to bed I was not surprised, colds are still so prevalent & I had found the Palm market a chilly place, I doubted not she was getting the Influenza. On Sunday morning when I sent in a supply of milk from our over abundant dairy<sup>307</sup> I sent a message also enquiring how all were, & heard that Miss Emily was much better, therefore I made up my mind Mr & Mrs Ropes would go to chapel & so little serious did I consider her symptoms I should not have wondered had she gone also, for she never let trifling obstacles impede her attendance at the house of God. I had always been convinced of Emilys devotion to her Saviour, she had only a few days before been saying (happy as she felt visiting her dear Sister - she must go back to her charity & Sunday schools at home) and I have observed her in all weathers tripping away to Chapel & when she could she has rode for the 3rd service to Alexandrofski. Knowing how sacredly the sabbath is observed by our neighbours I did not intrude, but thought Monday would be time enough! And yet I had not been without many experiences of “not knowing what a day might bring to pass”<sup>308</sup> After our early tea I was reading aloud from Legh Richmonds family portraiture<sup>309</sup> to my boys & their dear father in the drawing room, the front door is so near, we hear the voice of all who enter. A succession of quick pulls at the bell & Elizabeth Ropes<sup>310</sup> agitated tones made me spring to her side. “Oh come M<sup>rs</sup> W for Gods sake! the doct says Emily is dying! the short passage between our lodgings was passed in a moment & I was not many seconds in reaching the chamber of death, for so it proved, the idolized girl of 19 years was gently breathing her last, with her loving face turned towards that fond Sister to whom she was never again to speak in this world! M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes was kneeling on the bed beside her, gazing intensely upon that countenance which was so calm, she could not believe the cold hand she pressed was in the gripe of the king of terrors, but if the loved one were conscious the sting of death was not felt by her, she might have been strengthened by Angels who were invisible to mortal eyes! for she slept in death, as an infant lulled to sleep in a mothers arms. The struggle had been no doubt some hours before when poor Emily was so restless they could keep on neither blisters or sinapisms, she had then raised herself many times hopeless of ease & fallen back again on her pillow exhausted. but from the time I stood by her death bed all was calm, & dear M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes could not believe her darling Emily had ceased to breathe until she called for a candle & saw her eyes glazed! sightless, tho open! then nature could sustain her fortitude no longer, she was carried in a swoon to the next room by her afflicted husband, who felt as keenly as herself losing their favorite Emily. who have recovered from that protracted & severe illness of last Autumn, they were not prepared to give up in 30 hours from this sudden attack. “Be still and know that I am God”<sup>311</sup> was not slow to reach their wounded hearts, & tho so deeply bereaved, tho bowed to the earth in passing under this rod, they were not long in uttering “Gods will be done” Poor Hannah who had so tenderly been nursed by Miss Emily in her feeble health all winter, was so shocked by the suddenness of her death, she needed all our care & support. Elizabeth Ropes & I got her to bed only in time to keep her from falling in a fit on the floor, her whole frame shook till we feared dissolution & her extremities we cold as Emilys! When at last she could find power to speak she said “Oh Why did not God take me! I am so miserable, so useless, such a care to every body, & she was such a blessing to all! but then she added meekly “He knew who was best prepared for His summons! Oh that I may be as ready to go as Miss Emily was” — But I must not prolong my account of last Sunday night, tho it was after twelve ere I could leave that house of mourning. Aided by my good Laundress & my excellent Mary we dressed for the last time that cherished body that no rude hands should touch it, and a sofa having been placed near the balcony in the drawing room, the double sash removed & the fire put out, doct H. Mr Merrilees & her Uncle Gellibrand bore the cold form of Emily which was extended on a board that it might be gently removed to its lonely couch. There both M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand gazed upon the loved form tho the sister could not yet weep. but on the successive days her bursting heart was relieved by floods of tears, as she could not deny herself stealing to Emilys side, until tuesday<sup>312</sup> afternoon, when after the doctors had examined into the cause of so sudden a death & decided it was inflammation of the bowels.<sup>313</sup> the body was put in its coffin (covered with pure white velvet - with plated handles & silver plate with name,& that evening carried to the Chapel. Dear M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & even poor Hannah were there at the service today. Old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon went with us, but neither of these were at the grave<sup>314</sup> itself as the distance & weather rendered it imprudent. Never shall I forget what I felt as I stood looking down into that white sepulchre & saw the earth sprinkled on that snow white coffin of the young Emily! but as her dear little neices have been taught to distinguish, so must we all bear in mind it is only the body of senseless clay in that beautiful coffin. the spirit has returned to God who lent it to cheer parents & Sisters & friends, and He will speak comfort to all who turn to Him. Tho clouds & darkness surround His throne,<sup>315</sup> we know that the beams of mercy & love emanate from it. And that in all our sorrows, Jesus sympathises. What a lesson to the young to Remember their latter end<sup>316</sup> ere the days come in which they may not find repentance tho they would flatter themselves the sick bed is most suitable for making our peace with

God. But when the body is racked with pain, the intellect becomes clouded, Emily did not need to make a death bed testimony that she was one of the Saviours fold, for His service had engaged all her talents, but alas if she had given the world her heart, how could she have commanded her affections to Him who is the Lord of all. her brain was so much affected immediately that she could not converse & it was only by one remark in reply to her Sisters wish that Emily were well, & she in her place that she gave any expression which would lead one to suppose she was aware of any danger “Oh Ellen dear she said, dont wish yourself in my place! think how much more valuable is your life than mine!” I have seen M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes since the funeral, she is calm & has comfort in speaking of Emily, whose spirit she is assured is rejoicing in the presence of her Saviour, she trusts to His might to sustain her parents when the blow shall reach them. M<sup>r</sup> Ropes has written their pastor M<sup>r</sup> Hamilton<sup>317</sup> at Leeds who imparted so much religious instruction to Emily, he will comfort them by sympathy & sustain them by the promises of Gods word. I cannot cease writing of Emily Hall whom I never saw till eight months ago, without touching upon her sweet influence over her little neices next door. their parents have always been intent upon training them in the way Jesus teaches us to bring up our children even in the nurture & admonition of the Lord. the obedience & dutiful attention to their parents wishes is a sufficient reward for their perseverance. And their Aunt Emily these few months past has added greatly to their heavenly wisdom by seizing every favorable hour for cultivating their love of music, with spiritual songs & strengthening their memories with appropriate verses from the bible to their childlike confidence in a heavenly Fathers goodness & love. They have spent every day since her death at our house. Ellen who is just five years old has such a subdued tone & looks so sad, when she says “it is so very strange! the Aunt Emily who is upon the sofa in the drawing room, is not at all like the Aunt Emily who was always with us in our rooms! and then as if prompted by some invisible monitor she adds “Oh but it is not Aunt Emily! it is only her body that is upon the sofa, her soul has gone to God & she is happier in heaven, than we are on Earth”. Little darling Mary Emily sings “Around the throne of God in heaven thousands of children are”<sup>318</sup> and when I ask her who taught her that, she says in a solemn tone “Aunt

Emily but she cannot speak to me any more!” then she brightens up & adds but Aunt Emily is happier than we are! she is with Jesus & she tunes her harp & sings with the children there! Oh how pleasant that hymn sounds now that she taught me to sing!” Then she goes on in the same strain. “God wishes us all to go to heaven when we die! He says “Those that seek me Early shall find me”<sup>319</sup> and Jesus says “Suffer the little children to come unto me & forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven”<sup>320</sup> Oh would that all would use their opportunities as did this Young Christian! who was so unostentatiously a devoted servant to the Lord. “Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth will speak”<sup>321</sup> And how natural it is to speak of those we think most of! And how strange that the world should impose such restraint upon the theme of all others to inspire the heart eloquently to speak. “Whosoever honoreth Me before men, him will I honor before the Angels of heaven”<sup>322</sup> Oh if we realized more fully, that we are but pilgrims our stay here uncertain, we should not put off, repentance, & amendment of life.

Saturday. May 2nd <sup>323</sup> 1846 At this slow rate I shall not fill this book to send my dear Mother & what else could induce me to note my thoughts on passing events! except that my boys may when I am not by their side like to refer to mothers record of the past. They are in the school room now reading the Roman history in french, to Mons Lamartine, promising themselves a repetition of the pleasure of viewing the pictures at the Academy of Fine Arts at noon, which they have enjoyed almost every day this week. It is the triennial Exhibition,<sup>324</sup> we like them to become familiar with the subjects of the modern artists, & to James especially it is the greatest treat we could offer, it costs us only 10 cop silver for their crossing the Neva there & back. Entrance is free to all castes until next week. I went last Wednesday<sup>325</sup> with my dear husband for an hour, we encountered a hail storm returning & I have been confined with a cold ever since. The only April showers here are frozen, indeed the extreme cold of Winter is not so trying to the constitution as the chilling winds we have had this week. I was highly gratified however at the Academy, should like to take some of the Russian scenes so faithfully portrayed,<sup>326</sup> to shew in my native land, my James had described a boys portrait<sup>327</sup> said to be his likeness & altho the eyes were black & the curls darker than his, we found it so like him! his father said he should be glad to buy it, but its frame would only correspond with the furniture of a palace, being a rich vine, the boy is taken in a white shirt with crimped frill open at the throat, it is half length & no other garment could set off the glow on the brunette complexion so finely. But I gazed with a deeper interest upon a large painting of Bruno's<sup>328</sup> "the Serpent in the wilderness"<sup>329</sup> those countenances beaming with Faith I should never tire looking at, & Oh what a gloomy contrast do those make who will not look & be saved! Almost every afternoon lately dear M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes comes in to sit with me in my room whilst her husband is on Change, she says to sit alone now, where Emily was ever at her side quite unfits her for the exertions duty to her family require, she talks continually of her to me & says since Emilys sudden death, the world has lost its charm, whatever does not lead to Gods glory or advance the interests of immortal souls she now thinks ought not to be indulged in, herself & husband repeat to each other not to delay the performance of good, "tomorrow we may be in another world"

Saturday evening May 9th If my writing had not been interrupted last Saturday I should have recorded that the last Boston mail had brought us more letters than we have ever received at any one time from our dear native land, what a treat! my head & my heart were both full of news & emotion. I wished in vain for leisure to answer all by last tuesdays<sup>330</sup> mail, could only finish one to my dear Sister Kate & enclose within it a note to Eliza M<sup>C</sup> N.<sup>331</sup> how beautiful the account my precious mother wrote me from Florida under date of Feb.<sup>332</sup> of the approach of spring after an unusually cold winter in that latitude "Charlies house surrounded by daily rose bushes, now in full bloom, Olianders & cape Jessamines also, multiflora woodbine & yellow jessamines covering the piazzas" all these so odoriferous how enviable to have with reach, it was no wonder I had a sweet dream of my mother after she had filled my fancy thus, it was a brief deception but it made me happy to have been near her even in a dream. I judge by this time my dear Maria must be settled in her new home in 13th S!<sup>333</sup> Elizas description of the new house with its pipes & warm & cold Croton water<sup>334</sup> in every story, its bath room, gas lights & speaking trumpets makes me fancy it the perfection of convenience. May our heavenly father bless the dear inmates with health to enjoy house keeping again! Eliza kindly urges me to go & spend the summer in New York! to meet her aunt Eliza Cammann<sup>335</sup> who is visiting them from New Foundland, certainly it is a tantalizing invitation! but my temporary home is too far from theirs alas for me to avail. Debo will find it more difficult to resist returning with her cousin Mary Swift to New York for they meet in England upon Marys bridal trip as M<sup>rs</sup> Ironsides,<sup>336</sup> about this time, the Bliss<sup>337</sup> family also will be overjoyed to embrace their favorite Debo when they land at Liverpool,<sup>338</sup> they are to make the tour of Europe. I have commenced answering M<sup>rs</sup> Barnes kind letter<sup>339</sup> to be in time for next tuesdays Courier,<sup>340</sup> she has sent me a delightful report of the prosperity of Springfield, our dear little church now free from debt, our excellent pastor M<sup>r</sup> Lee more liked than ever & so attached to his flock as to decline calls of more extensive influence,<sup>341</sup> hundreds of houses have been built within the three years since we left, and one of the prettiest, a gothic parsonage which M<sup>r</sup> Lee his wife & two dear children are so happy in!<sup>342</sup> Our dear George also wrote us a most satisfactory account of his life in Baltimore,<sup>343</sup> he sent his father three news papers, the postage upon each being 4 rubles silv, mounted up so alarmingly that we shall have to prevent the repetition of such favors! Day before yesterday the weather changed, the snow which had continued up to then I hope may not return, baby has so enjoyed being taken to walk twice a day by his never wearying nurse Mary! she says he notices objects so much he all but speaks! looks in her face so smiling as he gazes at the novelties in the Boulevard,<sup>344</sup> or on the Neva as she strolls with him on the English Quai. I have felt new vigour from the walks I have had directly after breakfast with my dear husband, we cross the bridge & continue our promenade by the river on the Vasili Ostrow side up to the Custom house<sup>345</sup> & back. The birds & flowers it is supposed will soon be filling the court yard there, as the ships now just arrived at Cronstadt are transporting these favors for the public market by lighters<sup>346</sup> from that seaport to this Imperial city. Whistler during our walk pointed out where he thought the new stone = bridge<sup>347</sup> (now being erected below, ought to have been put up. to meet a fine open square near the Winter Palace, so conspicuous are the advantages of that central position it had been proposed, but the objection given was that as all the funeral processions would most probably pass over it, the burial places being on the Island opposite, it would be sad for the Imperial family to witness, yet they must be subject to sad processions passing from the Nevski thro the Isaacs plain.<sup>348</sup> We met two funerals at one time on the wooden bridge yesterday. I hope the coming dry season may arrest the illness which fills the hospitals yet to overflowing. No doubt we shall soon be complaining of dust! which is a great annoyance whenever winters pavement is removed. I observed a little green grass today in my drive with boys & fancied the naked trees looking ready to bud, we shall soon jump into Summer! Next Wednesday will be May-day old style & all the world must hie to Catrinoff<sup>349</sup> tho there will not be a green leaf to regale the eye; But I had intended as I alluded to sickness among the poor especially to record an act of mercy & justice too in the Emperor as it was repeated to me by my old friend Mr<sup>s</sup> L. his majesty was making his annual visits among the hospitals as is his custom to inspect all the public institutions, he observed many sick, miserable objects-seated on the steps whom he learned had been refused a shelter- why? the hospital was full & fifties were disappointed daily. the Emperor was struck with the injustice to the poor that suites of fine large airy apartments were yet retained by the heads of the department, he promptly issued orders for the necessary arrangement of bed for the sick in these which had been mere audience chambers for the rich or general visiters. My old friend also told me with great satisfaction the impositions which the new Governer of the city<sup>350</sup> is redressing. he goes about disguised as a poor person to purchase meat or other commodities & whenever he finds prices exhorbitant condemns the butcher, baker or shop keeper to a suspension of business & sometimes demands a heavy fine. But my husband step demands my welcome!

Friday 8 oclock in the evening May 22nd Our tea table waits Whistlers coming & as the sun is still quite bright I may write a bit ere my boys are ready to hear me read as usual on their retiring. I get very slowly on in the delightful book a Scottish mission to the Jews<sup>351</sup> which to me is so interesting from my having read McCheynes life<sup>352</sup> last Summer, but I prefer enjoying it with my dear boys & Mary in the nursery, tho the long day-light beguiles them into cheating me of the hour I used to devote at their bed side to sacred biography or scriptural readings. We have had very cold weather until these two past days, & for want of rain dust has been in plentiful circulation when the wind rose, my darling baby nevertheless has gathered a blooming complexion & good appetite from his airings. Mary daily takes him out ere the blustering of Boreas<sup>353</sup> can impede his enjoyment. While I gaze at him with delightful feelings, & my grateful heart is lifted to God in acknowledgement of His goodness to me undeserving as I am—. my sympathies are not withheld from a bereaved neighbour, whose little one just eight weeks older than my Johnie far exceeded him in intelligence, & who was quite as remarkable for health, the first ten months of her life none had lost an hours rest with care of her, & she had never lost a meal, her four first teeth had appeared without warning, but it was Gods will that teething should be cause of such a train of disease to remove her to a better world in less than a fortnight. Yesterday I saw the precious little body in its pure white coffin, flowers strewed around it, how unavailing its being so cherished by its fond Parents & Sister, it could be kept no longer & the lid was screwed down that they might bear it to the tomb. last Saturday at midnight the redeemed spirit had been borne to the bosom of its Saviour, & when on Monday I went with M<sup>ES</sup> Ropes to weep with dear M<sup>ES</sup> M.<sup>354</sup> we found her quite resigned, she had been attempting taking its miniature. She had been most afflicted at witnessing its sufferings, but with the Man after Gods own heart<sup>355</sup> felt after death it could not come back to her, the hope of going to where her little one is will always sooth her as she weeps her loss. In the death of an infant a mother feels “the joy of grief”<sup>356</sup> Last sunday morning the announcement of M<sup>RS</sup> M-s bereavement revived my feelings in my last trial, & my mind was deeply solemnized for attendance at Church. I was surprised to see a stranger in clerical dress follow our pastors family to their pew. Doct Law read the service & Doct Wiley<sup>357</sup> I (afterwards learned was his name) preached, a man past the prime of life with a slight scotch accent, but his very reverential manner & deep toned voice made every word impressive & his subject was fitted to raise our views to the Eternal Three in One! 17 Chapter, latter part of the 12th verse of St John.<sup>358</sup> his attitude fixed attention as he leaned forward with a small bible in his hand, if he had notes he scarcely referred to them. I am afraid I shall not hear him preach again, as it is said he is making only a flying visit to his brother Sir James W & that he feels he ought not to absent himself from his flock in Scotland. he came over by the Hull Steamer had morning & evening worship on board & explained the scripture daily to the passengers & crew. I must not omit to record the arrival of our friend George Prince from Boston last Saturday, he returned with the same Capt. Leach - with whom he went out to his native land last August. he was accompanied by his brother,<sup>359</sup> they three with the Ropes & our friend Capt Kruyger took tea<sup>360</sup> with us on Monday last, Whistler & I received some letters from home by M<sup>r</sup> Prince, who whenever he can be spared from the Counting house comes in to regale us with anecdotes of all our relatives & friends whom he visited<sup>361</sup> in the course of his nine months absence. I was delighted with a letter he brought me from M<sup>rs</sup> Maxwell<sup>362</sup> & more still with his account of the hospitality he received from that family circle<sup>363</sup> which I am sure I shall like when we meet face to face, as I have always had such a high regard for the Son. M<sup>rs</sup> M has sent me a dress, & to my boys a bundle of Stuarts candy,<sup>364</sup> how very kind & flattering. M<sup>r</sup> Prince says we must be patient till he manages to coax them thro the Customs house. But here is the young gentleman himself. I shut up my desk to chat about America.

Saturday afternoon. May 30th <sup>365</sup> It is exactly a fortnight since Geo Princes arrival & not till today did we receive the articles he brought us from Boston. In the interim the ship has been unloaded - reloaded & sailed last thursday.<sup>366</sup> But still our books are at the Censors. Jemie wonders if they read every volume which goes there! he thinks they must be well informed on universal history. he loves play better than books & now feels so delighted with Aunt Kates gift of marbles, sent by M<sup>r</sup> Prince! that I fear he will read less than ever. Koritsky<sup>367</sup> is taking a sketch of baby as he is seated in his little carriage driving about the parlor.

Saturday afternoon June 20th <sup>368</sup> I forget what interrupted my finishing this page three weeks ago. but I have been too busy ever since to note down the passing event. My dear husband set out for the inspection of his rail road tuesday before last,<sup>369</sup> I have written him twice & not having heard from him shall look for his return daily. M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison & little Annie embarked for London last Wednesday in the Victory.<sup>370</sup> they lunched with us. M<sup>r</sup> H & Henry went to Cronstadt to see them off. it was a sad trial to her leaving her baby & home, but her feeble health made it her duty to go, she nearly fainted & was obliged to be supported from the quai to the boat. we hope she will come back in a few weeks a different woman. The Ropes bade us adieu the same day to stay at M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrands datcha<sup>371</sup> 15 versts on the Peterhoff road. their carts of furniture went off between the showers, but the sun shone out in the afternoon & I took a drive to Catrinoff gardens with Mary & baby. how delightful the verdure, Summer has come suddenly & the change is like magic. We called upon old M<sup>rs</sup> Baird on our return, she was very glad to see us & invited me to stay to tea, she expects Miss Morgans Sister<sup>372</sup> from Scotland every day & is in high spirits at the prospect. M<sup>r</sup> Miller has lately arrived<sup>373</sup> & in a parcel he was the bearer of from my Sister Alicia I find a beautiful volume of Sandlands=poems, & feel my fondness for the pet of my school days, as I read his chaste & noble thoughts. M<sup>rs</sup> S— sent me this, the work of her dear Johns leisure hours in Brazil.<sup>374</sup> It is not pleasant to turn from such contemplations to the dull realities, but I have accomplished the business of house-cleaning in my husbands absence, last Saturday<sup>375</sup> I had three sets of men at work, some coloring walls, others waxing floors, other repairing peaches, myself & the boys had to eat in the nursery several days & they have been so glad to have their beds in my room I have not sent them yet back to their own, it is comfortable for the few of us left at home, to draw near together. Old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon who has been very poorly, was well enough to spend day before yesterday<sup>376</sup> with me. doct Rogers came to tea by chance & we have had M<sup>r</sup> Prince to breakfast & tea when M<sup>r</sup> Ropes could take his horse back ride to the Datcha to pass the night, for I have begged our young countryman to come with out ceremony when threatened with a solitary meal. Yesterday the Empress of all the Russias was welcomed back to S<sup>t</sup> Petersburg,<sup>377</sup> there was a grand service performed at the Kasan church at which all the Imperial family were present crimson cloth spread on the pavement for the beloved Empress to walk from her equipage to the church, crowds waited to see her features once more both at the church door & Palace.<sup>378</sup> Last night the illumination which my boys have been so eagerly expecting took place, I stationed myself beside baby to let Mary & Dounia each witness what young people like, the glare, & was so interested in writing to America while Johnie slept that ten oclock surprised me, it was half after when Mary brought Willie to undress him, but James expressed such an eager desire that I should allow him to be my escort just to take a peep up the

Nevski that I could not deny him. The effect of the lights from Vasili Ostrow was very beautiful, as we drove along the Quai & the flowers & decorations of large mansions close to ours I thought more tasteful than those in the Nevski. We had to fall into the line of carriages in the Isaacs square to enter that broadway & just then the shout from the populace (so unusual in this city) announced to us that the Empress was passing. the cloudy evening was not so favorable for seeing her face, as it was for the illumination, but no mistaking that there was her very Imperial self from the two Cossacks as footmen, as none but the Empress boasts of those proud attendants,<sup>379</sup> her guards also were in the rear. thus the Empress was going home to the Winter Palace just as we were beginning our dissipation. but there was no possibility of getting out of the line, gen d'armes stationed thro the middle of the Nevski, prevented any disorder, tho I was terrified lest the poles from the coaches should run into our backs, or that some horse might take fright, or bite us so close were their heads. Jemie laughed heartily & aloud at my timidity, he behaved like a man, with one arm he gaurded me & with the other kept the animals at a proper distance. I must confess, brilliant tho the spectacle was my great pleasure was derived from the conduct of my dear & manly boy.<sup>380</sup> he was not the least sleepy when we reached home at one oclock in the morning, tho I had nodded more than once. I can just recollect my pleasure when a child of ten years viewing the illumination in the city of N York when peace between my country & Gt Britian was announced<sup>381</sup> & this is the only one I have seen to compare yet with that, for usually in St Petersburg the illuminations attend every marriage & christening in the Imperial family, it is merely the name, for cups of oil on the pavement scattered at distances & even that miserable attempt is early extinguished, but on this occasion of the Empre'ss return, the initials of her own & the Emperors blazed forth with crowns, wreaths &c<sup>382</sup>

July 7th our style tho only 25th of June Russian. This is the Emperors fiftieth anniversary! & today is also the day of his daughter the Grand duchess Olgar's betrothal<sup>383</sup> to the Prince of Wurtemberg, the court are all at Peterhoff & thousands have resorted thither to see the illumination which is to be celebrated in the Imperial gardens tonight. A salute of 30 cannons will be fired here in the city, at the hour of the exchange of the rings, the Empress passes them from the one to the other, & the Telegraph<sup>384</sup> conveys notice always, every five minutes of every incident between this city & such neighbouring residences of the Imperial family. Crowds of people have been flocking since early this morning by the Steamers to Peterhoff, yesterday on our return from M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrands Datcha where we spent a delightful day, we met equipages without number thronging thither, many of them court carriages from the scarlet liveries we knew, & some few of the Corp Diplomatique by the green feather in the cocked hat, loads of chairs, mattresses & such kinds of conveniences, besides one or two fire companies with hose, for watering the gardens. We wished they could have laid the dust of the Chausée, for notwithstanding all the rains - which continued every day until last Saturday<sup>385</sup> - the Peterhoff road is such a highway for troops & travellers it is seldom free from clouds of dust. Our friends the Gellibrands are charmingly situated, upon an estate<sup>386</sup> with several others, their house stands upon elevated ground far back from the road, from the front balconies the view of Gulf & of this city in the distance is fine, we saw the gilded dome of the Isaacs church glittering in the bright sunshine. My two boys found much amusement in propelling themselves on the draw bridge to & from the fancy island in the pond, then they bounded after butterflies among the wild flowers, feeling it such a treat to be free in the country! darling Johnie also was as gay as a bird & won much admiration upon his intelligence & sweetness, contrasted by Willie Ropes my baby indeed looks like the country child & that little pale faced one as though he had been shut up in town, the three little girls have much benefitted by their range at their kind Aunts who told me the only alloy to their perfect enjoyment was, there was a parting in early prospect, for M<sup>rs</sup> R<sup>387</sup> must soon take her children to England! thus it is in this world we must ever have something to sigh for. I told my boys as we seated ourselves at tea in our own home last night I thought they had not even enjoyed the commemoration of our 4th of July last Saturday as much as their country range. but they would not admit that any place in Russia was as pleasant as Alexandrofski with all the Eastwick boys to play with! then the percussion caps, fire works, cross bows & muskets, the rides on horse back &c yielded so much excitement & variety! Willie forgot how sadly he burnt his hand & came home roaring with agony & tho to me no drive is so disagreeable as that to Alexandrofsky, thronged as the road is with beggars & drunkards, and the village has no sweet secluded spot but the little garden enclosing our countrymens home, I can imagine my boys see none of the annoyances, for they anticipate the warm welcome of youthful Americans & the kind indulgence of their parents in lending horses & grooms to secure them a safe & healthful pastime. I have so long neglected my journal that I have yet to record the introduction we have had within the past fortnight<sup>388</sup> to American clergymen,<sup>389</sup> accompanied by a young lawyer named Beach from Newark New Jersey.<sup>390</sup> knowing my friends there is has been very delightful to entertain them all.<sup>391</sup> the younger of the divines Mr Rankin<sup>392</sup> I have not yet heard preach but hope to when the return from Moscow, they have been obliged to leave behind one of their party (Rev Rob<sup>t</sup> Baird<sup>393</sup> who has been so ill from Rheumatism since arriving here, he has been secluded,<sup>394</sup> but it is a cause of thankfulness he is with kind M<sup>rs</sup> Wilson who keeps an English boarding house in the Galernia<sup>395</sup> very near us, this clergyman from having visited S<sup>t</sup> P years before is not as a stranger,<sup>396</sup> I hope to see this countryman who as advocate in the Temperance cause has had interviews with several of the crowned heads of Europe.<sup>397</sup> I felt it to be a high privilege to hear M<sup>r</sup> Brinsmade<sup>398</sup> both morning & afternoon of the sunday before last. I was in a pew with eleven Americans at the American Chapel in this city in the morning & took my boys to Alexandrofski where “an upper chamber” is consecrated at the American works, to divine worship,<sup>399</sup> it was so entirely filled that even the window sills were in requisition as seats. M<sup>r</sup> B took his text from the beautiful book of Daniel 5th chap & latter part of the 23rd verse,<sup>400</sup> I felt the subject to be well chosen. for how few of us remember to glorify the Lord our God in our several stations. the solemn, kind manner of the preacher made his solemn subject very impressive, he discoursed upon the invisible hand which had led us so far from our native land & prayed for the aid of the Holy Spirit to sustain us in shewing forth true religion in our intercourse with foreigners. I lost none of the high respect which M<sup>r</sup> B had won from me in the pulpit when he came with M<sup>r</sup> Rankin & Beach to dine in our family circle last tuesday,<sup>401</sup> the blessing he asked upon our meal was in the same strain, realizing the providence which had brought us, strangers in a foreign land to the same board! How good for us it is to be reminded to trace every event to our Heavenly Fathers direction! I hope to be strengthened by the pious counsel of these my countrymen by going to hear them again tho I seldom desert my own church even to attend the American Chapel. unless it be to contribute my mite to a missionary collection, for in the English chapel we never hear of Missions, for our benevolent pastor doct Law is restrained by the Factory<sup>402</sup> - who maintain this branch of their countrys establishment & he has been governed by them 25 years. but as far as his own exertions extend he goes about doing good. what a deplorable loss, neither sunday school, bible class, or missionary society connected with our church here! I must think the Dissenting congregation of the American chapel true followers of Christ for they are zealous in the cause of spreading the gospel, why should we deem ourselves only, of the true faith, I shall never forsake the beautiful forms of the Episcopal, with its perfect prayer book yet I cannot be so bigotted as to think the service of other sincere christians less acceptable to the Saviour, merely because their order is not that I have been educated to like best. But now I think I ought to commence a reply to letters from my dear Debo which we received by yesterdays<sup>403</sup> mail that mine may be ready for next Sat<sup>404</sup> - Courier, she was at Blackpool, with our sweet young friend Eliza Smith,<sup>405</sup> I half hope Mrs Harrison may join them in sea bathing, but she was ill in London lodgings by the same date, the physician says it is only debility, when she can gain an appetite she will regain her strength, I shall cheer her by the pleasant reports I can send of her home & infant my God daughter as I have fulfilled my promise of going often to Alexandrofski to see the little Alicia. Debo will be interested to hear what is circulated about preparations for the approaching wedding of the G<sup>d</sup> Duchess Olga. I have happened at Francescas<sup>406</sup> to see some of the bridal paraphernalia & heard from her that on the 28th old style which will be next Friday all her outfit will be exhibited at the Palace at Peterhoff, her jewels, clothing, furniture, even to kitchen utensils—<sup>407</sup> I am afraid I shall not see it, as 30 versts is a long way to go for a peep. I lately saw at Francescas an infants wardrobe for a lady at court, from its Valenciennes christening cap, its embroidered french cambric robe lined with pink satin, to its dozen Paadooshkas<sup>408</sup> - or long wadded pillow upon which it is carried - its pillow cases all of french worked cambric, & the one upon which it is to be carried to the font very rich & lined with pink satin. The Héritier is to be its God father as the father of the yet unborn babe is one of his aids.<sup>409</sup> The whole is to cost 3000 silver rubles, I had not the slightest wish for one article, & my Willie who was with me seemed to think the baby could not be lovelier than his little brother, who is always in simple white frocks, but the order for all this from the rich, is a benefit to the poor who must thus earn their bread & I rejoiced for the amiable Francisca, who politely asked if my little commission for M<sup>rs</sup> Eastwick could wait till after the Imperial wedding- “we are so busy for our Grand Duchess” she said. This girl is a perfect lady in her address & deportment, she has been well educated by her Aunt to whom I was recommended by dear old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon – she speaks English elegantly & therefore I must believe she is as well versed in French. Russ & German as she is familiar with all. What an advantage, I could almost envy her. We have been favored lately with many letters from the United States, bringing relief to our anxieties respecting the war with Mexico, from Gen Taylors<sup>410</sup> victories. I gladly welcomed a letter from my friend Meg Hill,<sup>411</sup> which was commenced last November & finished in May, she has the faculty of transporting me to the midst of her family circle & regales me with reports of others My former & very favorite pastor M<sup>r</sup> Lee of Springfield was in the city of N York upon the occasion of the consecration of “old mother Trinity”<sup>412</sup> And M<sup>r</sup> Ballard<sup>413</sup> of Pittsfield whose sympathy upon the death of my sainted little Kirkie has made any association of his name interesting. Oh only those so far from their native land as I am, can judge how welcome the sound of familiar names in scenes from home. My beloved mother was still in Florida, when I heard from my Sister Kate in Stonington.<sup>414</sup>

Tuesday July 2nd/14th <sup>415</sup> Several anniversaries in my own family circle the last week gave me occasions for deep but silent reflection. the public rejoicings on the occasions of the Grand Duchess Olga have demanded my participating in my childrens interest in the several spectacles. It is a week today since the Betrothal,<sup>416</sup> at Peterhoff, it is said some superstitious fear made the fair fiancée object to the ceremonies being solemnized in the chapel of the Winter Palace, the associations of her Sisters nuptials, & death following within the same year are too sad, for this happy occasion. they do say she shed many tears at her betrothal at the thought of how soon she must be separated by it, from the Empress & all which the spring time of life has endeared to her. The affection throughout the family circle of the Emperor is well attested. Still as Olga is fond of the Prince of Wurtemberg—who is her Cousin as well as lover, it is said her Imperial parents are well satisfied to establish her thus<sup>417</sup> & if rumour whispers truly she may soon be crowned queen, as the father of her lover is talked of as being on his death bed.<sup>418</sup> Since our arrival in Russia the annual fête in honor of the Empress names day has been omitted, therefore this had a higher zest & was selected also as the wedding day of the beautiful Grand Duchess Olga.<sup>419</sup> With the exception of Mr Clay our Chargé probably no American was witness to the ceremony in the chapel except the Rev<sup>d</sup> Robt Baird, whom the Prince of Oldenburg had invited to his palace in his zeal for the Temperance cause & complimented him by providing a place for him to witness the Imperial marriage.<sup>420</sup> while we Whistlers accompanied by our new acquaintances from New York the Crufts,<sup>421</sup> with the Harrisons & Eastwick families were jostled about in the crowd. tho the thousands there were as we have always observed in Russia extremely decorous & quiet. it was computed at least 200.000 people were in the garden last night, & from the throng on board the Steam boats<sup>422</sup> from early in the morning that calculation must have been within bounds. Whistler was afraid to risk his precious cargo among them & decided to hire a carriage & four, which I grieved to have to pay 24 silver rubs for one night, however we we<sup>423</sup> thought to be fortunate to get any, as almost every vehicle had been engaged & many had pd 30 & 35 silv rubs the road was not dusty, for showers have been incessant. The G<sup>d</sup> Duchess may argue favorably from the “remarkable coincidence”<sup>424</sup> that the only two bright days we have had this month past, were last tuesday her betrothal – & yesterday. We thought last night the moonlight not too light for the illumination, so many trees, some in dense avenues covered with lamps, the green foliage contrasted beautifully with their brilliancy. I wish I could convey the faintest idea even of the magnificence of the spectacle, it was truly Imperial. it is said the Emperor has appropriated an additional 20.000 silv rubles to the cost allotted to illumination other years, & this has been the first time the upper garden<sup>425</sup> - close to the Palace & fronting it - has been lighted, at the entrance gate from the town was a crown & under it very conspicuous O.K. for Olga & Karl, & the gate looked as if composed of diamonds. but all the rest of the upper garden had coloured lamps in the shape of fruits & flowers, bands of musicians were stationed in the groves & played alternately. The lower garden which is very extensive even to the Gulf - is descended to by a long flight of steps. the fountains rival those at Versailles, a golden Statue of Sampson which is placed where the largest body of water is played is worthy of its celebrity, the young New Yorkers of our party were glad to have their curiosity gratified by seeing the Sampson they had heard lately so much of: lines of illuminated wall looking like filagree work of gold & diamonds (for in the lower garden were no colored lamps) formed avenues extending in different directions thro, the principal one from the palace had at the end near the gulf, what looked like an immense gate of brilliants, surmounted by a blazing sun the rays of which enclosed an A for Alexandra in honor to the adored Empress. It was expected the Imperial family & court would have passed thro the illuminated avenues in open cars - similar to Irish cars<sup>426</sup> in form - as is usual on the Empress's day to gratify the Mobility,<sup>427</sup> who like to see them in all their magnificence but we learned that they had about 7 o'clock left the Palace with new married pair to seek the quiet of a more retired dwelling. I commended them for their feeling, & were I one of the Grand Duchess Olgas train should pray she might retain such habits & ever be indulged in them. The Imperial family left ladies & gents of the Court to represent them in the ball room & in the balconies. I saw some sign of merriment as tho the fancied the vulgar crowd hoaxed, & soon as possible we extricated ourselves for a purer atmosphere. I had shuddered to find the coarse beard of a Mujic<sup>428</sup> close to my cheek & his breath of leeks & vod-kee almost made me sick. but every variety mingled in that crowd, ladies in the most costly dresses of satin, gauze & silver, were contrasted by the odd home spun finery of Fin peasant-girls - very like our native Indians. And sheep skin coats no matter how old or greasy rubbed against gold lace in regimentals without fear, for on these occasions of fêtes the poorest subjects of the Emperor forget the shackles & revel with perfect freedom. Refreshments to suit all grades were to be obtained throughout the grounds, Mujics would meet us offering their "Harosky"<sup>429</sup> drinks & eatables, but we killed two birds with one stone by seeking Islers<sup>430</sup> tent for tea, as Mr Eastwick had promised to meet us there with our boys, our party was rather numerous we were continually getting separated by the crowd, it reminded me of the story of Jack & his eleven brothers,<sup>431</sup> for we had each to compare notes of adventures when we met at the OK which was always our trysting if an hour kept us asunder & there we were sure always to find our faithful footman Yohon, he would make a circuit & come back for orders to the point true to Whistlers appointment. My regret is that our good Mary who merits every indulgence cannot find a suitable escort to go one of these three nights to Peterhoff. I should far rather have had her take my place in the carriage & I keep her station at home beside my darling baby, but Mrs Crufts & her Sisters<sup>432</sup> I had promised to be with, besides my boys are now too large to be tied to Marys side & she would have felt awkward unless as their attendant. James has begged me hard to let him be Marys escort tonight but 30 versts off is a great distance & we cannot trust Mary to those boats where the multitude seem to tempt God by their reckless carelessness about life. Perhaps another year Mary may go to a Peterhoff fête, even Christina & Dounia have been prudent enough to yeild to the unpropitious weather & stay at home, tho I had given them leave to go. Mary & baby were sent off early yesterday to Gellibrands datcha where they had a charming country range with Hannah<sup>433</sup> & the children of dear Mrs Ropes. we stopped there as it is half way on the road to Peterhoff & took coffee with our friends. it seemed such an age to be separated from baby since the morning, it was delightful to see the darling so happy & behaving so admirably. he was in his own nursery again by seven & when we returned from the fête at 3 oclock he had only awakened once. I nursed & put him back in his crib, ere I realized how weary of the nights dissipation I felt.

Monday 27th of July<sup>434</sup> We have had a continuance of sultry weather since this month came in, yet my dear James caught cold from the dews at the Peterhoff fête, lassitude, loss of appetite were the symptoms & such an inflamed throat, leeches were applied & consequent confinement to his room. Mons Lamartine who is always hypocondrical, chose that week to be too ill to teach tho he came to his meals & I observed no strong tests of his feeling sick, still as vacations are general now, Whistler decided that our lazy Domini should be free & I have had my boys so entirely upon my hands as to find little leisure. Our drawing room & my chamber also upon the quai - for I have been obliged to move again to it for babys sake the noise in the yard having disturbed his slumbers - we spend our mornings in reading drawing &c, then the boys take their row under Yohons wing across the Neva to the swimming bath,<sup>435</sup> & in the cool of the afternoon a drive to the Islands or a range in the Summer gardens, or a row on the river. It is an imperious duty that I should go with them, as the season for freedom in the open air is so precious. We went last Wednesday<sup>436</sup> 15 versts in all the heat & dust, for the after recompense of spending the day at the kind Gellibrands datcha. I soon lost all traces of having passed thro the furnace when seated beside dear M<sup>rs</sup> G in her deliciously cool parlor but my boys could not bear the confinement, the boat & the drawbridge & the Island below the lawn looked too tempting. M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes beguiled them just before dinner to join us by teaching them the moves of chess, but Willie deserted & upon our being seated at table I was mortified that M<sup>rs</sup> G should wait so long in vain for him to be present at the asking a blessing upon the bounties spread. he was led in my the footman who had been sent to look for him & he looked heated as any Pyrisvostic,<sup>437</sup> from the like occupation, rowing. Oh my boys when will you acquire a taste for playing gentlemen! While my kind hostess & I were chatting over our coffee in the balcony we observed much excitement at the theatre of their mornings disgrace & my wild boys were again in difficulty. I took the baby & sent Mary to join the party of M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes & her children to look after James & Willie. they had broken the ropes by which the drawbridge was drawn to & from the Island & there were my brave boys prisoners. I thought it best they should remain so till time for me to return home with such unruly ones, but the good natured Dvanic was already pressed into their service and swimming to their rescue ere I could run down to offer my advice. Jemie was so drenched with perspiration from his efforts, that dear M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes stole him away to her room to coax him to lie down awhile & to rub him dry lest his sore throat should return to tell a tale of disobedience at home. Our Coachman had betaken himself to a rest in the woods & was not to be found when I sent at 7 oclock to order the carriage, so Mary had a cozey tea with

Hannah, and the gents reached home from the city & we were so urged to tea & strawberries that I yielded, as Mr R assured me I should not find my husband at home. And sure enough he did not get back from Alexandrofski till all but myself had gone to rest. He reported the heat overpowering in town & at the works, and we had escaped it by going to the country. Certainly if the reign of Summer was not so brief one would be wrong to stay in town. Last thursday there was a grand celebration of the Grand duchess Olgas birth day at the Alargon.<sup>438</sup> I gladly gave Mary permission to take the modest Francesca in our carriage with herself & the boys. while I staid at home to be devoted to baby. We had had many showers during the day & much dread there was that fire works would be “no go” & they proved not so fine in consequence of the damp atmosphere. Whistler had decided to stay with me, but officers came from Col K<sup>439</sup> urging him to avail of a government barge with its many oars. I had the honor of making tea for them & as all the maids had gone, Yohon played nurse after he had arranged the table for me to preside. It was one oclock when my husband return, to congratulate me that I had not been exposed to the risk of drowning from the crowd of boats upon the Little Neva,<sup>440</sup> he was heartily tired & wondered how he could have been so caught, we were both anxious till the boys & Mary arrived, she said she should never ask to go in another crowd! when for an hour they had alighted to obtain on foot a better view of the fire works than they could in the carriage, gay officers had annoyed herself & Francesca, & my innocent Mary concluded they could not be gentlemen of principle! James had protected them as well as he was able, but she had felt frightened & was so glad to get safe home! tho they had seen all the Imperial family within arms length, as they stood near the Palace, while the Emperor, Empress &c alighted from their pony chaises to enter it. the young Prince Oscar of Sweden<sup>441</sup> a handsome youth of 18 was among the court. and many other foreigners who were wedding guests. This morning while my boys were taking their walk before breakfast with Mary & baby they saw some tokens of another grand illumination to take place this week at Peterhoff, a government steamer laden with devices, lamps &c, tempted them to ask the Bootishnic,<sup>442</sup> who reported it was to be in honor of the Prince of Wurtembergs birth day!<sup>443</sup> but I will not be coaxed into countenancing any more folly, my boys have seen enough & must be content now to take amusement by daylight. I know it cannot be safe for our immortal interests that time & mind should be so wasted that the order of nature should be so altered. turning night into day & day into night, my boys did not take their breakfast till noon on friday!<sup>444</sup> this is surely not keeping the straight & narrow way<sup>445</sup> On Saturday<sup>446</sup> as I was striving to make up for all the irregularities of last week - for I have not recorded my day spent in change of apartments, nor the guests I had to entertain at dinner & tea several times - I was at the end of the week trembling lest my letters to my dear Mother & Maria should not be finished for Sat. mail, when Dounia summoned me to the drawing room to welcome Miss McMaster<sup>447</sup> who is so deserving of attention, that I would not let her know. how mal apros pos was her visit, iced mead refreshed her, but I trust it was not so prized by her as my cordial welcome, & she soon made herself so much at home, that I gave her Sandlands poems<sup>448</sup> to read while I scribbled thro my oft before interrupted scrawls & trust they will be received before this day next month by the two dearest to me in New York. Miss Mc M talked playfully with James about his better application to study & greater perseverance in cultivating his talent for drawing & I trust her serious advice covered so charmingly by good-humour may be remembered by him, she invited us all to M<sup>r</sup> Woods datcha for next Wednesday<sup>449</sup> James & Willie always enjoy visiting her pupils & I am particularly fond of the society of the excellent governess. M<sup>r</sup> Wood called for her at 3 oclock, she had come to town to bid M<sup>rs</sup> W<sup>m</sup> Handisides<sup>450</sup> farewell, upon her embarking for a home in Scotland this day.<sup>451</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Wood being in England, Miss M rarely comes to town. But I saw her at church yesterday between Kate & Ellen,<sup>452</sup> the weather had been so excessively hot that baby confined to the house by it lost his appetite so I thought it would not be breaking the Sabbath at 7 in the evening to take Mary & the three a row up to the old Fortress,<sup>453</sup> we landed & went into the church for the double purpose of giving our oarsman time to rest & that we might visit the tombs of the Emperors of Russia the Fortress bears the date of the age of improvement in this Empire for Peter the G<sup>t</sup> was its founder. 1780. of course it is not old looking, fresh & in perfect repair. many were visiting the church as ourselves. service was over as the Greeks begin at 6 oclock sat evening.

We slipped a ten kopeck coin into the palm of the soldier, who gave us each a flower, from the fresh garlands daily strewn upon the coffin of the loved Grand Duchess Alexandra, two other coffins covered with velvet palls (as are all indeed in the church) within the railings appropriated to the present Emperors family shew that he had lost a young daughter & a son<sup>454</sup> ere the bereavement of that young bride of 18, the summer before last. Our guide lifted the velvet pall from the coffin of the late Emperor Alexander to shew us the jewelled Orders & how highly it was ornamented, as a specimen for all the others, for when we came to that of Peter the G<sup>t</sup> & Catherine the 2nd he told us it was the same. That of the G<sup>d</sup> Duke Constantine (who ought to have been Emperor by right in place of this his brother now reigning over all the Russias)<sup>455</sup> displayed two keys taken by him from Fortresses in the conquest of Poland.<sup>456</sup> I will not note all my reflections upon the vanity of earthly greatness they would occur to any one who views this world as only a state of preparation for another. self conquests only, are of enduring benefit, but one cannot help moralizing in contrasting the splendor of the court of Russia with the silent sepulchre of its Emperors. We enjoyed our quiet row home at sun set 9 oclock And now I have endeavoured to begin this week by redeeming the time lost the last, I arose at 6. after my toilette took "The poor mans morning portion"<sup>457</sup> & my bible to the balcony as the only quiet & cool retreat. Yohon was busy preparing breakfast in the Stolola.<sup>458</sup> waxers were cleaning the parquet of the drawing room. & Whistler dressing in ours. One of my greatest privations in Russia is a closet for private devotion. I could envy those who have a chapel attached to their dwelling. But my heavenly Father ordained my sojourning in this land where display seems most thought of & therefore no arrangement for privacy. & he reads my hearty desires & I trust will accept them, continue & enlarge them that I may avail of every opportunity for communion with my Saviour. Since breakfast & my attention to household duties my James drawing table has been next my writing desk & he hard working to finish a dog before twelve. when Koritsky<sup>459</sup> came & condemned it. Willie has been studying John Gilpin<sup>460</sup> to spout to Father who wishes to hear him speak his own language distinctly. A letter from our dearest Debo<sup>461</sup> just received, tells of her pleasant meeting with her cousin Mary Ironsides in Liverpool, & brings us chagrin also because Kate Prince cannot come home when Debo does.

August 12/24th Monday. It is about a week now since my dear Whistler set out with Count Klienmichel<sup>462</sup> to inspect the work on his rail road & I have occupied myself so regularly about house hold affairs in the mornings & have devoted my afternoons to taking excursions with my boys to reward them for their application to study, that my journal has been quite forgotten. We went to pass Saturday & Sunday at the Gellibrand Datcha last friday afternoon<sup>463</sup> & returned home to an 8 o'clock breakfast today it is quite an era in my St Petersburg life, as I never slept from home before & ere I begin my routine of duties, I will try to record the few vanities of the past month. We have had the hottest summer ever known in Russia,<sup>464</sup> -& as in England- some violent thunder storms, I am sure we shall not soon forget the awful appearance of the sky last evening. kind Miss Funk<sup>465</sup> who now presides at the datcha (M<sup>ES</sup> G having gone to Travemunde for her health) made the tea, but she felt as we did, while the elements raged that it was as if God spoke to us & that a sensation of awe would prevent our enjoyment of the repast. how unconsciously darling little Johnie played & laughed thro it all & at last fell asleep while Mary & I sat watching the storm, looking to God for preservation & carressing our little pet to divert poor Phedocias<sup>466</sup> fears. The poor Russians are superstitious they cannot feel that security in calling upon their Saints while crossing themselves, which prayer & trust in Jesus inspires the bible christian with. It is only for our Redeemers sake we are spared to repentance. we feel as if there was but one step indeed between us and death, in a violent thunder storm! That of yesterday changed the state of the atmosphere From 24 deg heat in the shade Rom - today the thermometer is 13. I was uneasy lest James should catch cold during our drive before breakfast, but he & Willie drove M<sup>r</sup> Princes droshky by turns & the excitement kept him warm. I shall always retain a sweet impression of this Sabbath in the country however. the showers we had very early in the morning were immediately absorbed by the bright sun & the young folks took a stroll after breakfast then came in to study hymns & Collects<sup>467</sup> until eleven o'clock when our neighbours from the Parsonage,<sup>468</sup> & an English governess in a Russian family<sup>469</sup> gladly joined us in our private worship.<sup>470</sup> the prayers of our church were selected, two beautiful hymns & a Sermons of Blunts “The Lord is my shepherd” was read by Mr Prince. The children begged to be permitted a free range thro the woods before dinner & under the care of Sarah Meeriellees & the neice of our pastors wife<sup>471</sup> we entrusted the two little Handiside girls & my boys. Miss Funk & I walked across to the next estate where Mrs Ellerby has a summer retreat, we saw her three darling little girls, the baby about the age of mine is beautiful, as they are all lately returned from a visit to England<sup>472</sup> they are pictures of health, their mother is just what a clergymans wife should be, so interested in the spread of the gospel, so good to the poor, so cheerful, & so accessible. I had a most interesting conversation with her about the state of religion in her native land & such an interesting account of a converted Jew she had seen at South port.<sup>473</sup> Of course Mr Ellerby was in town at his chapel, but to return this day to their sweet retreat for the week. We had again service in the afternoon which Mrs E attended. she had staid away to let her English nurse<sup>474</sup> have the privilege in the morning. Miss Funk & I had just returned from visiting a poor German man<sup>475</sup> in the last stage of consumption. I thought of him during the storm when his shed could not have sheltered him from the torrent of rain, his bed only a bundle of hay! Oh that God may be leading him thro illness & privation to a house not made with hands! he seemed so patient, so uncomplaining, so different from a common pauper, for when we gave him money, he discovered so much emotion & apologized as the tears ran down his face for his necessities, I sent my boys on our return to see him, wishing them to take a lesson in contentment by comparing their lot with his, & Miss Funk wished that fruit & jelly should go, so they could present it, as the Dvanic spoke only Russ.

It was last tuesday morning<sup>476</sup> early my husband left home, in the afternoon I told James & Willie they might go in the Omnibus<sup>477</sup> to Alexandrofsky to spend a few hours & I should follow with Mary & baby en droshky. the heat was intense, they had already gone to swim, when we arrived at Mr Eastwicks & afterwards rode on Winans ponies, as all their countrymen were off on excursions. for it was a great holiday, tho we were not the least aware of its being the fête or day for blessing the Apples<sup>478</sup> until we encountered crowds of idlers & I am grieved to add, not a few so intoxicated that their boon companions were carrying them, or they were like swine wallowing along the road side, I wonder when I witness so much intemperance upon these church holidays, how the powers that be, can approve of them. but alas vodkee is so profitable for the revenue, they cannot yeild their gain for the cause of temperance. I wonder what report my countryman Robt Baird will make at the Temperance society meeting in London<sup>479</sup> as to Russia! he has only lately gone from this city to that. I must not omit the record of Miss Caroline Laws marriage to M<sup>r</sup> Rich<sup>d</sup> Miller,<sup>480</sup> it took place last monday at the church 7 o'clock p.m. Willie watched the carriages from our balcony as they collected on the quai & was half tempted to run down & make a friend of the Sexton that he might witness the ceremony, but could not induce Jemie to accompany him. the next day<sup>481</sup> a huge slice of wedding cake was sent me with M<sup>r</sup> Millers card. I shall not open it till Debo comes, as she would have been brides-maid had she been here. The young couple met me the next evening<sup>482</sup> as I was leaving the Cars at Tsarskoe Selo with James & Willie, our friend Geo Prince our guide upon our expedition to the Palace. We afterwards heard that the bride & groom thus escaped attending a ball given at D<sup>o</sup>ct Laws datcha, by going quietly by themselves to listen to the music in the gardens at Pavloski. We only said how dye do to them for our time was limited from four o'clock until tea time, it is not possible to convey an idea to any one in a republican country of the neatness & order & quiet in the little town of Tsarskoe. from the depot, thro the town up to the Imperial Parks nothing seems out of place, peasants are continually sweeping, weeding, watering even the roads & in the parks even the faded leaves if within reach are carefully removed. As we had on former visits gone thro the Catherine Palace built by the consort of Peter the G<sup>t</sup> which like all her works is rich in gilding, & ornament,<sup>483</sup> we chose the other end of the grounds & alighted from our Droshkys at the gate nearest the new Palace,<sup>484</sup> which the present Emperor resides in when there, tho since the death of his daughter the bride of the Prince Hesse Castle of Denmark, summer before last, his family have only occasionally visited this once favorite retreat, the soldier told us the Emperor oftenest is there, the Empres's grief is revived by scenes where he loved daughter's life ebbed away, yet she has been twice to gaze on the beautiful Statue of Alexandra with her newborn infant in her arms. it is of pure white marble, the figure is full length, the countenance preserves the likeness to the lovely face, we were told this “Parmetnic” or, remembrancer, was taken from that of the Princess Charlotte of Wales at Windsor. wrapped in a sheet, it looks like a blessed spirit ready to join those who walk in white around the throne of the Lamb. “Thy will be done” is the motto in Slavonin above the statue, & on each side of the richly sculptored arch are tablets with verses from the Gospel, “Blessed are they that mourn for they shall be comforted” &c. there is a pavement of black marble enclosed by a slight black railing the gate of which was locked, & the most choice exotics as if growing out of the black marble wall which supports the railing, a pale lilac lilly which grows in rich clusters, & which I never saw before, roses & other flowers in full bloom, the pots were embedded in the stone & mosses hid them completely.<sup>485</sup> I thought the motto we read under a simple portrait of the loved daughter (in a Swiss Cottage<sup>486</sup> which is in the same bower of dark ever greens as the Statue) how verified by all the care & taste bestowed by the Emperor. it is in french & thus I translate it “I know Father you are never so pleased as when you can make pleasure for Mama” the picture looked as if it had been taken when the Grand duchess was in joyous girlhood. On this spot where this cottage (furnished à la Swiss is built) she used to stand at the head of the artificial lake to feed the Swans. she continued to do so the soldier told us even the last Summer of her life until she became too ill to go out. I admired the taste which had lilies of the valley planted in circles around the evergreens on this hallowed spot, it is hid from public view so that if any of the Imperial family are there at any time none can intrude to gaze. yet when they are not there, visitors are made welcome. We found no hesitation when we reached the palace to being admitted there by the officer in waiting & were immediately taken to the Empre’ss apartments, the lamented daughter occupied those between her parents, & the space which contained the bed she died upon has been converted into a sanctum for private devotion,<sup>487</sup> it has been enclosed by a wall which is beautifully painted & on the side where stood the head of the bed is the picture painted by Bruloff, so like her in life & health, tho taken after death as representing her spirit passing upwards to the “palace above the blue sky.” she wears her imperial robes with a crown upon her head, at the back of the crown is a halo of glory. the stars are surrounding her as she passes thro them. No wonder my Jemie should have thought this picture of Bruloffs the most interesting of all the works of art around us. A most magnificent candle stick of gold with wreaths of wrought silver vines covering. stands in front of the portrait that a perpetual light may be burning as before the picture of saints in the Greek church, & on each side of the portrait are pictures, of the Saviour, the Madona & Saints. a most splendid tiara of real diamonds encircle the head of the Virgin & child. I felt sadness as I realized the danger there was for the bereaved Empress to make an idol of the picture of her daughter, whom she fondly expects to meet on the right hand of the Eternal throne. Oh that she may search the scriptures, that she may be taught to discriminate between the true faith & the poetry of religion. Every one loved the gentle Grand duchess. for she was gentle & kind to every one & the interest in all that relates to her is universal, it pervades all ranks.<sup>488</sup>

Saturday. Aug 29th I did not forget thursday<sup>489</sup> it was the anniversary on the birth of our angel Charlie and today is that of my darling little Johnie, he completes his first year today & my heart is overflowing with thankfulness to the Giver. I can reflect upon the gentleness & intelligence of the former who was taken almost three years ago from my arms to those of his Saviour, and the sprightliness of this one who has been sent to cheer me for that loss is a delight to the whole house. he does not walk alone quite, but attempts words, “that “dond “taa-taa “Mama &c & some of the garments our more fragile Charlie wore when he was two years old, fit Johnie now.

Saturday Sept 12th My dear Whistler came home within three weeks,<sup>490</sup> he had been detained five days at a wayside village hourly waiting the Count, who travelling in a state carriage met with many obstructions, this was very trying to an Engineer, but mine is not unreasonable & was too happy to find us all well at last & to be restored to us in better health himself than when he left, to fret over lost time. he must soon leave us again to go to Hamburg to meet & bring home our darling Debo. May God bless the undertaking! We have received several reports<sup>491</sup> of her enjoyment in her trip to Scotland, present at the grand ceremony of the dedication of Sir Walter Scotts monument in the Prince’s St Gardens Edinburgh,<sup>492</sup> spent a day on Loch Lomond<sup>493</sup> with such rapture she only wanted us all around her to make it complete. she was enjoying the society of our friend Kate Prince when she last wrote, anticipating the meeting her father & travelling home after her years absence. My trembling heart faints at the bare idea of the storms she may encounter in crossing the North Sea! for now our bright Summer has given place to Autumn & a strong westerly wind ruffles the Neva & sounds stormy. In God is my trust! what else could comfort in doubt & suspence. such as mine now, for yesterdays<sup>494</sup> mail brought us letters from our native land & the reports of my loved Sister Marias health very alarming, she was going to the Springs & how eager I feel for fresh accounts! that dear, gentle, Sister! my heart aches at the possibility of never seeing her more in this world!<sup>495</sup> Oh it is selfish, sinful in me, to wish to detain her in this world of sorrow, when God says “it is Enough.” & when so many mutually dear to us, wait to bear her to her eternal home where all tears are wiped away & joys which the heart of man cannot dream of are in store for her, thro much tribulation indeed this gentle Sister has long been preparing for Heaven & her example of submission & cheerfulness are proofs of the comfort we all may have if we thus trust in Jesus. God has removed me far from her sick couch, but distance cannot divide my heart from hers! we were wont to have but one mind & I feel the joy of grief in thinking of her! if we are not to meet again in this world, may my chief concern be to prepare to meet her around the Throne of the Redeemer. My Mother sends me the painful intelligence of my cousin A McD having been killed in a duell!<sup>496</sup> I shudder to think of a soul rushing thus into the presence of its Maker! nothing in my opinion can excuse the accepting a challenge. the truly courageous will brave the worlds frown & be undaunted by it. I pray that my James may never encourage notions of false honor or courage,<sup>497</sup> but that he may fear Gods frown & remember his life is not his own; “we are bought with a price”<sup>498</sup> & this world is only a school, the daily accidents as they are styled are all appointed to test our principles. “If you love Me keep my commandments”<sup>499</sup> said He who best knows the value of the immortal part of our being.

Some of my friends in Stonington have been called to mourn the loss of children this Summer. May they be comforted by their loneliness in this life assuring them they are “not lost but gone before.”<sup>500</sup> Parthinia Babcocks lovely little girl<sup>501</sup> was removed by an illness of 24 hours. Of such, surely is the kingdom of Heaven<sup>502</sup> & in Gods own time the bereaved young Mother will rejoice that, one of her little ones has escaped the temptations of this uncertain state of existence. It is indeed good for us to be afflicted! I must not omit recording the speedy removal of the poor German<sup>503</sup> whom I went with Miss Funk to visit in his miserable shed the memorable sunday of the thunder storm. he died the next friday. that pious lady several times stood at his bedside comforting him with words from the book of life & had the proof that he too had searched it from his taking up & finishing many verses she commenced. she attended his funeral taking the little girls with her to his grave. I spent last Saturday<sup>504</sup> at the Gellibrand datcha again, but returned home to tea as Whistler & Jemie were not of our party to the country, they went to Alexandrofsky. Col Melnikoff having been their guest at dinner. We enjoyed the fine weather. it was indeed propitious as there was a Russian fête given by Count Cooshiloff<sup>505</sup> to his peasantry & being only a short & very shady walk we all went. the Mansion is beyond the beautiful dairy which belongs to his estate, all this property is improved & we rejoiced to see the peasants (whose labour keeps it in such high cultivation, in their holiday suits filling two long tables on the lawn, which was soon covered with basons of excellent soup. with a portion of brown & also white bread to each, huge fish pies garnished the board, and a band of music stationed near increased their enjoyment. I wish it had been a Temperance feast. but it was just the opposite, first beer was handed in buckets, & at last vodkee without water was passed about in tumblers I observed even pretty, young girls drank freely, to say nought of their mothers & grand Sires. We had gone behind the scenes to peep at the soup making out in the open air in great iron cauldrons it amused us neat housekeepers to watch the rough manners of the mujics who ladled out the portions, having chopped the boiled beef first on the boards, spoon it up with their palms to give each bowl its proportion of solid food. When their stomachs were filled the peasants were sounded to leave the long tables - squads of beggars were waiting to gather up the fragments that remained for they are in attendance at every public fête from the Saints day down - Music sounded at the other front of the Lordly mansion & we followed to see what next, the peasantry had already filled the beautiful lawn at the foot of which is an artificial lake just on the margin of which were erected two very tall poles not only barked, but soaped, to be as slippery as possible at the top of each a suit of new clothes, belt, hat & all even to boots. & many were the competitors in climbing for such a prize. It was really quite exciting, my Willies attention could not be diverted even by the Juggler on the Lawn, or Punch & Judy, or the Cosmorama, how relieved we all were when the two lucky lads at last succeeded in reaching the top of the poles & bore off their prizes, they were soon dressed & went in triumph to the Balcony where the Count & Countess<sup>506</sup> were surrounded by gay ladies & officers. the peasant knelt at the Countess feet & kissed her hands. we could not hear the speeches, but saw her bend to kiss his brow. We had pointed out to us the very fair young sister of the countess<sup>507</sup> & the tall officer by her side proved to be the young Count Strogonoff, whose kindness to our boys on our voyage across the Baltic has rendered his name interesting to us. he is the betrothed of this heiress. her fathers beautiful seat<sup>508</sup> is not five minutes row off from the scene we were up. just across the little lake. Showers of sugar plums, nuts &c kept the children of the peasantry near the balcony. I watched the Count fill the tiny palms of a sweet little girl beside the Countess, from time to time. Mrs E<sup>509</sup> told me the history of the favored child, who was sent to the Countess when only a day old, it was elegantly dressed in linen cambric & rich lace, its pillow covered with white satin & the quilting lining the basket of the same. a letter elegantly written disclosed only that painful circumstances. prevented the parents acknowledging the little innocent helpless one & asked the Countess to take a mothers interest in its fate. she has adopted it & has no other. A very nice young English lady attended upon it as governess,<sup>510</sup> & already the little girl speaks English as if she had been taught in Victorias nursery. The Scotch steward & his portly dame<sup>511</sup> looked as if they shared in the profits of the estate they manage she was dressed in a gay light silk, with a lace pocket handkerchief as the insignia of work.

Saturday Sept 20th <sup>512</sup> There have been so many duties devolving upon me & so long a term has passed I forget what else I wished to add to my last day in the country. the weather became so cold and wet I could not take baby again, except one afternoons drive to see “the beautiful Mrs Anderson” as she is distinguished. my Johnie out rivalled her once so blooming infant daughter<sup>513</sup> who is six months older than my active boy teething made her so ill that she cannot yet walk. perhaps I listened with too pleased an attention to the admiration my darling excites! Mary has availed of very bright sunshine for taking him a drive this morning with his brothers, I have ordered them back to a 3 o'clock dinner because the afternoon became damp & chilly. And the interval I shall occupy by recording as briefly as possible the changes which a fortnight has brought about in my family circle. Whistler placed our dear James & Willie as boarders at Mons Jourdon's school<sup>514</sup> Monday before last, & the next day<sup>515</sup> he himself seemed sorry to leave me with only Johnie to amuse me in my loneliness, tho of course he felt it a privilege as well as duty to go to meet our dear Debo at Hamburg. he will not know what a contest there was in my heart as I saw the Steamer bearing him away while I held baby closer than ever to me as we stood on our three-story-high balcony to gaze after dear father, yet if I wept, I also rejoiced that he was to have a three weeks reprieve from rail road duties<sup>516</sup> & a trip to Berlin on his way back with his only daughter - his day of leaving St Petersburg exactly fulfilling her years absence from us.<sup>517</sup> Our Consul Mr Gibson was most glad to have my husband's society on his route to England, we have in possession several nice pieces of furniture which were favorites of his- especially his french clock. for his health does not admit of his return to this post where he has been so highly respected twenty years. we shall miss him much, who will now forward my letters to England by the Courier? who will enable us to receive our Gallignani without the Censors clipping out all the highest seasoned bits of news?? he has never been well enough to return my husband's calls, since the introduction he offered in propria persona to Mrs & Miss W on their first becoming established in the Bobrinski Dom. but sent me his card with P.P.C.<sup>518</sup> as he has heretofore upon his leaving St P for the winter. My dear boys have almost daily exchanged billet doux with Mother since their strange absence of a week at a time from home. James reported every thing "first rate" even to brown bread & salt for breakfast & quass for dinner.<sup>519</sup> and Willie forebore to complain of home sickness, tho our friend Mr Prince reported when he went one evening to see them that poor Will looked very doleful.<sup>520</sup> Our coachman thought me no doubt very hard hearted when he drove me out for an airing one day the first week the boys were at school & stopped before Mons Jourdon that I would not get out. James! Willie! he exclaimed thinking I could not be aware where he had chosen to take me — I ordered him to the Summer gardens which face the school,<sup>521</sup> being upon the opposite side of the Champ de Mars where all the grand reviews are held by the Emperor. there I took a solitary promenade, wishing I might be met by the pupils of Mons. Jourdon, for their daily walk in the season for it is to the Summer garden. Never shall I forget the delight mutually experienced as I welcomed my dear boys home the first Saturday!<sup>522</sup> Mother. Mother I heard them call as soon as the front door was opened & they were in such a glow, they looked almost handsome in their new round black cloth caps set to one side their cropped heads & the light school uniform of grey trowsers, black jacket<sup>523</sup> & velvet stock made them appear taller & certainly straighter. Willie was in such an excitement he went down to the court after dinner to ride about it on H. Eastwicks<sup>524</sup> new pony. James found the new suit too tight for his drawing lesson. he sacrificed vanity to comfort & was not diverted from his two hours drawing by the other boys frolic which argued well for Jemies determination to improve as he promised father would<sup>525</sup> in his absence. My dear boys told me much of their masters & class mates as they enjoyed their curd & cream & good bread & butter at tea time. then asked for a warm shower bath as a Sat nights indulgence, after which Willie shared my room or rather I & baby had taken possession of the boys former quarters, so Jemie slept in what we call “Aunt Alicias room” that our diminished circle might thus be drawn closer together, we had abandoned the front of the house that double windows might be put in. What a privilege I felt it to have my dear boys at family prayers on the Sabbath morning. I observed with pleasure too how well they behaved at church. Henry Harrison<sup>526</sup> came home with us to dinner & Mons. Lamartine also joined us then that he might see his former pupils In the afternoon I had the three boys assembled in my room, read & talked with them upon the duty to God & to their teachers & associates. I could not but remark darling Willies clinging to me, his attention to all I wished, but I did not understand the deeper tenderness which was swelling his heart as the hour for leaving home drew nigh. We spent the twilight hour in the recital of what he had suffered all the week from home-sickness. I could but weep with my tender hearted Willie the first half hour, as I thus sympathised he told me all, & it was a sacred & sweet privilege to comfort him. When I at last put the question "Will you let the boys go tonight without you?" he answered still sobbing. "Oh no! it is right to go to school. father wishes it & I will try all I can to study to please him!" May our Almighty Father strengthen this purpose of his youthful mind! & may time accustom him to his privations in being from home. I cannot wish him ever to become indifferent to absence from it When I talked to my more manly James about his brothers claims upon him for sympathy while away from my side, I unfortunately added "you do not know what he feels" then Jemies wounded love melted him into tears as he uttered "Oh Mother you think I don't miss being away from home!" he brushed away the shower with the back of his hand as quickly as if fearing to be caught weeping. Dear boys! may they never miss me as I do them. After tea Willies grief was renewed as the moment of parting came. Mary went down with him to the Droshky & heard him say in reply to Henry Harrisons "dont cry Willie! look at me I dont mind going back to school! "Ah Henry you are not leaving your Mother!" When I had proposed to Willie that I should call some day to see them at Mons Jourdons, he had the self denial to recommend that I should not until he should be better reconciled to his new situation, he feared it would make him more home-sick "if I only look out of the windows & fancy you may, some of you be in the Summer gardens I cant stand it!"

October 6th Tuesday night. The house has almost the stillness of the grave & I may while on the watch as sick nurse write of that which has engrossed all my time & thoughts these ten days past. What a shock it will occasion to Whistler & Debo when they arrive to hear all I have gone thro, & they will see how near we have been losing our precious little Johnie. the crisis is just past & tho daily there are hours when his unfavorable symptoms prevail, yet we may hope now God will spare us the affliction of having to bury the little one who has the year past caused joy to return to our home circle. Poor Marys heart has been almost broken at the prospect of losing him. Never have I witnessed sufferings so extreme, so protracted in an infants frame. I could only pray that these might be softened. I dared not pray to have his life on earth prolonged if our Infinitely wise & compassionate Saviour designed to take him early to his home in Heaven. I may say “tears have been my meat day & night”<sup>527</sup> yet hymns have been my solace as I paced the chamber hour after hour striving to win sleep to my darlings eye lids. Doct Rogers has visited him four times a day & some nights has staid till after twelve in hopes of his prescriptions giving ease to the little sufferer, yet he has for his own satisfaction called in a consulting physician who yet meets him here daily. A German doct who for twenty years has been presiding physician at the childrens hospital.<sup>528</sup> he explains away the mysteriousness of my baby’s attack of Dysentery, by telling us it is an epidemic in some of the neighbouring towns & has told its victims ten a day even in St Petersburg lately. he called it very properly a visitation sent from God. no doubt in mercy sent to check dependence on creature comforts. Our cup would have been too full without this check, for we are looking for the arrival of my dear husband with darling Debo tomorrow. My excited mind keeps my body from sinking under fatigue. for now tho every one is asleep in the house & neighbourhood I feel like sitting up all night, indeed mid night is past, how beautiful the moonlight is! my husband & daughter are I trust gazing in admiration upon its mild beams at Cronstadt<sup>529</sup> & lifting their souls to the Creator

[Thursday] October 15th We had only accomplished the removal of babys crib into the quiet apartment where he was born, when a summons for the Droszky, announced the arrival of my dear husband & Debo.<sup>530</sup> And where is that infants Crib now? since I occupy the silent back chamber without it, indeed the room wears an altered look, the dark curtains are taken down & a fire burns in the grate. That little one was last evening gently removed in his crib to our own room upon the quai as the coolest place, to preserve the precious clay yet a few days from corruption that we may visit & gaze upon its marble loveliness. Yes - yesterday at 3 1/2 oclock in the afternoon our babys sufferings terminated!<sup>531</sup> his redeemed spirit borne on Angels wings no doubt, returned to God who had lent him to cheer us, & taken him suddenly to warn us “Be ye also ready”<sup>532</sup> “The sinless child with mission high, to us on earth was given, to teach us that this World should be the vestibule to heaven”<sup>533</sup>

Friday [October] 16th <sup>534</sup> “The spirit indeed is willing, “but the flesh is weak”<sup>535</sup> I could write no more yesterday, Arrangements have been made to have the funeral service at our house, altho contrary to the established rule of the English church,<sup>536</sup> indeed we have much to be thankful for, the kindness & sympathy of a few, seems very sincere, Mr Ropes has called upon our pastor to make the arrangements, has verbally invited those friends who have evinced an interest in the little sick=one, our dear boys were sent for yesterday from school & add much to our comfort, they wept bitterly at the sight of their darling Johnie still & cold in death! that little brother who had, until illness checked his joy, ever been so full of glee at the coming of James & Willie! May God of his infinite mercy grant that the solemn impressions of this death be enduring! we had family worship in this back chamber before the boys said good night, dear children! I fear at school they hurry thro their prayers in the multitude of different creeds. I felt so ill this morning. when I first awoke aching in every part of my frame. yet went to the parlor to lead the family devotions & made breakfast for the rest tho I could taste nothing. My kind physician has been both yesterday & today to visit me. Our pastor also has called today to pour the balm of consolation & to offer sympathy. dear old Mrs Leon has sent to ask after the health of our baby! I have sent to say my first visit after that to the house of God, shall be to her, it will be a motive for my going out, & doct R urges me so much to take the air, for I suppose fatigue & sorrow tells upon my countenance. Once today only have I stolen into that chamber where all that remains to us of Johnie lies, shall I ever forget the expression of that sweet face? tho so changed from what it was in healthful beauty, it is beautiful still. the deep sunken eyes cast a sad expression thro their long dark lashes, but the mouth smiles still, his dark brown curls are not long enough to shade the noble forehead which is so like Kirkies! and his snow white hands as perfectly beautiful as was that angel brothers in life & in death! ____ I resume my task facinating tho so heart rending while I am alone an hour after tea. Debo is reading to James & Willie in her own room, Whistler has our friend George Prince in his office. for I would record the mercies which sweetened my attendance upon my little one in his illness of eighteen days.<sup>537</sup> the remembrance of his fondness for his mother & Mary is so sweet, he would at times first extend his arms to clasp my neck, then hers by turns, and once when his favorite Mr Prince went in to look at him, he smiled, but these intervals from pain alas were few. We thought he recognised his dear father, and perhaps he did not look upon Sister as a stranger for he had heard her name so constantly, so that she could have the privilege of aiding us in carrying him about, for his sufferings rendered it necessary we should night & day pace the chamber with him in our arms. and thankful am I that mine never wearied “As thy need so shall thy strength be”<sup>538</sup> I have fully experienced in such seasons of affliction. Our hopes were uppermost the first day or two after Whistler & Debo return and we were permitted to rejoice that they had come home. but then succeeded stronger fears our good doct Rogers & doct F<sup>539</sup> who still attended as consulting physician apprehended that the head would be attacked from our precious little sufferer lifting his arms so much. Oh how my heart sunk when the ointment for blistering<sup>540</sup> the back of the neck was ordered & I had to apply it! that sore spot never healed, after death, blood flowed from it. The thirst which the doct had so often questioned me about as a sure attendant upon the disease, at last came. Forgive me Oh my Saviour that thy thirst upon the Cross should never before have impressed my soul! Oh my God I have indeed needed thy correction! And this little one whom thou hast now taken, after have purified him thro suffering – has seemed to me as a victim for my sins. Oh God humble me! Holy Spirit keep these impressions in lively exercise, that I may ever be looking to Eternity: tho our babys restlessness in a measure abated towards the last, I could hear his teeth grind in the agonies of death! Ah why was it so hard for the “little one” of whom, Jesus said “such is the kingdom of heaven”<sup>541</sup> – these struggles with our last enemy? if not to teach us the beginning of wisdom the fear of God.<sup>542</sup> while we adore Him may we fear to offend Him for our God is a consuming fire.<sup>543</sup> but if we strive to resist sin, which is the sting of death to us under the law, death will have no terrors to the believer, in Christ, who has overcome the grave.<sup>544</sup>

Thursday evening 29th Oct.<sup>545</sup> My dear husband charged me (as he left me to go with Debo to listen to the trial of a new organ at a German church<sup>546</sup> for a few hours before tea - if I should have painful sensations on being left alone to call our good Mary to the drawing room. I am not well, nor can it be expected I should, but it is rather an indulgence sometimes to be solitary when the full heart needs relief & if tears fall over my records they will not be checked as if those so dear to me were present. Ah what a luxury to weep over the memory of my little Johnie! I seldom encourage this selfish grief, fearing it is sinful in Gods sight, for has He not evinced love in calling that precious child from a world of sin & sorrow ere he could discern good & evil: And now I will go on from my last record. I would not leave out of this account the funeral services of my darling baby. as he died in the room where he was born, so, almost the same circle of friends assembled to join in these most solemn & touching obsequies, who had witnessed the dear little ones baptism in the same parlor fourteen months previously. Our pastor & M<sup>rs</sup> Law had seen me in another room while they were collecting, & while some who delighted in our beautiful Johnie were gazing fondly upon all that remained to us of him. My dear Whistler, George Prince & Mary had placed the dear body in the neat box which had been made by our sympathising countrymen at Alexandrofsky. poor Mary had lifted her darling from the pillow for the last time! And when told all had left the room I went to take my last lingering gaze! what a reluctance I felt to parting from the body I had so much delighted in! as I kissed the beautiful hands, they were as pliable as ever in life, so soft & dimpled! but ah the icy coldness struck to my heart. Whistler brought in our boys & dear Debo came to look for the last time at Johnie.

When I entered the circle an hour after in our drawing room where I knew the crib had been placed at the end of the large apartment just where I had offered my baby at the font, it was with difficulty I maintained composure, I dared not lift my eyes. M<sup>r</sup> Ellerby & his dear good wife who had taken so much interest in my baby while in health & sickness I knew were present. The sympathising Merriellees family too.<sup>547</sup> our kind Doct all our countrymen from Alexandrofsky of course our kind neighbour M<sup>r</sup> Ropes & George Prince, and several others dear Miss Funk had from first to last proved her belief that it is better to go to the house of mourning than the house of feasting!<sup>548</sup> When I could think that all present truly sympathized it was a melancholy gratification Our beautiful burial service how impressive! how comforting! Immediately upon its conclusion my kind husband upon whose arm I had leaned, supported me to my back chamber where Johnie was born & from whence his happy spirit had taken flight. Whistler had the privilege of seeing the little body again, but I was spared knowing exactly when it was enclosed until the loud grief of poor Mary called me to her side to comfort & soothe her, Mr Ropes had cut the curls & sent them for her to give me, Mr Eastwick & George Prince went in the carriage of the former to bear the box to the vault of the English church, true mourners with us in our loss for they loved the little one, and it has been comforting to us that we needed no hirelings even to remove him from this home to that depository. We have obtained permission since, thro our Ambassador's interest with the authorities of the Police that when an expected ship comes to Cronstadt which is to be sent to our native land this autumn, we may have the precious box transported thither. Which of us shall go next to another world is the most solemn reflection. May God sanctify every affliction to us & Oh may this last stroke loosen our hold upon earth & each succeeding help to prepare us for heavenly joys. And oh the blissful welcome from these happy spirits who have only gone a short space before us to where we all hope to be! How much I have thought of christian friends there who would so differently view my loss. such saints as Miss Hirst & M<sup>rs</sup> Nichols, how blind & idolatrous that mother who could desire to detain a little one from the Lord of all! tho I weep let me faint not,<sup>549</sup> but press on daily towards the attainment of a blessed reunion of all I have loved whom God has taken before me to an eternal home. The day after our funeral service at home, we all attended Church morning & afternoon.<sup>550</sup> dear Debo & I attended the Lords table together. When shall I have the happiness of seeing my husband kneeling at the Altar to commemorate the death of Jesus who has so loving invited all who believe in Him (as I know my dear husband does with a deep veneration & love) thus to shew forth the Lords death till He come! for some wise purpose my prayers are not yet answered, I must wait my Gods appointed time & yet pray unceasingly Our darling boys had to go back to school at bed time, but we improved the evening in reading aloud & had family prayers ere nine o'clock came. Willie & I parted as usual in tears, dear Jemie may love his home as well, but he is blessed with an elasticity of spirits which rise above the thoughts which cause his younger, gentler brother to cling to his poor mother, Willie would like school if he could return to us every night, last Saturday<sup>551</sup> when they were enjoying being seated in our drawing room after, he picked up a book which he recollected I had read aloud while he & Jemie drew last winter & said "Oh Mother those were first rate evenings! I wish they could be, over=again" Willie has kindly offered to walk with Mary to church, knowing how much she misses Johnie, he thus tries the only day he can, to be attentive to her. bless my thoughtful kind little Willie for it!<sup>552</sup>

Monday November 2nd! No ice yet, indeed today the thermometer is at 1 deg of heat. I had a short walk with my husband after breakfast, we looked for the English book-store in vain. & regret Kirton has moved from the Galernia<sup>553</sup> it was such a convenient distance for us to go. I wrote dear M<sup>rs</sup> Maingay on Sat,<sup>554</sup> as her son came to offer to bear our despatches to England, he sets out by land this evening to pass the winter at home. The Harrisons not yet arrived here tho it is more than three weeks since he wrote from Ireland.<sup>555</sup> little Alicia is therefore still under my care, I grow fond of the little one who occupies my lost ones crib. What hard struggles I endure to subdue my selfish grief! Yesterday I was struck by my bereaved friend M<sup>r</sup> Nichols extract in the last letter<sup>556</sup> received from him "Let power be given - To draw - not them to Earth, but us to Heaven."<sup>557</sup> & shall endeavour to keep this warning in view, that when memory bids painful images of my darlings sufferings pass in review, I may lift my heart in prayer to Jesus to help to keep my thoughts upon the realities of an unseen world. Why should the thrilling tones of my babys voice as I last heard them expressing the sufferings of that agonizing thirst still cause me to weep bitterly! it is past & he has forgotten it for the gentle Shepherd leads him to pure streams of living waters.<sup>558</sup> why am I ever seeking to recal my babys countenance in the sleep of death! the bright expression of his happy face as it was in health never forsakes his fond mothers mental gaze, and it is in a state of glorified beauty & happiness! Why do I press my lips & weep as in a stolen indulgence at sight of his little down=pillow which scented as it is from all the alleviatives used while his darling head rested on it those eighteen nights & days is more odoriferous to me than the most costly perfumes. Jesus look down in mercy upon me & put strength in me! lay not this grief as sin to my charge Oh thou compassionate & Holy One! but grant that when Thou has tried me & purified my soul thro suffering Thou mayest take me to where my little one has gone. My husband last week invited a fellow passenger of his & Debos from Stettin who is passing a few weeks here - to dine with us en famille. Our good Doct Rogers only was invited to meet M<sup>r</sup> Bainbridge.<sup>559</sup> I was pleased with the stranger who is middle aged & rather in feeble health from having lived many years in India. this also renders his conversation interesting, I listened to his remarks about India with pleased attention as we sat round the bright fire after dinner, he could scarcely account for his feeling so much more comfortable in our drawing room than in any other in St Petersburg until its being carpetted all over & curtained according to the English mode was forced upon his conviction, for grates are used in most houses occupied by his countrymen here. he fell quite in love with my warm foot-stool & said he should look out for one like it on his return to London. he suffers from cold feet & has a horror of draughts as is the case with most persons who have lived years in India. he is a perfect gentleman so mild, so moderate in his choice of language where dissapproval must be expressed, one just fitted to make friends wherever he roams & he seems bent on visiting many nations. M<sup>r</sup> Bainbridge on finding Debos taste for music invited her to go in his carriage to hear the rehearsal of the court singings last friday morning.<sup>560</sup> she referred him to me, & as I could make no excuse for not wishing to be one of the party, I was more than repaid for the effort to gratify my dear daughter, & agreed with her I never had heard such perfect music in my life. Oh that she would be content to substitute these rehearsals of sacred sounds for the Opera! While I shut out even the sedate looking Choristers with my handkerchief to my eyes, I could almost imagine myself near the throne of God. Oh how delicious were the tears I shed as I thought of my little one who had loved music so fondly here! with his golden harp – for now he is an angel! As we were singing that verse of the morning hymn the second sunday I attended our church after I lost him<sup>561</sup> the same thought brought me joy in my grief tho it overpowered me & caused me to lose my voice, that he was among those who never weary in singing praise around the throne of God! How impatient I feel to be among that happy number! And my loving Saviour will not exile any who wish to go there. longer than necessary to fit them for the change. Holy Spirit quicken me to repentance & make me entirely submissive, believing, hoping, waiting, in Jesus to whom be all the praise. And enable me in my life to exhibit my dependence in Thee Alone.

[Saturday] November 14th <sup>562</sup> Having just sent off a letter to my dear Whistler who left us a week ago to meet the Count at Moscow<sup>563</sup> - may it soon be received by my husband at Tchoodver<sup>564</sup> as he will be much interested in the news from America especially the battle at Monterey where our friend Capt Williams<sup>565</sup> of the Engineers was killed & buried by the Mexicans into whose hands he fell, with the honors of war - Georges letter<sup>566</sup> enclosed in the same envelope with mine announces that his Uncle Col Whistler & Garland<sup>567</sup> have been ordered back to the seat of war, poor Eliza - Garlands fond bride<sup>568</sup> will experience now the beginning of trials to which the wives of soldiers are peculiarly subject. This is an era in the worlds history when wars & rumours of wars verify our Saviours testimony that these must be the latter days, for our journals are filled with news of distress of nations from famine, pestilence & storms. I was almost tempted to copy the details of the providential preservation of life in the thrilling report of the Steamer G<sup>t</sup> Westerns<sup>569</sup> last voyage to the city of New York from Liverpool, because it seemed so solemn a warning of human helplessness & such a subject of praise for Gods forbearance & mercy should be handed down to future generations. Our friends the Crufts whose acquaintance we first made here last Summer, were on their return home after two years spent in Europe for health - among the 260 souls on board, & probably they were of the 60 who partook of the holy communion - it would be for the first time, but I trust not the last! Our hearts are hard by nature yet Oh it would seem such an especial evidence of the Divine goodness & love must make an enduring impression upon all who sought the Saviour on the mighty deep - for when they were ready to perish He commanded the raging waves & the storm was subdued. the Capt confessed "the hand of God was in it!" Ah in that very storm, how many bodies must have found a watery grave! how many souls have been called unprepared into the presence of their judge! while these favored ones have had years added to their term to give them opportunities to shew that they believe in the efficacy of prayers. From the Sat till the Tues. while the storm raged the account reports several religious exercises the last was one of thanksgiving & praise to God for His interposition when a watery grave seemed inevitable, and before the favored ship entered the harbor of New York the passengers not only presented a liberal sum to the Capt. officers & crew but instituted a fund for the aid of destitute families deprived of their support by loss of husbands, fathers, or sons at sea. to be called "The G<sup>t</sup> Western fund," in commemoration of their own preservation. The G<sup>t</sup> Western brought our last dates from New York to Liverpool. But no letters from my dear family addressed to myself, tho I am thankful to learn thro one to Debo that my precious Sister Maria's health was benefitted by her sojourn at the mineral springs. This morning my dear daughter has gone to M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrands to take her german lesson with Elizabeth Ropes who is not well enough to come to our Study as usual. & as it is not yet time to prepare to welcome James & Willie from School I scribble up my family record as I would fain do each saturday. I must look back to the 3rd of this month,<sup>570</sup> the anniversary of my wedding day being the most blessed of all anniversaries to me, as each year I sensibly feel a higher appreciation of the blessing God bestowed upon me in my beloved husband, but as I like not compliments on such occasions I reminded none of the family until the day was over, tho I had thought much of the changes which mark the period & had in the solitude of my own room poured out my thanks mingled with tears to the Searcher of hearts for His having crowned my lot with mercies. for even afflictions are such if viewed by the eye of Faith. My dear husband & I talked until the clock struck one, of the first period of our married life when Debo was the little one, and we acknowledged to each other that yet as the only daughter this dear gentle one continues the object of our deepest solicitude & tenderest care. As we are wont to kneel side by side in our chamber our silent prayers mingle for spiritual gifts for the four darling children yet spared us on earth, & it is our delight to talk at times to each other of the four whom God took early to their home in heaven where we hope all will meet at last, to part no more. Let me not omit to record my gratitude to God who has disposed my husband to seek counsel from on high, that he now never travels without his bible as his companion, and now that I must kneel without him at the footstool of mercy my solace is to commit him in prayer to One who follows him on all his journeys. The Harrisons arrived the wednesday of last week<sup>571</sup> having journeyed almost all the route from London by land.

no letters had met them from this after they set out & landing from the Stettin Steamer no friend was waiting to tell them of our loss. M<sup>rs</sup> Harrisons first question was for her infant, her next for mine! The Victory a London Steamer had met them near Cronstadt, but they had no suspicion that the remains of our little Johnie were on board, that the precious body may be sent forward from London to our hallowed enclosure in the Stonington village burial place. M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison has many times since said to me "suppose it had been my Alice instead of your Johnie!" Gods holy will be done! I needed the chastisement & my innocent little one was taken to a heavenly home. May my soul be weaned from earthly desires that Jesus may become the supreme object. As my need so shall my strength be.<sup>572</sup> I shrink not from suffering. for Infinite wisdom & love cannot err. yet how forcible I felt the words of Hawkes in the evening portion for the 7th of this month "And they feared as they entered into the cloud"<sup>573</sup>. how vivid is my recollection of past experience, when last winter my darling babe was very ill a few hours I trembled as death threatened! and even in his last illness how my heart sunk at a slight chill as we were putting him into a warm bath recalled the dying struggles of my dying Charlie in the bath in which that little one had given me his last look of love, & oh I shall fondly cherish that last expression of affection while reason is retained. But I record it to my Saviours glory that unworthy as I am, He has enabled me to feel it to be good to enter the cloud of affliction where His glorious presence becomes visible to the mourner who cannot bear the false glitter of this worlds joys, but whose soul then stretches its gaze to the realities of Eternity. M<sup>rs</sup> Harrisons little Alicia more than repaid me for my attention to her by her fondness of me. when her father asked where was Mama she pointed to me & said "there," indeed to let her own Mamas facinations have full effect, I had to screen myself, for the whole family spent the day of their arrival with us. they took Henry from school & when their carriage was announced before tea Alicia & all bade us adieu, a happy- unbroken family band went home together! The next time M<sup>rs</sup> H came to town she was laden with gifts for me which herself & husband had selected on their route. a beautiful Tea Caddie of petrified wood from Spâ,<sup>574</sup> an embroidered pélerine<sup>575</sup> & Brussels lace<sup>576</sup> from that emporium of fine work & a pr of Tyrolese gloves<sup>577</sup> from Prussia. also a case of scissors from Birmingham which because most unpretending yet most useful I had nearly omitted to name. M<sup>rs</sup> Eastwicks baby was christened last tuesday,<sup>578</sup> under happier circumstances I had promised her to be present on the occasion, I lent our consecrated bowl which I & all my brothers & Sisters & some of my own children have been christened from, but I wrote a note of apology, and felt grateful that they did not urge me to overcome my selfishness. I could not have been in the festive throng after the holy rite & it might have appeared rude to leave without partaking the hospitalities which our clergyman always remains to partake of. Never can I forget the kindness of M<sup>r</sup> Eastwick towards my children, especially his last act of tenderness towards my angel Johnie in so gently removing the precious corffin with his own hand & taking it in his own carriage to the vault of the English Church & I pray God to reward him seven fold in spiritual mercies to his children. The baby was christened William, after brothers of M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> E,<sup>579</sup> M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Kirk<sup>580</sup> stood sponsors. Oh that the solemn vows may impress them!

Saturday Dec 5th My own dear husband was welcomed home by Debo & I last tuesday<sup>581</sup> to dinner. he had complained of nothing in the months absence thro his several letters<sup>582</sup> to us, but home sickness, his patience was tested to its utmost endurance, while waiting the movements of the great man, to whom all ranks in the Engineer department, but Whistler, bow in humiliating submission & in presence of whom they tremble, as man only ought to do to God! however the Count has always been polite towards my husband,<sup>583</sup> & now this vexatious inspection of his work is over for this season, he can annoy us no further. A short peice of the rail road 22 versts had been completed,<sup>584</sup> in the prospect of the Count coming over it from Colpener,<sup>585</sup> locomotives & trains were sent to meet them, refreshments had been prepared & taken in the cars by Winans & Harrison, but Whistler only was to profit by these attentions, the Countess<sup>586</sup> having met her lord monday evening at Tchoodver, they travelled together to the palace in this city, on the chaussé, Col Melnikoff was honored by their taking possession of his house for the night! but of course he was not invited to act the host, he sought the hospitality of another officer for himself, where also Whistler was entertained, my husband always testifies as to the courtesies of the Russian officers, their eagerness to welcome travellers is the more praise worthy, when their circumscribed means are contrasted with their graceful hospitality, many of them have not more than $200 salary. they are all educated as gentlemen.<sup>587</sup> While my husband was absent our dear boys had no praznicks<sup>588</sup> altho he wrote us two had been observed in the interior<sup>589</sup> & he had felt glad to fancy them enjoying themselves at home, last saturday indeed Jemie had been kept in school until night, to write a given portion of french over 25 times as a punishment<sup>590</sup> for having loitered to chat with a class-mate after their recitation was finished instead of marching back to his seat according to order. poor fellow! it was rather severe when he had looked only for rewards at the end of the week. during which he had not had one mark of disapprobation. he was too much elated by his number of good balls for perfect recitations, & forgot the disobedience of orders is a capital offense under military discipline. He lost his drawing lesson. & made us all unhappy at home thro his detention at school. Willie would have waited for him but that he would not permit, poor coacher & ponies must have suffered most after all, for the weather was exceeding cold, snowing & freezing, yet there they waited from 2 oclock until 5 1/2. We had tried to keep a nice dinner warm for poor Jemie, but his appetite had forsaken him altho his breakfast had been at seven & only a penny roll since. Koritzkie<sup>591</sup> had been precisely at four to give him his Saturdays treat a drawing lesson & Jemie dashed the tears in vexation from his eyes, I hope he will not forget the lesson upon obedience! his cheerfulness however was soon restored by his gentle Sisters kindness & we had our usual Sat nights reading, before the bath. When the boys left us to go to sleep at Mons Jourdon on sunday night<sup>592</sup> as usual, they were cheered by the prospect of the two praznicks<sup>593</sup> they have had this week. & were not long after their dear fathers welcome home in coming for theirs. I must not omit to record that the river was closed last Saturday night,<sup>594</sup> the season has been remarkably open & mild, usually the Neva has been travelled over by sledges a fortnight before this - and besides the ice not coming down in due season, a long stretch of a verst & half below the works of the new bridge was left quite free for ferry boats to ply across several days.<sup>595</sup> however the cold has been so intense this week it is already frozen across. appearing like an immense mirror, while the rough masses of ice from Ladoga are piled up in striking contrast, but so soon as the police give freedom to sledges to cross to the islands roads will be levelled.<sup>596</sup> Our boys took their skates when they went to Alexandrofsky on wednesday, it was very lucky that their praznic gave them freedom for Harrison Eastwicks birth day,<sup>597</sup> he came to town to breakfast with them, & the happy trio of cronies did not loiter after it, they stopped at the Gostinandvor to provide themselves each, a pr of fur mittens & fur boots our boys were restored to us at bed time by M<sup>r</sup> Eastwick himself. he took the moonlight drive to town with them & to put an end to my thanks said he enjoyed it. We had to put off their recounting all the pleasure of their visit until breakfast, for a warm bath was ready in their own room & good Mary had a bright fire in their grate to tempt them to it. Jemie had been so much interested in the exhibition of the Magic lantern<sup>598</sup> (which M<sup>r</sup> Eastwick has lately imported from England to add to the domestic resources of his boys) displaying the planetary system & simplyfying the science of astronomy to their comprehension, he found his evenings entertainment as charming as his days freedom to range out of doors had been. they left their skates & sledge at Alexandrofsky in the hope of other holidays, & because the English ice hill club are not to offer the winters amusement to which we have always subscribed, they are the better pleased that at the American works ice hills are to be formed this season. On thursday<sup>599</sup> we had our favorite Miss MacMaster & her three interesting pupils Helen Kate & Willie Wood to meet our boys. Henry Harrison also came to dinner & was here till nine when the party broke up, for the Woods were sent for & our sledge was in waiting to take our boys back to Mons Jourdon. Even our Willie went off smiling (instead of weeping as is too often his wont upon a summons to leave home) for a day & half would so soon pass! I was rather startled to hear Henry alluding to an alarm which his parents still suffer from, in poor little Annies state of health, as I had carefully avoided mentioning the subject to our boys, in the dread it might thro childish garrulity reach dear little Annies ears, she being entirely unconcious of having had an Epiliptic fit, the first fortnight after her return home from England. it was very early in the morning when it seized her, as she was amusing her baby sister<sup>600</sup> in her own little room, the two children being surrounded by toys, when she suddenly cried out “Oh my head” fell back in convulsions, which lasted two hours, after a long deep slumber succeeding, she awoke & only expressed surprise at finding herself in her mamas bed instead of her own. The nervous fever she had in England, may have predisposed the dear little girl for this, but the dread is a recurrence,<sup>601</sup> however as her general health has been much better since the fit may it be hoped God will avert such a trial to her parents as to witness her subject to such a dire attendant upon life!

Saturday evening Dec 19th <sup>602</sup> M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison came just as I had written thus far & waited here till Henry came from school with my boys, after dinner I let no employment interfere with their claims upon me. Last Saturday<sup>603</sup> M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Eastwick brought their nurse & baby in hopes of meeting our good doct here wishing to consult him about their little Russian Willie. & as the last day of the week is that I set aside for summing up the other six days, I am almost discouraged in the attempt to keep a diary. Debo went at 7 oclock this evening to the Parsonage to witness the marriage ceremony of her favorite Miss Henley to M<sup>r</sup> Wishaw,<sup>604</sup> having had the promise of a window upstairs from which she could look down upon the altar. Now that my boys have finished their Sat evening English reading to their dear father & I, we having enjoyed tea which our good Doct partook of with us, they have gone to their room to bathe & I am all alone in our large parlor, for father has gone to escort Sister home.

Friday Christmas day our style Dec 25th I shall have a most delightful accompaniment to my notes, while Debo, her father & one of our pastors daughters are playing piano, harp & flute. Yesterday Whistler obtained the favor for our dear boys spending our holiday at home, tho the schools give none, he took them to the Gostinandvor<sup>605</sup> directly after breakfast to supply them each with a pr of skates, the "English skating ground" being now ready, the weather so mild & they needing exercise so much, I advised them to call for a young Scotsman named Saunders<sup>606</sup> who is fond of the amusement & who is a favorite among us, his modest & gentlemanly deportment being very captivating & his having been trained to a proper way of thinking by a pious mother, who is alas separated from a dissolute husband. We are always glad to see young Saunders, he came with his uncle M<sup>r</sup> Miller & spent an evening by our fire side this week, Whistler delighted him by his imitation of the scotch bag-pipes upon the flute, for we old folks were required to exert our powers of entertainment, as Debo was spending the evening at the Henleys.<sup>607</sup> Last evening by way of realizing Christmas Eve, we had a small party of young folks to meet our young people,<sup>608</sup> previous to their assembling, Whistler & I went to Kirtons English book shop<sup>609</sup> & selected a Christmas gift for Debo & the boys which I presented this morning directly after breakfast, Jemie seems quite sensible of fathers generosity & has whispered me to dissuade him from the purchase of gifts for the Russian Christmas, how happy it makes me that our plan for then, will not dissappoint our children! Oh that the Saviour who came to Earth (as on this day) & announced by the holy Angels “Peace on Earth, good will to men”<sup>610</sup> may answer my petitions for the four dear children He has yet left us, to cheer us on our pilgrimage thro this vale of tears! Oh that He may “call them early”<sup>611</sup> by his Holy Spirit, that they may honor Him in their life among men, & give them tastes & desires for the society of Saints & Angels where we are comforted in believing the four who have gone before us to an unseen world, have already entered upon unending happiness. Our late letters from dear George<sup>612</sup> have been rather depressing, how often we think of him so separated from the family circle, which with his domestic tastes must indeed be such a privation, but in this world of trial, we must become resigned to the arrangements of an Invisible over-ruling power, which appoints for each of us situations most favorable for the great reformation man requires to fit him for a heavenly society. What could enable me contentedly to spend years away from my native land, my mother, Sisters brothers & friends, even deprived of the visits of a pastor, but that I cannot doubt God will more than compensate me, by drawing me to the Saviour, who has said “whosoever loveth Mother or child better than me is not worthy of Me”<sup>613</sup> — I had kind notes from two among my small circle of friends in this city<sup>614</sup> today. & my heart was touched with gratitude that comparative strangers should give a passing interest to a mourner. I gave, with my answer to one on the Island, “Na Chi” to the messenger, the poor serf was as thankful for the grevenic<sup>615</sup> as a Yankee would have been for a dollar. Had it not been so late when I took up my pen last Saturday evening,<sup>616</sup> I should have recorded having passed an hour the morning of that day in “the house of mourning”<sup>617</sup> it was my second call upon Miss Funk, since her sympathising visits to me in my late affliction, she had consented to pass this season under the roof of her only Sister, who had five “little=ones” under nine years of age<sup>618</sup> & was expecting a sixth. I had become interested in the mother<sup>619</sup> of my christian friend, whom I had conversed with in my first call, for tho a German lady, she spoke English, the sunday before last she gave birth to another little girl,<sup>620</sup> much suffering ensued, under which the patient evinced how sustaining is the true believers confidence in God. when pain ceased, she rapidly lost strength,<sup>621</sup> a nurse was provided for the vigorous infant, who thrives & misses not a mothers care. Previous to death M<sup>ES</sup> G conversed with her husband<sup>622</sup> upon her hopes in Christ Jesus our Lord, leading him to lay hold upon such as a staff in his affliction, she repeated the 14th chap of St John<sup>623</sup> to him, (from which the clergyman selected his text when he preached at the funeral service which we attended in the Dutch reformed church last tuesday)<sup>624</sup> I felt it good to be there, although I could not understand what he said, except occasionally the text “In my fathers house are many mansions” his countenance was so expressive & manner so earnest, Debo told me when we walked from the church how impressive the address had been, particularly to the young for she whose body was borne to the grave had been young & full of hopes for years of usefulness, the attendance was very numerous. tho the cold was intense 10 deg below zero Farenheit. How wan the poor widowers face as he passed alone, and Miss Funk how overcome with sorrow she seemed, her pastor & M<sup>ES</sup> Ellerby were among the number of English friends who were present. My good Mary who is always contented at home has been invited by M<sup>ES</sup> E to spend this evening at the Parsonage with her good Ellen, the English nurse.<sup>625</sup>

Tuesday evening [December] 29th Our dear Debo has gone to dine with the Gellibrands & as her father is inclined to read American news papers I shall scribble a while before tea. Last evening while he was gone to Alexandrofsky a solitary letter reached our Russian home by the G<sup>t</sup> Western from New York, we were too eager to wait his breaking the seal of Maxwell communication,<sup>626</sup> & Debo read it aloud to me while I made tea, it was eight pages, but as his letters always are so entertaining, we were sorry to come to its end. it was well we lingered over tea thus, for Debos favorite Miss Grant<sup>627</sup> just at that moment arrived & soon after, my gude mon himself. the young lady seemed exceedingly amused at our having dared to make so free with the Majors property, as it was an unheard of liberty among the English for any women-kind to break the seals of the masters letters, however Whistler only looked pleased that we had taken the first reading & enjoyed the second to himself after tea, when the young ladies scampered off to the piano. I brought my desk to write at the same table beside my husband. Miss G afterwards - when we had towards eleven oclock drawn in a circle around the bright fire - remarked how charmingly we each had pursued our occupation, which a very large parlor gave us the advantage of doing without interfering with each other. she is one of those with whom we need not be ceremonious, for she comes expressly to be with Debo, & tho she says it is the greatest treat she has, to sit & listen to her playing Harp or Piano, yet her own merry voice is often ringing cheerfully in speech or laughter, & we thank her for exciting responding notes from our darling daughter, who much needs more suitable companions to her age than her old mother, or even usually cheerful father. we miss our dear boys so much from home. the house must be too quiet for her, for she seems at times solitary & melancholy, while I in my efforts to appear free from sadness for her sake, in general am really so. I must not omit to record the enjoyment we all had in the three days visit<sup>628</sup> of our boys last week, & while they were eager for amusement out of doors, skating &c, they behaved with so much gentleness & consideration in the family circle, especially James, that we have promised if Mons Jourdon does not object, they shall spend New Years evening at M<sup>l</sup>. Mirriellees<sup>629</sup> where we are all invited sociably. We had some merriment last Sat evening<sup>630</sup> from the boys practising making bows under their fathers tuition. I am glad to observe in dear Jemie a desire now to conform to his dear fathers wish in every thing, and also to listen to his mothers admonitions, how grateful she feels God only knows!

This evening Whistler has been telling me of the loss of another Steamer in Long Island Sound, the new boat on the Norwich route, it was on the same night when the G<sup>t</sup> Western was detained by the storm off Staten Island on leaving New York this last voyage. that the Atlantic was deprived of all power by an accident to her steam pipe, & the storm continuing to increase in violence she during that night & the next dragged her anchors a distance of 22 miles & at 4 o'clock the second day was dashed upon rocks & immediately went to pieces. a Steamer & also a small vessel put out in the hope of at least saving the passengers. but the storm was such they were driven back, indeed the gallant commander Capt Dustan hauled down his flag of distress upon seeing them approach knowing their own crew must forfeit their lives for their bravery if they ventured nearer. how aggravating to all on board the ill fated Atlantic! to be so near the land as to be seen by many eager to help them, but not able! yet God in mercy gave them to see that help could only come from His own mighty power! and this those who trusted in Him sought in prayer & we will hope among the forty three bodies drowned in that storm many may be found on the right hand of God at the last day when at the voice of the Saviour the sea even shall give up her dead.<sup>631</sup> What a warning to those who trust in human intervention, in human forethought & wisdom. Some had boasted of this boat that it could brave any storm the Almighty could send! Ah if by our words we are to be justified, or condemned, should we not stand in awe & thus sin not. The Capt too was so great a favorite many would feel secure from the assurance of his nautical skill, he was a devoted sailor no doubt, for he never left his post thro that awful hurricane, when cold also assailed all on deck, he kept at his post cheering all by his calmness & courage. Alas, alas, for his aged mother, his widow, his helpless little ones who<sup>632</sup> dependent on his exertions, may God who disposes men to compassionate such, raise up friends to them, their first intimation of their loss, was the arrival of the dead body at his home on Staten Island.<sup>633</sup> Oh well may we pray to be delivered from sudden death! but even more earnestly should we pray for grace to live prepared to die. Oh that the living would lay these lessons to heart & redeem the time yet allotted for repentance. My heart has been softened today Wednesday 30th by the sympathising letters I have received from my kind Sisters Maria & Kate,<sup>634</sup> and I have indulged in floods of tears which have relieved my full heart. Thanks be to God for all his mercies to me! Every trial has been sweetened by kindness And should I ask more than that all who have left me have gone to Jesus (called early to enter upon joys of Which the imagination of man has no conception. Ah can I compare my griefs with those of the widows, the childless, the orphans made by war or by shipwreck! May God keep me humbled under a sense of my unworthiness, and may the only effect of sorrow upon my heart be to keep it softened by its showers, for holy impressions. When I go into the apartment, where my Johnie first breathed, where his happy spirit was also released & weep over the empty crib, may Jesus look down in pity & forgive a mothers weakness & put strength in me by the blessed promises of the gospel. forbid it that I should indulge in grief rebelliously ! I read with comfort of the triumph of faith in the death bed scene of Mrs Lorrillard<sup>635</sup> which Marias letter recounted. she was one of the very few who was a faithful steward of her masters goods. the poor of the city of New York have lost a friend & her children weep their loss of a christian mother. but what a holy association they will retain of her in prayer, her dying petition was to “Our Father which art in Heaven”<sup>636</sup> she had confidence in her Redeemers blood. “Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord” they rest from their labours & their works do follow them” Also, “Blessed are they who do His commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life.”<sup>637</sup> Rev. My friend Mrs Barnes also writes me of the happy death of another little daughter of Maj Ripley,<sup>638</sup> & promises to send her memoir written by our dear pastor M<sup>r</sup> Lee of Springfield. this dear child of only eight years had thro the renewing influences of the holy spirit been led early to seek her Saviour, may the impression of her example be sanctified to her Sister who has just left her home as the bride of a rich man of the world!<sup>639</sup> & may the example of the believing young wife be sanctified to him. many will congratulate her upon the elevation of her station in this world without considering the temptations it will draw her into to forgetfulness of the Pearl of great price.<sup>640</sup>

January 1847

Saturday 23<sup>d</sup> of our style being 11th of Russian style. It is three weeks this afternoon since our dear boys came home from school to spend the Russian Christmas & New year holidays, & now it seems not probable they shall return again to Mons Jourdons this winter.<sup>641</sup> James was drooping from close confinement at school & for two days was confined to his bed with sore throat. I came to him to nurse him at night as by day in our hospital the back chamber & his father took Willie to our room, as his bed fellow, but our dear little Willie also was taken ill the second night & that apartment communicating with the drawing room improper for an invalid he also was brought to share this & for the benefit of the open fire place. Our boys were pronounced sufficiently well by Christmas eve Russian Style (being 5th of Jan our style) to avail of the invitation they had received from Mrs Morgan<sup>642</sup> to partake of the festivities of the season prepared for her children & their playmates. but the early hours was the strongest argument with us to consent, going at five, and returning at eight or nine, gave them as much frolic as they could derive enjoyment from for it was unalloyed by after suffering. they gradually recovered from their attack & skated with visible benefit almost daily upon the Neva. And Jemie often had crossed on the ice to the Academy of Fine arts to spend an hour or two of the early part of the day in the study of his drawing master.<sup>643</sup> Upon the Russian New Years eve Debo & her father went to pass the evening at the Morgans where “les tableaux vivants”<sup>644</sup> were the most attractive amusement, tho dancing succeeded before supper, to which last they did not remain but came home to me at 12 1/2. I had been alone, all the evening as our boys had been allowed the indulgence of accompanying the Eastwicks to their home to spend Edwards birth day<sup>645</sup> & stay all night. Alas! that dear Jemies eagerness for sports should so often bring illness upon him & cause us so much anxiety. we feared from his pale face & loss of appetite he had taken cold, tho he would not complain as long as he could keep up. Debo had invited the Wilks family to have a musical entertainment & they came the second evening after our dear boys frolic at Alexandrofsky<sup>646</sup> & tho they were allowed to sit up until ten I observed James was not in spirits & that he hovered over the fire while every one else felt our drawing room to be so warm we had to open the door of the corridor. I must not forget here to record, how very late Lizzie Ropes was in making her appearance that evening because of the stupidity of the Ishvostic who had driven Miss Scofield<sup>647</sup> & herself over to the Island where they had been invited to dine at a Russian merchants,<sup>648</sup> where Mr & Mrs G with the Mirriellees family waited an hour longing for the arrival of these damsels. the dinner in the while kept back & in consequence of the delay Elizabeth could not earlier be excused than her coming to us at near ten proved. she was quite excited and seemed almost as ready to cry as to laugh when she recounted to us her terror during the crazy drive of that never to be forgotten hour in the dark with a strange Ishvostic, he proved to be a rude peasant from the interior (herds of them flock each winter to St Petersburg with their rough sledges & ponies to make a trifle, which very probably they have to spend in freeing themselves from the recruiting orders which are annually issued to press the poor peasantry to fill up the ranks broken by the desolating war of the Caucases.<sup>649</sup> Of course these poor fellows are ignorant of the city & especially of its environs tho the will not confess it, & thus when this one was directed to follow the sledge of Mr & Mrs Gellibrand to a certain house in a certain line on the Island it was expected the young ladies must reach there at the same time as themselves, poor Mrs G was extremely alarmed & weeping bitterly among her sympathising friends the other assembled guests. & Mr G had said many a time he would give a thousand rubles to have Lizzie brought safe to them! when she & Miss Scofield really came! the latter a stranger to the language & customs had depended entirely upon Elizabeth & it was well she could speak for the Ishvostic had driven them to places she had never been in before & seemed obstinate about enquiring the way, until Lizzie summoned courage to seize his reins & stop his exploring further. I did not understand if the general alarm had destroyed the appetites of the guests. the profusion was as usual at this Russian merchants feasts, & Mr J. Ropes seemed to have had a surfeit of rich dishes & champagne. & to be glad to repose while listening to the music at our quiet fire side circle. Lizzie did not stay all night with Debo as she does generally after coming for the evening. her sister could scarcely bear to lose sight of her recovered treasure, so she called for her on her way home from the late dinner party in her own sledge.

The next morning when we assembled at prayers Willie came without James, whom Mary reported to have had a very feverish & disturbed night, his symptoms of a rheumatic attack were soon confirmed, pain in the chest & left side added to our alarm for him, our good doct who always uses mild remedies as possible, ordered oil silk<sup>650</sup> to be wrapped around his ankles & feet, indeed wherever the rheumatic pains attacked him, it was like a charm, for altho he could not be touched without screaming for days after, still the aching pains were within half an hour relieved. mustard plaisters repeated upon his chest & side whenever the pains & difficulty in breathing came on, and afterwards the oil silk applied there was as soothing as it had proved to his limbs. the fever & nervous irritability with heavy perspirations when he could sleep were weakening & distressing. Of course my post is always in the sick chamber, this back-room the scene of so many trials to me I occupy as my precious Jemies nurse.<sup>651</sup> As in the watches of the night season when my babys sufferings caused my eyes neither to slumber or wish sleep I sung hymns which at such seasons are the only welcome sounds to sooth anguish mental & bodily. poor James would ask me for them when he could not win sleep. Oh it is good for us when in health to lay up a store of Gods word in our memories, a verse of scripture becomes an acceptable prayer, when human energies are so prostrated by bodily anguish as not to be roused by the longing to cry unto God in a prayer of our own. He knowing all our weakness has mercifully provided us in the inspired language of His own book with ejaculations of prayer & praise. Even the youthful experience of my darling Jemie has proved that it is a rich treasure, & I trust Gods holy spirit may help him to make a dilligent search & that his mind may be stored with verses suited for every emergency. for the holy scriptures are good for instruction & correction, as they are for support & comfort thro the sufferings of sickness & on the bed of death. it is to this end I require my dear boys in health to commit a verse to memory & to repeat it at breakfast. "What we sow that shall we reap"<sup>652</sup> let us never weary in striving to walk in the commandments of God. realizing his hand guiding every event towards the great end of our being, even the preparing us to enter into a better & brighter existence, after this life is over, there are moments of gladness even in a sick chamber. All around me in this back room reminds me of my trial of last October. the crib occupied only by the useless basket which was wont to be in use for Johnies change of clothes, the little soft down pillow upon which his beautiful head was supported on my arm till the last! and which is still so powerfully perfumed with the musk which he used to take that it must ever be most nearly associated to the little sick bed - many might wonder at my composure in gazing on these sacred objects, but I can shed delicious tears over them in the hours of the night when none but a compassionate Saviour looks upon me "a woman of a sorrowful spirit"<sup>653</sup> even the little chairs I touch gently, when I try to bring them into use for Johnies sake! he is only gone home a short time before me! why should I not feel it a sweet privilege to touch what he has so lately handled. even the little pillow I have brought to dear Jemie to support his knees when weariness & weakness has made it difficult to find a position of ease to his rheumatic limbs. Oh my Saviour let not my sojourn in this back room be abused by me that I venture into sinful indulgence of grief, when my soul should rejoice that Thou has secured my "little one" from further suffering, but grant that each visit here in the attendance upon a sick bed of any dear to me, may yeild me opportunities for examing where on my hopes of a hereafter rest, may lead me more to study thy will that it may become my sanctification. I count all things as nought in comparison to the knowledge of God in Christ Jesus our Lord.<sup>654</sup> I have read to Jemie to divert his weariness & pain. he is beginning to recover his appetite. he sleeps better as his fever & thirst are decreasing. We keep 15 deg of heat in his room, & of course I am often enough awake to watch the fire that it never goes out.

Saturday Jan 30th Gradually has my darling patient been convalescing all the week, and this morning walked across the floor, what cause for thankfulness, that tho this attack began with such alarming symptoms it has been less protracted than any other preceding of rheumatism. he has been allowed to amuse himself - while seated in M<sup>r</sup> Maxwells great chair,<sup>655</sup> with his pencil. and I have read aloud to him, his sisters and his dear fathers visits occasionally during the day have given variety, and he has had appetite to enjoy "manna cassia<sup>656</sup> & milk" for breakfast or roast chicken & jelly for dinner. He has not taken a dose of medicine during this attack. Doct R has avoided every remedy which was not soothing. he has only had a cough mixture, or a sleeping powder the first nights which were most miserable, but great care has been required in his diet. During this fortnight of dear Jemies illness Willie has been profiting by his kind Sisters instructions in the study & by the mild, bright, weather for being upon the Neva skating in the recess. One day I walked down the quai to be a spectator of the English skating ground, & enjoyed it exceedingly it was mild bright weather, the part of the river hedged round by ever greens, is a very large oblong & kept so smooth by scraping & sweeping daily & pouring water over to freeze at night it looks like a clear mirror. I thought our Willies skating very tolerable as he glided across the great square of the English ground upon seeing me standing watching his movements from the quai, he suddenly seated himself upon one of the benches & calling to a Mujic to unstrap his skates he was soon running towards me - to beg for fifteen copeecks silver<sup>657</sup> to buy a hockey stick. He reports daily the kindness of the gentlemen skaters in teaching him, & particularly young M<sup>r</sup> Merriellees<sup>658</sup> who condescends to play ball with him. Willie finds it difficult to persuade himself to leave such fascinating society to come home in time to be ready for our dinner at four o'clock. but he brings a famous relish for it from this fine exercise, indeed Willie has quite regained his bloom this fortnight & I feel that it would be more severe upon me to send my boys back now to school than it was when they entered, for then we were all well - and since then such a blank! besides the experiment has dissatisfied our expectations, any advantage in the way of study has been at too great a sacrifice, that of health most apparent, but I tremble also for morals. I beg their father earnestly, that they may remain at home under my care & their gentle Sisters tuition where their habits to virtue will be strengthened, & their gradual progress more sure in the end. We received letters by the Cambria which left Boston on the 1st of this month, last monday. that from our dear George<sup>659</sup> has excited an uneasiness which cannot be dissipated until the next steamer a month off yet - may bring us more cheering tidings from our dear Son. May God direct & comfort him & may the next report be that his health is restored. When I allowed Debo the perusal of my dear Mothers letter<sup>660</sup> to me she remarked as she returned it "how beautifully Grandmother expresses herself & her letters are so full of home details they are the most satisfactory we get" Yes I often think how remarkable such letters are from an old lady of seventy, for the neatness of the caligraphy is as extraordinary as the clearness of the ideas, & original beauty of the sentences. My precious Mother! may we yet enjoy years at home together, when it will be my delightful privilege to smooth away the cares from which I would my honoured parent might be free in the down-hill of life. Oh that I had it in my power to obey the impulses of my heart & cheer her at this distance by contributing to the comforts of my brother Charles. The letters from Irving Place<sup>661</sup> told of the "merry Christmas" there, & my dear brother William in the midst of his family circle made their enjoyment without alloy. But what a severe winter they are having in my native land in comparison to ours in Russia thus far, and in England & even in the south of Europe the papers mention more suffering from cold than we have in this really frozen region. but this winter has been even more exempt from winds here than ever, the only day when I have suffered from cold in going out, was the day of the funeral of Miss Funks sister.<sup>662</sup> we have not had our January thaw either, the sleiding has been excellent & the skating on the Neva also, yet mild & blessed as has been this season for the poor (& there are more than usual on the list, from persons out of employment finding it impossible to obtain bread for their families, clothing the Dorcas society<sup>663</sup> has bountifully distributed. our friends the Gellibrands & Ropes being most active members - yet the moisture of the atmosphere—which has yeilded us such beautiful frostwork scenes - has not been as wholesome as the clear cold natural to Russia. our doctor has reported more ill than he has known at the beginning of any year before, for it is at the breaking up of the winter the hospitals are most full. Dear old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon is very poorly, the cold she caught in crossing to church on Christmas day has confined her ever since. her friends flock to her, & the poor still obtain admission to pour their tale of sorrow into her sympathising bosom, knowing she will leave no effort untried to interest those who can “go about to do good”<sup>664</sup> & to distribute.

Saturday morning Feb 6th 1847.<sup>665</sup> During this week I have been so incessantly attending upon my dear Jemie & Deborah as only to have been out once & that was last Monday<sup>666</sup> to see my respected & beloved old friend M<sup>rs</sup> Leon. I had sent Mary to her several days to evince the regard I felt, for doct Rogers reported her failing strength from day to day. & at 83 years “when the grasshopper proves a burden”<sup>667</sup> we could scarcely expect even her extraordinarily good constitution to be restored to aught like health. she received me with her usual affection tho it was not easy for her to assume cheerfulness, her cough distressing her & general debility pervading. I offered Marys services by night or day. but as has ever been my own dear Mother - she felt too unwilling to give trouble & has ever been as conspicuous for her neatness and love of order, she embraced me as that dear mother would have done upon my short call being ended tho as I kissed her mouth, she said “Oh dont my dear” I suppose from the dread of infecting me with her cough. The weather had suddenly become so intensely cold (15 deg below zero Farnheit that I could not bear to keep horses or coachman waiting as long as I could have liked to stay besides my invalids at home wanted me. Willie had been seized with one of his attacks of stomach disorder on the evening before & his father had taken him again to be in his room for dear Jemie was not so quiet with me away from him at night. Debo had caught cold in a short walk she took mild as the weather still was on Saturday.<sup>668</sup> Every body rails at this atmosphere of St Petersburg, they say the swamp it is founded upon was never intended for any inhabitants but wolves & bears! certainly people of all classes but especially young girls lose what health they bring to this imperial city & soon assume the appearance of the natives of southern latitudes in my own country. Our dear daughter not feeling able to exercise under a fur shube as she would do with garments suited to a less severe climate has become very fragile, losing appetite & inclination to sleep. this slight cold has brought her to such a feeble state we have suffered great anxiety for her this whole week. I divided my time between her room & Jemies, until she became better & he alas much worse, for a blister has been applied to his chest & his nervous irritability returning I have feared to leave his bed-side. he has been almost in a sitting posture in bed that he might have freer respiration, for two nights I have watched his sleeplessness anxiously. And yet uneasy about his dear Sister being left so much alone in her nervous, low state, I felt thankful that she could leave her room yesterday & well cloaked up I brought her to Jemies where I can watch over these two of my hearts treasures during the long night, & they help to cheer each other in the day. Willie is again well enough to come to table, & amuses himself with Mary & Phedocia in the sewing room as he has no lessons this week & the cold has been too intense for anyone to skate. I am thankful to record that it has moderated during the night, my dear husband having been obliged to leave us directly after breakfast to drive to Alexandrofsky, yesterday he was out much in his open sledge & on calling upon Col Kraffts,<sup>669</sup> he stopped him ere welcoming to have his face rubbed with snow as he detected Jack Frosts finger marks on Whistlers nose & cheeks. our poor Coacher from having been kept hours on his box suffered seriously. my humane husband does not forget man or beast & advised Nicoli to drive into a stable to shelter the ponies & warm himself, but “nichevoov” was the cheerful response of the hardy Russian, and it was not till the exposure to cold in attendance upon his master was over, that he submitted his phiz to our good natured Arnooshka<sup>670</sup> for some cooks=grease to soften its frozen condition, the cold happily for him has decreased from 16 to 1 deg Rom—I have wished much to be able to call at the parsonage of the American chapel these few days past, for the sad reports I have of Mrs Ellerbys nursery make me yearn to see her cherub Emily again. that little one so associated with my own angel Johnie, so nearly the same day of their birth, so much resembling each other in beauty & loveliness I cling to, & yet feel how selfish to wish to detain such here below who are “of the kingdom of heaven.”<sup>671</sup> little darling Emmy has been extremely ill from croup & is still. Elizabeth Ropes interrupted me just as I had written this far while they were cleaning Jemies room & I had stationed myself in the Chancellery to write that Willie might amuse himself with painting landscapes to surprise Jemie afterwards - And now it is an hour before our tea time & we are finishing our morning efforts in the drawing-room while his dear father is sitting between the two dear invalids in the far back chamber. I learnt from Elizabeth today of the death of my revered old acquaintance Mrs Leon.<sup>672</sup> her last words were to Mrs Gellibrand yesterday morning “I hope-I hope!” she gradually became weaker & in the evening when her happy spirit took its flight it was without a throe or a struggle. Doct Rogers was paying his last visit just when the summons came for her departure from this world of trial, he had feared her suffering much at the last, when he saw her yesterday morning. & it must have been a cause of thankfulness to him to witness her peaceful sleep in the arms of death. Doct Rogers was one of the dear old ladys favorites, may God reward him for all his attention to one among the many he attends without earthly compensation. during her illness of last Summer how many times she spoke to me of all his kindness, his respectful attentions, his generous & ingenious pleas for getting all her medicines for her at his apothecaries & then avoiding any settlement with her— at that time God was preparing her for this last sickness no doubt, as her general excellent health was then broken she was obliged to retire more even from her small circle of friends & depend upon the consolations of religion. her dependence upon the righteousness of Christ was entire, she walked humbly with her God & “she did what she could”<sup>673</sup> in His service, being lowly in her own eyes we have full confidence that He has exalted her to the place prepared for those to whom the Judge will say “well done good & faithful servant enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”<sup>674</sup> May my end be like hers. Never while memory lasts shall mine cease to revive the profitable hours I have spent in this dear Mrs Leons society, for her experience was valuable as was her advice to my children. how fond she was of my little Johnnie! & he of Grandma Leon! how shocked she was at my losing him & how soon she has followed him to where all who confess Him here, will be united in Christ Jesus. Doct Rogers who studies every case with great attention was an hour with us today examining our dear James lungs because of many unfavorable symptoms this week, I was detaining a messenger of Mrs Frank Bairds quite unconscious what the contents of the elegant note<sup>675</sup> I held in my hand or from whom, while my heart & head were both aching, as I was engaged in the interesting discussion of my dear boys symptoms, after he had left the sick chamber to question me privately. so many sleepless nights as I have had of late have contributed to make me nervous & I found it a difficult task to answer a polite note of invitation to join a party this evening rather for Debo to join the “at home” at the elegant Mrs Bairds than myself, for I excused myself from attending any, when she called the other day upon us. I had it in my power then to confer a favor upon her by lending the beautiful new foot stool which Mr Winans has lately had made for me - as a model for one to secure her against cold feet in driving about, the Bairds have been uniformly attentive to us & I really congratulated myself upon having it in my power to serve this lady who is in delicate health tho so gay & had searched in vain for a foot stove. But as to her parties I politely declined any infringement upon our quiet family=circle=at homes=truly, for Saturday night, expressing a readiness when dear Debos health should admit to meet her convenience for any other of the five evenings of the week. In this & other cities on the continent of Europe where the Lords day is scarcely reserved for sacred duties, I know my Yankee habit of shutting the business & pleasures of the world from my family circle on Saturday evening would be deemed rather strict, yet I cannot but believe it right to do as we pray on the last day of the week, that all worldly cares may be banished from our minds that we may serve the Lord without distraction on His holy day. & surely one cannot attend a gay scene without involving all the injury of late hours (to servants included who surely ought to have their rest after six days labour. "It is written" that the day of the Crucifixion was the Preparation,<sup>676</sup> the day before the sabbath, and should Christians be careless to take advantage of this observance of Gods peculiar people! Thus it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness,<sup>677</sup> It is so usual to prepare for any fête day, that even members of Christs flock who participate in these pastimes do as others & give many thoughts & conclude arrangements beforehand, to avoid confusion, or loss of time in entering upon the recreation, even tho new schemes of pleasure succeed they are not indifferent as to the anticipated arrangements. But "the children of this world are wiser in their generation"<sup>678</sup> & alas there are few indeed of Christs flock who are as persevering in seeking eternal pleasures, as these are in their eager pursuit after evanescent joys which refresh not the votary, who still pursues them in his search after happiness. Oh that the early habits I strive to give my children may secure them from some of the evils arising from temptations to banish preparation for the sabbath from weekly arrangements. if I could perfect my plan Saturday evening should always be reverted to by us all with the most heartfelt satisfaction of all the six evenings of the week. for surely it could not even be condemned by the world that a family circle should unite in improving each other, with so many interesting memoires or histories to read aloud, after which sacred music would yeild variety & excite devotional feeling, to induce a willingness for family devotion & reading a chapter from the best of books. God would bless us, by giving us yeilding us suitable dispositions for enjoying the succeeding Sabbaths.

Monday [February] 8th As my invalids were late in rising I found it impossible to attend public worship but it was more important Mary should hear Doct Laws sermon in aid of her suffering countrymen & the poor Scotch. Our good Doct made his visit early enough to admit of his going to church which he cannot often, because of his number of sick to visit, but as a Scotsman it was a peculiar duty that he should listen to the charity sermon & give of his abundance to the starving of Ireland & Scotland.<sup>679</sup> My Willie felt happy in nearly emptying his poors purse that he might put in his mite, & Mary received from Jemie his, to add to her own. My husband reported to us how crowded was the church & how touching the truths revealed by the pastor, on the ladys side sobs were audible & even many men wept. we have heard today of a young lady who took off her watch to put in the poors purse another in the same pew kindly offered to lend her money supposing her unprepared & that she might afterwards regret the sacrifice of her watch & trinkets, no she replied "I do not need it" & quietly yeilded it up among the offerings. the collection was about eighteen hundred siver rubles, but this would be paltry in comparison to the collection of six hundred at the Chapel from Mr Ellerbys small & not rich congregation, if it were not understood that the british merchants, who generally belong to D<sup>oct</sup> Laws church are to meet to deliberate upon measures for more extensive subscriptions. Deborah appeared so much better in the afternoon I went to church leaving Mary to aid her in taking care of dear Jemie who is only able to change from bed to the great arm chair. As I had read & prayed with him & dear Sister in the morning, so after our early tea we had a family service for his benefit in his room. I selected another of Arnolds<sup>680</sup> sermons after the reading in the bible & our devotions. And what had the multitude been interested in before the Imperial palace? yesterday was the commencement of the amusements in that great square for this is what is called the butter week, or that preceding Lent. poor deluded people! how imperious is the duty that those who have the lamp of Gods word should let their light shine to guide these darkened souls into the path of wisdom. Oh that the English who can speak in their tongue would venture a word too in season, instead of winking at these errors, & many alas participate in them. May God teach them better ere it be too late.

Tuesday night [February] 9th <sup>681</sup> Watching by my darling James bedside I incline to avail of the stillness of midnight for recording the mercies of Him who never wearies in His Omniscience. May His holy Spirit fill my soul with adoration ere I seek Him in prayer this night. My precious invalid had more refreshing sleep last night than since his relapse, he had suffered exceedingly the past week from blistering, & pain in his chest & side, which induced debility & restlessness. but yesterday I took a drive with Debo - my last had been a week previous, to visit dear old M<sup>rs</sup> Leon - today at noon Whistler & I went to her funeral!<sup>682</sup> it was very respectably attended. many wept to think they should see her in this world no more! M<sup>r</sup>. & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand her constant friends these many years past, were among the mourners. I drove after the funeral to enquire at the parsonage of the Chapel, how M<sup>rs</sup> Ellerbys darling baby did & was thankful to find her improving. On my return home Debo took some young friends a long drive in our sledge, the weather was so mild & bright, she looked quite revived by it, tho still she is feeble & pale. Willie having been a good boy at his books with Sister during the morning, also went out, & preferred walking with Mary, that he might see the amusements in the square. They met the other two little Ellerbys & their nice English nursery maid, who has so long been shut up with the sick baby she must have been glad of the walk with the elder two little girls. It is time for me to seek my pillow tho I am not inclined to sleep. how refreshing it is to me to watch the sweet slumber James has fallen into, he has not looked so natural in a long time, since this attack his sitting posture, propped by many pillows & his extreme palor has recalled his illness in Stonington<sup>683</sup> to my minds eye. with thankfulness that this has been less severe tonight it was my painful task to apply the pomade<sup>684</sup> upon his chest where the blister has just healed. how hard for a mother to give pain to a child! which she would wish to screen from all suffering by any endurance herself. But our heavenly Fathers ordains the trial for us both. May He bless the means for my dear boys recovery. & sanctify the discipline to us both. Never can I cease to recal with joy the spirit of cheerful submission of my darling James to his privations in this back chamber, consecrated as it has become by scenes of trial to me. Especially yesterday his uncomplaining endurance of confinement while Willie was enjoying all the spectacle of the Carnival. he was so free from envy.

Saturday evening. Feb 27th <sup>685</sup> The occasional replies to letters, or daily notes which could not without rudeness be avoided, has been the only writing I could attend to without depriving James of my participation in his enjoyments, for whether reading, or looking thro books of engravings he has so much more satisfaction from my listening to his remarks, that unless when I have engaged his interest in some of my own reading aloud to him, he has claimed mine in the little vanity afforded him in the back room. Each evening between dinner & tea for some days I indulged him with a tale relating to a family in New York, because it combines instruction with amusement. "Hoboken" by Mr Fay<sup>686</sup> now Secretary of our legation at the court of Prussia displays principles of the highest order, & has my best wishes for doing its proportion of good in discountenancing duelling & in supporting the argument of scripture that the fear of God, & the love of immortal souls, is the course of true courage & honor. If God spares the life of my boys I trust they will never forget the lessons early instilled & that they may dare to confess themselves Christians. that they may not by acting without asking Gods direction in prayer upon each stirring event, bring the curse of remorse upon their souls. Never shall I cease to record with thankfulness dear Jemies un murmuring submission these six weeks of his suffering confinement, the doct does not yet consent to using his pencil, which is a great privation - but while pain lingers as it still does in his chest, my darling patient himself agrees that his favorite pastime may be injurious. he begins now to walk some about his room. tho still cannot wear jacket & trowsers, as the blistering is continued on the chest. I altered a dressing gown (which had descended from me to his sister, doing excellent service from the date of his own birth) & it fits him so nicely, he is delighted to wear it when he sits up & says it is "first rate". What a blessing is such a contented temper as his, he is so grateful for every kindness, & scarcely ever expresses a complaint. his sweet Sister - in whose visits to his chamber he delights - borrowed for him a huge volume of Hogarths engravings<sup>687</sup> - of those pictures so famous in the gallery of artistes, we place the immense book on the bed & draw Mr Maxwells great easy chair close up that dear Jemie may feast upon it without fatigue. I expressed surprise to hear him say yesterday while thus engaged, "Oh! how I wish I were well" & said to him I hoped he was not getting impatient of seclusion. "Oh no Mother! he answered cheerfully, "I was only thinking how glad I should be to shew this book of engravings to my drawing master, it is not every one who has a chance of seeing Hogarths own engravings of his originals. & then he added in his own happy way "And if I had not been ill Mother, perhaps no one would have thought of shewing them to me" his dear, kind father is now teaching him chess while I occupy the drawing<sup>688</sup> alone, before tea. I sat by Jemie after dinner, reading him M<sup>r</sup>. Maxwells letter received by todays mail, it contained the touching account of his having attended to the interment of our precious Johnnies body. he had taken it to Stonington himself, thus adding to his friendly actions towards us.<sup>689</sup> I have looked forward thro this whole month to the treat of letters from home by the Steamer of the 1st if my Mother or Kate wrote, it was too late for the mail probably, as Whistler & Debo have many letters from New York. thus deprived of my private supply of home news, I am the more indebted to M<sup>r</sup> Maxwell for his particular mention of all at the dear corner house, all well! hospitable & kind, Doct P – he calls “a fine fellow, his wife one of the amiable & excellent kind, his children such pictures of health it did his heart good to look at them, & M<sup>rs</sup> M<sup>c</sup> N their grandmother an astonishing lady”<sup>690</sup> So now I must hope on thro another long month to see the welcome hand writing of either mother, or Sister. When my head presses my pillow this night I may visit in memory the resting place of our boys at Stonington! for night by night it is my melancholy indulgence to recal them from their narrow beds there to surround me, I think of them as they were, & as they are! yearning to go to them, yet trying only to wish that God may give me grace to improve my allotted term this side the grave, to be ready to follow them. I suppose I have the same desire for heavenly scenes, as my enthusiastic little Jemie has for travelling thro Italy, Egypt &c, yet when looking thro a volume of American sketches today to gratify him, I felt natural longings to visit the beautiful places of our own native land with my children, & to see again ere I bid adieu to earth, the many I love there, tho so painfully feeling this four years separation from Mother, Sisters & friends, my most forwent hope is that our hearts are united in love to our Saviour then we shall have consolation, even if death overtake us, that our meeting shall be in heavenly mansions, to part no more, forever! & ever. Ah how can any one professing to love Jesus, so love this worlds enticements as to let its follies, prevent their honoring Him supremely before all the world! “Who so loveth the world, the love of the Father is not in him”<sup>691</sup> Ah do those who indulge in worldly vanities, forget the divine admonition “to strive to enter in at the straight gate, & to keep the narrow path?”<sup>692</sup> “Be ye seperate from the world.”<sup>693</sup> Holy Spirit quicken us in repentance unto newness of life!<sup>694</sup> My excellent friend M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand who is ever active in benevolence & christian duty has added to her routine, since the death of our respected M<sup>rs</sup> Leon, the settlement of her affairs, as the beloved old lady had outlived all her relatives M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> G seem most interested to execute her wishes, her furniture & clothing to be sold for the poor or distributed to the few of her pensioners. It was I well remember her humble yet exalted aim to do all the good in her power. "She has done what she could"<sup>695</sup> was among her favorite texts. M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrand wishes some one could write the memoires of this remarkable old lady, it would indeed be very interesting, even the few items I have become intimate with, will ever be pleasant reminiscences, because I shall always associate her own lively manner & intellectual remarks, her high regard for traits of good encountered in her extensive knowledge of the world.<sup>696</sup> she was the neice of the discoverer of Vaccination, Doct Jenner<sup>697</sup> - her maiden name having been the same, when a very young girl - she was an only child & her father a man of superior endowments had educated her with undivided attention to intellectual accomplishments - while her mother added practical instruction in the art of housewifery &c - she accompanied her Uncle to Paris & was so much in the same circle as our Franklin<sup>698</sup> who was then American ambassador at the court of France, that he always addressed her as his child, she could relate many anecdotes connected with the sufferings of the Royal family of Louis 16th & had been eye witness to many exciting scenes of public interest. Whether she was introduced at the court in either of her visits to the french capital I did not ascertain, but her usual deportment shewed she had been accustomed to the best society. Her husband was an officer in the British Army, she lived in the West Indies & at other stations abroad, & her travels used to remind me of those of my own Mother. Upon the death of her father, her husband & her children, her aged mother having only a limited income, & herself without independent support, she sought to make her talents useful & was recommended by a lady of her acquaintance among the English nobility, to a very distinguished Polish family<sup>699</sup> who were then seeking an English governess for their daughter Olga. M<sup>rs</sup> Leon went to their princely home in Poland where they remained awhile, but eventually came to St Petersburg to complete the education of their children. they occupied a Palace<sup>700</sup> - which is now converted into a charitable institution, for it is forty years since the beautiful Countess gave her fêtes there - thus M<sup>rs</sup> Leon was accustomed to meet the court circle of Imperial St Petersburg for she was usually mistress of ceremonies, she was familiar with the reigns of Paul & of Alexander as of the present Emperor & abounded in anecdotes of each in turn. she never wearied of talking about the graces of mind & person of the beautiful, the charitable, the generous high-minded noble Countess. & was enthusiastic in her admiration & attachment to her own pupil Olga. but at the time this noble family must leave St P to travel, M<sup>rs</sup> Leon met with a fall, which caused a temporary lameness & prevented her accompanying them. Tho a sad dissappointment to her at the time, no doubt it will be seen in the state of rewards in a world where trials are fully comprehended – that it was wisely ordered that her prosperity should be darkened that her whole dependence might be placed on her Saviour. For her savings also thro the dishonesty of an agent were lost to her – and she had in every situation of her life managed to contribute to the comforts of her mother – As she never of course gave me any direct narrative of her chequered life, of course I cannot be sure, but I think she took a situation in the Naarishkin<sup>701</sup> family upon her recovery from the sprain which had been so serious as to confine her two years. during which period of privation she realized the comfort of having many true friends among her own Countrymen here.

In course of time she was induced to undertake the office of house keeper to M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrand – previous to his first marriage<sup>702</sup> & when he resided in Moscow – she remained five years in that capacity & from all accounts few ever manage admirably as did M<sup>rs</sup> Leon, in the drawing room & larder, —I have listened to her tell of her nice dinner & wish now I had noted down some of her receipts. After M<sup>r</sup> G brought a wife from England, she took no other situation, but aided by the English Factory here, lived respected in private lodgings, going about doing good among the poor, or visiting her few intimate friends, the usual employment when spending the day out. was making lint for the hospitals. & how neat she was about it, with the linen cut in squares, & every shred so carefully kept from the carpet. M<sup>rs</sup> Snow<sup>703</sup> kindly invited the dear old lady to remove to her home last Autumn, for the decay of nature was visible, & her last year in the Galernia had been one of comparative seclusion from a painful disorder attacking her. How much we all miss our revered visiter!

Saturday morning March 1/13th Before our Pratchka<sup>704</sup> brings up the baskets of clothes from our fortnights wash for me to sort & put away, I may scribble awhile in my journal – as Willie recited his lessons to me previous to his going to sit for his portrait to Koritzky at the Academy of Fine Arts.<sup>705</sup> Whistler has gone again to the rail road station. expecting to meet the Count & accompany him to Colpina, tho I shall not be surprised to learn, his Highness<sup>706</sup> having again postponed his survey of the road, as he has several days in succession found an excuse, & today there being a royal christening at the winter palace his presence may be in requisition there. the infant Grand Duke of the Leughtenberg branch is named Eugene,<sup>707</sup> with the usual grand ceremony. I went last tuesday<sup>708</sup> with my Willie to witness the funeral procession of the Prince Vassiltchikoff a person of the highest rank at the Russian court – he was aged 69 years, “was Aide-camp General – President General &c of the Empire” & one in whom the Emperor had such confidence, he remarked at his death he had lost his last familiar friend.<sup>709</sup> We did not venture within the church, but our coachman selected an excellent stand for our sledge, where the suns power was not lost upon us, the weather being extremely cold we were glad not only to be in a favorable position for seeing the procession, but for a sheltered warm place. we had a fine view of the Emperor & his suite both as they passed thro the military on their way to the church & coming out. his majesty was saluted with a stunning hizza by all the troops & then silence reigned, he looked nobly in full uniform & wore no cloak, cold tho the weather was. The Metropolitan or Pope of the Greek church with all the high Clergy preceded the gorgeously decorated hearse, all of them walking in solemn procession bare-headed with their long hair flowing in the wind, the Metropolitan only, wore a jewelled crown, about twenty orders which had been worn no doubt with pride by the distinguished man whom the Emperor had delighted to honor – were carried by as many officers of rank, upon scarlet, or crimson, velvet cushions. the coffin was covered with scarlet & gold, a high canopy of gilded ornament exposing it to view. The Emperor crossed himself repeatedly as he gave a last look at the remains of his faithful old friend, for the weather did not encourage him to follow in the procession to the Smolna Monastery,<sup>710</sup> where the burial was appointed, he therefore stationed himself at the head of the Nevski (leading to his own palace & received the salute of the cavalry as they passed after the hearse, we had an excellent view of him as he was thus motionless as a statue for about fifteen minutes, his brother the Grand Duke Michel, the Herétier, the Count Klienmichel & others of the Imperial family around him. The Emperor & suite dashed down the Nevski as soon as the procession crossed it, servants stationed there took their horses while they no doubt were glad to take to their equipages which had been in waiting, for the cold was intense. Willie & I were twice glad when we reached our home, that we had seen so grand a pageant & that it was over, for our faces were nearly frost bitten. I had never had so satisfactory a sight of the magnificent Emperor before, so close to him & for such a length of time. when I reached home, I was welcomed by dear Jemie, who has all this week gone to the drawing room for half the day, his father was keeping him company on the sofa, from having caught a severe cold some days before indeed Debo & I will not soon forget when her dear father was detained from us so many anxious hours when we had waited dinner & tea in vain, and at last midnight overtook us & we were still watching & fearing some sad accident, he reached our fire side at one o'clock, had had nothing to eat from early breakfast with us, until midnight at Mr Harrisons at Alexandrofsky, tho only a snow drift on a part of the rail road from thence to Colpina had detained them,<sup>711</sup> I hoped he might be spared another day of such exposure to cold, the poor Russians who work on the road are all serfs, badly clad & not in any way efficient, they are whipped if they run into difficulties in working the Engine which thro their ignorance they often do & no rewards are held out to them if they do better, their fare black bread & salt, yet Whistler says he never saw more cheerful fellows, tho those who understand them best – Russians themselves – say they are but ye<sup>712</sup> servants & must be watched & beaten. but Whistler thinks they must – to succeed with their road – adopt a more civilized system. I was very much astonished by a summons to our servants apartments yesterday to see poor Parsha,<sup>713</sup> when she went away with her husband last autumn to his mothers cottage 700 versts on the road to Archangel I thought we should never see her in this world again, she was then in miserable health & he appeared to be in the prime of manhoods vigour, now she is a widow! he was ill only a week. her own health has been restored & his widowed mother is kind to her, so she is going back to live with her for a year, to pray over her husbands grave she says, & then to enter a convent, for life! poor Parsha & I mingled our tears.

Wednesday March 23rd On Friday last my husband took Debo & myself across the river to see the highly extolled paintings being exhibited all last week at the Academy of fine arts. the production of Russian Artists<sup>714</sup> most of them purchased by the Emperor for his palace, most beautiful they are, marine peices, one in which is pourtrayed Peter the Great standing on a rocky coast with a few trusty peasants bearing torches. the light from these thrown upon his figure & theirs is wonderful. they have fires blazing upon the rocks as if to warn the fleet in the storm, to keep of from so dangerous a shore. For this successful effort of the native Artist the Emperor has given him 4000 silver rubles.<sup>715</sup> Views of Constantinople – of Odessa upon the Black Sea – of Cronstadt & other sea ports upon which the sun gilds the water magnificently or the moonbeams play upon the waves<sup>716</sup> all delighted us in turn. I only regretted dear James could not have accompanied us. the crowd was so great we did not stay as long as we should have liked & Mr & Mrs Harrison<sup>717</sup> whom we met there accompanied us home & spent the day. Willie & Mary were just entering the Academy as we left it, our darling Will had been in Koritzkies room in the 3rd story of that building all the morning sitting for his portrait.<sup>718</sup> In the evening of Friday Debo had a musical circle. Saturday the weather continued so bright & mild I obtained the docts consent to taking James a drive, his first airing in nine weeks!<sup>719</sup> the sledging is now nearly broken up for the thaw has continued uninterrupted for a week past. Willie & I walked directly after breakfast today & made the circuit of the Gostinandva. great preparations for the Palm market which commences tomorrow<sup>720</sup> – We met several Droschkys in the Nevski, the first this season – Jemie is now taking a promenade with his Sister on the English quai. his father not yet returned from Alexandrofsky, he went there upon the rail road in attendance upon a party from the Winter palace. the Grand Duke Michel & staff, have gone to visit the American works.<sup>721</sup> during the last fortnight Whistler has been incessantly required to be upon the peice of rail road 16 miles long been<sup>722</sup> St Petersburg & Colpina, because of the desire expressed by the Count Klienmichel to have every thing connected with it in complete order for a visit from the Emperor – first the Count went himself & was well pleased, with the fabric at Alexandrofsky as with the ease with which he travelled thither upon the rail road. such a bright array of fine Locomotives as were exhibited at the works were no every day sight, 108 in number, freshly painted & cleaned. Our countrymen expended about three thousand silver rubles in preparations for the oft deferred visit of the Emperor. however last Wednesday<sup>723</sup> they were fully compensated for all their trouble by the entire satisfaction he expressed, he was attended of course by the Count K as he is chief of the rail road department – the Héretier, the Grand duke Constantine & many of the Court, my husband was distinguished by an invitation to ride in the car with this royal cortége. the Emperor was exceedingly affable towards him, & put the question to him “could the rail road be opened to Moscow in two years more? Whistler answered in the affirmative without hesitation. The very possibility of such an event makes my heart bound homeward! & I do trust every facility will be given to the progress of the work henceforward. it is the only favor I would ask the Emperor. Winans was Engineer on the day of his majestys visit. At the works a wheel was cast in the Imperial presence, which is to bear the date &c in a suitable inscription. The Cars, the Locomotives, the shops & the hundreds of workmen appearing to the best advantage, were subjects by turns of the Emperors eulogium, when he spoke of the latter as fine fellows he added “but they will get drunk sometimes! what a pity they make beasts of themselves!” The day after his visit to the American works.<sup>724</sup> the Count held a levee, my husband having been invited, went with a supply of documents for the Count supposing (as he had previously urged despatch) they would be demanded but by the advice of his friend Col Melnikoff, put them in a corner till called for. When the Count summoned Whistler to a private audience in an inner apartment, he met him with marked kindness, kissed him on each side his face & hung an ornament, suspended by a scarlet ribbon around his neck, saying, the Emperor thus conferred upon him the order of St Anne – second class –<sup>725</sup> Whistler, as such honors are new to republicans – felt abashed when he returned with the Count to the large circle in the outer room & was congratulated by the officers generally - even the servants as he went out of the palace congratulated him - his friends Cols Melnikoff & Crafts were promoted to the rank of Major Gen.<sup>1</sup> <sup>726</sup> Our countrymen from Alexandrofsky have brought in the magnificent diamond ring each has received from the Emperor, to exhibit to us, the three rings have been made for them purposely. for they are precisely alike & each valued at a thousand silver rubles.<sup>727</sup> I tell them they should have them converted into broaches, for their wives – tho I am sure I should feel such a jewel inappropriate to my own retired station & could not be tempted to wear such.

[Thursday] April 15th <sup>728</sup> The Influenza rages in this city at present, we have had four cases in our limited family circle, but thank God my dear husband is again so far recovered as to go out & attend to his duties, & our precious boys tho still taking cough medicine are well enough to study & to play in doors tho they must not venture into the damp atmosphere, our poor Pratchka still keeps her bed, she was so ill last Saturday as to send for her pastor who administered the Sacrament to her & her friends who wept around her bed supposing she must die. Doct Rogers has himself been a case, he says he has not any season before known this epidemic so violent or universal, not a family he attends without its victims & so suddenly are they seized, that a gentleman told him one day, where he expected to meet a large dinner party 30 excuses were sent in at the last hour. Gen.<sup>1</sup> Melnikoff had just left a friend dying with Grip when he called to ask after Whistler this morning & he tells many are daily dying from its effects, he himself had high fever & was delirious. Debo & I went in our neighbourhood yesterday to make a few visits, for all our acquaintance have some sick Sarah Merriellees<sup>729</sup> is still dangerously so. & her mother & aunt so exhausted from watching they have a Soeur de Charité to nurse the dear girl whose fever is obstinate & delirium continues. I have offered, now that my invalids need me not, to relieve the watchers around her bed — And this moment have had a note describing the accumulation of sorrows pressing upon that good family, Sarah no better. M<sup>rs</sup> M confined to her bed, two of their servants ill & two leaving their posts. also the Sœur de Charité so unwell she must go too. I wait my husbands return to gain his consent to my aiding them by watching tonight. Debo & I ventured only to the front door this morning intending a walk, but we met our good doct, who recommended an umbrella, we turned back frightened by the shower of half snow, half rain. which drenches the streets, the ice in the Neva looks so black & spongy it must soon break up. It is needless to rail against the climate tho a Russian officer said to me today “how can any be healthy in this climate, we have six deg of heat today & had fifteen deg of cold day before yesterday”<sup>730</sup>

[Monday] May 10th We remarked to each other yesterday as we sought the shady side to walk from church the great change in the weather since the Sunday before<sup>731</sup> when we were glad to wrap our shubes around us. The ice in the Neva very unexpectedly began to yeild on tuesday & entirely broke up on Wednesday.<sup>732</sup> immediately upon its disappearance the air felt like Summer. On Friday<sup>733</sup> I ventured to take my boys out to walk how glad we all were to have their long embargo over, we walked along the quai (& were hailed by M<sup>rs</sup> Gwyer<sup>734</sup> who sat by her open window) I took my boys thro the boulevard of the Admiralty for we had heard of the Emperors daily reviews, in the space between that & the Winter palace, we pressed close to two officers who were making their way thro the crowd & obtained a good place. a gentleman decorated with many Orders was very flattering in his notice of our little, polite, Willie, who replied to his questions in french promptly tho with becoming modesty. We had as fine a view of the Emperor reviewing a regiment of [blank space left for its name]<sup>735</sup> as any one could have across so wide a space, soon we observed a lady & children upon one of the balconies of the palace kissing their hands to the emperor & then perceived a little boy of about five years of age run from the palace to the Emperor, who lifted him to kiss many times & continued to shake his little grand sons hand as he went on with the review. This the eldest born of the Héritier will be seated on the throne of all the Russias if he survives his father, who is quite young still.<sup>736</sup> The Journal last week announced the betrothal of the Grand Duke Constantine to a princess of Germany.<sup>737</sup> which country seems to be the nursery for all the crowned heads of Europe to keep up the seed of royalty. Again this spring there has been a christening at the Winter Palace chapel, another son to, the Heritiér.<sup>738</sup> with cannonading & illumination succeeding a banquet

[Wednesday] May 19th I did not forget this anniversary of my dear husbands birthday, tho I had nothing but a kiss to offer him, never shall I forget how tenderly he returned my embrace, my heart was too full for utterance but I could pour it ought in thanks to God for giving me such a husband & pray for blessings on his path. Oh how earnestly do I pray our hearts may be united in our Saviour, then our love for each other & for our dear children will take a deeper a holier hue, then shall we be one throughout Eternity We had a circle of neighbours around our fireside last evening.<sup>739</sup> dear M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand whispered me her best wishes for many returns of this day, as she drank the majors health. When Debo & I came in from a walk today how surprised we were to find gifts from her dear father to each of us, for her a splendid work box, a musical one, with her first gold thimble, for me as beautiful a desk, as my first Russian Christmas gift was, completely filled with the finest writing materials.<sup>740</sup> but gratified as I feel by Whistlers kindness, the fact of having lost the other will make me too careful of this to enjoy it, I shall ask him to allow me to change the desk for a watch, which will be always carried about me. I must not omit to mention the neat french notes our dear boys wrote their father on his birth day<sup>741</sup> & presented with suitable gifts which I had bought as the Demidoff<sup>742</sup> to gratify their wish for something to give! We shall always remember the opening of the first 16 miles of the Moscow & Petersburg rail road to the public as it took place upon Whistlers 47th birth day.<sup>743</sup> all winter Cars have been running upon it, but only for the convenience of the rail road department.

Wednesday [May] 21st <sup>744</sup> The weather has been unseasonably cold for many days, since the passing of vast quantities of ice from Lake Ladoga. I never saw as much any season before, the winds have been unfavorable to its passing from the harbour, where quite a fleet of merchant vessels have been hemmed in, many suffering seriously, some wrecked & all dreading being run ashore. the report has been that 300 were waiting to get in to Cronstadt,<sup>745</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Prince has been most uneasy about the fate of the Zephyr. Capt Leach - in which his brother Ben is 2nd Mate.<sup>746</sup> The English Steamers arrived today, their first trip this season, & the Stettin boat brought not only our Ambassador M<sup>r</sup>.

Ingersoll,<sup>747</sup> but our Springfield neighbours the Bliss family<sup>748</sup> took us by surprise. They look & act so naturally it is quite reviving to have them come into our fire side circle

Friday [May] 23rd! This is St Nicholas day, my husband was off after a hurried breakfast (as he has been obliged several mornings this week) to be at the Depot by eight oclock – when he returned to dinner he reported that a thousand passengers had gone by the 1st train, six hundred by the next. in the next train probably as many & the three trains to return this evening, makes a good beginning. The poor who resort annually to Colpina, (on this day to be cured of diseases at the shrine of this patron Saint, so the popular tradition<sup>749</sup>)

Preston. Lancashire. England. June 26th 1847 Saturday. It is a fortnight this afternoon<sup>750</sup> since I landed with my dear boys at Hull from Hamburg & I must record this period ere I review the weeks which preceded our setting out from St Petersburg upon this Summers tour. The first day of our voyage from Hamburg had been so rough as to make all the passengers sea sick but myself & some cause there was for stopping the boat in the night & cooling the engine to examine it, which caused us uneasiness for a little, & detained us so that we did not land as early as the Capt had expected.<sup>751</sup> The custom=house=officers were so polite as to give us no trouble about our trunks, they merely opened them & took our word that we had nothing to smuggle. We were made very comfortable at the Vittoria Hotel.<sup>752</sup> having brought letters to Mr Bamford,<sup>753</sup> from Mr Ropes, his clerk was very useful to me in exchanging Russian gold into sovereigns for me & advising about our reaching York by the mail train Sunday,<sup>754</sup> as the last train had left Hull for Scarborough ere we arrived, & equally strangers in Hull as in York, I greatly preferred attending divine service at the latter place, so after a nice tea we went early to rest, & were called by six oclock as it would have been a sad disappointment to have missed the only train, any but that for the mail not running on sunday. We took tickets for the 1st class & thus comfortably travelled two hours before breakfast. admiring the verdure of the country, the hawthorn yet being in full bloom & all nature so lovely in the early sabbath morning. I felt we could not be doing wrong in going such a distance to church, for we knew no one in Hull to tell us where to go, & to attend York minster<sup>755</sup> any one would make greater efforts than we did by an hours earlier rising. Arrived at the Station house<sup>756</sup> we left our heaviest luggage to be locked up in the office, & went to the Royal Hotel<sup>757</sup> the nearest to the Minster. "Ettridges"<sup>758</sup> is an old establishment, my sister Eliza is delighted that I selected the very house she went to when a girl she visited York. They gave us an excellent, Yorkshire breakfast,<sup>759</sup> after which we prepared for church. Never shall I forget the feelings of reverence with which I entered the Minster, the service just commenced.<sup>760</sup> the pew opener gave us one of the best pews, where we could hear every part of the beautiful service equally well, the chaunting was finer than any I ever heard in english. I was glad the prayers were not chaunted & the sermon was excellent, so that I have never enjoyed the worship of the sanctuary more. My whole soul seemed melted by the goodness of God whose arm had led us safely across the seas, tho perils had menaced us the past week & I contrasted the sabbath previous to this,<sup>761</sup> when on board the Russian steamer we had scarcely found a quiet spot to read our bibles in, & where we had seen card tables surrounded by scoffers of the Lords day. We dined early & found the young lamb & asparagus quite a treat, for when we left Russia ten days before<sup>762</sup> not any signs of vegetation presented. Associating my early favorites Kate Prince & her Sainted Sister<sup>763</sup> with the Manor at York we begged to be directed to its grounds & the head waiter, an old & most respectable looking man walked with us to the gate of what are now the grounds of the Museum, that we might see the ruins of St Marys Abbey<sup>764</sup> until church time. we became so much interested we wished we had one more day to spend there, the Manor-school house where my young friends L & K P had been educated is now a school for the Blind,<sup>765</sup> its seclusion, yet so enclosed by the extensive grounds render it a most desirable place for a seminary. the building looks like a nunery & very probably was. Oh how beautiful are the ruins of the Abbey with their drapery of Ivy in the midst of what is now a highly cultivated garden! we could scarcely persuade Jemie to leave them so eager was he to explore deeper than bare walls & fine windows. It was a showery day, yet we went again to the Minster in the afternoon. & were early enough to walk around it & see the out side of the Deans Palace.<sup>766</sup> I was sorry the weather had not admitted of my going as I had been advised by a lady who sat in the same pew with me in the morning - to hear a Mr Treevers<sup>767</sup> in the Pavement, & the more so, I regretted not going to hear this celebrated preacher, because the 2nd service at the minster broke the spell of the 1st. A spirit of worldliness was evinced by the pew opener who was rude until I gave him a shilling & then he was cringing. I felt pained too by the crowd of idle children playing on the porch ere the doors were opened to admit us. & when in the pew, ladies rudely seized the cushions from us to kneel at their devotions, & made us feel as intruders in the house of God. I thanked them for the seats we were allowed to retain, ere we left their pew. dear Jemie was so fatigued we took him back to our hotel & left him on the sofa to rest, while I took Willie & Mary to “All Saints church” but we were an hour too early & thinking that we must allot time for a good nights rest in anticipation of our early start, we felt obliged to leave this very old church tho I longed to worship in it & to profit by the eloquence of its pastor We reached Scarbro<sup>768</sup> to breakfast. went in the 2nd class carriages tho Jemies pride was wounded by so doing. I was much diverted by the talk among the farmers who were our fellow travellers, and glad to hear there never was a better prospect of fine crops in England than this season. Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for all his goodness & declare His works to their children!<sup>769</sup> I was advised by a young farmer (who was going to a cattle fair ere we reached Scarbro<sup>770</sup> – to go to the Temperance House<sup>771</sup> there. and most comfortable we were the few hours we occupied a parlor for breakfasting & a bed room for making our toilettes. When our boys were made neat I sent them to seek M<sup>rs</sup> Wilsons cottage N<sup>o</sup> 5 on the Cliff,<sup>772</sup> as in the list of visiters, in the journal, our landlord discovered M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes lodgings to be there.<sup>773</sup> My kind friend soon came back with my boys & was accompanied by her mother,<sup>774</sup> we all accompanied them immediately to their cottage on the Cliff. my first hour there was devoted to writing my dear husband as the foreign mail was to close at the end of that time & M<sup>rs</sup> R had also a letter to finish to her husband, so we sat side by side at our desks. I cannot at this distance record how our week there was spent. my boys enjoyed every thing, the weather was rather showery, but the soil soon became dry & they exercised on the beach, or upon the cliffs, walking or upon ponies, or in looking for Cornelians<sup>775</sup> or pretty pebbles or shells. the little Rope’s out of doors from morning till night, darling Willy with his attentive Naanooshka<sup>776</sup> always the first object to be seen on the beach as I opened my window to look out. this sweet infant is ever associated with my own angel Johnie, & what a contrast his present healthful appearance, to his frail state in S.<sup>t</sup> Petersburg last year, when mine was so blooming! I rejoice for my friend that her Willie is such a picture of health. & I am assured that my darling is blooming in paradise.” but my tears always flowed as I felt my bereavement while M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes fondled her little one. I was very far from feeling well myself at Scarbro, & thankful to be allowed to stay by the fire side alone, while all went out to benefit by the sea air. I exerted myself to walk one afternoon with dear M<sup>rs</sup> Hall, we talked of her sainted Emily,<sup>777</sup> this christian mother has never lamented her own loss, or attributed it to the effects of a bad climate or any evil chance she feels that God had a hidden purpose of mercy in the sudden bereavement. I never saw M<sup>rs</sup> Hall’s countenance otherwise than cheerful, yet no mirth around her could excite her to laugh. love reigned in the family circle at the cottage, & we left them with regret, my heart filled with gratitude that I had been enabled to visit them & for all the kindness.

South Shore of Blackpool.<sup>778</sup> on the Lancashire coast. July 28th 1847. Wednesday. I shall begin this second day of our visit to this bathing place a review of the interval, during which I have been either too unwell to write more than my correspondence with absent dear ones required, or I have been visiting different friends who have interfered with this task. But my Sister Alicia advises me to take this opportunity for scribbling my thoughts, for she has companions in my boys & I am not quite strong enough to brave the high wind, which they say puts them in a glow as they walk upon the beach, the surf is rages. often during the last night the roaring of the waves awoke me & when I came down to breakfast this morning, Betty<sup>779</sup> expressed the fear that our good Mary had felt the sea too rough on her voyage from Ireland to Liverpool, she left Preston more than a month ago to visit her native land, & wrote of her wish to return about this time, May God bring her in safety to us! the day before she went, she was most devoted to me for I was obliged to keep my bed, the chills which had been daily creeping thro me, ended in fever, but tho some gentle doses of medicine prescribed by doctor Winstanley<sup>780</sup> in a measure relieved me, it was not till we were obliged to summon a surgeon<sup>781</sup> to Jemie when we were on a visit at Mr Picards<sup>782</sup> in Kirby Lonsdale,<sup>783</sup> that my symptoms were deemed serious enough to warrant calomel,<sup>784</sup> for my Sister Eliza had made up her mind my ailment was mental, it was not so entirely, for ever since that time I have been gradually gaining strength & my appetite is now as good as need be. How favored have we been in a fine season! & how abundant the provision for the suffering state of this country, made by the bountiful Giver, in this fruitful season, such crops of hay as we have seen gathered in are indeed unusual & now the corn fields are as promising of plenty, while the potatoe fields are yeilding healthy crops, & every green vegetable is cheap in the markets. God grant that His relenting goodness may make the lively impressions it ought upon the hearts of all classes in this favored land of gospel light. Well might Mr MacGrath<sup>785</sup> say in the eloquent appeal I heard him make in the Walton church,<sup>786</sup> that a lesson had been sent Britian in the calamities of Ireland, he touched upon the day of humiliation appointed by the queen some few months back<sup>787</sup> – & besought them to continue their supplications to the King of kings & to study his word & walk in the fear of bringing down His judgements. he was pleading for the sunday & parish schools of Walton where he was once pastor<sup>788</sup> with only an open bible in his hand & his arguments were irresistable. for the study of that volume was recommended as the foundation of all education. I had heard this man of God 17 years ago! My boys attention was rivetted & they did not forget the preaching of this eloquent Irish clergyman. for some weeks afterwards when we attended Worsley church at the seat of the Earl of Ellesmere & we had as impressive a discourse, they seem pleased to discover the preacher there also was an Irish protestant,<sup>789</sup> But I must go back to the Sunday at Walton (which is only three miles from Preston) that I may not only record it as my darling Jemies 13th birth day. but dwell upon the hospitality extended to us from Mr Swainsons<sup>790</sup> family, we lunched at his house & as Mr MCG is his son in law profited by his conversation between services & went back to the family pew<sup>791</sup> to hear him preach to a full congregation of poor - in the afternoon again. We resisted an invitation to dinner for five oclock as we preferred returning home to tea. We walked thro green meadows & by the Ribble side. Aunt E had taken my boys home in her carriage, so Aunt A & I had a delightful tête a tête upon the comforts of religion & I was not fatigued by my first long walk. my boys reported to me that they had gone to Uncle Ws pew alone in the afternoon, as Aunt E could not leave her guest M<sup>rs</sup> T Ainsworth<sup>792</sup> alone all day, & when I heard too that many had called to pay their compliments to her, I was the more thankful I had been with those who had held religious counsel all day. both M<sup>rs</sup> MacGrath & her sister in law M<sup>rs</sup> W Swainson<sup>793</sup> tho young & beautiful appear decided followers of the Lord Jesus. And so I should hope is the interesting M<sup>rs</sup> T. A of Flish<sup>794</sup> for her father was a minister of the church of Scotland<sup>795</sup> but as the wife of a Unitarian, she must not speak of the Saviour!<sup>796</sup> her health is impaired & she has known many afflictions lately in the loss of sisters by consumption & the death of one of her own beautiful little boys.<sup>797</sup> she has two left, of the ages of 5 & 3.<sup>798</sup> oh that these little ones may be trained as Christs lambs! yet it is fearful to think that the christian mother may not confess Him before men, as her Lord & her God. “Yoke not yourselves to unbelievers”<sup>799</sup> for such shall have trouble in the flesh” I must not pass over our sojourn of a week at Kirkby Lonsdale at the beginning of this month. my sister Alicia remained in Preston because the carriage would only accommodate comfortably M<sup>r</sup> W. Aunt E my boys & self. the coachmans wife<sup>800</sup> sometimes exchanged seats with me, that I might have a better view of the charming country thro which we journeyed, especially when we entered Westmoreland where the scenery becomes so diversified. Willie & Jemie rode by turns on the dickey with me. & George had much to say to us, for he is still a very important personage in the household of Uncle W. having been in his service thirty years. his wife Mary is one of the best attendants upon table I ever met with & her plate is the admiration of all the visitors at her masters table, she made herself equally useful at M<sup>r</sup> Picards, where we were welcomed to an early tea. We had set out exactly at seven oclock from Preston after a very early breakfast, & as was it was in the hottest weather we have experienced, we rested three hours at Lancaster, which gave us leisure to go into the old church<sup>801</sup> - for it happened to be open for morning prayers - & to look at the monument to the memory of L Richmonds mother in this church yard.<sup>802</sup> but I am in error, now I recollect this visit to the old church at Lancaster was on our return from Kirby Lonsdale I ought not to forget that upon our journey to Westmoreland, neither Jemie or I were well enough to walk about Lancaster in the heat of the day, tho he wished much to persuade Aunt Eliza to allow himself & Willie to go to the court house<sup>803</sup> where he had seen a mob gather & where he understood a case was to be tried. to divert him from this fancy, she persuaded him she wished him to take her likeness,<sup>804</sup> & fell asleep while sitting for it to him! she pronounced it very satisfactory & lest it should be rubbed out (for it was in a book of Willies, she washed the page with milk & as I should have expected soiled it completely We stopped to bate the horses at a village called Hornby between Lancaster & Kirby L & had time to walk thro the beautiful grounds around the Castle of the same name,<sup>805</sup> we followed the course of the river Lune upon which Lancaster is situated all our journey. “the crook of the Lune” is famed for its beauty, & from this point the route became more & more attractive enclosed by hills & abounding in wood, rich fields of grain, or meadow land, “it was hay making season” & the air was perfumed. Kirby Lonsdale is most beautifully situated upon the Lune, embosomed in hills, tho excepting the church which is surrounded by its burying ground<sup>806</sup> & on the river bank, the town itself is not picturesque.<sup>807</sup> Mr Picards house I remarked before it was pointed out as the home of my old friend Elizabeth W<sup>808</sup> as the nicest looking in the street, central yet not public, she stood at her door to welcome us & to introduce me as the only stranger to her husband, their only child a little fellow in his fifth year,<sup>809</sup> was soon on the most intimate terms with the “little boys” as he styled Jemie & Willie. they went to the river side to fish together day by day or played horse thro the garden. & were equally sorry when the last days companionship came round. I could not tempt my boys from their gambols with little John Richard, to accompany our large party in the carriage or on foot upon the various excursions we made in the environs of Kirby. one afternoon indeed Willie went to the ornamented grounds of Casterton,<sup>810</sup> for “Lala” or Isabel Simpson<sup>811</sup> - took Johnie & we found room to squeeze his little cousins Mary & Meggie<sup>812</sup> in the carriage, as only Miss Simpson went besides my sister E & I. M<sup>ES</sup> Picard remained at home with the gents & Jemie chose to be with them. the children were far more intent upon finding wild strawberries on the sides of the elevation, than upon views, the garden was like a fairy scene, for it was the height of the season for roses. Each successive afternoon my sister ordered the carriage to some new point over at Casterton, the village connected with the lordly manor & called by the same name is like a picture with its neat cottages covered with vines & their little flower gardens enclosing each. the schools & church of Casterton are far famed,<sup>813</sup> but the reality exceeded all the descriptions I had listened to, they are situated on very high ground, yet hills rise far above them, the grounds under cultivation are very extensive, & the variety of flowers the verdure of wood & meadow surrounding the chaste style of architecture made it indeed like fairy land. we walked around the pretty church which seems rather in a flower garden than burial ground, tho in fact the beds are infants graves - for an infant. school is connected with that for the education of the daughters of indigent clergymen- & some black marble tomb stones marked the resting places of some taken in their youth to Eternity. yet flowers bloomed gaily & roses of every variety were trained around their graves. The owner of Casterton<sup>814</sup> having understood from our surgeon<sup>815</sup> that strangers - guests of M<sup>r</sup> Picard - were admirers of his great taste & his benevolent spirit - sent thro M<sup>r</sup> Whitaker an invitation to us to ascend still higher his elevated & highly ornamented grounds, even to visit his gardens enclosing his own lordly mansion & to see his conservatories, as his roses were in perfection, we could not resist the temptation & spent the last afternoon in wandering about them & certainly were amply repaid for any exertion. I cannot enumerate the variety of roses in that parterre, but there was every shade & size from almost black, to pure white, from the tiny Scotch hundred leaf to the Cabbage, some hung in festoons, some covered bowers & every bed was luxuriant. we drove from Casterton to the other side of Kirby to call upon some ladies<sup>816</sup> who had invited us to tea, & here I found more to interest me, in the bee hives. we had scarcely returned to the town when one of the Misses Tomlinson sent a servant laden with their honied spoils, a tin case filled with virgin honey in the white comb. for my share I was much obliged. This same kind hearted spinster had given my Sister an engraving to send me because of its resemblance to my angel Charlie.<sup>817</sup> It was the wish of Sister Eliza that I should thank Miss T when she first called to see us, but I could not do so in general conversation, & ere I could wait to whisper it apart to the stranger, my Sister had anticipated me. I have not attempted to describe the comforts we participated in, at Elizabeths home, but should choose if I might, for my family such a snugger, it is a stone house with three parlors & a front kitchen on the first floor. M<sup>rs</sup> Ware<sup>818</sup> the widowed Sister of Elizabeth calls one of the sitting rooms hers & furnishes it, with the sleeping room above it, which in her absence at Harrogate myself & boys occupied, these look out into the garden & therefore I was charmed had been selected for such a lover of flowers as I am. My old friends the Misses Simpson<sup>819</sup> of Edinburgh call Elizabeths house their home. “Lala” is the governess of the three little cousin Picards.<sup>820</sup> During our visit Jemie attempted the portraits of even the three nice servant maids,<sup>821</sup> & Johnie was induced to stand as a model,<sup>822</sup> by the promise of two of the largest Strawberries in his fathers garden. I never saw such fruit as that bed yeilded, M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Picard cultivate their neat garden themselves & its plentiful produce rewards their industry. We had a dessert each day of fine cherries or strawberries gathered by their own hand. cucumbers from their hot bed - excellent head lettuce, new potatoes - green peas, all of their own planting & picking. I shall always associate Elizabeth with tranquil home-scenes-& luxuriant natural scenery - for when I visited her 17 years ago she was the comfort of her widowed mother<sup>823</sup> & North Gate<sup>824</sup> was situated in Wensledale one of the loveliest valleys of Yorkshire. During our late visit at Kirby one day in alluding to her suffering sea sickness if riding in a close carriage, her husband laughed & said “Elizabeth was not formed to be a fine lady” “no no ! Richard that she was not was her smiling response she was to be your wife & she envies no one” Often have I watched her devoted fondness towards this gude mon of hers with painful interest, for I am told she has deep anxieties for his health, tho he is a picture of manly beauty in the prime of life, his lungs are not sound it is feared.<sup>825</sup> This world is not our home, even such an earthly paradise as Kirby Lonsdale is not secure from the destroyer. But if trials assail Elizabeth, her trust I know is in God. Tho little John Richard threatened to break Uncle Ws carriage or lame his horses, yet we had to leave on the friday morning<sup>826</sup> of that happy week. And right glad was Aunt Alicia to welcome us in the Preston home to tea that same night. Jemie has since, received a flattering proof that he made friends at Kirby, for the kind surgeon there M<sup>r</sup> Whitaker has written<sup>827</sup> to ask his young patient to return to make him a visit, I had read in the countenance of both physician & Jemie a mutual love at first sight, for Mr W has no boy of his own,<sup>828</sup> & confessed to Mr Winstanley how lively an interest James excited. Many thanks for his prescriptions to us both, for he administered judiciously to my case as to James. by his recommendation I should have sought a sea side retreat immediately but an invitation to visit my friends at Chadock Hall<sup>829</sup> first induced me on Wednesday the 14th <sup>830</sup> inst to set out from Preston with my Sister Alicia & boys by the 4 oclock afternoon train, we reached the Astley station<sup>831</sup> in an hour & found a cart awaiting our luggage & old Peter<sup>832</sup> coming forward from the pony phaeton to meet us, but my adventurous boys must have surprised Miss Smiths steady old coach man, for he was scarcely off his seat ere they occupied it & had reins & whip in hand, even I accustomed as I am to their sudden movements was astounded & as the ponys head was turned towards Chadock I almost expected he would take them there without us. Old Peter laughed good humouredly & restored order. he is a great contrast to George at Preston<sup>833</sup> certainly, for he allowed the young mad caps to drive by turns, notwithstanding their having attempted it before asking permission. Cordial was the welcome awaiting our arrival at the old Hall from Mr Robt Smith, my dear friend Anne & her two sweet young neices & protégées Mary & Bessie,<sup>834</sup> whom I had not seen since they were little girls, for 17 years had elapsed since my last visit to Chadock. in that time they had lost their parents, & they reward Aunt Anne for every sacrifice she has made to devote herself to them, by contributing as they do every hour now to her comfort. Bessie the youngest looks too fragile to endure the storms of an earthly pilgrimage, those she has known have depressed her young bouyancy of spirit & she is habitually pensive, I saw many proofs of her deep piety during the week I was at Chadock, & believe Mary to be equally pious, tho her firmer health yeilds her a greater stock of cheerfulness. she would be in her sphere as a clergymans wife is some village,<sup>835</sup> for these dear girls shrink from the bustle of a town life. they go hand in hand as Aunt Annes housekeepers alternately, or in works of charity, their recreations are reading aloud to her or to each other over embroidery, or Bessies wax flower making, but I observed they began every day directly after breakfast by the study of Gods word, they regularly retired to their own room together, to read from the same bible,

& it was the last subject with the trio before retiring at night. If I had lost my full appreciation of the value of time in a four years. absence from a land of gospel light, I have been brought to reflection by the example of these conscientious young disciples. How very often I wished dear Debo had been with us that week at Chadock. The country around it tho so entirely unlike Kirby Lonsdale was as charming to me, we were favored in a continuance of fine bright weather for daily walks or drives. it is a fine farming district, & a plain so very extensive, would perhaps have wanted variety but for the shades of green, in the newly mown fields, contrasted with waving wheat, barley and oats, with their rich hawthorn hedges separating them & the quantity of wood land interspersed, the trees are many of them very large, & with the help of fancy I could imagine the ocean in the distance, for the tallest looked like a fleet in the distance. Often in our rambles we would see partridges or rabbits or pheasants, for the Earl of Ellesmere<sup>836</sup> has much game on his estate & all the neighbourhood around Chadock Hall is his property. himself & his Countess<sup>837</sup> are deservedly beloved for they are promoters of improvement in the condition of the poor<sup>838</sup> all around there, he has built a new castle at Worsley<sup>839</sup> since I first knew the neighbourhood, & the prettiest new church<sup>840</sup> within walking distance of it I ever examined. it was at evening service there my boys discovered the preacher by his earnestness & idiom to be Irish.<sup>841</sup> but Mary Smith had interested me so much in the rightful & youthful incumbent<sup>842</sup> that I cannot help wishing his health may be restored & that the temporary pastor may preach the word in some other parish. it is a nephew of M<sup>rs</sup> Sherwood<sup>843</sup> who was first appointed to the Earl of Ellesmeres chapel. but premonitory symptoms of consumption have driven him to the south of Europe for this year, she engaged the heart of an orphan who was in her voyage from India bereft of all her natural protectors by ship wreck,<sup>844</sup> her fathers wealth was in the English funds. may she have the open hand of Charity to secure her a heavenly interest, from all I learn of the ladies of Ellesmere she will have good examples. We had been within the pretty chapel during one of our strolls in the week & I had observed a printed notice in each pew, requesting all the congregation to unite in the devotions, the responses & if possible in singing the praises of God. And as we entered on sunday evening<sup>845</sup> just after the service commenced it seemed one burst of praise. the seats are all free & all were filled. we had some of us driven in the pony phaeton so Anne, my Sister & I walked home with M<sup>r</sup> Rob<sup>t</sup> & Bessie took my boys in the carriage. I was not fatigued, tho my boys had gone to their nest when we reached Chadock. for Jemie had walked both morning & afternoon to the Ellesmere Chapel 1 1/4 mile distance & I had desired they should wait to bid me good night after my experiment. The air is certainly better for me at Chadock than here at the Ocean, but my boys enjoy the bathing, & I hope it may be for their good we came hither.

Preston. September. Saturday 10th <sup>846</sup> Seated in the pleasant back chamber at my dear twin Sisters which has been occupied by my Sister Alicia & I all summer, when after our various excursions we return to this home, I determine this bright morning to endeavour to recollect as distinctly as I can the scenes thro which I have passed since my last date. Let me first record my own restoration to health, for in the search, writing & reading have been neglected. & while I regret not having been able to note down in succession the scenes we have passed thro, the many dear friends we have visited & who have visited us, I feel that it would have been wrong to have tied myself to the desk. While at the cottage at South Shore my dear Sister & Brother Winstanley came to spend a few days with us, bringing the carriage load. the boys could scarcely wait till it stopped for them to give three cheers. & how glad we all were to see our own Mary<sup>847</sup> on the dickey with George & his wife. Jemie said we had a feast day, that day for so many good things were brought to add to the good things we had provided in expectation of their coming to dinner. to hominy & fresh milk was added the luxury of cream & fresh Eggs in abundance for breakfast. the boys lamented when their indulgent Uncle & Aunt must leave us & cousin Anne Clunie<sup>848</sup> went too! Jemie wished to have gone back with them home. but I thought we must fulfil our fortnight.<sup>849</sup> I must not forget to mention the day we all went to dine at the rectory at Poulton.<sup>850</sup> M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> John Hull<sup>851</sup> were so kind & hospitable & their governess<sup>852</sup> entered into all the sports of the children, our boys seemed to win her admiration the weather was most propitious, so that the games were all upon the green sward under large walnut trees & as we older folks sat at the window we shared the enjoyment. How almost enviable I thought M<sup>rs</sup> Hulls lot, such a home, so retired from bustle yet so conveniently situated for her husbands duties he need scarcely be gone an hour from her, & their large family (Lucy the eldest only the age of our Jemie)<sup>853</sup> all so bright & so dutiful & so fond! We went to see the church,<sup>854</sup> where there is an elegant monument to the memory of the father of the pastor - my kind friend old Doctor Hull<sup>855</sup> of Manchester is buried at Poulton his native town. At dinner we had very fine fruit, but the children who had been allowed the favor of coming to table, were considerably released at dessert, that they might gather theirs in the garden, where all sorts of ripe berries abounded. we afterwards joined them there.

We went often to see poor old Aunt Wilkin<sup>856</sup> at Black Pool where she resides with her daughter Priscilla, who married an honest carrier,<sup>857</sup> & takes lodgers thro the summer, for their house is finely situated on the beach. How many solitary musings I had in my strolls upon that long beach at low tide! when the dear boys were amusing themselves with bow & arrows. or on donkeys or in throwing stones as far as they could send them into the surf. But the last bathe was taken the second saturday<sup>858</sup> there & we had a fine afternoon to return bag & baggage to Preston. My Sister Eliza & kind Mr W were waiting at the Station to welcome us. & had scarcely done so, ere they were met by one of the servants telling them Sir James Wemess<sup>859</sup> was at the house. he afterwards went again with as many as could make the exertion, back to the station to see Mr & Mrs Ormerod<sup>860</sup> passing thro, for my part I was obliged to lie down on the sofa after my journey, until tea time. It is surprising how much fatigue my Sister goes thro, tho she cannot now bear the excitement of entertaining many at a time as she used to do. there is an incessant demand upon her hospitality & sympathies. each day she regularly visits an infirm old lady to cheer her in a sick chamber. Mrs Walton<sup>861</sup> would feel alarmed if she staid away without sending word that something extraordinary prevented it. this grateful old lady is continually racking her brain to think what she can find for Mrs Winstanley! & her amiable daughter Agness<sup>862</sup> delights in inventing & seconding these little surprises of her invalid mother. My sister laughs & asks the old lady if she fancies she has a poor look? & Mr Winstanley advises Eliza to take a basket of her arm, for seldom two days elapse without her bringing home some nice thing insisted upon. We had not long time allotted for Preston upon our return from South Shore ere the day was fixed by my friends in Liverpool for my visit to Cambridge St.<sup>863</sup> poor Jemie had left undone much which he applied himself to accomplishing the last day. there was a sketch of Aunt Winnie<sup>864</sup> promised to Miss Clunie.<sup>865</sup> & a beautiful engraving of Miss Waltons<sup>866</sup> long waiting to be copied, he did copy the old hermit at his devotions<sup>867</sup> very correctly, tho he had only a common pencil & fools cap paper. Aunt Eliza said she should have it framed.

I set out for Liverpool with my boys only, as Aunt Alicia could not leave Preston until her cousin should to return to Scotland, & we had no time to lose. I was glad to have enjoyed the society of Cousin Anne Clunie three weeks in all. for I have always loved her & she is a true christian.

Dear Eliza & John Sandland were waiting for us at the Edge Hill station,<sup>868</sup> & soon we were driven to the snug home of their dear mother. how warm & comforting was the embrace of this friend of my youth. "Oh how like you are what your dear mother was when I first saw her!" she said to me when she had told me over & over how glad she felt to see myself & boys. I found Mrs Sandland looking so interesting fair after her severe illness, that tho so delicate in appearance she seemed to have become younger, her hair is still beautiful & her eyes looked less dejected than they had been many years ago they must be always beautiful. she was wearing blue ribbons on her blond cap – but now alas she is again in deep mourning, for within this last week both Mr Jno Grayson & his sister Bessie<sup>869</sup> have been released by death from great suffering, they died happy! speaking of their trust in an all sufficient Saviour, & dear Mrs Sandland is now at Roby<sup>870</sup> comforting her bereaved relatives – I shall ever treasure up the memories of kindnesses experienced daily at 10 Cambridge St my friends made myself & boys so much at home. John Sandland seemed to feel he could not be too condescending to Jemie & Willie & devoted himself to their amusement, even to country strolls to help them fly their kite. he had reminiscences of my making a pet of him when I was a school girl & he a "little one"<sup>871</sup> And he was so partial to my boys as to fancy them more intelligent than lads of their age are generally. he showed them the Docks. took them to the Assizes<sup>872</sup> to hear a trial & see the Judges in their big wigs – he was most amused at the greeting between a countryman of ours with them when he gratified their wish to go on board an American ship. the mate a Massachusetts man would scarcely let them go ashore again he and Jemie were so communicative, so truly "hail fellow well met"<sup>873</sup> I availed of opportunity for hearing the greatest pulpit orator of Liverpool,<sup>874</sup> altho M<sup>rs</sup> Sandland does not frequent St Judes. it is not distant from her house. Eliza went with me to the thursday<sup>875</sup> lecture the very first evening of my arrival, I had heard the eloquence of M<sup>r</sup> M<sup>c</sup> Neill (now Doctor extolled, & perhaps it was because of such extravagant praise I was at first rather disappointed, his discourse was from the 6th of Romans.<sup>876</sup> it certainly was excellent, for Hugh McNeill is a most clear reasoner. I went again on Sunday morning,<sup>877</sup> the aisles were filled, but so many families being out of town there was not the usual difficulty of obtaining seats in pews & we faced the reverend speaker, who wins each time more & more upon his auditors. the whole service is most impressive. A lady member of the congregation—is the only female in the not numerous choir, her voice is very fine, simple tunes are selected as most easily joined in by the whole congregation. The illustrations given to his subject by M<sup>r</sup> McNeill are very beautiful, he preaches without notes. referring from time to time to the little pocket bible which he has open in his hand. as tho he is most attentive to the written word, which he seems to have by heart. In the evening he preached from 2nd Epistle of St Peter.<sup>878</sup> I was sorry not to have taken my Jemie to hear him, as he described the works which would be burnt up!<sup>879</sup> even every thing however important in the estimation of man - which is not to the glory of God! Oh how rivetted was the attention of the hundreds who filled aisles & pews & galleries! may it not have been in vain! On monday I went to see my friends the Blis's for the last time at the American boarding house in Duke S<sup>t</sup>.<sup>880</sup> Sarah B took charge of a pot of Ivy plants for my Sister Kate, M<sup>rs</sup> Bliss promised to deliver a parcel to my dear mother from me. I cannot say I envied them embarking in the Montezuma<sup>881</sup> that day, tho the ship is so fine, so many emigrants were to be fellow passengers. these kind friends had told me much of their Swiss tour in a first call I made them in Liverpool, they described Debo as quite a heroine & said she had been such an acquisition to their party.<sup>882</sup> but they had been obliged to give her up to our friends in London, M<sup>rs</sup> Clarke Haden<sup>883</sup> claimed the fulfilment of our daughters promise to visit her in Deans Yard

Westminster.<sup>884</sup> And the Maingays at Woolwich<sup>885</sup> must have their share. So when I first took possession of a pretty cottage over at Egremont on the Cheshire coast<sup>886</sup> to give Jemie more sea bathing, Eliza Sandland only accompanied myself & boys. Aunt Alicia & our servant Mary soon after joined us from Preston. The weather was hot in Liverpool, we realized how preferable the opposite side of the river was whenever we were attracted to the city to shop, but the crossing in the ferry steamers we found very agreeable with each its band of music. Eliza & I sometimes exerted ourselves to rise early enough to take a stroll before breakfast, her dear mother occasionally would cross over from the city to spend a long afternoon with us, she enjoyed as much as we did the walks in which the environs of Egremont abound, & while we three were enticed to wander thro pretty lanes & corn fields, John Sandland would join my boys in their juvenile sports, reporting to me, when 7 o'clock assembled us all around our frugal evening meal, that they had been boys together. I must not omit to record the friendly attentions of Mr Vallances<sup>887</sup> family to us, it was pleasant to me to meet an early friend in his sweet little wife,<sup>888</sup> & her brother George Dunscombe<sup>889</sup> being on a visit from my native land to his own, could tell me much of my own dear brothers family circle at New York. Mrs Vallance has a numerous family circle of her own now, her eldest daughter Minnie<sup>890</sup> a girl in her teens I took great interest in, because of her amiability & self devotion to her mama & the little ones. she spent an afternoon with us at the cottage Mr Edw<sup>d</sup> Maude<sup>891</sup> also was very attentive to us. I had been introduced to him when he passed thro Preston, he supped & slept at Mr Winstanleys, & is a favorite. his lodgings being near ours on the beach, he stopped sometimes to take my letters for Russia or America to the Liverpool post office, sometimes we met in crossing the ferry, & once he made leisure to take my boys fishing, And when at last the day was at last the day was appointed for my dear Debo leaving London with Emma Maingay as her companion, he politely met them at the station in L Pool & brought them to our cottage door. little Willies eagerness to see Sister was so great, he waited at the Egremont ferry & capered by her side all the way, till Jemie at our gate claimed the turn of bringing her to Mother. How happy it made us to have Debo restored to us in safety after all her perils by sea & land, but tho her countenance looked cheerful, to me she appeared not to have regained health in her tour thro Switzerland, she was very eager to recount to me in a tête à tête on the sofa after tea her pleasant visit to the kind Hadens at Deans Yard, & as I had lost my voice by a severe cold (caught thro imprudently prolonging my enjoyment in bathing) hers sunk to a whisper, as she described to me each member of the family. I was not suspicious of any other cause than sympathy in my inability to speak above a whisper. & therefore did not trace the many symptoms of her mind being ill at ease to the true cause in the day or two succeeding her joining us at the sea side. On thursday the 26th of August however all was explained satisfactorily by letters from 62 Sloan St from an unknown member of the Haden family,<sup>892</sup> & also vouchers from his Aunt in Deans Y<sup>d</sup> never did I realize the friendship of dear Annie Ormerod so truly, I found she had acted as a tender mother to my daughter while under her protection, & she wrote that the young physician her husbands nephew who had attended herself thro several illnesses, was soliciting her influence for our consent to his union with Debo. The brief period of their acquaintance we must overlook because of the long friendship between his family & our own<sup>893</sup> - the surprise must be softened to Whistler & I became at once an Amenuensis, in copying the letters which came daily from London, those from our old friend Annie O. now M<sup>rs</sup> Clarke Haden of course being the best vouchers for all that others wrote in favor of the nephew of her husband.<sup>894</sup> Dear Debo herself arose very early to write her fond father upon this most important event of her young life.<sup>895</sup> And she chose also to acquaint her Aunt & Uncle Winstanley, a day only elapsed ere she received their blessing, but we must yet wait long ere she can receive that of her father or know whether he can comply with our united wishes for his coming to England to meet us.<sup>896</sup> Debos heart is so set upon the accomplishment of Seymours hopes for their union this autumn, her Aunt Eliza says we might as well chop her head off as propose her going back to Russia & indeed she seems to depend upon daily communications to & from Sloan S.<sup>t</sup> - for as the youthful pair had plighted their troth I could not oppose their very natural wish to write each other, tho a visit from the lover is deferred until we have the countenance of Whistler to give opriety to it. M<sup>r</sup> Hadens mother<sup>897</sup> wrote Debo at once upon learning the state of his affections, of her entire approval. Mary Boott who is the affianced of his (only brother) Charles,<sup>898</sup> has written in the most lively strain her delight that her dear little D is to be one among them. while Rose Haden<sup>899</sup> the young & only sister of these fond brothers is only prevented by her timidity writing the favored one. Seymour has sent Debo a brief memoir in print, of his father,<sup>900</sup> which tells us he also was a physician, a man of worth & talents beyond the common lot, that he wrote many valuable treatises on medicine, & was conspicuous as a member of a musical coterié, he died young. The great talent for music among all this family of Haden, might lead to the presumption of connection at least with the celebrated composer, but that the name is spelt differently.<sup>901</sup> Our friend M<sup>rs</sup> Kirk Boott,<sup>902</sup> having always been particularly partial to Debo, will I think be well pleased that her favorite nephew Seymour is to bring the dear girl into their family circle. he no doubt has written to inform them in Boston. altho we have only to our own George disclosed his sisters prospects. until we have her fathers views as to the marriage. dear little Willie & Jemie have not the least idea that their sweet “Sis” is seeking a home in England. when they know it, they will become better reconciled to remaining at Holly Bank,<sup>903</sup> in the prospect of spending their holidays with her occasionally — And now have months elapsed since my poor journal was opened,<sup>904</sup> we did not doom our dear boys to a separation from us, for when their father joined us at Preston to give away their sister in marriage, he could not bear to part from all at once. M<sup>r</sup> Stewart expressed his regret at their removal from his school in the most flattering terms, saying that their example would have been valuable to the other boys. indeed I had observed with grateful emotions that the blessing from on high, upon our training them, had enabled Jemie especially to resist temptations among his play fellows, that he had not yeilded to their persuasions to deceive their masters & that when he had made mistakes, he still had courage to confess his fault. May God always continue to my darling James & Willie tender consciences, that they may never prevaricate. It was with fervent prayer I sought counsel from God in our important decision as to whether to leave our boys in England, or to bring them back to Russia, for I knew their fond father would not without due consideration decide, as he would make any sacrifice of selfish inclination for their future good, especially for James health. We went to Holly Bank together the next day after Whistlers arrival at Preston (I have not described that, tho it was so exciting at the time, my spirits had been at the lowest ebb, when my Sisters went out hoping to bring me at least a letter, on their way to the office Sister Alicia discovered G W W in the large white familiar characters upon some trunks a porter was wheeling across from the rail road station,<sup>905</sup> she sprung forward to embrace them, but happily fell upon Whistler, who became as eager as my sisters to reach home for the public exhibition of feeling made him shrink from public gaze! how welcome he was to us all! the transition from a most painful state of suspense & anxiety, to joy was almost too great for me. and we thought him looking so well! & he had not experienced any of the storms, which had made me tremble for his safety. Oh how delighted he was to have Debo beside him! he was rather shocked at finding the wedding day fixed, without waiting for him, it was monday he arrived & thursday was to have been the day, he must be in London that day to deliver government despatches,<sup>906</sup> so it was put off till Saturday)<sup>907</sup> there was so much bustle in anticipation of winding up Debos affairs at Preston, that her father & I were glad to find ourselves occupying a car of the 1st class on our way to Liverpool. it was beautiful bright weather. the sail to Birkenhead was lovely & Oh how delighted our boys were to welcome us at school. we did not then think they were to return to it only to say farewell to Mr & Mrs Stewart,<sup>908</sup> who seemed so fond of them. we asked for them to visit Preston for some days. their carpet bag was soon put up, a new suit of clothes for each having been completed by order – Tom Clunie<sup>909</sup> had taken them to the most fashionable tailor<sup>910</sup> for a new Polka jacket<sup>911</sup> & pr of white trowsers. tho I had not let the secret out that these were for bridal array– We lunched at a confectioners in Bold St<sup>912</sup> instead of dinner & then put Willie in a Fly<sup>913</sup> with the carpet bag &c to deposit at Mrs Sandlands & wait our coming there. Jemie went shopping with father & I, each of our boys seemed happy to be at our disposal any way. I had to select a diamond pin for Seymour & a bracelet for Emma<sup>914</sup> as bridal gifts from Debo. It was late in the afternoon when we reached 10 Cambridge St<sup>t</sup> our kind friends there were so glad to see us! to welcome Whistler after five years separation,<sup>915</sup> John really shone as master of the house, I was only sorry my husband could spend so brief a time with him, they went out to a stationers together, leaving us ladies to talk over the wedding, as we had not met since they had been informed of the sudden event in darling Debo's life. they entered so kindly in our feelings & mingled thankfulness at Debo's bright prospects, & our struggle in giving her up for life! they had attended to the wedding cake &c for me in Liverpool. How touching such proofs of friendship as I gazed on their own deep mourning for their dear Bessie & Mr John Grayson.<sup>916</sup> Yes two had been taken in youth, from their family circle since I had last seen them, & they had wept for the surviving mother<sup>917</sup> & the young widow & two fatherless boys. John Sandland has sent me the obituary he had written upon his cousin J G's death.<sup>918</sup> We were obliged to leave our sincere & affectionate friends directly after tea, to be in time at the station for the last train, when we reached Preston there was our good Mary & Betty<sup>919</sup> in waiting, who took all care of parcels & boys off our hands, & it was not many minutes ere<sup>920</sup> we were welcomed in Uncle Winstanley's parlor. "What did you come for you good for nothing chaps?" "We thought you wanted to see us, as much as we did you" answered Jemie with the tone of a privileged favorite. The next evening<sup>921</sup> Whistler started to travel all night to London taking Jemie with him for company. Debo had written Seymour at what hotel he would find her father the day he had appointed for their personal introduction to each other. & at 11 o'clock the young man was punctual, each had much business to finish in that day, thursday, for they were to journey back to Preston together at night, but Whistler managed to go to Sloane St to dinner supposing Seymour's mother & sister were there. so Jemie saw nothing to amuse him in that day's visit to London, for father & he were driving about from one place to another all day. The trio reached Preston at midnight, it had been as busy a day with us there, & I was still in the girls room, where I had spent the whole evening helping Debo to look thro her treasures, to see what I must pack up & what she would give away for I knew her father would not be willing to spare me from his side. I was the only one in the house who had not undressed. but not expecting our travellers till morning I was frightened by pebbles rattling against the windows of the girls room, supposing the only light had attracted a mob, for 20 factories having been shut up there were alas I knew discontented spirits enough, to raise a disturbance, & gentlemen among the manufacturerers having been late calling upon Mr Winstanley, I fancied were still in the parlor,<sup>922</sup> I did not know how late it was really! & the girls jumped out of bed frightened by the alarm I could not avoid shewing. I went down stairs alone, trembling, for the knocking was now at the side door. I opened the dining room very softly lest the gents should be there, all was darkness, then I went to Mr Winstanleys sleeping chamber & roused him, it was really a pity to disturb the good old gentleman, but it was a droll scene when he came out in his night cap & slippers looking taller than ever in the long fur Caftan<sup>923</sup> my husband had brought him, with his spouse of lowly stature peeping out after him, for by this time Jemies ringing voice had brought me to the street door & I let the travellers in, & above stairs. the true cause of the midnight disturbance was understood, Debo had slipped a black silk dress & visite<sup>924</sup> on and was waiting in the vestibule, to catch one embrace from her lover as he should pass up to his apartment, & there was Aunt Alicia in her night dress busy lifting poor Willie from the bed Seymour must occupy, & a pretty time she had with both the boys in hers the rest of that night! The next day there was no trace of any confusion soon after breakfast, for the nice Betty & Hannah<sup>925</sup> soon ordered all the apartments & Aunt Alicia chose one to herself in the attic. I dont like to recal that day to mind. for Whistler was not well, I staid in our room all day by his bedside. Debo was shut up in the little parlor with Seymour directing bridal cards to his hundred friends, to announce that Mr & Mrs Seymour Haden would be “at home” on the 15th of November at 62 Sloane S! Ah what a pity that worldly ceremony made Debo forget her dear father that last day she might have been with him, but she was so delighted with her bright prospects, she could not suspect that the approaching separation was making father ill. the business of her wedding, was destroying all sentiment! Oh if we could have had it under our own roof we should not have had such a bustle. Yet dear, kind, Aunt Eliza took it all off our hands, & was as busy as a bee all day in preparations for the bridal dejeuner. Mr Clarke Haden arrived from Fleetwood<sup>926</sup> in the evening, as it had been arranged by the Vicars<sup>927</sup> permission that he as Seymours Uncle should perform the ceremony. he had written a most beautiful letter<sup>928</sup> previously to Whistlers arrival, over which we had all shed tears & Aunt E would have me copy it for her to preserve with the last dear Annie had written her. Whistler made the exertion to get up for tea, that we might evince every respect towards the Rev<sup>d</sup> Uncle, but Oh it was painful the gloom which hung upon our spirits. Emma whispered me for mercys sake, to propose music, I did ask Seymour if I might have the pleasure of hearing him chaunt with the girls, but he thought his poor Uncle would associate it with the past & be over come, so we had to try to talk, but every one seemed pre-occupied, & the Vicar called upon Mr C Haden, & Seymour was summoned to the dining room to see him too. I had put up a pr of white silk gloves for each the maid servants with a half sovereign slipped in the finger as Miss W-s parting gift after prayers, & the coachman George his pair with a sovereign. My Sister selected the 12th Chap of Romans<sup>929</sup> which she read very impressively, previously having told us, that it had been a favorite of her Grandmothers.<sup>930</sup> That night every thing had been ordered so that we should be like clock work, to lose not a moment of Debos wedding day. her trunks were already packed. The 16th of Oct was one of the brightest days ever experienced in England. When I first met my Sisters they were all dressed in satins, & ready to be bonnetted. Mr Winstanley was seated in the little parlor where any one who wished coffee or tea buttered toast or dry or even an egg might go sans ceremonie & take it. Before the bride & only brides maid Emma put on their shubes to go to the carriage, the half dozen maid servants<sup>931</sup> begged to be admitted to their chamber to see & admire them. I think there were three carriages to drive us to the old Parish church. I congratulated the young ladies their dresses were quite covered by the long black satin shubes. for unluckily it was market day & Fishergate was thronged early as it was. As we encircled the altar in the nave of the old church, so gloriously shone the sun thro the eastern windows, that rainbow hues covered the Altar. we were only a family party – little Johnie Chapman<sup>932</sup> was the only spectator & he told his mama<sup>933</sup> on his return home, he had been blinded by the tears, which would come as he thought Miss Whistler was going away from them forever! affectionate little fellow! The so lately-widow'd uncle read the service most impressively, but when he put his hand upon the head of the newly wedded pair to bless them, his words almost choked him - no doubt thoughts of Annie rushed to his mind - but he recovered his self command for the rest of the day – I was annoyed by the rudeness of the crowd pressing upon us as we attempted to get from the church to the carriage, Mr Winstanley expected it & had filled our boys pockets & his own with sixpences, but still he cried shame on the English custom<sup>934</sup> while the shower of silver diverted the rude people from us & we soon drove home The Vicar only was invited to the bridal dejeuner, it certainly was ample & elegant, on each side of the ornamented wedding cake were the beautiful bouquets which Mrs Chapman had sent to London for in the expectation that the bride & Emma (the only brides maid – would have held them. but choice & aromatic as were the flowers, they would have been inconvenient to carry, they graced the table, which had also a great display of the Winstanley plate; dear Debo was seated between her father & Seymour, looking the happiest of the happy, not thinking of how soon she was to part from the gentle & indulgent parent but full of fond anticipations of a bright future with the young protector her heart had selected. she wore her white chip bonnet<sup>935</sup> during breakfast & Emma a pretty rose colored bonnet. When the health of the young pair was proposed in champagne, poor Whistler raised his eyes to the portrait of my brother William over the mantle peice opposite where they sat, & said “let us next drink to the health of our brother, who would I am sure take a lively part in, what now engages us if he could be here”<sup>936</sup> — The passing of wedding cake thro the pure gold ring Debo was then required to condescend to.<sup>937</sup> soon after which I went with her to her room that she might change her white dress for a travelling one, which was equally becoming. While there Mrs Chapman & her daughters<sup>938</sup> came to say adieu, as they wished me joy it sunk like a knell upon my heart. When we went down stairs<sup>939</sup> the drawing-room our friends from the Cliff<sup>940</sup> were there, & Whistler & I had to endure all their congratulations, well meant no doubt, but surely if any had reflected upon the sacrifice we had been required to make, the most delicate & feeling attention to our feelings, had been silence. Debo bid us good bye without a tear, her eyes shone with happiness, & surely a brighter sunshine in England never shone, than that of the 16th of last Oct. Neither Whistler or I saw the old shoe thrown by Aunt Eliza after the carriage<sup>941</sup> as it whirled off from the front gate, tho I heard afterwards this omen of good luck was not omitted. We had proposed going to Fleetwood to visit the bereaved parents there. by the first train after we had parted from our darling girl, for our hearts could sympathise with Mr & Mrs Ormerod, but Aunt Eliza insisted we must eat the wedding dinner first, she went herself in her rich puce col<sup>d</sup> <sup>942</sup> satin & new white chip bonnet to exhibit herself to old Mrs Walton<sup>943</sup> & took James to shew him off to the invalid - as the only grooms-man - Willie who was dressed exactly like him went too & took from me a large peice of wedding cake to the kind old lady. I was obliged to appear in black at dinner, as no time was allowed to change my dress after it, and I had worn mourning for my friend Annie from the day we heard of her death, until dear Debo's wedding. busy memory had reminded me of the sad solemnities in our drawing-room at St Petersburg on the 16th of last Oct! & I thought how very similar the effects to myself & dear husband the two ceremonies,<sup>944</sup> we were assured our loss of our angel baby was his happiness he had been taken to heavenly mansions & thus secured from earthly vicissitudes & sorrow. We had resigned Debo for this life also, tho for her happiness in a new home. & our hearts were heavy with grief at the distant prospect of our meeting again, for our departure for the continent could not be delayed to welcome her in London, on her return from the bridal tour in Wales - The duty Clarke Haden had come to Preston having been fulfilled, he took his place in the car for Fleetwood with us, & as we had one to ourselves, he was not restrained in uttering what was uppermost in his thoughts, he bent his head & said in a low voice to me "Do you remember when we last met at this station you said to her how happy you thought her, travelling with her husband? now permit me congratulate yourself & Mr W<sup>m</sup> Edward Ormerod<sup>945</sup> just then came (by the Manchester train) & took a seat with us & we were not much more than a half hour in reaching Fleetwood, where poor Mr Ormerod<sup>946</sup> & Mrs Edw<sup>d</sup> <sup>947</sup>was waiting at the station. It was distressing on first meeting dear Annie's bereaved Mother,<sup>948</sup> but she commanded her feelings wonderfully. she often sighed as tho her heart must be bursting & once laying her hand upon it whispered "oh you know not what a weight is here! but she can never come to me! I shall go to her" Whistler's tears flowed as did mine, yet we felt it more congenial to our present feelings to be at the house of mourning,<sup>949</sup> & we staid until the last train, with our kind friends, who seemed to think the more of our visit, that it was a proof we could remember them on such a day. What a busy day was the next monday<sup>950</sup> to us all! Emma was to go with us the next day to London, Whistler asked Aunt Alicia to go with him & Jemie to Liverpool, & the two last went to Holly Bank<sup>951</sup> to bid adieu to it. I had completed packing Debos trunks for London & ours for the continent when they came back to Preston by tea time. Very early on tuesday<sup>952</sup> Whistler bade adieu to Mr Winstanley & my kind sisters, that he might spend the day in examining different stations on the route, he arranged that we should follow by the early afternoon train & meet him in Birmingham, as we did. Oh that dreadful last day in Preston, it is too sad to recal the bustle & the parting! after five months finding a home under that hospitable roof, much as I longed to be settled in my own home, it was trying to bid adieu. & it will be a grief to me till I see my dear Sisters again, that business curtailed my intercourse with them that last day. Mr Winstanley presented us each with plaid scarfs, even to my boys for the voyage. We reached the Euston station at midnight. Emma staid at the hotel there<sup>953</sup> with us till after breakfast, when (as she naturally was impatient to get home after a six weeks absence) we hired a carriage, the boys & I accompanied her to Shooters Hill,<sup>954</sup> the weather was bright as Oct in my native land, & we enjoyed our visit for the day to Wellesley House. we found all the family at home,<sup>955</sup> but Mr Maingay who was in town on business. how glad they all were to have Emma back again & they thought her looking so well! she was almost crazy with joy! laughing incessantly. Eliza had just returned from visiting her district of poor cottagers when we arrived, she was the picture of neatness & composure, looking so placid & with a heavenly expression on her mild, sweet face. Emma joked her sweet Sister upon a resemblance in her quaker attire to some plain good lady of their acquaintance, Eliza smiled & so did their mother, who remarked she could not resemble a better woman. “No I dont wish to look like her mama!” why not? “No earthly models mama” gently replied this follower of our Lord. Eliza entrusted to my care a good book for her friend Mary Touchkoff<sup>956</sup> at St P. this excellent book “The family of Bethany<sup>957</sup> was a solace to me in crossing the rough seas — she gave me also a Russian bible to bring home, to place upon the window of our vestibule where so frequently couriers are detained a half hour & where I always keep a supply of Russian tracts. After I had said good bye to Mrs Maingay she called me back to the sofa where a sprained foot detained her, to embrace me again. how much I should have enjoyed a few days in Elizas society. My boys had gone off to the nut trees with Fred after lunch. but little Lillie<sup>958</sup> clung to her sisters. at last I could make them hear my summons back to London. Our hotel was the Waterloo, on the Thames.<sup>959</sup> it might have been amusing to watch the boats passing our windows which looked out upon the river, but the weather was so fine & we had many friends & places to visit. Jemie would have lingered a day at Westminster Abbey,<sup>960</sup> for he had taken out paper & pencil to sketch monuments, but the Sexton at last hinted prayers would soon begin, & we must come again. It was just as difficult for him to see enough of the Colliseum,<sup>961</sup> the statuary, panorama of London & the Cartoons in turn invited him to linger. I sent Mary with the boys to St Pauls<sup>962</sup> another day. but took them to call at Mrs T Smiths, St James Park<sup>963</sup> - a lovely situation, such a treat to me to spend an evening with the lovely daughter of my old friend Mrs Stevenson! I made an engagement to go with Eliza to Clapham to see Mrs Shaws family<sup>964</sup> & Oh how disappointed I was not to accomplish it, I had been at home under the hospitable roof of Calcutta House<sup>965</sup> five weeks 18 years ago, as Anna Mc with dear Mrs Stevenson when we first visited London, together & in the two last visits I have made to London with my children, I have tried in vain to call even! for the Shaws now reside at Clapham, hourleys run there, but it takes a morning to visit a friend. & our time was so precious, we could only call at Doct Bootts<sup>966</sup> the last day. how much I had to do that day! I took Willie with me to Paternoster row,<sup>967</sup> to select a book or two to leave on Sisters toilette as a souvenir of her birth day. then drove to Sloane St. The house keeper<sup>968</sup> was very attentive & shewed me all the apartments to be graced by her young mistress occupation. Mr Hadens study on the first floor. above it the dining room – opposite to which the drawing room looks out on a small park, Cadogan Gardens.<sup>969</sup> Above this salon is Debos boudoir, furnished with blue, its walls covered with Seymours sketches of Italy & Switzerland<sup>970</sup> –opening into it is a most commodious bath & dressing room. Above the dining room – looking out into the flower garden belonging to their house – is their bed room, with its new wardrobes & every elegance for the lady fair. it seemed a pity not to see her smiling approval of all, but the sunny days of Oct it was of more importance to her to pass among the Welsh hills, breathing a pure & healthful atmosphere, she would have enough of London, even tho her home so abounds in comforts & elegancies. We left our hotel after a very late dinner in the evening, to sleep on board the Steamer for Hamburg,<sup>971</sup> never shall I forget the impression made on my mind by the contrast between those two extreme points of the vast metropolis the west end & the direction we took to reach the river, as we drove thro dark narrow streets of the city & saw such squalid wretchedness, it did not do to think of the luxury of the favored few at the court end. it seemed to us all we were driving thro a district of pollution & crime. And then the Thames boatmen! what a set swearing at each other, seizing our luggage & hurrying us so savagely into their boats in the darkness of the evening I almost trembled, & scarcely expected they would put us on board the Steamer without pilfering us of some of our articles of luggage, but Whistler did not dispute their unlawful demand for hire, as a lady did who went passenger in the steamer with us, by which she was put on board minus a whole peice of broad cloth<sup>972</sup> &c for servants liveries, while she was only intent upon a fair settlement one of the men must have sliily slipped back into the wherry this very valuable bundle, for she did not discover her loss until after she had lost all sight of them. The ladies cabin was rather confined & very crowded, so I felt thankful that I was not one of those compelled by sea-sickness to keep my narrow berth, so I each morning met my husband & dear boys at breakfast time in the saloon, and if I had not as good a relish for the meal as Jemie & Willie I had plenty of books to beguile time of tediousness, and it seemed to me such a favor to have the society of my husband, this being my first voyage of days with him. I was so soothed too when thinking of having parted from Debo ! by the perusal of "The family of Bethany," but I have before mention its having been recommended to me by dear Eliza Maingay. Oh how delighted we all felt in landing at Hamburg on monday;<sup>973</sup> not having spent quite three days on board the Victoria. the scenery to the city from the mouth of the Elbe is rather flat, but we gazed at the shores with villages or country seats scattered along, with pleasurable emotions, no such annoyances as passports or custom house inspection of luggage on landing at one of the principal wharfs, our boys were soon making their knowledge of German useful, & amusing themselves by putting questions to the people around us. we were soon very comfortably domiciled at Streights Hotel<sup>974</sup> in the beautiful new square, in the centre of which is an artificial lake on miniature scale, in which at night the lights are reflected & thus the effect of the fine buildings, is heightened & extended. The custom throughout Germany I believe is to take every meal but dinner in travelling — in the same room in which the traveller passes the night, but we asked & obtained the favor to have our breakfast table set (and a nice repast too) in the salle à manger. there was one bright little German footman who devoted himself to us. & even prevented gentlemen smoking in the saloon while we were there at breakfast. At dinner unless we hastened from the table d'hôte immediately after dessert we must have been quite scented with segars, as they were handed regularly round to the Gents. German ladies seem to be reconciled to the custom, for we always left many ladies at table at the elbows of their cavaliers. We found Hamburg an excellent shopping place, such an abundant supply of french goods especially & as no duties is upon them, cheaper there than any where out of France. I supplied myself with dresses for the remainder of my sojourn in Russia I hope! Whistler tried to tempt me to purchase a very elegant cloak just imported from Paris, it was drab cloth<sup>975</sup> lined & trimmed with dark blue, very tempting! & Jemie thought I ought not to mind giving five pounds English for it, as father wished me to look nice! but Uncle Winstanleys gift of a beautiful tartan scarf was enough I thought in addition to my plaid cloak & other cloaks at home. Whistler supplied our boys with new shubes at Hamburg, for our voyage made it necessary they should be thoroughly guarded against cold. And a blustering time we had of in crossing the Baltic so late in the season of Oct, for it was the last boat to St P in which we embarked on Sat Oct 30th. While at Lubec we staid of course with our attentive host of the Stadt Hambourg, & Jemie paid many a visit to his gallery of pictures.<sup>976</sup> We only spent one night at that curious old town & went in the same vehicle which we had hired at Hamburg, to take us, to Travemunde. We had a continuance of bright weather & did not suffer from cold as we had feared we might. upon our reaching our steamer, we immediately deposited our luggage under care of the Steward, mine for the convenience of the voyage being arranged by the attentive German stewardess in my state room, she evinced great interest in me & tho we could not talk together she often kissed my hand

& her countenance expressed that she still retained the tender sympathy for me, which the painful circumstances of my first acquaintance with her had elicited, when she was stewardess of the Alexandra<sup>977</sup> There proved to be only one lady passenger beside myself this time on board the Nicoli.<sup>978</sup> so that there was no objection to Mary having the state room next my own, but the stewardess was ever so watchful to attend upon me that I did not tax Marys services, the boys were however glad she was well enough to be at the beck when they wanted her, there were few gentlemen passengers & each had an entire stateroom except Jamie & Willie who of course preferred occupying the same & next their fathers. I always remained as late as possible with Whistler, for he had taken cold & was really ill & felt depressed. the gales were all in our favor, but we had a taste of what we might have suffered had our course been in the other direction, for having run too rapidly before the wind, the Capt put about to prevent our reaching Cronstadt too early in the morning, & even I felt sick from the roughness of the motion a few hours. We were all obliged to rise very early in the morning to prepare for custom house officers. How different my feelings now, to when I had encountered their scrutiny before; how comfortable Whistler protection had rendered me all this route! what a treat to have him to travel with. the officers were exceedingly polite to him, as his passport announced him a courier from the embassy in London, they merely asked the number of articles of our luggage, ticketed each, so that when we reached the English quai at St Petersburg, our things we all passed ashore without being required to go to the Custom house. I have omitted to mention that among the companions of our voyage were two, whom we associate with occasionally as visiters at our fire side. One is a Doctor Crawford<sup>979</sup> to whom I feel much indebted for his lending me his Church Records<sup>980</sup> to read as he receives them from London, thro favor to Prince of Oldenbourg in whose family he has an appointment,-as moral governer to his son.<sup>981</sup> the doctor is a decidedly religious man, so true a witness of our Saviour among men, he seeks the society of all christians whether of the church of England or Dissenters, his attendance at Mr Ellerbys saturday evening prayer meetings missionary meetings &c as constant as his coming to our church on the sabbath & he is one of the few never absent from the Lords table. The other companion of our voyage who visits us still is a Mr Konoring<sup>982</sup> a Pole, but of the Russian diplomatic corps. he has just returned from Brazil after a three years absence from this city, where his father resides.<sup>983</sup> he is a perfect gentleman, quite young & speaks English well. I discover that his mother<sup>984</sup> was a dear friend to my favorite Miss Funk. & that she was a truly pious lady. the son also seems thoughtful. How glad I was to see W<sup>m</sup> Maingay upon our first landing! & it was so attentive in him running to bring our neighbours to welcome us & so kind in M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes to make the exertion to meet us with her husband, they insisted upon our lunching & dining at their house & had Mr & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand & Lizzie Ropes to meet us at tea.<sup>985</sup> I could not have imagined it would be so delightful to return to our St Petersburg home, but no place had seemed so comfortable & none so commodious in all my travels. Mr Prince<sup>986</sup> had had it put in such beautiful order, & it had been thoroughly painted, papered &c during the summer, even the double windows were put in & bright fires were burning in the grates, & carpet down. I felt so grateful to Mr Prince for all the trouble he had been at in superintending preparations for our welcome home! Matvie<sup>987</sup> looked neat as ever & was very much gratified by my having brought him a new blue cloth round-a-bout<sup>988</sup> from Hamburgh, & a pr of white gloves, such as had been distributed at M<sup>rs</sup> Hadens wedding. Our faithful little Cook came to take possession of the kitchen the very day of my return, & she liked the blanket shawl<sup>989</sup> I brought her from England, she had kept herself out of place all summer, that she might serve us! Our faithful Laundress<sup>990</sup> too had reserved herself for me. she came back immediately to her old duties, I had a pretty English cap for her with bordering of net & ribbons enough to trim three. And ere many days even our good cow<sup>991</sup> was restored to us in better condition than ever, from her pasturage at Alexandrofsky, Mr Eastwicks family had had her milk for the summer, for her keeping. Ere I could unpack our trunks even friends & acquaintances thronged upon me, ah how often I thought of dear Debo who had always been ready to do the honors in the drawing room! sometimes two or three sets of ladies would call at one time, for instance as I was receiving the fashionable M<sup>rs</sup> F B. the equally stylish M<sup>rs</sup> Slatta & the lovely M<sup>rs</sup> M A came & at the same time Mad Melnikoff & daughter,<sup>992</sup> I scarcely could answer all the questions about Debo & our summers tours, especially as Mad M speaks french or Russ only. By very early rising & late taking rest I managed to get my house hold duties in operation before the sabbath came. And in due time to report our safe arrival to all across the Baltic & Atlantic. I must not omit to mention a new baby among our American colony at Alexandrofsky & soon M<sup>r</sup> Harrison invited all his compatriots to the christening of his little “Marie Olga”<sup>993</sup> Doct Law performed the solemn rite, the young Sec of our legation stood proxy for some uncle<sup>994</sup> of the little black eyed stranger, M<sup>rs</sup> Leland an Aunt lately arrived from Baltimore its god-mother.<sup>995</sup> A Russian maminka<sup>996</sup> brought the “dooshinka” or darling,<sup>997</sup> to the drawing room & waited in her peculiar costume to receive her nursling back, from its mother when the christening was ended. M<sup>rs</sup> Harrison seemed her good husbands chief source of interest & anxiety, he feared her being fatigued at the banquet which we all partook of & before it was ended, by a sign had an easy chair brought in that she might rest. As her health continued feeble she was not able to avail of invitations from M<sup>r</sup> Ropes to all the American circle to keep the Yankee thanksgiving on the last thursday of Nov at his house, neither could she be one among us at a magnificent dinner given up by M<sup>r</sup> Ingersoll our Ambassador<sup>998</sup> immediately afterd but as change of scene, quiet, & entirely relief from domestic cares, were advised by her physician I had the guest chamber of our lodgings made as comfortable & cheerful as possible & invited her to make me a visit, she brought her little Alicia to renew her claim upon her God-mother & my good Mary occupying the next room to theirs took care of both. M<sup>rs</sup> H at first could only reach the drawingroom sofa by great exertion, but her strength & spirits daily improved & ere she left us, she even rose to family-prayers & breakfast. The annual birth day party for her Henry & Annie<sup>999</sup> occured while their mother was with us, Mary went to Alexandrofsky with little Alicia & my boys to attend it, on Christmas eve our style, M<sup>rs</sup> H & I had a snug quiet day by ourselves, she even exerted herself to get in next door, to spend an hour with my dear good neighbour M<sup>rs</sup> Ropes, while I wrote my own dear Mother. M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Gellibrand came to us to tea. Whistler & M<sup>r</sup> H arrived from A with the boys from the juvenile fête, bringing us fragments of good things, but little Alicia came not back to town. Aunty Maria kept her as a hostage, how surprised I was when my guests appeared at breakfast to hear they must return home to a Christmas dinner. But M<sup>rs</sup> H looked as bright as the sunny day & I would not discourage her, by advising her to let Doct H<sup>1000</sup> govern her movements. I went with her happy husband to the English book store<sup>1001</sup> by stealth while she was directing Mary about her packing, to surprise her with a gift, it was indeed a seasonable one, a precious & elegant vol of family prayers with portions of scripture heading each & beautifully illustrated. When next I went to see her, she whispered me she had begun the New Year by using it regularly in her family circle! And since then herself & M<sup>rs</sup> Leland have become members of our holy communion! M<sup>rs</sup> Eastwick had gone up with me to the altar when I had no longer a daughter by my side, & now these two Sisters have joined us, how sacred becomes the bond in a foreign land, when those from a distant country become so united by love to the Lord Jesus! Oh may we be faithful witnesses for Him wherever His providence leads us! I was made member of a ladies committee (patronised by Lady Bloomfield of the committee patronised by Lady Bloomfield of the British Legation)<sup>1002</sup> for visiting the newly established British school<sup>1003</sup> as chiefly connected with our congregation, tho as M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrand is one of its most generous supporters M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Ellerby of the chapel also are of the gentlemen & ladies committees. I should rather have been made teacher in a sabbath school at our church, but Doct Law thinks religious instruction will be connected with other courses of instruction at the British school — April 25th 1848 And now in resuming my much neglected journal,<sup>1004</sup> to give my dear mother as true a statement as I can of what occupies me while absent from her – I will briefly remark upon the success which has not yet crowned extraordinary efforts, for establishing this greatly needed seminary for the neglected children of English mechanics, weavers & all of that class in this city & its environs. No expense has been spared by owners of mills such as M<sup>r</sup> Gellibrand, or M<sup>r</sup> Baird who owns an enormous iron foundry &c, M<sup>r</sup> Wood to prove himself a patron of the school besides unlimited pecuniary contribution, placed his own little boy as one of the boarders, having implicit trust in M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Smith (as an English clergyman, who were sent from England) to superintend the classes, assistant teachers for modern languages, governesses, house keeper, every necessary aid, to keep in order about forty children of both sexes. Doct & M<sup>rs</sup> Law incessant in their supervision & the committees to attend monthly to inspect accounts &c, no trouble, no earthly means spared! yet evils unforeseen have arisen, a want of unity among the directors, so that now the girls department is closed until another teacher can arrive to take Mrs Smiths place, as she is found not capable.<sup>1005</sup> I have timidly again hinted the propriety of connecting a Sunday - school with our church, why should we not among the thousand who claim membership with us find teachers, when in Mr Ellerbys little congregation of two hundred, they have a regular attendance of forty Sunday scholars. God would no doubt bless our efforts if we began by asking his aid! I am using my persuasion with the Americans at Alexandroffsky to open a Sunday school there this season, as the room in which Mr Ellerby<sup>1006</sup> preaches to them every Sunday afternoon would be ready for the school, & that devoted pastor could open it with prayer after his service. he has attended a bible class there weekly all winter. We have no religious instruction but from our pulpit & I fear youth is not so impressed by it as when it is personal, in a class. May the Holy Spirit teach the shepherds of Christs flock everywhere. I often sigh for some other evidences of devotion in our congregation, than the "Passion week" strict attendance at prayers in Church. During Lent theatrical performances are prohibited by law in Russia, & the Italian Opera is closed but morning concerts & tableaux vivant supply the want, & members of our church do not deny themselves these courtly substitutes for the winters dissipation. I cannot be reconciled to these inconsistencies in those who call themselves followers of Christ. Do I lack charity? I hope not, for charity means love to God & to all mankind in Christ Jesus. I have had the privilege of meeting occasionally these few weeks past a most devoted christian who has been the guest of our neighbours Mr Merriellees, & have listened to the detailed accounts of the state of religion in the south of Russia which Mr Mellville<sup>1007</sup> narrated to us, with intense interest, he has lately set out on his long journey to return to Odessa, which town has been his headquarters these last twelve years, he is a scotchman, but has acquired sufficient knowledge of many languages to communicate freely with Germans, Poles, Tartars, Turks, Armenians &c he seems most familiar with the jews & gives most cheering reports of their willingness to read the New Testament, he has often seen it used in their school, has there heard the youth in classes reading it. but Mahometans also are eager to possess themselves of the scriptures, & to all the mingled population in all his journeyings for distribtng the bible & tracts, he gives to those who are too poor to buy, tho he finds ready purchasers. he would trace his wanderings on the map, tell us where were the fire worshippers & linger over some points of the route to describe the wonders or the luxuriance of nature, where ignorance or superstition clouded the noblest work of God. he came to St P to replenish his stock of bibles & tracts. God has given him favor in the sight of some who hold great privileges under this government, & their names are passports to gain him free access & egress on his journey, were he called a missionary he would be banished the country. God put it in his heart to come to this vast field of labour, he modestly asked protection as a stranger & waited for God to open the path of duty in His service, & it is marvelous the success which attends him, we will pray & hope God will impel other evangelical christians to follow his example. he says he only wants help, for the field is ripe for an abundant harvest. I often wished that my dear mother could listen to this extraordinary traveller! & thought too how much such christian friends as Mr Nichols or Mr Lee would have been interested in his recitals, he was so ready to communicate, & looked so sincere & so benevolent. When he described to me the condition of English emigrants thro out the interior of Russia, I felt grieved for them that they had abandoned all the free institutions of their native land, for uncertain pecuniary benefit, their children speaking only Russ, reading in no language! When I told him of the luxuries which in a few months has crept into the British school here, tho founded upon the most economical system only last summer! A dancing class clandestinely begun on Ash Wednesday! &c he sighed, & said how earnestly he wished schools suited to the necessities of the English at the south might be founded in this metropolis & in Moscow. he knows intimately the clergyman in Moscow<sup>1008</sup> who arrived there last summer only, yet who has already done so much to improve his flock. he has given up two rooms in the parsonage for a school, he visits his people in the most friendly manner & prays often at their houses. his wife is also a fellow labourer with him in his congregation. It is cheering to hear of such a pastor of the protestant church any where on this continent, where temptations to lukewarmness & worldly policy, induce most to be mere preachers, deceiving themselves, they throw stumbling blocks in the way, by their own inconsistencies. We are now brought to an era of the world to make men stop & reflect, & ask themselves in what they place their trust. As my old friend Henriette Hallback<sup>1009</sup> asks me in a letter I received last Saturday from her at Frankfurt on the Maine “who would have dreamed three months ago of the revolutions which now prevail all over this continent. France a republic! Prussia with only a nominal king! the base policy of the crafty Metternich (1773–1859) no longer endurable & he obliged to flee from Austria, as Louis Philippe (1773–1850) & Guizot (1781–1874) from France. how many of Earths nobles seeking an asylum in England, the boasted soil of the free! yet Ireland is filled with British troops to quell rebellion there, & at the great meeting of the Chartists in London lately (the 10th of this month)<sup>1010</sup> there were many threatening remarks againsts the expences of the royal family, such as “what entitled the queen-dowager to receive £100.000 per ann, while the wives & children of British subjects were starving?” May God so over-rule in the councils of Europe that a better state of society be ordered. As soon as the revolutions in the south and west reached the Emperors ears, he issued the following Ukase, which was read first in all the Greek churches on the Sunday, with great effect by the priests, who made every heart throb with loyalty to their Sovereign. It was published in the journals the next day.<sup>1011</sup>

Manifeste de S. M. L' Empereur. Par la grace de Dieu. Nous, Nicolas Premier, Empereur et Autocrate de toutes les Russies. Etc-Savoir faisons:

Après les bénédictions d'une longue paix, l'Europe occidentale se trouve aujourd'hui livrée à des troubles qui menacent d'amener le renversement de toute autorité légitime, de tout ordre social.

L'émeute et l'anarchie, qui d'abord ont éclaté en France, n'ont pas tardé à franchir la frontière de l'Allemagne, et s'y répandant comme un torrent destructeur dont la fureur s'accroît à raison des concessions faites par les gouvernements, ont fini par atteindre l'Empire d'Autriche et le royaume de Prusse, Nos alliés. Aujourd'hui, l'audace révolutionnaire ne connaissant plus de bornes, ose même dans sa démence menacer la Russie dont Dieu Nous a confié les destinées. Qu'il n'en soit pas ainsi! A l'exemple, de Nos Prédécesseurs fidèles à la sainte foi orthodoxe, après avoir invoqué le secours du Dieu Tout-Puissant, Nous attendrons Nos ennemis de pied ferme, de quelque côté qu'ils viennent, et sans ménager notre Personne, nous unissant plus étroitement que jamais à Notre Sainte Russie, nous défendrons l'honneur du nom Russe et l'inviolabilité de nos frontières. Nous sommes persuadé que chaque Russe, chacun de Nos fidèles sujets, répondra avec joie à l'appel de son Souverain, que notre antique devise: "Pour la foi, le Tsar, et la Patrie" Nous ouvrira aujourd'hui comme toujours le chemin de la victoire. Et alors, pénétrés d'un sentiment de pieuse reconnaissance comme Nous sommes aujourd'hui pleins d'une sainte confiance en Dieu, nous, Nous écrirons tous ensemble: Nobiscum Deus! audite populi, et vincimini: quia nobiscum Deus! Donnée à St Petersburg le quatorzième jour du mois de Mars, de l'an de grâce mil huit cent quarante-huit, et de notre règne le vingt-troisième.

Signé:

Nicolas.

Judging from the effect of the delivery of this to the community first at the altar of God, by its solemnizing effect upon the mind of our Matvie,<sup>1012</sup> the Empereur is recognized as the representative of God to his people here, "shall we fight against God"? they say, "no, we will spill our last drop of blood for our church & its head our Tsar." The same sunday upon which the Ukase was made to form part of the service of the day, His majesty & the Empress were seen in an elegant carriage together in the Nevski at the fashionable hour for promenade & received the adulation of the crowd. indeed some reported the Emperor out several times that sunday & in various costumes, unusually brilliant.<sup>1013</sup> In the course of the week appeared in the St Petersburg Journal another Manifeste from his majesty more expressly developing his intentions, a strict neutrality would be preserved towards other nations, unless they infringed the rights of this monarchy, closing in these terms. "La Russie ne souffrira pas que "la propagande étrangère vienne souffler chez elle le feu de la sédition, "elle est fermement décidée à ne point souffrir que l'équilibre politique et "territorial, s'il venait à être modifié, puisse l'être à son préjudice. "Jusque la, elle se maintiendra dans une stricte neutralité, spectatrice "des événements; inoffensive, mais vigilante. En un mot, elle n'attaquera "point si elle n'est pas elle-même attaquée; elle respectera scrupuleusement “l’indépendance et l’intégrité de ses voisins, si ses voisins ont soin de respecter “son intégrité et son indépendance.

We went one day soon after this to the New Boulevard to see the Imperial family enter the chapel of the Menage, many of the court were with them altho the diplomatic corps had not been invited to attend, for our young Sec— was with us,<sup>1014</sup> but even the green feather of his chasseur could not gain us admittance within the limits marked by the police, there was the most reverential silence pervading the respectful crowd, for it was known the Empereur & Imperial family were going to worship with some regiments on that most solemn festival of the Greek Church, I think it was the Epiphany, but no it could not have been, it was in Lent, & was probably some extraordinary festival to invoke the Virgin.<sup>1015</sup> The loved Empress’s equipage was the last to enter the circle, she was attended by Pages in white uniform, indeed the Emperor & all the Grand Dukes uniforms were white with blue & gold & scarlet. There were many ladies of the court. and of course among them the young fiancée of the Grand duke Constantine, the Princess of Altenbourg.<sup>1016</sup> Had I kept my diary as I ought, I should have recorded the grand ceremony of the betrothal of this young couple early in February old style, I went with a party of ladies to the Winter Palace & thro the favor shewn some of the English nursery governess in the service of the Hérétier, we were admitted by tickets to the gallery of one of the great halls thro which the Imperial family passed from their several apartments to their private chapel. It was a brilliant spectacle certainly, & quite exceeds my powers of description. I had counted about sixty dames d’ honneur, as they graced the hall in velvet robes of every hue with long trains richly embroidered in gold, silver or beads, their head ornament in form of a crown sparkling with jewels from which hung veils at each side, tulle sleeves also large & flowing from the mere shoulder strap of velvet.<sup>1017</sup> these ladies attended by gentlemen of the court & military in the most gorgeous uniform seemed in gay conversation from the murmur of voices, but we know from private confession how wearisome are these ceremonies, so pompous, so heartless. At last all hurried to their places, the ladies had enough to do to spread out their trains to the best advantage, when the Emperor, Empress & all the Imperial family entered the hall from their apartments to pass thro to the Chapel. The young Princess of Altenbourg - having been confirmed the day preceding now bears the name of the Grand duchess Alexandra - she is tall with fair complexion & well formed. her dress was tulle over white satin, with wreaths of pink roses en crêpe, in regular stripes from the bodice to the train, those who saw it near (as Young Ingersoll who told me) said there were rows of pearls between the beautiful pink roses. she wore emeralds; I had wished to gain admittance to the gallery of the chapel to witness the imposing ceremony of the Betrothal, my friend Miss T<sup>-1018</sup> had used her influence, in vain it being appropriated to the children of the Imperial family. I heard the sweet solemn chanting & judged how long the ceremony must be by the fatigue we felt in waiting, to see the royal procession pass out again.

Friday 19th of May 1848. This is the anniversary of my dear husbands birth day, the only gift I had to present him was a watch guard begun by Eliza Sandland<sup>1019</sup> for him & finished by me. he accepted it with grace, telling me he had intended to surprise me with his portrait<sup>1020</sup> today but could not get it done in time, how busy has memory been contrasting this birth day with the last when he presented dear Debo with a beautiful work box, & me with the handsomest escroiture he could find. dear girl how much I wish she could be beside her fond father this anniversary! Young Ingersoll has been calling & reminds me it is a year today since he arrived at St P, our friends the Bliss' with our ambassador.<sup>1021</sup> What a contrast in the weather! now so hot we can only venture out to walk before breakfast or after tea, & have our balcony door open to admit the breeze from the Neva, then the harbour was full of ice & the shore covered with snow, & we all going out in Shubes Yesterday<sup>1022</sup> was the grand review in the Champ de Mars, once seeing that is enough imposing as it is, & the heat of the weather being so excessive & so sudden, we were better off in the shady walks of the Summer Gardens, there is only a Canal between them & the Champ de Mars, so we heard the martial music (rather a treat in St P tho there is so much military) & saw the plumes waving. we returned to our own sweet cool lodging, by water as we had gone. our next door neighbours had witnessed the parade from a window at the Count Koushiloffs,<sup>1023</sup> but Mrs R-s pity for the poor soldiers in the heat almost deprived her of enjoyment tho her own position was so delightful. Indeed the effect of these pageants are destroyed by quiet reflection!

Monday [May] 22nd 1024 I gratefully record this as one of the most favored days of my life. at least I know not when my heart has been so full of good emotions. We were quite ready to rise early this lovely summer morning after the rest of the blessed sabbath & as Whistler had to be at the portrait painters<sup>1025</sup> by eight o clock & Jemie was to go as fathers companion I had a motive to be up early that they might have a slight repast. As I looked at the thermometer 23 deg of heat I opened the window of our room to let in the pure morning breeze, the Neva looked like a mirror. When at seven o clock Whistler & I were passing thro the drawing room to assemble the family at prayers, we saw American letters upon the table & were induced to peep into one from Doctor Palmer to see the news. My Sister Kate the blessed mother of another little girl born on the 7th of April<sup>1026</sup> & both & all so well! Oh that I could always have a heart so full of thankfulness in approaching the footstool of mercy, which I have experienced this day! When Willie & Mons Biber<sup>1027</sup> had gone out to walk & I had attended to my household affairs to secure myself from interruption, I took my letters to the cool balcony & oh what a feast I had! why did my tears almost blind me as I eagerly perused one from my tender mother so full of interesting details of this Spring in her Florida home? it was from the fullness of happiness in being so loved by such a dear mother, and when before dinner my husband asked me to read to him the letters from our native land, I saw him wipe his eyes at our mothers expressions of tender attachment for us, then dear Kates letter written just previous to her confinement how affectionate its tone, & her good husbands p-S filled up the measure of my satisfaction I thought, but no! other favors came & I found myself as eager to devour Debos fond words, & my Sister Alicias account of her journey from Scotland, her visit to Westmoreland & to Preston. A strange & painful idea had impressed me in the unusually long silence which preceded these letters from my native land, I began to dread that our five years absence had weaned all but mother from us!

June. The first saturday of this month<sup>1028</sup> my dear James was taken ill with one of his attacks of rheumatic fever, I watched him night & day at first in the far back chamber, & then removed him to my room on the quai, it being more quiet, his dear father delayed his trip to Moscow till Jemie was able to leave his bed & sit up in an easy chair, when he decided to take Willie as his companion in the survey of his rail road,<sup>1029</sup> the cholera having increased in Moscow he could only venture there for a few hours. at midnight on monday the 19th of this month they bade us adieu the heat then was excessive, so that I wondered at Whistler providing either himself or Willie with warm suits for the journey, but even by the next evening a change had come over our atmosphere & we had a succession of gusts, of rain & hail, indeed snow had whitened the ground for hours on the islands. Then the cholera was announced in St Petersburg as numbering its hundreds of victims daily! the papers at the same time reporting that the pestilence was increasing in the interior. Our good doctor was obliged to embark for England for his own health<sup>1030</sup> during Whistlers absence from us, his going had long since been contemplated, that he should leave Jemie convalescing was some comfort to Doct Rogers & as he had decided us to change the climate for him also, he expressed the hope that soon we should meet in London. Debilitated as I was by anxiety, & loss of rest at night, it was no wonder I should have felt more than slightly indisposed, as many were complaining around me, then the tidings of deaths among acquaintances added to the depressing influence of the strange weather. I discovered even our good, sensible, cook<sup>1031</sup> who reads her bible & fears God had imbibed the popular prejudice & was attributing the cholera to poison, which she said enemies (the Poles were having strewed among the vegetable shops, & even in the river, she feared to buy rice or aught else from the green grocers,<sup>1032</sup> where we had dealt for five years. I tried to lead her to a higher source, to put her trust in God, to follow our good doctors advice about diet, & humbly to rely on the Ruler over all for a blessing, & an answer to our prayers. Twice I wrote my dear husband, & from his silence argued that he was hastening home, he & dear Willie surprised us at midnight on the 28th I had just risen from my knees for my heart was too sad to let me rest, & was wiping the tears away, when I heard them listening at the door of Jemies sick chamber afraid to disturb him. How happy I felt to go out, & prepare their room for them, as Mary had long been asleep. Ivan<sup>1033</sup> soon got some water to boil in the Sumava & they made a slight repast, after which I bathed Willie, who seemed to me fatter than ever, tho he had been terrified by rumours of cholera.

July. thursday 6th on board the Camilla,<sup>1034</sup> bound for London, lying off Copenhagen to while away time I continue at my desk after having finished my report of our voyage to my husband, until our quarantine is fulfilled & we are allowed an hour on shore, ere we proceed tonight on our voyage, I was too entirely occupied in attendance upon Jemie, & in making our arrangements for leaving home, so hurried at the last! to do more than pack my journal in my desk, to add to my notes in England in case of leisure, but I find it here, unwished for, the cholera in St P having inflicted upon us a quarantine here, the steamers always stop for coals on their way between St P & London, thus the passengers usually spend the six or seven hours pleasantly in viewing the pretty town of Copenhagen & its rural environs. James having already gained sufficient strength at sea was planning our visiting the church so celebrated for Thorswaldens statuary<sup>1035</sup> & Willie was petitioning for a peep at Tivoli gardens,<sup>1036</sup> while I had determined upon a drive to Fredricksbourg<sup>1037</sup> the capt put to shore in his long boat with his papers promising to come back for us directly, but he returned to make us feel like half crying, half laughing, as he described their taking his papers from his hands with the tongs & smoking them, ere they would open or read them. the doctors boat soon followed his & alas it bore the green flag a signal for quarantine. Yet prisoners tho we have been since yesterday noon, we have all been in fine spirits, and have profited by the excellent market, the agent of our English steward having brought along side fresh bread, milk & fish for breakfast, and our dessert delicious ripe strawberries & cream, besides goose berry tart & fine ripe cherries in abundance, not to mention fresh lamb. Our 4th of July we spent wretchedly enough with a strong head-wind, sending most to their berths. but today we have had a respite from our sorrows. we left Cronstadt last saturday evening, my dear husband went from St P with us, as also M<sup>r</sup> Eastwick & W<sup>m</sup> Merriellees accompanied him. Sunday<sup>1038</sup> we had rain, but the ship went on quietly & I read with comfort with my boys all day, on monday<sup>1039</sup> we were on deck occasionally, tho the wind was rather fresh, Jemie took no cold as we had furs & plaidies. we have an agreeable set of passengers. Our Ambassador & his Son, an Italian Countess & her companion going from the cholera to her estate in England. a Danish gentlemen whom we shall leave with regret at Copenhagen this evening he has been so polite. A french gentleman is very amusing to my boys & he goes all the way to London; we have two English ladies, & expect to take in another from C this evening. M<sup>r</sup> Ingersolls french cook is among the forward passengers, & so is a Hindoo<sup>1040</sup> whose portrait Jemie is wishing to take.

Shantlin.<sup>1041</sup> Isle of Wight – its southern coast.

Saturday July 22nd This my darling Willies twelvth birth day I have spent entirely devoted to his pleasure I bathed with him in the beautiful summer sea & poor Jemie was envious that he also could not for the doctors think the bracing air here as much as he can bear, we three had a sea-side ramble & then returned to rest at our cottage until dinner-time, I plied the needle while my boys amused themselves Willie in making wax flowers & Jemie in drawing. we spend every afternoon in rambling over the hills or thro shady lanes, & now having just come in, they write their journals;<sup>1042</sup> would that my notes were not so far behind hand! I must even run back to Copenhagen for I wished my dear mother with me the brief hours enjoyment we had in our visit to its deservedly far famed church. Our chargé M<sup>r</sup> Flennigen<sup>1043</sup> brought his barge along side our steamer as soon as he knew the doctors had left the quai to liberate us, it was so roomy & he so polite that the Countess & her maid, M<sup>r</sup> Sharon the Danish gentleman<sup>1044</sup> & the doctor<sup>1045</sup> were accommodated with seats as well as us Americans, the motive of the latter for returning to the town in our party, was discovered upon our landing, for as M<sup>r</sup> Sharon was putting us in a carriage & directing the driver how to proceed to shew us the most possible in our limited time, the good old gentleman stepped up & begged most gallantly to be our valét de place,<sup>1046</sup> he proved a great acquisition, & seemed a true patriot as well as proud citizen of Copenhagen, pointing out its palaces<sup>1047</sup> (which to us were so simple in comparison to those of St P. – but the church he was most enthusiastic about, & detecting Jemies love for sculpture he became most devoted to him. We only wished for many hours instead of one to examine & admire, as the statuary exceeded all we had seen.<sup>1048</sup> The figure of our Saviour<sup>1049</sup> I like better than any attempt at similitude of Him than I ever saw before. the expression is so benign & so commanding, the arch under which it is placed - as the altar piece - is gilded richly, the statue of white marble as is also the figure of an Angel<sup>1050</sup> in front, kneeling it holds a pure white shell & is thus the baptismal font. The ladies of the congregation worked a square carpet for the font to be placed on,<sup>1051</sup> down each side of the church are the apostles, six on each side, against the wall, full length & also of white marble, equally beautiful, we only wanted time to linger & feast our eyes, tho we tried to impose on ourselves & fancy the mellow of twilight increased the effect of our view of the church. We also saw the Sarcophagus of Thorswalden,<sup>1052</sup> in a small chapel at the side, flowers faded & dried were strewed over it, & our friend the Doctor - who had known & loved the artist personally - seemed to feel it was holy ground he was upon. as did our enthusiastic Jemie. On the outside of the church, there is also Thorswaldens work, St John preaching in the wilderness,<sup>1053</sup> every figure highly finished & in marble, so superior to the stucco images of St P.<sup>1054</sup>

But now I must change the scene to our arrival in London monday night the 10th inst.<sup>1055</sup> M<sup>r</sup> Fairbanks<sup>1056</sup> had been on the look out for us, as we ought to have been in on saturday, but the head winds & our quarantine accounted for our delay. he so kindly urged me to go home to his house, that late as it was & tho I had never seen M<sup>rs</sup> F,<sup>1057</sup> I gratefully acceded & our welcome from my countrywoman was a proof of her amiability, she insisted upon giving us tea & some slight repast & it was soon served at midnight, such is the good training of English maids & the excellent arrangement of their kitchens. The motion of our steamer still making me dizzy, I found it impossible to coax sleep; at last I was glad when four oclock struck to get up & write my own dear Whistler,<sup>1058</sup> I also wrote a note to my Sister Winstanley to announce my safe arrival in her adopted country.<sup>1059</sup> When I looked out of my dressing room window into their pretty flower garden & beyond it into Hyde Park<sup>1060</sup> I realized with gratitude to our Almighty Preserver that we were no longer tossing about upon the fathomless deep, in the confinement of a ships cabin. Our hospitable host had no idea how many hours I had been up when we at nine oclock exchanged the salutations of the morning, he had been so careful that we should not be disturbed! it was ten when a very nice & substantial breakfast assembled us around the table, I was thankful to have an appetite, for my head was dizzy & I anticipated illness such as hung over me long after my last years arrival from sea in England. but this year I have escaped it, thro the mercy of God, who “tempers the wind to the shorn lamb”<sup>1061</sup> When I left M<sup>r</sup> Fairbank’s family to walk to Sloane St (not more than ten minutes walk from Albert Terrace) it was with a promise to his children<sup>1062</sup> soon to return with my boys to them, for I supposed Debo at a sea-side place, but only Mary went back that day & it was to have our luggage brought to M<sup>r</sup> Hadens. Seymour himself met us at his door & after heartily welcoming us, ran up stairs for our own darling Debo, who had returned from Ramsgate<sup>1063</sup> purposely to be at home on our arrival, they had been enquiring when the Camilla would be in, but it was a surprise at last, as we arrived in the night. I found my dear girl looking better than when she was a bride & happy as she was then I am sure she is even happier now.<sup>1064</sup> my own anxieties pressed less heavily upon my spirit under Seymours roof where all is so well ordered, he & Debo truly are one, their tastes the same perfect harmony & cheerfulness reigns. I only missed one comfort in their home, family worship. but as I know they each trace their Saviours love in all mercies, I trust they will have the wish put into their hearts to raise a family altar, & that their servants may be servants of the living God.<sup>1065</sup> dear Debos health may have prevented her rising regularly early & his profession interfered with the assembling all together day by day. besides his brother Charles often was obliged to breakfast & go down to the city<sup>1066</sup> ere we had left our rooms. I was much pleased with M<sup>r</sup> & M<sup>rs</sup> Charles H<sup>1067</sup> as inmates, they are soon to go to house keeping & will be very near neighbours, these fond brothers – Seymours Mother & youngest sister Rose also live in their neighbourhood.<sup>1068</sup> the Sunday I spent in Sloane St. I went to the church Seymour & Debo attend regularly, where I was edefied by a most practical & elegant sermon from their pastor M<sup>r</sup> Burgess.<sup>1069</sup> he is the successor to Blunt whose writings are now so widely circulated & admired. In the afternoon I went with my boys to Westminster Abbey, where I was pleased to observe the devotion of the crowd, we could scarcely elbow our way up to the pews, and yet could find no seat a very polite young lady insisted upon Jemie sharing hers in turn, probably she discovered his being still on the invalid list. We listened to a discourse from Revelations, from a celebrated preacher,<sup>1070</sup> it was quite opposed to the Second Advent of Christ,<sup>1071</sup> which now so many lead their congregations to expect. As we walked home thro St James Park & the beautiful squares surrounding Buckingham Palace<sup>1072</sup> we were struck with the quiet in comparison to the week day bustle. this is as it should be among a people professing to read their bibles; no doubt in the thoroughfares of the city we should have been more disturbed. In the evening Debo proposed sacred music adding, "I know Mother would like it! & she begged her "mama" to lead at the piano. they could not chaunt without "Uncle Clarke"<sup>1073</sup> who was ill, but all the Hadens united their voices in sacred melodies, except Seymour who was obliged to visit his patients. I have omitted to record the day upon which Debo went with myself & boys to see my old friend, Mrs Shaw,<sup>1074</sup> at Clapham. I lamented that it was too late for me to see once more the venerable Grandmother of her children, Mrs Wardrobe<sup>1075</sup> was on her death bed! but dear Mrs Shaw did not assume a distressed tone in telling me how soon she must lose her excellent mother, for she knows the aged saint has long been waiting a summons from her Lord to go to "the Old Mans home". When I asked her, if her mother would remember me, to express my regrets at being too late to pay my respects after eighteen years since we had parted, she answered "oh she would quite recollect you, but she is too far spent to make the exertion to welcome you as she would wish" dear Mrs Shaw retains the same cheerful, lady like, deportment I was charmed with when I was her guest at Chelsea eighteen summers past & the same air of refinement in her home, only some luxuries have been added, by the industry of her young ladies she told me, elegant embroidered chairs & other gifts from her pupils, & more valuable than these because her mothers work a beautiful white lambs wool rug, which she says is displayed in summer, but carefully put away when dark days would soil it. When she proposed to my boys. that they should go out into the garden to have a feast of gooseberries & they thanked her in their happiest expression, she could tell me how it delighted her to see them such little gentlemen, she said many gratifying things gratifying to a mothers partiality & in questioning me about my number, said in her own sweet way "ah then these are the pet lambs!" I asked about her own, she has yet the number I had caressed as little ones at Calcutta House,<sup>1076</sup> her three sons<sup>1077</sup> all abroad, one had married & would soon be bringing his two motherless babes home to her arms. I was sorry not to see Kate & Georgianna,<sup>1078</sup> they had gone out for the day on a pic-nic. Debo invited them to dinner, but they wrote of an engagement. What an encouragement M<sup>rs</sup> Shaws case is to all to do their duty in the state of life to which God has appointed them looking to Him for the reward. when I first knew her 18 years ago, she had lately been left a destitute widow of a West Indian physician<sup>1079</sup> who had from his practise in Marlow maintained her handsomely, but looking forward to long years had laid up nothing, she a fond wife, was almost in despair, her pious Mother example led her to cast her care upon God, not doubting, or wavering! & fragile tho her constitution was she opened a preparatory school for boys, her brother in India<sup>1080</sup> had influence to get pupils there for her, & her establishment was thus appropriately named Calcutta house, she has educated her own children & given them every advantage, since her two daughters have been of an age to assist in the school, she removed to Clapham & opened it for young ladies,<sup>1081</sup> they have every refinement around them. But now it is high time I begin to describe the Isle of Wight<sup>1082</sup> of which too much cannot be said in praise, we had been four days at Madeira Cottage when I dated this last fragment<sup>1083</sup> of my poor attempt at jounalizing for my dear mother. Debo could not accompany us from Sloane St, so I left Mary to attend her when she should be ready, myself & boys had the inside of a commodious rail carriage to ourselves to Gosport,<sup>1084</sup> where we embarked in a ferry steamer & were soon at Ryde<sup>1085</sup> on the Island, I should have felt interested in the town even had it been made less attractive by nature than I found it, for Cousin Anne Clunie<sup>1086</sup> had talked much to me of its scenes when she interested herself in getting my boys placed last summer in a clergymans family, it is a beautiful place from its many gardens, & hedges, green is so refreshing to a town it is hilly too, its fine pier is the fashionable promenade, but were I a sojourner there I should delight more in the rural walks at the back of the town, & its sea beach where my boys could pick up pretty shells. I hired a chaise peculiar to the Island with only curtains at the sides, it was a remarkably bright day so that we were glad not to shut out the view, every turn in our road which was quite undulating, brought variety & beauty to our gaze. Willie did not forget Legh Richmonds descriptions of Brading as we were passing it & wished to stop to look for the grave of the “little cottager Jane.”<sup>1087</sup> We looked at one lodging house at Sandown<sup>1088</sup> en passant, tho our driver assured me I should be better suited at Shanklin<sup>1089</sup> & as Seymour had recommended our coming to this village, I resisted the fine open bay which is so attractive to sea bathers & am well pleased I was led hither, for we have even greater sources of enjoyment in the country walks, corn fields, shady lanes & flowers, Willie has copied many in wax (for dear Sis provided him with a stock in London, when Seymour gave Jemie a paint box) we have frequent showers in this hilly nook & are glad of such resources in doors. there are two very commodious hotels (Daish’s the new, & William’s the old)<sup>1090</sup> two provision shops, two butchers stalls, two shoe makers, one baker & a blacksmiths shop,<sup>1091</sup> the two last have rival ponies to hire at 2/6 for two hours, and there are two donkies at 6 pence per hour. so we have all we want, but the most interesting object to Jemie is Shanklin Chine, a wide chasm in the cliff where he would fain station himself to sketch the water fall, by the hour if I would let him expose himself to catching cold in so damp a shelter, pretty cottages peep out, thro shrubbery on its sides, winding paths are kept in nice order & with steps at their turns enable one to ascend to the downs above the cliff, & as all face the sea, seats there are for those who choose quietly to sit & read.<sup>1092</sup> “Tower Cottage” is at the head of the Chine,<sup>1093</sup> the house itself is so enclosed we can only see its thatch covered with vines by intruding, for upon the gates leading to it we read “no thoroughfare.” yet I have ventured to the very door, for I never lose a chance to make the impression of the beautiful on my mind; In one of our afternoon strolls (Jemie always carrying his sketch book under his arm & Willie the camp-stool in shape of a walking stick for our invalid to rest while seeking health & recreation) we discovered the little village church,<sup>1094</sup> it is in so retired a corner rather out of the village in the direction of the road to Luccombe,<sup>1095</sup> Bon Church<sup>1096</sup> & Ventnor,<sup>1097</sup> we meet stage coaches & jaunting cars going to these places, but never any bustle or dust. a shower often overtakes us, & then bright sunshine dries us ere we can take cold. What a healthy climate this is, never chilly yet never warm, myrtles grow to an astonishing height, fusias are very plentiful, often reaching the top of the thatch, so gaily ornamenting the cottage gardens, I am quite sure I have seen some here ten feet high! I have so wished for Kate to feast her eyes! in this very luxuriant soil if the inhabitants only had a pastor like Oberlin<sup>1098</sup> how abundant might be their harvest, & we should not have to pay such an unreasonable price for gooseberries &c, as we do, also for shrimps lobsters & crabs, but the shell fish is remarkably fine, & our house keeper M<sup>rs</sup> Reid<sup>1099</sup> dresses crabs most temptingly. the country people bring us fresh Eggs, chickens, fresh culled vegetables &c every day, so tho we pay dear for these (luxuries to us from Russia) we have the most wholesome nourishment for our money. We get excellent milk, set it for cream for coffee, yet it is rich enough not to appear like skim milk & is our common beverage for dinner. Then, our pretty cottage faces the sea & has quite an air of seclusion from its garden enclosure & hawthorn hedge, yet it is only a step from the kitchen paling to Higgs the baker. or from Merwoods our grocers. One half of Madeira cottage when we came to it was occupied by a family consisting of parents & three youths, but they kept themselves to their own apartments, & vacated them yesterday without our having exchanged any civilities. in an hours time they were taken by a young couple, who brought an only little daughter with their servant maid,<sup>1100</sup> we had a continuance of rainy weather so that the juvenile members amused themselves within, or they had surely introduced themselves & brought us all together in the pretty flower garden which encloses our cottage in its front towards the sea. the Philipp's & ourselves had become quite social, after my boys advances by inviting little Anna Maria to play with them in our parlor, she walked with us to meet Debo, when we were led to expect her one afternoon. we had to walk back instead of returning in the travelling carriage, for Sister & Mary did not arrive till the next day (And now I ought to have changed my date for they had<sup>1101</sup> here more than a week when dear Debo came,<sup>1102</sup> I take up my journal when I have a leisure hour & thus it is irregular) How the boys had longed for their loved Sisters coming! but she had been to Bath<sup>1103</sup> with her husband to visit some of his best friends & then to refresh herself in her own sweet home after that long journey, but at last we had her to ourselves! she came laden with good things for the boys who had only wanted herself - a beautiful bow & arrows from Seymour to Willie as a birth day gift, a block drawing book with paint box purposely for sketching out of doors for Jemie & a loaf cake for both, besides many nice relishes for our cottage table. among other things the rennet in wine<sup>1104</sup> I had written for was not forgotten, & we have had sweet curd every afternoon, milk is so excellent in this fine farming district. Now little Anna Maria could spare me from the circle in playing “pretty fair maid”<sup>1105</sup> & dance up to the boys sister when they played on the green, while we parents sat to see the innocent frolics of our children at the evening hour under the verandah, but one day about a week after Debo’s arrival there might have been a sad termination to their sports but for the providential escape which God in his mercy ordered, for “without His knowledge not even a sparrow falleth to the ground,”<sup>1106</sup> & I love to trace His care of us even in small matters. Some of our St Petersburg acquaintances having come to Shanklin for health, have attached their party to ours, right glad to find us here, that never to be forgotten afternoon, Mrs Morgan & her little Fanny<sup>1107</sup> came by invitation to pass at our cottage. I took the mama one of my favorite strolls, while Debo kindly acceded to the wish of the boys & two little girls to go with them to a beautiful large green field, where they carried her camp stool & Crochet work that she might sit & watch them shoot at a mark with Willie’s new bow & arrow. As Mrs M & I returned after our delightful walk; we saw Debo & little Anna Maria coming up the slope towards the village, we halted to meet them & soon I became alarmed by their grave expression, they both burst into tears as I addressed them, & Oh how shocked I was that Debo had been hit by the arrow so close to her eye I shuddered to perceive how narrow the escape from putting the eye out! little Anna Maria kept weeping & saying “I did not mean to hurt Mrs Haden, indeed I did not but I could not manage the strong bow” But when we all assembled at tea, the eye having been bathed in tepid water & a small plaister covered the wound, dear Debo had recovered her composure & comforted the affectionate child, all had brought home appetites to enjoy the sweet curd, raspberries, brown or white bread & butter, after which the two boys & two little girls danced on the green till their bed time. Mrs Morgans maid<sup>1108</sup> took Miss Fanny to the hotel, James & Willie bade us good night & then Mrs M regaled Debo with St Petersburg anecdotes, describing Mrs Bairds<sup>1109</sup> fancy ball & all such things which had engaged lovers of such false pleasures the past winter. What a contrast has that city presented this summer to the frivolities of the long winter, it has been desolated by the cholera, as many as could, fled to other towns but the pestilence has pursued them to all the towns on the frontiers of Russia, my dear husband never clouds his reports<sup>1110</sup> of his own health & of the preservation of that of our faithful domestics with these fearful details, but M<sup>ES</sup> Morgans reads to me hers, I am afraid to say how many hundred funerals a day M<sup>F</sup> M<sup>1111</sup> records, as an illustration of the depressing effects of the pestilence which has caused every Russian to mourn the loss of some relative, the shops of the Gostinandvor were so deserted as to be closed, & M<sup>F</sup> M writes scarcely an Ishvostic could be obtained to drive about the city, which generally is so thronged at every corner with these drivers of droshkey in summer & sledge in winter, but all the peasantry fled from their occupations in the city, in number it is calculated one hundred & forty thousand! most of whom perished from hunger & thirst on their journey, for the people in the country shut up their wells from the superstitious belief that the water would be poisoned, & tho so hospitably inclined as to share their brown bread & salt or milk with every one who demands it, they barred their cabin doors & steeled their hearts against those who came from the infected city. Since then we have heard of the cholera diminishing in St Petersburg but raging in the interior, in Moscow it has been far worse than it was last winter, it began there! We have felt interested in meeting several families here whom we did not visit in St P. Willie had heard Russ spoken in the village of Shanklin by some few individuals, with surprise, I advised him to chime in, it would be like music to the ears of strangers in a foreign land, so he charmed a nurse of the child of a Baroness<sup>1112</sup> one day, who entreated him to become a visiter at their cottage & be a play fellow with the little girl, he occasionally went, the nurse who had picked up a little English, would get Willie to read tracts to her, & explain the good stories in Russ to the little girl who knows only her native tongue. Willie was surprised & pleased to see the bible in the nursery there.

August 1ST Tuesday. At the two extreme points of the little village of Shanklin are the places of worship a very small church where the Arch Deacon<sup>1113</sup> who has lived half a century at the Parsonage, preaches once on the Lords day, alternately morning & afternoon here, the other half he has service at another village, for he keeps no Curate, and thus a small dissenting Chapel<sup>1114</sup> has been built at the entrance of Shanklin, which of course is crowded when the church is closed, & always so well attended that a subscription is being raised for enlarging it, a very zealous & eloquent young minister comes from Brading to preach once on the sabbath, & the other part of the day one of the deacons reads & prays with the people. I went to the Sunday school last sunday<sup>1115</sup> afternoon with M<sup>rs</sup> Phillips, we were sorry we had not taken Willie & Anna Maria who wished to accompany us – for M<sup>r</sup> Smith<sup>1116</sup> the minister addressed the children in a deeply impressive & interesting manner. he preached in the evening Willie went with me, there was not a vacant seat in the Chapel, he preaches without notes from the bible open in his hand, which he seems to know by heart, & prays from the abundance of the heart. The name of dissenter is merged in that of christian, when I meet with such an one as M<sup>r</sup> Smith, my mite shall be given, not to the new chapel projected, but for the purchase of a few books for their sunday school, such as “The Week”<sup>1117</sup> suitable to this community, and under Gods blessings my selection of a few volumes, may be the foundation of a library for the Sunday school which the poor children seem to need to encourage them & to make them delight in their study. I have gone several times to “The Parsonage” to see the myrtles<sup>1118</sup> which the guide books points out to the notice of the tourist as the finest in the Island, the Arch Deacon is evidently gratified to exhibit them to visiters, he came out himself to give us their history, they cover completely the south side of the parsonage, openings are cut thro them for the windows, & they are cropped annually to prevent their getting above the thatch, he put aside the branches to shew us the thickness of the trunk, he told us they must be at least a century old, that he had lived at the parsonage fifty years & they had always been as now during that time. What will the Lord say to this steward, that no trees of righteousness have sprung up,<sup>1119</sup> no young plants now nurtured, no sunday school connected with this branch of His church! the parsonage seems to be all its occupant has really to boast of, it is a charming place, not only myrtles, but fusias rhododendrums, lauristinas are of an extraordinary size & beauty there, and as a proof of the mildness of this climate, this shrubbery which flourishes only in the southern states of my native land, is never covered here. The old house keeper<sup>1120</sup> dressed in mourning & fat as the Arch deacon himself came out to take up the tale when the church dignitary retired, commended the wisdom of her master in giving their home such an air of seclusion by the planting of a hedge of trees between it & the village, especially now since Shanklin has become such a place of resort to sea bathers. We had in truth been induced to search for the parsonage by the guide book. I fear, not many weary & heavy laden souls<sup>1121</sup> find it a place of refreshment!

Wednesday [August] 2nd! Yesterday the weather was so invitingly fine, the Phillips & ourselves went to Bonchurch it was a pedestrian excursion, but we took two donkeys (slinging a prog basket on one) Mrs P & her little girl rode theirs by turns, Debo & Jemie the other, for the distance there & back was fully five mile, up hill all the road thither, I did not feel that I had blistered my feet till our return, for I was too much engrossed in admiration of the beautiful scenery, the pretty village of Bonchurch, has a finer church<sup>1122</sup> than Shanklin, it probably gave name to it, & may be the corner stone to it, for the elegant cottages all look new, these two places ought not to be compared, Shanklin is so green, such rural scenery, with its rich pasturage, corn fields & fine trees & hedges, the village built on the sloping sides of the green hills which enclose it, “country down to the sea beach”<sup>1123</sup> Bonchurch<sup>1124</sup> has an equal air of quiet, but its position is bolder, the cottages are all facing the sea, but for bathers it must be fatiguing to climb the steep cliffs almost perpendicular, to their cottages which are on terraces of the cliffs, high flights of steeps are cut, we had wound our way by the coach road to the base of the cliff where there is a beautiful pond encircled by pretty walks & shaded by trees, with swans swimming about it, & pleasure boats on its sides as tho they at times were in requisition, the shops are opposite, few in number, but much more stylish than those of Shanklin. I stepped into a labourers cottage where I saw milk was sold, to buy some to moisten our bun & to beg the loan of a few chairs, that we might rest by the pretty little lake. the children would fain have shared their cake with the graceful swans, but their long walk had made them so hungry! the milk was like cream & the girls who brought & took away the chairs when at last we set out upon our return, were so pretty & so respectful! Debo went under the protection of the Donkey girl the same road we had entered the village, we mounted the flight of steps (I wish I had counted them it was such a height) thus we had a close inspection of the different style in the cottages & their flower gardens, making such a beautiful contrast to the perpendicular cliffs which towered above them all, yielding us a fine view of the sea which we could not see when we were by the side of the lake. Our road home being down hill most of the way, we easily reached it, to our three o'clock dinner. I was rejoiced at the proof both Debo & Jemie gave of not being fatigued, by their sallying forth before tea for a stroll, Willie is never tired except when confined to his lessons two hours in the morning when he sighs for freedom to range at pleasure. so they all went, & I followed my inclination in writing dear father of their health & happiness.<sup>1125</sup>

Saturday. [August] 6th <sup>1126</sup> This morning bright sunshine enlivened us after the nights rain & wind which had battered against our casements facing the sea M<sup>r</sup> P invited Jemie to walk with him along the shore to Ventnor to search for fossils, the promise I made Willie to bathe with him reconciled him to staying behind. I will not enter into details of Mrs P-s alarm in her bath with little Anna Maria. the current was strong & she a timid bather, but I regretted she had trusted to my skill instead of that of the guide who generally assists her, I have spent the whole morning in calming her, the dreadful thought that she might have drowned her child has made her so nervous she has wept, tho the little girl soon forgot her terror in the water, in playing with Willie & looks rosy & bright as ever. Our pedestrians got back at four o'clock, just<sup>1127</sup> I had told Mary we should wait no longer for dinner, they had had a mule chaise part of the way returning so Jemie was not tired.

Monday [August] 8th <sup>1128</sup> The day being unusually fine M<sup>r</sup>. Phillips took the boys on a pedestrian excursions along the shore to Culver Cliffs,<sup>1129</sup> they left soon after breakfast, carrying a hammer for they were to search for fossils & they took a prog basket, we agreeing to take a carriage after our early dinner to meet them at Brading as we all desired to see the grave of "little Jane the Cottager. Our drive lay along the sea side, we admired this prettiest aspect of Sandsdown; A new, gothic, chapel<sup>1130</sup> attracted us at the entrance of Brading overling a beautiful bay of the same name, & having taken M<sup>r</sup> P & our boys into our carriage (for they were waiting for us at <sup>1131</sup> Jemie having toiled up the hill from the shore with what he supposed was a fossil tortoise) we determined to alight & have a closer examination of the prettiest chapel we had seen in

